For example, there is a good article on the construction of houses and that kind of material, which is fairly long?

Professor Cameron: Well, I think we tend to think of some of these things as magazine material. I am not sure—for example, we have done the same thing in our first issue of the rights of the citizen in arrest and detention.

I find that, for example, in the Montreal Star. We fly it up there. I think a lot of the things are amenable to treatment by newspapers. We have given them magazine treatment.

For example, the whole business of the construction of the university buildings in Fredericton and the relationship between Associated Designers and inspectors on the university proper is obviously minor but just to make up a news story, if anybody wants to go out and write it, it has been standing there for a long, long time, and has not been picked up at all.

There are a number of stories we could develop there. I would suspect that news-pers probably would become more like magazines in the future anyway and we would tend to go into longer and more detailed background material and not the sort of intimate news you get from television anyway.

Senator MacDonald: To go back to your brief for a moment. What are your comments on this contempt of court matter? You mentioned about the student jailed for ten days for saying the courts in New Brunswick are the tools of the elite.

The Chairman: Where are you reading from, senator?

Senator MacDonald: Page 6, paragraph 20, halfway down:

"...the values of free speech and a free press could only be invoked by reference to scattered and conflicting cases in common law."

Later on you mention you do not see the courts should be above criticism.

This is on page 10.

Professor Cameron: Yes.

Senator MacDonald:

"We see no reason for the courts to have special immunity from criticism."

Do you differentiate between criticism and abuse?

Professor Cameron: No, I don't. I do not see that the courts deserve any more privilege than you or I do. In fact if they are libelled or slandered, the laws of libel and slander are as open to them as they are to you and me.

I do not think they deserve anything more than that.

Senator MacDonald: In other words, there would not be such a thing as contempt of court.

Professor Cameron: Not by scandalizing the court. Now, obviously one could commit contempt of court by misbehaviour in a courtroom or something of that nature but that kind of contempt, no.

I might make a partial exception. I would think you could have a contempt of court—perhaps it is right to have contempt of court laws arguing against certain kinds of reporting of cases that are currently being tried. That may be correct.

But, if the decision is wrong or if the journalists believe the judge is corrupt, then he should be able to say so. But as far as I can make out if a journalist has any evidence that a judge is corrupt, if he prints that, he is liable for contempt of court because the test is that he has lowered the court in the view of the public.

Whether or not the court deserves to be lowered does not seem to be a question that you can get at.

Senator Prowse: Do you say that seriously?

Professor Cameron: Yes, I do. This seems to be the situation that developed. I sat right during that trial which went on for days and days.

Senator Prowse: We have had judges kicked off the bench in Canada and roundly criticized.

Professor Cameron: I am not saying that that would actually happen but as far as I can make out the state of the law is such, you know, that it is possible to argue that a judge is corrupt and to have a judge then, you know, cite you for contempt, without hearing the evidence or even whether he has the evidence.

Senator Prowse: Do you not think there is a difference between a situation where a person who does not like a judgment says the judge is corrupt—he was in the pay of so and so without one skinkful of evidence; and a situation where a fellow has evidence that shows the judge is corrupt and says, here it is—here is the situation. He had an interest in this and he was sitting in a case where he ought to have disqualifed himself.

In the second case I cannot see a judge getting away with calling a person for contempt of court because he was criticized. If the person had some evidence that might indicate his statement was perfectly valid without laying himself open to even worse charges of abuse?

Professor Cameron: We were never able to get the substantial question into the courtroom at that trial, as far as I can recall.

Now here, I get scared about contempt of court and talking in public about it, frankly.

As you might suspect, I do not scare too easily but this whole area scares me stiff.

We, for example, tried to—the charge was that Mr. Murphy had lowered or brought the court into public ridicule and contempt by saying what he did about it.

Senator Prowse: Where did he say this?

Professor Cameron: In the student newspaper, the New Brunswick.

Mr. Fortier: May be the witness should be reminded that his statements are privileged before this Committee, Mr. Chairman.

Senator MacDonald: That is right. You do not have to worry.

Professor Cameron: They are?

The Chairman: You can say what you want.

Professor Cameron: They are?

The Chairman: Do you want to submit a new brief?

Professor Cameron: Yes. Well then, I shall read a passage which I excised from my oral presentation.

Senator Prowse: Subject to malice.

Professor Cameron: Yes. Well, right. There is a point I think to be made that one of the judges in that case—perhaps Senator McElman can correct me if I am mistaken—but as I understand it Mr. Justice L. McC. Ritchie has been observing these hearings on behalf of Mr. Irving. He was one of the judges in that case and he worked for Mr. Irving before the trial. He worked for Mr. Irving after the trial and so forth and as far as I can see, there was no way that any investigation could have been held to get the truth or otherwise for the trial.

Now, for example, the charges that he had brought the court into public ridicule and contempt. All right, then a neutral test of that would be a sociological survey which indicates whether people who have read the article have a lower the opinion of the court than people who have not read the article.

We conducted such a survey and could not get any evidence.

Senator Prowse: That is just the way it works.

Professor Cameron: Again he is in court to show cause why he should not be cited for contempt which, as any philosopher or social scientist can tell us, is asking him to prove a nil hypothesis.

You could not prove you had not brought that court into contempt. I could not prove I had not done it.

That is why we assume normally that people are innocent until proven guilty.

Senator Prowse: This was because of an article he wrote in a newspaper. He was then called before the court?

Professor Cameron: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Was that for a decision or while the trial was in progress?

Professor Cameron: The trial was in progress but that aspect of it was never raised in the courtroom.

What was disturbing the judges was that he said in effect, "you cannot get justice in Nova Scotia", and the judges were very, very angry about that.

The Chairman: Well they might be.

Professor Cameron: He did not say that but that was the implication.

Mr. Fortier: Still, I think the distinction Senator Prowse made earlier about the two situations is a valid one. You know, a blanket statement such as this one I think could probably be held to be contempt of court. But a statement of criticism, documented with, you know, specific facts and accusations, well that is something else.

Professor Cameron: Well, the argument put in the brief really comes down to this. If I say to you—and you are an attorney—that attorneys are charlatans and shysters, you cannot jail me for it. If I say to Miss Barr that all administrative directors are, you know, of necessity corrupt, she cannot jail me for it. But if I say that about judges they can jail me for it.

I do not think somebody, judges or anybody else, deserves that kind of blanket...

Mr. Fortier: I would take strong issue with that statement because I believe in the system of justice.

The Chairman: I think we are getting somewhat off the subject.

Senator Everett: I would like, Mr. Chairman, to have the witness give us the actual statement. He has told us what the effects of the actual statement was. I would be interested to know if you have a copy of the actual statement that was made.

Professor Cameron: I do not have it with me. I think I can describe it.

The Chairman: Can you get a copy for us?

Professor Cameron: Yes.

The Chairman: We will be interested. It would be of help to us.

Professor Cameron: Yes.

The Chairman: The witness is going to send us a copy of the actual statement, Senator Everett.

Senator MacDonald: Just in case I misunderstood what you said. Did you say one of the judges worked for Mr. Irving before and after?

Professor Cameron: As I understand it Mr. Justice Ritchie—before he became a justice—was a partner in a law firm in Saint John which was widely recognized to do the bulk of Mr. Irving's legal work. He was there on the bench and retired because of age and I believe that has been reported in the press, although not in New Brunswick.

Senator MacDonald: He was not acting as an attorney while he was a judge?

Professor Cameron: Not while he was a judge but immediately before and immediately after.

Senator MacDonald: Just one other question which is a sort of follow-up on that; not on the same thing. You mentioned you thought printers and publishers should not be subject to any of these laws like libel or something like that. They are just machines...

The Chairman: I wonder if I could ask the senators for a little more order. We cannot hear the question.

Senator MacDonald: When you said "If that was so they would have to publish what was given to them or brought to them for publication".

Professor Cameron: I think there ought to be some way in which a magazine which felt it was being frozen out in some way—and we have had an incident earlier in the history of the Mysterious East, that could have been interpreted that way only we never found out what in fact was the case.

Perhaps it was, as the printer said, "production difficulties" but he refused to give any further details, so he didn't really give us evidence to decide whether that was the fact or not.

I think there ought to be some way in which an individual who wishes to print can air that grievance.

Senator MacDonald: Well, you are going further than having a grievance, you know. I take it you are saying that when a man is running a printing concern, if I want him to print something he has to do it. He has not got the right to say what work he will accept or not accept.

Senator Prowse: First of all, he has exempted him from any legal responsibility for what he prints. He says he provided him with that and then he says he must print anything that is offered to him.

Professor Cameron: What I am concerned about: obviously a lot of these things were originally confusing while I was in New Brunswick and would be probably elsewhere but I genuinely believe—as I said—I do not think Mr. Irving does take any direct hand in his concerns.

I have talked to people who have worked on his newspapers and their sense of it is there are people who get timid on the papers, but not that they ever had any direction from Mr. Irving.

Nevertheless if Mr. Irving, let us assume, was a malicious man—and I see no evidence that he is—but let us assume there were malicious men now in this position. It would certainly be possible for him to prevent the Mysterious East without any trouble whatsoever.

I think that is the best guide...

Senator MacDonald: Let us forget about Mr. Irving in New Brunswick for the time being.

Professor Cameron: It is hard to be...

Senator MacDonald: But just for the general principle. Do you think that you can compel a man to do something which he does not want to do in his own business?

Senator Prowse: How do you relate this with a policy of freedom?

Mr. Fortier: I thought the witness meant it in another way. Once you removed the possibility of the printer being charged with libel, then he would not be driven to refusing to print a particular magazine or a particular newspaper.

Professor Cameron: Right.

Mr. Fortier: Because he could do that with impunity insofar as the criminal courts are concerned. Is that what you meant?

Professor Cameron: That is what I thought was the immediate effect of that but I would like to go beyond that because I think there are problems and this is why I raised the New Brunswick thing again.

There are problems in that. There are pressures other than legal pressures. There may be problems for printers other than legal problems. It may be profitable to prevent that.

Mr. Fortier: Then, Senator MacDonald's question stands?

Professor Cameron: That is right. I think it does stand. I think there ought to be—perhaps the way to get at this kind of thing is the Combines Act or something of that nature or the line of conspiracy or restraint of trade.

It seems to me if it is impossible for an individual in a particular province to get a newspaper printed because the printer refuses to do it—not that they do not have the capacity but for some reason, which would appear to be political, social or whatever—that there ought to be some avenue of redress for that individual through some form of legislation.

Mr. Fortier: I submit there is an avenue of redress, if you leave the criminal law aspect aside. There is.

Professor Cameron: Through the combines—that would be...

The Chairman: I would like now to turn to Senator Everett.

Senator Everett: I would like to very briefly examine with you a statement in your submission.

The Chairman: Is this the oral statement?

Senator Everett: The oral statement, yes. On page 4:

"Another system would be a blanket subsidy of some kind, available to all general publications or to all non-profit publications..."

Professor Cameron: Yes.

Senator Everett: First of all, I would like to have your appreciation of the difference between a general publication or a non-profit publication.

Professor Cameron: I was going to say a general publication and any other publication. I was going to refer...

Senator Everett: Let us do it that way and then I would like to know the difference that may exist between a general publication and a non-profit publication.

Professor Cameron: Probably I should have phrased it to say "Any general publication or any general non-profit publication".

I do not see them as a distinction. What I meant to do was suggest there were two scopes that the subsidy could take. It could either take all general publications or just those who are not on a profit-making basis.

Senator Everett: Can a newspaper be a general publication?

Professor Cameron: I would think that is a general publication par excellence, yes.

I did not recommend this. This is a theoretical possibility and it is not one I personally think has too much merit in it.

I would like to see the other two suggestions that I made. I would like it to be easier to produce a newspaper and I would like to have some way of embarrassing existing papers. I think this is much more to the point and much more practical.

Senator Everett: I accept that. But what I wanted to examine with you is the feasibility of this sort of thing. Even though you do not recommend it, it is in your brief.

Professor Cameron: Yes.

Senator Everett: You have put it forward as a possibility.

Professor Cameron: Yes.

Senator Everett: You say this subsidy would be available to all general publications.

Professor Cameron: What I wanted to suggest by making that suggestion—this is why I think it is a dilemma with such a proposal—that if you make it available to some general publications and not others, then I think you are immediately into this problem of determining which one gets it and which one does not, unless it is to be used for bailing out an ailing newspapers where there seems to be some pressing need for it but even there, I do not really see it.

Therefore it seems to me the only way out of it is to say you are not suppressing information, you are subsidizing that information.

Senator Everett: Would not need have something to do with that? For example, find it hard to believe that the Edmonton Journal would be able to do it—although I am sure they could use it.

Senator Prowse: Would use it.

The Chairman: Would accept it.

Senator Everett: It would be a fairly wasted subsidy.

Professor Cameron: Yes. As I say this is the kind of reason where need would be a case in point but then the question would be well, "Why are these publications in need". "Is it that there is not any need for it?"

Senator Everett: I am sorry. I didn't follow that.

Professor Cameron: I think the next question one would have to face if you said "Yes, you can give it to certain publications who need it" then the theoretical question which is raised then is "Why do they need it? How come they are losing money? Is it because you have for example, 17 newspapers in one town and one of them is in trouble".

Senator Prowse: Just say you have two and one is in trouble.

Professor Cameron: Yes.

That would be the kind of situation. If the reason for it being in trouble is it is an incompetent paper, do you want to subsidize incompetence?

I think the problems with this kind of scheme become immense.

Senator Everett: I think they become enormous because you would have to define need. You would have no definition for it. It would have to be made on every case. You would have to redefine this to cover every case that was put forward to you.

And if the concept is advanced to permit new people to go into the newspaper business publishing business, then I would think the subsidy would be so large... We have seen what happened in Vancouver with the new newspaper there where they had some $3 million or $4 million and went through that very, very quickly.

I just do not think—I am glad you do not endorse the system—it is workable and I wonder whether you think the same thing.

Professor Cameron: That, I think, is right.

The only case I see as a much better one would be if someone were to come with a suggestion—with a documented case that the existing newspaper in town was in various ways incompetent or dishonest or whatever and having documented that case then would ask for assistance in setting up a new one, which would be a much better thing than propping up one that was in existence but may be ailing specifically and generally because immediately you have tied up to the journalistic need for it and not the business need.

What I am after is something on this general line, that you start with a journalistic problem which is by nature a social problem. You respond to that one rather than simply going around propping up a newspaper whether or not there is a need for this particular newspaper.

Senator Everett: Even if it were your suggestion you subsidize new newspapers, it really is almost impossible, is it not? It is not really a practical suggestion.

Professor Cameron: That depends. I would suspect you would receive a valuable number of variety in newspapers. I think if you can get into questions of social priorities. If you place a very high value on a free market in ideas, then perhaps you can afford to spend the kind of money on that and not on refitting the Bonaventure, say.

Senator Everett: I think that is right but I think you will find on examination that there are other suggestions.

Professor Cameron: Which are probably...

Senator Everett: Which would tend to solve the problems that are far more practical than that one.

Professor Cameron: Yes, I think that is right. I think this whole area becomes very difficult. Other ones are economically feasible.

The Chairman: Senator Prowse, have you a supplementary question?

Senator Prowse: Yes. Following on this because this is an intriguing suggestion but I think that on the basis of evidence that the Committee has before it—I do not think anybody quarrels with it—it fails for lack of practicality.

For example, let us take the City of Edmonton where you have a well established paper with the lowest milline rate in Canada, I believe, that is the cost of advertising, which is essential.

It has been pointed out to us that the probability is that more people buy daily newspapers for the shopping news and the ads and the classified ads and that type of thing than they do for the type of story that you and I have been talking about this afternoon.

Now, to start a paper in Edmonton would take a minimum of $15 million. You would have to be able to carry on with something like $5 million loss. I would think unless you had $25 million, you would have $25 million gone into that in the way of operating losses and capital investment before you would even know whether you were wanted in there.

Then, if you were successful and you devised the market instead of having a very profitable operation, you would have a marginally profitable operation for two papers, if they became fairly equal.

Then there would be a tendency for one to drive the other out of business because of a number of complicating factors. So that...

The Chairman: Senator, this is a very long supplementary question.

Senator Prowse: Now, in view of this fact and multiplying it and all the other factors, the pressure that may be brought on advertising in the Maritimes, for example—leave it right there. You know what we are talking about.

Do you think there is any possibility that the government would be doing anything except creating maybe 100 Bonaventures in trying to put a paper in competition against the 89 daily newspapers in Canada that have monopoly situations in their own communities?

Professor Cameron: I see the problem, but I would like to remind you I did suggest that these should occur only when it can be documented that the newspaper in town is incompetent or dishonest, or something of that nature.

In other words, it is not serving the public need for information.

I doubt that is true in all 89 cases although I can think of one or two in which I would argue that is so.

Senator Prowse: I suggest to you, and think about it, you may be satisfied it is not doing this but...

The Chairman: Well now, Senator, you should not argue. I think it is wrong to argue with the witness. You can question him and if you disagree that is fine, but I do not think you should be arguing.

Senator Prowse: I disagree. I want to find out whether his thinking is going to clarify a question that is a real problem to me but we will let it go. I will see him afterwards.

The Chairman: That is fine, thank you. Are you finished, Senator?

Senator Everett: Yes.

The Chairman: I want to ask you some questions. I am anxious to adjourn not later than, if not before, six o'clock. I am mindful of that fact when I put a couple of questions to you.

In Section 5 at the top of page 3 you talk about a headline which recently appeared in the Gleaner: "Jap Socialists Protest N-Test". You say, "I am expecting any day to see 'Canadian Kike Congress Calls on Brotherhood' or 'Chinks Barred from U.N.' or 'Federal Cabinet Run by Frogs.'"

Is that not really intellectual dishonesty on your part? You do not really expect to see those headlines. Are you not being unfair to the Gleaner?

Professor Cameron: No, I am not being unfair to the Gleaner but I am being rhetorical.

The thing is the word "Jap" is very analogous to "Kike" "Chink" or "Frog" and that used in the headline.

The Chairman: I am not sure it is.

Professor Cameron: Well, the Japanese certainly think it is.

The Chairman: All right. I will accept that. I think your examples are unfair. Would you agree with that?

Professor Cameron: Well, it depends on what you mean by "unfair". I do not frankly feel that that is an unfair comment because I think the shock of the subsequent headlines, I suggest, is the kind of shock that probably the Japanese reader experiences. I think it ought to experience that. That is a derogatory term.

The Chairman: This headline did run in the Gleaner?

Professor Cameron: Oh, yes.

The Chairman: I would suggest to you that the others would not. Would you agree with that?

Professor Cameron: Yes. This is the point I was agreeing to. I was being rhetorical. I was attempting to make a spurious comment but I think this comparison is correct.

The Chairman: On page 4 Section 10.

"Indeed, the New Brunswick feeling that Irving serves as an easy whipping-boy for cheap Toronto liberalism has some merit."

What on earth is cheap Toronto liberalism?

Professor Cameron: You will notice it is a small "I".

The Chairman: I notice it is a small "I". But what does it mean? Are you referring to Mr. Bagnell's articles?

Professor Cameron: Yes. Mr. Bagnell's articles perhaps would fit into that category although I admire the articles very much, but the motive that has produced those articles, I think is what I am getting at.

The feeling that I have had put to me in New Brunswick, I think there is some merit in it.

There are stories in Ontario, and indeed the feeling of the people in New Brunswick is that there are indeed stories in Ontario—what they have in mind I do not know.

But if you read stories in Ontario which are equally arresting and equally damaging—if you run a story about New Brunswick and you lose say half of your circulation in New Brunswick, you are seven papers to the bad whereas if you had the same thing in Ontario and you lose a lot of readers that really does not hurt, so it is very easy to go around poking holes about the problems in New Brunswick.

Senator Prowse: You feel they are picking on New Brunswick because it is a long way off?

Professor Cameron: Right.

Senator Prowse: It is like writing an editorial about the Middle East.

Professor Cameron: That is right. They are safe at home, miles away from the scene of the action.

The Chairman: So you do not feel Mr. Bagnell should have written those articles?

Professor Cameron: No, I think there is a tendency for Central Canadians to come down to the Maritimes, to look around and say, "This is the problem, this is the problem, this is the problem." And sure, there are all kinds of things which are obvious here.

After all I have read in some of the Ontario papers, I had expected a land of milk and honey but this morning as I drove through Rockland, I found, it seems to me, the same type of impoverished community that I see in the Maritimes, but I do not read about Rockland.

The Chairman: I am sure there is poverty in rural Ontario. I am not quarreling with you at all. I am trying to take that phrase in the context of the media.

In other words, what you are saying is that it would have been better had this criticism begun in the province?

Professor Cameron: Yes, it would have been better. It would not have happened. I think that would not have happened.

Firstly I am grateful those things did occur and that those articles were printed.

The Chairman: I suggest to you that "cheap Toronto liberalism" is an easy whipping-boy for you in this presentation. Would you agree with that?

Professor Cameron: It may well be. To me it is just producing a regional disparity in reverse.

The Chairman: The only other question I have, Dr. Cameron, and that is one which unhappily would take you 15 minutes to answer—I hope you will not take that long because Mr. Fortier has some questions and I think Senator McElman has some too; and I want to adjourn at six: subject to the time limitation, I would be interested if you would expand upon a phrase on page 1 of your oral brief:

"Private radio hardly deserves comment".

Would you mind giving us the comment that you feel it hardly deserves?

Professor Cameron: Well, I would think I am probably just repeating what many people know but my sense of the private stations that I listen to in the Maritimes practically all year, and I listened to the private radio all the way from Montreal to Ottawa, is that by and large the air is full of fluff. We have a lot of records. We have occasional phone-in programs and we have a great many commercials and not very much else.

My sense of the private radio is that it does not address itself to the kinds of news that I am trying to address myself to here.

The Chairman: Is it popular?

Professor Cameron: Yes.

The Chairman: Why is it popular?

Professor Cameron: I think it is popular because it is attempting to answer different needs. I think it is attempting to provide a kind of Muzak and advertising outlet and so on.

What I am saying, I suppose, is I do not think it is what I would consider journalism to be at all. It is sort of a commercial service. That is really about all most private radios tends to be.

The Chairman: Well, as I say, I would like to talk longer but unhappily we cannot. Senator McElman was first, I believe.

Senator McElman: Given the relative dollar size and current saturation of the New Brunswick market area, would you think there is any reasonable expectation of seeing another new daily established in any of the three base cities of Moncton, Saint John and Fredericton?

Professor Cameron: I cannot see it myself, no. Moncton and Saint John have two now and Fredericton is only a town of what—40 or 50 thousand metropolitan population.

I cannot see it. I think what one could hope for would be weekly newspapers in these towns which are more cheaper and much easier to produce in a lot of respects.

Senator McElman: The reason I raised this, I believe Mr. Costello and a number of other witnesses have taken the approach that if people do not like our paper they can start a new one. You would not then expect in the current context that would happen?

Professor Cameron: No. Senator Prowse, I think, had made a point about how difficult it is actually to start a new one. You would really have to have the resources of somebody of Mr. Irving's financial status, I think, to do it.

Senator McElman: You would not foresee that development?

Professor Cameron: I do not foresee it.

Senator McElman: In any of those three cities?

Professor Cameron: I do not see any real chance of survival.

Senator McElman: Looking further to the weeklies which you have mentioned. Knowing the weekly situation in New Brunswick that is the independent weekly, I believe you told me there is one that is in a chain, the Bathurst Weekly is part of the Thomson chain.

Looking at the current crop of weeklies would you see any possibility in any of them developing into a daily in any competitive fashion with the existing dailies?

Professor Cameron: I am inclined to back off. I just have not read enough. I do not know enough about weeklies to know whether there is any possibility. I do not see any immediate possibility but I do not see all of the weeklies, so I do not know all of the situations in which they operate, so I really do not know.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Given the state of the written press, Dr. Cameron, I wonder if you could go into the causes; how did the press in the Maritime get to be so bad?

Professor Cameron: All I can offer there would be really guesswork. I do not know what the historical background is. I do not know why some papers survive and others do not.

Mr. Fortier: Have you not ever attempted to look at the causes? You have come to the Maritimes fairly recently. You have now discovered a bad press. How has it come about?

I would think as a professional student—do not mean that facetiously—that you would be interested in finding out what the causes were so that possibly this would not happen somewhere else in Canada.

Professor Cameron: Well, I am interested but in fact instead I have got involved in setting up an alternative. I do not have time to find out what seems to militate in that direction now.

Perhaps these are some of the causes that begin the whole situation. One of them I think, is this business of local monopoly and the fact that there really is not competition

If you are in Ontario or Quebec—if I were in a news situation in Ottawa, I would find half a dozen dailies from all over the place. In New Brunswick we have French-language Quebec between the English audience of New Brunswick and the English publishers in Ontario. The effect of that is the only papers you can get on the same day are the Maritime papers, which in effect are the local papers.

And, for the kinds of reasons that Senator Prowse has suggested, this has tended to become a monopoly and often single papers and I think they have become fat and lazy.

Mr. Fortier: Is it because of the lack of competition?

Professor Cameron: I would guess that was so but, as I say, I do not really know what in fact is the cause.

Mr. Fortier: You have travelled in Canada? You have studied in Vancouver. Have you discovered good newspapers in Canada?

Professor Cameron: I have not read regularly the major newspapers of, say, Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. Fortier: What are some of the good newspapers that you have read in Canada?

Professor Cameron: Well really, my experience in Canada is limited to Vancouver and the Maritimes and the Vancouver Sun struck me as a not bad newspaper.

Mr. Fortier: Are you comparing the Sun at the moment to the British papers or are you comparing it to the Maritime papers?

Professor Cameron: I think probably what I am comparing it with is the whole works with things like the Observer, the Sunday Times and the Guardian and so on which I did see regularly when I was in England.

I would suspect that probably the same goes for the rest.

I sense though from what I see when I pick up something like the Globe and Mail or the Star or the Telegram, whatever the faults of these newspapers, they are along way ahead of what we have in the ends of the country.

Mr. Fortier: Let us take Rubber Duck Award which consists of a subscription for a year to a choice amongst certain newspapers, one of which is Canadian.

Professor Cameron: The Toronto Globe and Mail is Canadian.

Mr. Fortier: I am sorry. I read it very quickly.

Professor Cameron: We also offer a paper of the reader's choice.

Mr. Fortier: Let me ask you whether or not the inclusion of the Globe and Mail—I am sorry as I read it I did not notice the Globe and Mail—did you include it because you personally or your colleagues on the staff of the Mysterious East considered it to be a very good newspaper which compares with the Manchester Guardian Weekly and the New York Times?

Professor Cameron: I do not think it compares with the New York Times and I doubt if it compares with the Manchester Guardian Weekly.

I do consider it to be probably as good a newspaper—again from the sporadic reading I have done of it. I pick it up from time to time. It is probably as good as any in Canada, I would think.

I notice that my other friends, who are from Toronto, when you go downtown to get the newspaper if they want to know what is going on in the city seem to buy mostly the Globe and Mail.

Mr. Fortier: You have not read in the papers—Mr. Nichols of the Hamilton Spectator, when he was here, made the statement. He was referring to a book review which had been published in the Spectator and part of which eventually found its way to the New Yorker. Did you read about it?

Professor Cameron: No.

Mr. Fortier: The book review started in this way: "This book has to be read to be appreciated." What would be your comments about such a statement in a book review?

Professor Cameron: I take it this is a laudatory review?

Mr. Fortier: Before I go any further, I think I should say...

Professor Cameron: I do not know what you are after?

Mr. Fortier: I am taking a copy of the Mysterious East here of December 1969 and I was looking at the book review of the "The Night of the Knives" which, I presume, must have been written by either yourself or one of your colleagues.

Professor Cameron: Not by myself, by one of my co-editors.

Mr. Fortier: I read here:

"It is quite impossible to convey the inepititude with which the book is written. Reading it is the only way to comprehend fully."

I ask you if you would care to compare this statement with the comment of Mr. Nichols in the Hamilton Spectator.

Professor Cameron: My considered judgment would be they were very similar. I do not object to the Hamilton Spectator review. I think this is probably a fair thing to say from time to time in a book review. You can only touch on that kind of thing.

Mr. Fortier: Do you consider the Mysterious East as being a member of the underground press?

Professor Cameron: No.

Mr. Fortier: Would you explain why not? I expected a "no" answer. Would you explain why not?

Professor Cameron: Well, there was—by the way you might enjoy this—a proposal initially to call it "The Maritime Underground Aboveboard, Free and We Really Mean It Press". That was to be the title. We concluded that an underground press by and large does not attempt to address itself to the general public. It addresses itself to a group of purely limited interests, young people, students, what have you. The sub-culture, if you want, yes. So it tends to be available in certain places where these people congregate so that in a sense it is a sort of ingroup thing.

What we are attempting to do was make and in road into the full field of audience in one way that was not available in any other newspaper and would be searched for and therefore make it available to people in Dominion Stores and places like that in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and any other places in the Maritimes.

Mr. Fortier: Is there a need for an underground newspaper in the Maritimes and if...

Professor Cameron: I really do not know. There may be one coming up anyway so will soon see if it survives. We are told there is one starting in Halifax.

Mr. Fortier: Therefore its role is really to reach a limited number of persons in limited areas. Is that correct?

Professor Cameron: Yes, I think that is it; a fairly restricted section of the public is what it is appealing to.

Mr. Fortier: Have you any idea why the groups—this was asked in a different way earlier and I was not happy with the answer—why the chains have never penetrated the Maritimes?

The Chairman: With the exception of the Thomson papers in Charlottetown.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you.

Professor Cameron: Probably the reason is...

Mr. Spears: Mr. Balfour of Southam said they would like to.

The Chairman: Mr. Spears mentioned the Mr. Balfour of Southam said they would like to. In fact, I do not think anyone said they were adverse to the idea.

Mr. Fortier: No. I wonder if the witness had any idea as to why, with the exception of the Thomson newspapers.

Professor Cameron: The only idea that occurs to me in addition to what I said earlier, and I think this is perhaps the kind of thing Senator Prowse was alluding to earlier is that it may well be that people in the Maritimes prefer to sell to other Maritimers.

I think Mr. Wardell made some observations to that effect, that if he was going to sell to somebody, it should be another New Brunswicker.

The alternative papers were—for example, a newspaper in Maine was interested in acquiring the Gleaner.

Mr. Fortier: Would you favour that?

Professor Cameron: Well, it depends on which one you consider the least of two bad alternatives; that the ownership should be outside of the region which I would not like to see or if you sell it to a monopoly within the region which I also would not like.

In this particular situation, I think I would have preferred to see the Gleaner go to the chain. I would not have liked it, all the same.

Mr. Fortier: In a few words, what reactions have there been in the Maritimes in general?

and New Brunswick in particular to the publication of the Mysterious East?

Professor Cameron: Well, we had expected—and I think one of the things I really resent about the Maritime press is that it conveys the idea that the Maritimes is a tremendously stodgy place and that therefore we read the Maritime press for want of an alternative—and therefore we had expected it would go down very badly.

We thought there was probably not much of an audience for this kind of thing. In fact we found absolutely the reverse has been true and what we had hoped was true.

It does seem to be borne out to some extent in the evidence we are getting, six or seven subscriptions every day and probably half of those—I do not collect the mail myself so I am not sure if that is too accurate but that is my sense of it—probably half of these include a word of congratulation on the subscription form or a little letter saying “I really like his” or “I like that”; and the reaction has been really very, very favourable.

Mr. Fortier: Have you and your colleagues any idea at this stage from which sector of the community your readers are to be found?

Professor Cameron: Well, yes and no. In a broad sense they tend, I think, to be pretty well educated. We have a very large number of professional people. The people writing in are mining engineering and consultants’ letter-heads and that type of thing.

There are a large number of students and the faculty. It is also being discussed in the high schools. High school teachers have bought it and taken it to class and discussed it in class and the students in the high school have also been buying it and so on you know.

I do not think there is any simple reason. It seems to be getting all kinds of the public. Probably in relation to the common denominator it looks like a pretty high level of education or something of that nature.

Mr. Fortier: By and large are you restricted to New Brunswick or the other provinces?

Professor Cameron: No. It is doing quite well in Nova Scotia. Our problem has been for a newspaper we have to pay $25 per issue to have it distributed in Nova Scotia. And we have to take back at our expense anything that does not sell in Nova Scotia.

There is a separate outlet for Cape Breton and also there is a separate outlet for Newfoundland. We simply have not had the money to make it available in Cape Breton Island so we work through private agencies who are people we know in those areas.

In Nova Scotia and New Brunswick we have had a fairly heavy subscription list.

Mr. Fortier: You say in your brief—I was very startled when I came across it—

“The Gleaner has refused to accept advertising from the Mysterious East.”

Professor Cameron: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: There were no reservations about that statement, that you offered to pay for an advertisement and it was refused. Any reasons given?

Professor Cameron: Yes, they said they did advertise rival publications.

Mr. Fortier: And they consider you to be a rival. That is a compliment.

Professor Cameron: Well, of a very low order, yes.

Mr. Fortier: Did you attempt to press the point?

Professor Cameron: No, we just made a note of it for this brief.

Mr. Fortier: One last question about the Canadian Press. Have you followed in the New Brunswick newspapers the Canadian Press reports of the hearings held by this Committee?

Professor Cameron: Yes, I have.

Mr. Fortier: Have you ever seen any reference to the New Brunswick Press Lord in it, critical of the Irving Interests?

Senator Prowse: Or Dennis.

Professor Cameron: It is very difficult to be sure just what has come from CP sources and what has come from other sources. I think if I can give you an answer that is really an answer to a neighbouring question.

My impression is that when I have read other newspapers than the Maritimes ones, I have seen a great deal more about it.

I cited one case in the brief and I think one could document it, if one had the time but one does not get very much of that again.

Special Senate Committee

But no, as to answers specifically about Canadian Press, I am not sure.

Mr. Fortier: Or from any source?

Professor Cameron: It has clearly been played down in relation to what I have been reading in say Toronto and Montreal papers on the spotty occasions when I have picked them up.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Well, Dr. Cameron, on behalf of the Committee we thank you.

You said in the opening statement that you intended to talk about life in the real world and we are grateful that you have.

I would only say in closing that you have indicated in your brief and elsewhere at other times and other ways that there may be additional material you wish to send us. If you do, we will be delighted to receive it.

Thank you very much.

May I remind the Senators that we meet at 10 o'clock in the morning in this room to receive the brief of the Toronto Star.

Professor Cameron: Thank you for inviting me.

The hearing adjourned.

Second Session—Twenty-eighth Parliament

1969-70

THE SENATE OF CANADA

PROCEEDINGS

OF THE

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE

ON

MASS MEDIA

The Honourable KEITH DAVEY, Chairman

No. 16

FRIDAY, JANUARY 30, 1970

WITNESSES:

The Toronto Star Limited: Mr. Beland H. Honderich, President and Publisher; Mr. Peter C. Newman, Editor-in-Chief; Mr. Martin Goodman, Managing Editor; Mr. William C. Rankin, Business Manager; Mr. Murray Turner, Vice-President and Director of Advertising; Mr. Donald A. Bannerman, Advertising Sales Manager.

1969-70

MEMBERS OF THE
SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA

The Honourable Keith Davey, Chairman

The Honourable L. P. Beaubien, Deputy Chairman

Beaubien
Bélisle
Bourque
Davey
Everett
Hays

Langlois
Macdonald
(Cape Breton)
McElman
Petten
Phillips (Prince)

Prowse
Smith
Sparrow
Willis—(15)

(Quorum 5)

ORDERS OF REFERENCE

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Wednesday, October 29th, 1969.

“With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator Davey moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lang:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to consider and report upon the ownership and control of the major means of mass public communication in Canada, in particular, and without restricting the generality of the foregoing, to examine and report upon the extend and nature of their impact and influence on the Canadian public, to be known as the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media;

That the Committee have power to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry;

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have power to sit during adjournments of the Senate and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation to this Special Committee from 9th to 18th December, 1969, both inclusive, and the Committee have power to sit during sittings of the Senate for that period;

That the papers and evidence received and taken on the subject in the preceding session be referred to the Committee; and

That the Committee be composed of the Honourable Senators Beau-bien, Davey, Everett, Giguère, Hays, Irvine, Langlois, Macdonald (Cape Breton), McElman, Petten, Prowse, Sparrow, Urquhart, White and Willis.

After debate, and—

The question being put on the motion, it was—

Resolved in the affirmative.”

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Thursday, November 6th, 1969.

“With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Smith:

That the names of the Honourable Senators Giguère and Urquhart be removed from the list of Senators serving on the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media; and

That the names of the Honourable Senators Bourque, Smith and Welch be added to the list of Senators serving on the said Special Committee.

The question being put on the motion, it was—
Resolved in the affirmative.”

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Thursday, December 18th, 1969.

“With leave of the Senate,
The Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Smith:

That Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation to the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media from 20th to 30th January, 1970, and that the Committee have power to sit during sittings of the Senate for that period.

After debate, and—
The question being put on the motion, it was—
Resolved in the affirmative, on division.”

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Friday, December 19th, 1969.

“With leave of the Senate,
The Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Langlois:

That the names of the Honourable Senators Bélisle and Phillips (Prince) be substituted for those of the Honourable Senators Welch and White on the list of Senators serving on the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media.

The question being put on the motion, it was—
Resolved in the affirmative

ROBERT FORTIER,
Clerk of Senate.

MINUTES OF PROCEEDINGS

FRIDAY, January 30, 1970.

(16)

Pursuant to adjournment and notice the Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 10.00 a.m.

Present: The Honourable Senators: Davey, (Chairman); Macdonald (Cape Breton), McElman, Prowse, Smith and Sparrow.—(6)

In attendance: Miss Marianne Barrie, Director and Administrator; Mr. Borden Spears, Executive Consultant; Mr. Yves Fortier, Counsel.

The following witnesses, representing The Toronto Star Limited, were heard:

Mr. Beland H. Honderich, President and Publisher;

Mr. Peter C. Newman, Editor-in-Chief;

Mr. Martin Goodman, Managing Editor;

Mr. William C. Rankin, Business Manager;

Mr. Murray Turner, Vice-President and Director of Advertising;

Mr. Donald A. Bannerman, Advertising Sales Manager.

At 1.40 p.m. the Committee adjourned to Tuesday, February 10, 1970, at 10.00 a.m.

ATTEST:

Denis Bouffard,
Clerk of the Committee.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Friday, January 30th, 1970.

The Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 10.00 a.m.

Senator Keith Davey (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, this morning, as you know we are receiving the brief from The Toronto Star. Sitting on my immediate right is the President and Publisher, Mr. Beland Honderich.

I perhaps should ask Mr. Honderich at the beginning to introduce the rest of the people who are here with him.

May I just say to you, Mr. Honderich, the brief which you prepared was sent to us more than three weeks in advance, as we requested. It has been circulated to the Senators and it has presumably been studied by them. I am now going to ask you to amplify the brief or to expand upon it, or indeed talk about anything which may or may not be on your mind; and then if you can perhaps do that in about 15 minutes, following that period of time, we will have some questioning for you from the Senators on the contents of your written brief and any oral remarks you make this morning and indeed on other things which may be on their minds.

I should say to you at the outset if during that question period you wish to have other members of your team answer the question you may do so.

Perhaps you can begin by introducing those people who are with you.

Mr. Beland H. Honderich, President and Publisher of The Toronto Star: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Honourable Senators and ladies and Gentlemen.

The Toronto Star welcomes the inquiry into Mass Media. We are very pleased to have this opportunity to appear before you and give you our ideas and also submit to your questions.

We believe that the freedom of the press rightly belongs to the people and not the publishers, and that the conduct of the press is, therefore, a very proper subject for public scrutiny. We sincerely hope your Committee will take the first step toward making the press of Canada accountable to the people in some reliable way, without, of course, jeopardizing its essential, traditional freedoms.

To assist the Committee today, I have invited five of our senior editorial, advertising and business executives to join me in making this submission if I may and I would like to introduce them to you now.

They are: first, to my left, Mr. Peter C. Newman, our distinguished Editor-in-Chief, and formerly The Star's Ottawa Editor. I am sure that Mr. Newman's work as a newspaperman and author is too well known to need elaboration here.

Sitting with Mr. Newman on my left is Mr. Martin Goodman our very able Managing Editor. Mr. Goodman joined our staff as a general reporter, distinguished himself as a financial writer, and later as Chief of our Washington and Ottawa bureaus. He was appointed Managing Editor in 1968.

To my right, Mr. Murray Turner is a Director of our company and also our Director of Advertising. Before joining The Star, Mr. Turner was Executive Vice-President of the Cockfield, Brown and Company Limited advertising agency.

Mr. Donald Bannerman is our Advertising Manager. Mr. Bannerman played a leading role in the development of our advertising acceptability standards which, I might say, go well beyond any legal requirements and we are very proud to say serve as a model for our industry.

Mr. William Rankin is our Business Manager. Mr. Rankin was associated with the Globe and Mail before joining The Star and has had wide administrative and financial experience in our business. He is also Treasurer of the Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association.

Each of these gentlemen, Mr. Chairman, is available to answer your questions and I hope you will avail yourselves of their broad knowledge and experience.

In our formal submission to the Committee, we explained our positions on the mandate of publishing in this era, chain ownership of newspapers, multi-media ownership and the so-called Canadian editions of Time and Readers Digest. Today I shall try to place our recommendations in the perspective of what we conceive to be the functions and duties of the press in a free society.

First a word about that much-abused and over-used phrase, "freedom of the press." To us it simply means the extension to publishers and journalists of the individual right of free speech, carrying no privileges or immunities which are not enjoyed by ordinary citizens. But since the control of a printing press itself is a privilege available to few, we believe the concept of press freedom should include the freest possible access of people to the press.

Our form of democratic government contemplates a parliament working under the influence of public opinion and free discussions. As Sir Lyman Duff stated in the Alberta press case, our parliamentary institutions "derive their efficacy from the free public discussion of affairs, from criticism and answer and counter criticism, from attack on policy and administration and defence and counter attack; from the freest and fullest analysis and examination from every point of view of all political proposals."

It follows that the basic function of the press in a free society in reporting news and opinions is to encourage public discussion and debate and to provide a forum for all shades of opinion. To perform this role, and to perform its central function of reporting the significant and interesting events of the day, the press must have freedom from government censorship and control.

We submit that the freedom in freedom of the press really belongs to the public, that it entails the freedom of the individual in our society to have a press which is free to disseminate all manner of information and opinion necessary to an intelligent understanding of public affairs.

The duty to inform the public fully, fairly and truthfully, and to hold up a wide reflector of public opinion, should at all times take precedence over commercial profit—although profit is essential to a newspaper's strength and independence.

We find the widely-praised concept of "objectivity" inadequate as a guide to reporting and editing the news. It is both impossible and too easy. It is impossible in any meaningful sense because nobody is totally free of emotion and bias. It is too easy because the demand for objectivity can be superficially satisfied by reporting what one person said and what another person said in contradiction. To get the truth usually requires more digging than that, and often requires inclusion of a reporter's interpretations. The traditional idea of a rigid separation between news and opinion never worked perfectly, and it is yielding to the need to report multi-layered, many-sided, interconnected events, in ways that make sense to the reader. To say this is not to deny that the news columns of a paper ought to be as accurate and fair as humans can make them. What we are saying is that flat two dimensional journalism must give way to a new journalism in this era of confusing, rapid and complex change. This new journalism, more difficult, more daring and more risky, can succeed if we raise the professional standards of journalists as high as they should go.

In a country like Canada I believe it is particularly important that the press reflect all shades of opinion. The press must serve as a vehicle in focussing public attention on the shortcomings of our system or many of our people will in fact be deprived of their franchise in the court of public opinion.

I would hope that the Committee gives special thought to this problem. As a publisher, I am more concerned with our sins of omission than with our sins of commission. I feel that we do not always give adequate representation to the opinions of people who are not part of the recognized establishments.

The Chairman, your Committee cannot ignore trends which limit the number of effective voices in the news media. For with out too many competing voices in the field of communication there is no assurance that minority points of view will be heard. The most obvious of such trends is the growth of group or chain ownership of newspapers. The question you must ask here is not whether chain ownership is necessary or desirable for publishing companies, but whether it best serves our society's need for free speech and free debate.

We believe that chain ownership has reached a point in Canada where it could endanger freedom of expression as well as the full disclosure and discussion of facts which the public has a right to learn. The danger is unmistakable in New Brunswick, where one man controls all five English-language newspapers.

Why is the growth of newspaper chains dangerous? It is dangerous because it gives a few people the power to determine what many newspapers will print. That the present owners of chain newspapers claim not to exercise this control in no way destroys this argument. For they have the power of effective control, and if they do not use it now, they or their successors could decide to use it at some time in the future.

It is stated that the individual publishers of chain newspapers are free to determine their news and editorial policies. We suggest that in most, if not all the chains, they do so within well understood limits. Newspapers, The Star included, tend to reflect editorially the opinions of their owners—if for no other reason than that owners are inclined to hire publishers and editors whose views are compatible with their own. And since the opinions and interests of the chain owners are very well known to the local editors, the independence the latter enjoy is subject to certain well understood inhibitions. To the extent this is so, it tends to restrict the variety of opinions available to the public.

It is not uncommon for papers in the same chain to support different parties at election time. Personally I would be more impressed if they often disagreed fundamentally on various aspects of our social and economic problems or, equally important, on the future of Canada as an independent country.

The end result of unchecked extension of chains could be a situation where 15 to 20 people would decide what Canadians would read in their newspapers. To preclude that, and to maintain the maximum feasible number of independent voices in the Canadian press, we have proposed that all future takeovers of newspapers by other newspapers or chains should require prior approval of some public body such as the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. The object of this policy would not necessarily be to prohibit any future takeovers, but rather to require that each case be examined in terms of the probable effects on the public interest.

Criteria for the public interest can be established, as the Monopolies Commission has done in Britain.

Multi-media ownership poses a similar but even more complicated problem. If, as The Star believes, the public interest is best served by having many voices in the field of communications, the ownership by one person or company of a newspaper and/or a radio and television station must be questioned.

The difficulty here is that multi-media ownership is now so widespread in Canada that we see little practical possibility of reducing it. Multi-media ownership in cities like Toronto, where our chief competitor the Telegram owns a television station, presents distinct competitive problems for an independent newspaper. Indeed, in the absence of government policy barring multi-media ownership, The Star may well have no alternative but to seek participation in broadcasting to protect our competitive position.

Should we eventually make such a decision, we believe we will be able to do so in a way that adds a dimension to the kind of broadcasting now available in Canada. We would see our role as an extension of our present ability to gather news and distribute it to the public in a way that encourages public discussion and that provides a forum for all shades of opinion.

Taken as a whole, the daily press of Canada is not bad, but I maintain that it is dangerously self-satisfied. Observing the rising prestige and influence of the British Press Council, The Star has for some time advocated that the Canadian newspaper industry create a similar tribunal to investigate public complaints and to upgrade professional standards. We have tried to gain support for this idea among Ontario newspapers, with little success so far; few of them appear to have given the matter any serious or detailed thought. With the exception of the Southam newspapers, the publishers of most of our chain newspapers in Canada are opposed to a press council, and I cannot help but wonder if some of these publishers are not merely reflecting the viewpoint of their owners on this question.

The main reason for our advocacy of a press council (or rather, regional press councils to suit the regional or local character of Canadian newspapers) can be summed up in one sentence: The publication of a newspaper is an exercise in arbitrary power.

To say this is not to deny that most publishers try to do a fair and conscientious job; we acknowledge that. But arbitrary power is an inescapable fact of the business. By the things it emphasizes in gathering the news, by its priorities in presenting the news, and by its editorials and interpretive stories, a newspaper can advance certain people, causes and ideas while obscuring or discrediting others. Used with prejudice or poor judgment, the publishing power can make mountains out of molehills or molehills out of mountains, to the confusion and detriment of the public.

In other fields, arbitrary power that can affect the public interest is normally subject to government regulation. That must be avoided in the case of the press because of the obvious dangers of state censorship for regimentation. But the arbitrary power of the press calls for self-discipline, which press councils can encourage and guide.

I am not suggesting that a press council should have the power to control what a newspaper can publish, and I would strongly oppose legislative action creating press councils; that might be a step toward government licensing of newspapers. A press council should be a voluntary organization consisting of representatives of the press and the public, with an independent chairman, and it should be financed by the newspapers through dues and assessments.

As in the case of the British Press Council, its function should be to preserve the freedom of the press, maintain the character of the press "in accordance with the highest professional and commercial standards", and consider and deal with complaints about the conduct of the press or the conduct of persons and organizations toward the press.

It should also keep under review developments likely to restrict the supply of information of public interest and importance, and to report publicly on developments that may tend towards greater concentration or monopoly in the press.

Some witnesses appearing before the Committee have objected to a press council on the grounds that it interferes with freedom of the press and others have said that the Press Council in Britain has failed to prevent the publication of hurtful stories such as Christine Keeler's memoirs.

Both criticisms ignore the fact that a Press Council would be a voluntary organization without power to compel anyone to do anything. Since its findings and recommendations carry only moral force, not the force of law, it cannot abridge press freedom, but to the public it would offer an independent tribunal where complaints against newspapers could be weighed and judged and, equally important, publicized. Newspapers would be free to ignore its decisions, but only at the risk of offending public opinion.

I sincerely hope, Mr. Chairman, your Committee recommends the establishment of provincial or regional press councils. At the same time, I must sincerely caution against recommending legislation to create a press council. A press council, established by government legislation, would be worse than no press council at all.

Finally, I urge the Committee to study the operation of Canadian editions of American magazines and to ask yourselves whether these foreign publications serve the public interest. The publishers of these U.S. magazines are in fact dumping editorial material into Canada. They contribute little to the discussions of Canadian affairs by Canadians, but because of their dumping operation, they enjoy a competitive advertising advantage over Canadian magazines serving the domestic market. We concur strongly with the recommendations of the O'Leary Royal Commission on Publications, in which it was recommended that these magazines should be placed in the same position as other foreign publications in respect to Canadian advertising. If this is not done, the financial problems that have confronted Canadian magazines may well spread to Canadian newspapers as well.

The Star commends the federal legislation which discourages foreign takeovers of Canadian newspapers by disallowing, as a non-deductible business expense, the cost of Canadian-oriented advertising in a non-Canadian newspaper. We believe this law should be applied to all "Canadian" editions, national, regional, and metropolitan, of The Star and Reader's Digest.

Mr. Chairman, The Star is proud of its tradition as a crusading newspaper, and we believe that it was never so urgent as now for newspapers to expose social inequities and injustices, and to urge corrective reforms. It is urgent because television and high mobility have made inequalities and wrongs incomparably more visible than ever before. People's tolerance of unredressed grievances and unsolved problems is fast diminishing. Some solutions take time, it becomes even more important today to give people access to the media for ventilation of their complaints and troubles, otherwise, frustration will become explosive.

Although the newspaper press of Canada is generally sober and honest, it suffers from widespread complacency. Many newspapers are satisfied with an unenterprising, over-discreet type of local reporting which leaves too many stones unturned and too many establishments unruffled.

In considering newspaper chains, multi-media ownership and those privileged foreign publications, your Committee's aim should be to create conditions which will enable healthy, competitive newspapers to carry on wherever they exist. In considering press councils, we hope you will accept this thought: Canada needs a press that is vital and responsible, as well as free; a press that the people can trust as their own.

Thank you.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Honderich. I think the questioning this morning will begin with Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. In view of the revelations of recent days, I wonder if I can start by asking a question of Mr. Newman.

Mr. Honderich: Certainly.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Newman, who has been writing your columns in recent years?

Mr. Peter Newman, Editor-in-Chief, Toronto Star: May I answer that, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: Yes. That is a very strange question but do.

Mr. Newman: Well, the answer is very simple. I have been writing them obviously with the help of any friendly politicians who have a public conscience and expose or try to expose some of the things that are going on in Ottawa, at least when I was here.

I would like to take your question a little further and if I may, talk a little bit about the Press Gallery. May I do that?

The Chairman: Fine.

Mr. Newman: Because it seems to me that—I was in the Press Gallery for 12 years and I have some very strong feelings.

The Chairman: I may say I thought the question was facetious but by all means if you wish to answer it, do so.

Senator Prowse: Don't stop him now.

Mr. Fortier: We are equating Bobby Orr with Peter Newman.

Mr. Newman: I think the problem is that too many Ottawa correspondents get by on advance releases, prepared texts and average voices at the other end of the official telephones.

I would like to think of the function of political reporters as provocateurs, not voyageurs of power. Ideally I think that the Press Gallery should be what Douglas Taylor, a Washington correspondent, described—as the fourth branch of government. I do not think there is enough of that in Ottawa.

I would like to see journalist guerillas sweeping down upon bureaucratic outposts and political camp fires and coming back with information that sometimes is embarrassing to the official line.

I think the Press Gallery, if I may generalize, does too little original research. They tend to be too impressed by invitations to the Prime Minister's residence, to bask in the unshadowed arc light of conventional publicity, to be part of a definite arrangement of profitable bargaining.

I think in the process what gets left out and what does not get protected is the public interest. However, I think that is unfair to put the blame entirely on the Press Gallery. I think part of the blame has to be put on the politicians and partly on the publishers.

I think that too many politicians still tend to regard Press Gallery reporters as "The Press Boys". Of course, the way to deal with the "Press Boys" is to set up a bar, not discuss issues of the time for information.

Now, I think there is a kind of feeling of disdain for the press. This extends to certain senior members of the current Government.

I think publishers too often do not give their Ottawa correspondents a large enough mandate to dig for original interpretive stories; so to sum up I think that the Press Gallery will not be improved until the Press Gallery members themselves take their mandate more seriously and until the publishers extend that mandate and until the politicians recognize the function of the Press Gallery.

Mr. Fortier: Are you suggesting, Mr. Newman, that members of the Press Gallery in fulfilling their role of a provocateur rather than a voyageur should have fulfilled the role of opposition?

Mr. Newman: Yes, and opposition in a sense that they make politicians more accountable to the public. Politicians quite often try to hide things and I think the parliamentary system allows this to go on. I think there is a duty of the press to dig out anything that a politician may try to hide, again in the public interest.

Mr. Fortier: Am I to understand that an effective Press Gallery will only arise really where there is an ineffective opposition?

Mr. Newman: No. I think the Press Gallery and opposition are very different because, of course, the opposition is an alternative government whereas the Press Gallery, when the Government changes, remains the opposition.

What I am really saying is there should be a tension between politicians and journalists and not partnership.

Mr. Fortier: Does Mr. Goodman who was a member of the Press Gallery, agree with that statement by Mr. Newman?

Mr. Martin Goodman, Managing Editor, The Toronto Star: Very much.

Mr. Fortier: There is a statement in Mr. Honderich's oral brief on page 7 that newspapers tend editorially to reflect the opinions of their owners, The Star included.

May I ask Mr. Newman whether or not he does reflect the opinion of Mr. Honderich?

The Chairman: You are asking Mr. Newman if he reflects the opinion of Mr. Honderich?

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Senator Prowse: That is the kind of question you should have submitted to the Press Gallery.

Mr. Fortier: Maybe Mr. Newman wants a chance to think of the answer?

The Chairman: Senator Prowse?

Senator Prowse: I think talking of the job of the Press Gallery, I would imagine that what you intend to mean was the Press Gallery to have too close friendships with either Government or Opposition or any member of Parliament would be an equally bad thing.

Mr. Newman: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Your job is to search for that status and not just with the government in Power at the moment.

Mr. Newman: Yes. There has to be a creative tension between the two groups.

Senator Prowse: Between all of those groups.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: I wonder if Mr. Newman would explain what he meant by these publishers extending the mandate of the members of the Press Gallery.

Mr. Newman: I would like to see more publishers assign more of their correspondents here not to cover the question period in the House of Commons, which is I think very adequately covered by the press services.

I would like to see more reporters turned loose from their routine and assigned just to dig out stories. I think that there is a kind of insidious atmosphere in the Gallery where often reporters of competing newspapers tend to question each other about what went on at a certain meeting and then it becomes a kind of a conventional wisdom to say this about that.

Instead I think reporters should be out on their own trying to make news, not just trying to report what happens.

I might say that I have worked here for two publishers, Maclean-Hunter and The Toronto Star. I have been very fortunate that my publishers did not feel this way. They allowed me complete freedom and a complete mandate, which was my own. I could do whatever I wanted.

The Chairman: Would it not be fair to say that when you were with Maclean-Hunter, your column appeared monthly?

Mr. Newman: Twice a month.

The Chairman: Twice a month. I am sorry. When you were with The Star you were writing out of the Gallery and you were a columnist so is there not a difference between a person in that position and a reporter in the Press Gallery who is charged with filing copy daily on what is happening in the House?

Were you not in a special position? That was the point of my question.

Mr. Newman: This goes to the very heart of our brief which is that the idea of simple objective reporting is no longer good enough. I think there has to be much more interpretive reporting and perhaps I could go into that a little bit further because I think this is very important to what we are trying to say.

If by "objective", you mean fairness and accuracy, of course, I agree objectivity is not only good, it is essential.

There was an American publisher who once said that a newspaper must guard its accuracy as jealously as a woman guards her virtue and I have always thought that was a great understatement because a newspaper can print retractions.

I think we have to move beyond objectivity and we have to strive for truth which is not always the same as objectivity.

Let me give you an example. If you have a strike and you send out a reporter to write a story of the strike. The sort of traditional old fashioned method is that he interviews a few strikers and he interviews a few representatives of management and he writes a story and you create kind of—I think it is a false synthesis because it is not. There is no synthesis, it is a confrontation.

With the new kind of journalism we are talking about, you begin by realizing that there is not one truth but there are two truths. There is the strikers' truth and there is management truth so you send out two reporters who will write two interpretive stories with two points of view, both of which are true; but there is not one objective story that covers the situation.

That is the kind of thing we mean.

The Chairman: You said objectivity includes fairness and accuracy and truth. Does it also include balance?

Mr. Newman: It depends what you mean by the word "balance". If you mean that you would have a half page story on the strikers and two or three pages on management, I think that would be very unfair. So sure, in terms of length, it includes balance but it may well be that one case is stronger than the other, so I do not think you start out by saying you are going to give them equal weight.

Senator Prowse: Would it be fair to say that the average person's measure of objectivity can be summed up by saying any reporter who writes what I like to read is an objective reporter.

Mr. Newman: Yes. This is too often the case and I think there is no such thing as objectivity.

You take a very simple example like a fair; and a reporter goes out and he writes in his notebook let us say 12 facts about the fair. He goes back to his office to write his story. He picks out six of those facts. All right, that is a subjective judgment.

Then the editor gets the story. He decides which of those facts will go in the headline. Well again, that is a subjective judgement and this innocent objective story which appears is really subject to a hell of a lot of non-objective judgments.

Senator Prowse: A lot of personal decisions.

Mr. Newman: Yes.

The Chairman: May I ask a question at this point. Quoting from your brief at section 24 and I think it is significant, you say:

"The very act of selection of the events discussed (among the hundreds of thousands of possible items), the decision about their relative importance and their arrangements—all of these factors make it apparent that history is a result of the outlook and the biases of the historian, however carefully hidden these may be."

The question I want to ask you about is the specific phrase "history is a result of the outlook and biases of the historian, however carefully guarded these may be."

Was the historian who wrote "Renegade in Power" and "Distemper of our Times" biased and were those biases carefully hidden?

Mr. Newman: Well, Mr. Diefenbaker always referred to me as "a hireling of liberalism to write pseudo-biographies for monetary gain."

The Chairman: That was before you wrote the book about Mr. Pearson.

Mr. Newman: Well, exactly, and I do not have any biases although if I had to describe my political ideology, I would have to say I am a political agnostic with a lot of very strong beliefs; but the point is that I believe in issues and not in politics. I think this is very important.

The Chairman: At the risk of embarrassing you, I would like to take this question one step further and voice the charge which is sometimes heard specifically about you or your books, that an initial period of enormous enchantment with political figures, in which perhaps, as the historian, you have allowed yourself to become too overly enchanted, is followed inevitably because of this great build-up by a period of disenchantment; inevitably the person cannot live up to the expectations and then follows a period of enormous grief. There was the example of Mr. Diefenbaker, the example of Mr. Pearson and, I must say now, the example of the editorials which appear in the Star about Mr. Trudeau.

Mr. Newman: Well, I think you have to remember that it was not me who got Mr. Diefenbaker and Mr. Pearson out of office. It was seven million voters. I was merely articulating the disenchantment that was widespread right across the country.

Also I think—and I feel very strongly about this—that there are no biases in those books. I was merely telling the events that happened and I can prove that very easily because these books have been out several years and no significant fact in either book has been successfully challenged, so all I was doing was telling it the way it was.

The Chairman: Is a Pierre Trudeau book in the making?

Mr. Newman: No.

Mr. Fortier: As has been said before this Committee "To be truly appreciated, these books have to be read."

The Chairman: That reference was made to a book review which appeared in the Hamilton Spectator which began "To really appreciate this book, you have to read it."

Mr. Newman: That reminds me of a comment. I got innumerable letters especially about my Diefenbaker book from people in the West and the last sentence in each letter was almost invariably the same. It was "Furthermore, I am not going to waste my time reading your book."

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: A supplementary question. There was a widespread feeling and widely voiced feeling that several prominent journalists, particularly a couple out of the Press Gallery, who also at one time had been commentators and panelists on CBC television, that they had consciously or otherwise grouped together, combined together, to knock Mr. Diefenbaker out of office. And more latterly they helped to make Mr. Trudeau liberal leader and re-elect him as Prime Minister.

Do you in your knowledge believe there was actually a conscious effort to this end?

Mr. Newman: Most definitely not. I think you have to remember that in a way the Press Gallery is a little bit ahead of the public because we watch these politicians—when I was here, we watched these politicians very intimately day by day. In Mr. Diefenbaker's case, I think we could see, not so much that his policies were wrong, but that he was incapable of the day to day business of Government and as we sensed this, we reported it.

I think inevitably the public sensed this and voted him out so it was not any kind of conspiracy. It was an intimacy which gave us this view first before the general public got it.

The Chairman: You said the Press Gallery was ahead of the public. Would you agree that the politicians are ahead of the Press Gallery?

Mr. Newman: No.

The Chairman: You and I have a big disagreement on this.

Mr. Fortier: My second question, Mr. Chairman, was: could Mr. Newman comment on that sentence in Mr. Honderich's brief for the newspapers, The Star included, tentatively editorially to reflect the opinions of the owners?

Mr. Newman: Well, the way that the editorial policy of The Star is arrived at—that the editorial Board of the paper, which consists of six editorial writers headed by myself, meets every morning at 10 o'clock and we discuss the issues of the day and we hammer out a policy.

Mr. Fortier: Is the publisher a member of this Board?

Mr. Newman: No, he is not. My instructions are that if I feel that some policy we arrive at is something that the publisher should be aware of, then I report to the publisher. In other words, the onus is on me to ask the publisher whether he agrees with this.

Of course, if he does not then he has the right of veto.

Mr. Fortier: Would you do that very often, ask the publisher whether he agrees with a consensus which has emanated from the editorial Board?

Mr. Newman: Well, I have been Editor-in-Chief of The Star for a year now and I think I have done it on four times and in each case the publisher agreed.

Mr. Fortier: That was my third question.

Mr. Newman. But, I do not rule out the possibility he may not agree.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Honderich, what would you do if you disagreed with the policy of your editorial board?

Mr. Honderich: The question, I suppose, would turn on the policy. I think it is rather dangerous to generalize. I will give you two examples.

I personally think in Toronto that the Spadina Expressway should be continued. The editorial board thinks it should be topped. I think the editorial decision is going to be that it should not be built any further until it has been very carefully examined, so I am prepared at this point to go along with them.

If there was a question of whether we would change our policy on some fundamental aspects of our welfare society, for example, Medicare or something of this kind, and the Editor-in-Chief and I could not resolve the matter, then I am afraid the Editor-in-Chief would have to look for another job.

Mr. Fortier: This view was expressed to his Committee by your friend and colleague, Mr. Basset. As I understand it, you agree with him.

Mr. Honderich: I think Mr. Basset made a very honest statement in that area and I think I would agree with him more than some of the publishers and owners of chain newspapers who tend to suggest their publishers need freedom because...

Mr. Fortier: On the question of a Press Council which you support very enthusiastically. You raised the matter of the problem of the Christine Keeler Memoirs in your brief this morning.

Supposing there was a Press Council for Canada and supposing the Toronto Star intended to publish a series such as the Christine Keeler Memoirs. Let us sort of transpose these situations from England to Canada.

Do you think that in such an event, you, as publisher of a newspaper, should decide to go ahead with the publication of such series or do you think that you should abide by the decision of the Press Council?

Mr. Honderich: Again I think it is very difficult to generalize but if the point in the Christine Keeler series was whether or not the press should pay someone, who has been convicted of a certain offence, for their series, as a matter of public policy, I do not think this is good. If this was the policy of the Press Council, we would abide by it.

On the other hand to take the Munsinger case, if the Press Council said in effect that—"No, you cannot publish the Munsinger story", we would go ahead and publish it because I think there is a matter of public interest involved there.

Mr. Fortier: The CBC I think if I remember correctly paid...

Mr. Honderich: They paid us.

Mr. Fortier: They paid you.

Mr. Honderich: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: It does not offend your sense of journalistic ethics to pay Gerda Munsinger for a story but it would, if transposed to England and the payment was by the London News to Christine Keeler?

Mr. Honderich: Gerda Munsinger had not been convicted of any offence.

Mr. Fortier: That is your distinction?

Mr. Honderich: It would be in this case but even if Gerda Munsinger had been convicted of an offence and we were satisfied that this relationship did exist and the only way we could get the story was to pay her some money, we would pay her.

Mr. Fortier: You would have?

Mr. Honderich: You see, the problem a newspaper faces was that a person like Gerda Munsinger recognizes from the outset what she has to say has some value so she quickly acquires an agent and the only access to Gerda Munsinger is through the agent, after payment of money.

Mr. Fortier: Supposing Mr. Cardin had not blurted the "Monseigneur" name in the House of Commons but that your Ottawa correspondent had come to you with the whole story. Would you have allowed publication of the story in the Toronto Star?

Mr. Honderich: Yes, if I was sure enough of the facts, yes.

Mr. Fortier: You consider that it would have been in the public interest?

Mr. Honderich: There is a matter of public interest involved here in that certain Ministers of the Crown were associated with someone of a certain background and the public have a right to know this.

Mr. Fortier: How private is the public man's private life from the point of view of the newspapers?

Mr. Honderich: Well, first of all I think a man in public life is a subject of public interest and I think the press has a right perhaps to go into his privacy to a greater extent than they would an individual.

The line I would like to draw, if you can draw it, is where there is public interest involved. If your question is prompted by the statement of the Prime Minister...

Mr. Fortier: Last January.

Mr. Honderich: Last January in Britain. We felt that public interest was involved.

Mr. Fortier: In what way?

Mr. Honderich: Prior to the Prime Minister's trip to England, we were aware that a relationship of some sort did exist. We were also aware of the background of the person. So public interest was involved and I think the Prime Minister conceded in that statement that his public appearances were open to the press.

I think it is a very difficult line to draw outside of a specific problem. I think you have to look at each problem in terms of what you consider to be the public interest.

Mr. Fortier: I wonder if Mr. Newman would care to comment on that point?

Mr. Newman: I think the private life of a public man is as private as he wants to make it. If in this particular instance Mr. Trudeau had wanted to see that particular lady in his hotel room in Claridges, it could have been very private. No one would have known. By taking her out to a well known restaurant I think he made it a public fact and gave us a mandate to comment on it.

Mr. Fortier: So that, I understand, is the Star's policy insofar as publication of matters affecting the private life of politicians is concerned?

Mr. Honderich: I think public interest has to be involved.

Senator Prowse: If the private life appears to present some kind of threat to the public interest then you feel you have a duty to move in.

Mr. Honderich: Yes. I think the public have a right to know what kind of man is their Prime Minister. I think the Prime Minister's friends are a matter of importance. Who does he see? Who influences him?

Senator Prowse: Or who may influence him?

Mr. Honderich: That is right.

Mr. Fortier: In view of your very strong remarks directed to the situation in New Brunswick, in order for you to further assist the Committee in its deliberations, I would like to ask you this question.

How would you deal with a situation in New Brunswick today?

Mr. Honderich: Well, I think if there is no power under the present Combines Law that it should be amended, perhaps in the way recommended by the Economic Council, perhaps with some amendment to their suggestion to deal with this specific situation.

Mr. Fortier: Do you think that...

Mr. Honderich: Mr. Fortier, I am not a lawyer but I think an interesting case might be the result if a citizen of Manitoba went to the courts with the argument that his right of his access to free discussion which has been called the natural right of Canadian citizens is denied by this form of ownership.

You are the lawyer. I am not.

The Chairman: I think you meant to refer to New Brunswick. You said "Manitoba."

Mr. Honderich: New Brunswick, I am sorry.

Mr. Fortier: That is an interesting suggestion. Maybe it will reach New Brunswick.

Senator Prowse: It might be appropriate in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Fortier: Without intending to get into legal opinion, as a newspaper publisher could you suggest that the Government should interfere or a Government agency should interfere at this juncture and break up newspaper monopolies such as the one that exists in New Brunswick or in Quebec?

Mr. Honderich: I suggest they should wherever they fail to meet the kind of public criteria that we recommend in our formal submission.

Mr. Fortier: In this context who would be called upon to decide that public interest has or has not been served?

Mr. Honderich: I think you first must establish some criteria. This criteria has been established in Britain. It is possible to establish it here.

If you accept my definition of freedom of the press, then freedom and freedom of the press belongs to the public. It is their natural right as Canadian citizens to have access to the discussion.

I think it is possible on that basis then to develop a set of criteria that would apply against any situation of ownership.

Mr. Fortier: Has the advent of television made newspaper a better means of communication?

Mr. Honderich: I think that competition has helped them. I have the view that radio and television news encourages the sale of newspapers.

Mr. Fortier: This "new journalism" where you speak in your brief, do you consider that television is a suitable medium for an expression of this "new journalism"?

Mr. Honderich: There is certain types of stories which lend themselves to development by television. There are certain other stories that do not.

If you take a situation like the Saskatchewan doctors' strike, which was a very complex matter, television could not come to grips with it. I think the newspapers did a splendid job in that area but where you have a subject that the public can see on their television I think perhaps television is a more effective means of "new journalism".

Mr. Fortier: I wonder if you could relate to opinion of objectivity which permeates your brief to this statement of yours here.

Mr. Honderich: I will probably be disowned by a lot of my colleagues here but I think it was due to the fact I am not an admirer of Spiro Agnew. I think in his references to television he really touched on a very important point; because here you have again a relatively small group of people deciding what the public are going to see.

I do not think I know enough about the operation of television to have any idea of what should be done but I am always concerned when a relatively few people have the power to exercise effective control of what is seen.

The Chairman: I think Mr. Newman wanted to add something at this point.

Mr. Newman: I just wanted to say I think there are three things that newspapers can do very much better than television and that is to record events, to interpret events and to act as advocates.

If you take the highlight of television last year, for example, I think we all agree it was the landing on the moon. Certainly it was very exciting to watch the landing on television but in terms of recording the events, of providing a permanent record, it is going to be the newspaper of that day which is going to be passed down to your grandchildren so I think this is a function that newspapers can do that television cannot do.

Mr. Fortier: Well, the film will last.

Mr. Newman: Oh yes, but it is very difficult to get it for the ordinary person whereas a newspaper is available to all.

Senator Prowse: There was not all the film they wanted either.

Mr. Newman: I think in terms of interpretation, television has fallen down very badly whereas the newspapers are going more and more into interpreting not just showing the events but telling what they mean.

Most important of all I think television, because it is a neutral medium, does not advocate any courses of alternative action whereas newspapers do. I think newspapers will always survive because of these three functions which you can't apply to the TV set.

Mr. Fortier: You say that in the field of interpretive reporting television has fallen down. What could it do that it is not doing, more precisely.

Mr. Newman: Well, I think it is dealing too much with superficial analyses, two or three minute capsules of events whereas newspapers can take the time and space to discuss various points of view of what is happening.

Mr. Fortier: Are you suggesting that television should allocate that time?

Mr. Newman: Certainly. I think television should have an editorial point of view. I think there should be enough channels so that the consumer of television news has as much knowledge but I do not think television should remain a neutral kind of medium if it is going to do a real job.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Honderich, you say that the advent of television has forced newspapers to become better. Is that correct?

Mr. Honderich: Well, I think the competition has been good. I think it has tended to change the role. I think before the advent of radio and television, people had to look at a newspaper to find out what had happened in the last 24 hours or, more particularly, overnight.

Now, most people today get the news first by some broadcast means, so they look at newspapers for amplification of what they have heard on radio and television. So our role has changed into an explanatory interpretive function more than telling you first what happened last night.

Mr. Fortier: We had a newspaperman before Christmas who came before this Committee and said that with television, newspaper reporting has had to become more precise and truer.

Mr. Honderich: Well, I think it is a check on our accuracy and I think it is going to require that newspapers perhaps change their method of operation.

One of the handicaps that we face is our deadlines. There is a certain time set for a paper to go to press to meet requirements of distribution, to get the paper in to the house on time.

I can recall during the conference Mr. Robarts had in Toronto—I forget the name he applied to it.

The Chairman: The Constitutional Conference of Tomorrow?

Mr. Honderich: At the particular time our newspaper was going to press, there was a confrontation between the late Premier of Quebec and another premier and that got the emphasis in our account.

Well, later on, that confrontation disappeared and a cordiality came back and I think that the public must have been confused that evening when they looked at television and saw a very friendly conference and they had read our story about the angry confrontation but it is a check on the facts of newspapers.

People see things on their screen and what they read in the newspaper does not accord with what they have seen on the screen, then obviously they wonder why.

Mr. Fortier: Do you envisage that the technological improvements which are fast upon us—do you foresee a solution to this very problem that you have?

Mr. Honderich: I think the solution has come in the type of reporting. I think you have got to perhaps counsel your reader that these events took place at a certain time and the conference was continuing.

I think you perhaps might develop a different kind of style of reporting. Perhaps you should not attempt to tell the readers quite so quickly as we do sometimes what is going on until you can get more of the story.

The Chairman: I wonder if at this point you could ask Mr. Honderich a question, Mr. Fortier, with your forebearance.

What specific advantages does the Telegram enjoy over the Star because it owns CFTM? What are the specific advantages? You said it gives them a competitive edge or you imply that. What is the competitive edge?

Mr. Honderich: Well, I think one is: here is a company that has access to television revenues. I am not suggesting that Mr. Basset do this or would ever do it but conceivably he could decide to use these television revenues to operate a newspaper on a break even or loss basis with the idea of putting your competitor out of business.

This is an element of risk on a very practical level and I am not complaining about it. I want to emphasize this. At one time if I bought a travel ad in the Telegram, it automatically gave you a plug on television which was something we could not do.

If I owned the Telegram, I would be able to pay better salaries to my staff because they would be able to spread their costs over more operations.

The Chairman: Does the Telegram pay better salaries than the Star?

Mr. Honderich: They will not as long as I am the publisher of the Star but this does relate itself back to a financial matter.

The Chairman: You have spoken about the subsidization of newspapers by a television station. Aside from that in the area of news competition, if I can call it that, does it give the Telegram any advantages to own CFTO?

You are suggesting there are business advantages. Are there news advantages as well?

Mr. Honderich: I think there are potential advantages if they are exploited. If I owned the two and set out to exploit them, there would be very considerable advantages.

Mr. Basset has suggested to this Committee that he has more foreign correspondents than any other newspaper in Canada. First of all our Managing Editor, Mr. Goodman, tells me this statement is not so.

Mr. Fortier: Would you call him an "un-nitigated liar"?

Mr. Honderich: That is your phrase, not mine.

The Chairman: That is Mr. Bassett's phrase, not Mr. Fortier's.

Mr. Honderich: I would like Mr. Goodman to deal with this but if you are talking about staff correspondents—this is people paid by The Toronto Star and entirely dependent on The Toronto Star, I think we have more representatives abroad than any other newspaper.

If you are talking about correspondents—people who work part-time, for example, for the Star and part-time for other people—well, then you get into a never-never-land because I think every newspaper has about 1000 of these people around the world they call on at one time or another; but if one had the revenues from both sources and decided they were going to use this to develop a news service, obviously they can go further than a competitor who only has the revenues from one source.

The Chairman: Before we ask Mr. Goodman to comment on that, I would like to ask the other question, and round figures will do in answering this question. How many more newspapers on the average do you sell than the Telegram at the present time?

Mr. William C. Rankin, Manager, Toronto Star: One hundred and forty five thousand.

The Chairman: One hundred and forty five thousand more than The Telegram?

Mr. Rankin: Yes.

The Chairman: How many more newspapers than The Telegram did you sell in the last year before CFTO went on the air; in round figures? Would it be more, Mr. Honderich, from memory in round figures?

I will put it this way. Let us be specific. You enjoyed a very sizeable lead at that time.

Mr. Honderich: Yes.

The Chairman: So you see my next question which is: does this advantage the Telegram enjoys with CFTO really matter to the newspaper because of the enormous lead you have over The Telegram? It may even be broader today than it was before CFTO went on the air.

Mr. Honderich: But a number of competitive factors have been at work during this period only one of which has been television.

The Chairman: What are some of the others?

Mr. Honderich: Going back to the time The Telegram got the licence, they were the only newspaper in Toronto with a Saturday supplement and they enjoyed a lead on Saturday over their weekly average of about 75,000 papers.

For competitive reasons we introduced a supplement and today we have a lead over The Telegram on Saturday of more than 100,000. The quality of the newspaper has changed during that period. We have deliberately embarked on a policy of stepping up editorial expenditures to improve the quality of the paper so one cannot isolate this in relationship to television.

I want to emphasize, I am not here crying or complaining. I am merely pointing out the potential danger that exists for an independent newspaper.

The Chairman: I should make it clear that I do not sense in your brief at all that you are crying or complaining. I should make that clear.

The only point that I am making, Mr. Honderich, is as I read your brief, I was repeatedly impressed with the fact that you have this margin over The Telegram in spite of the fact that The Telegram has CFTO, so I do not think that answers your point about the potentiality and so on. I take that point but still the important fact remains: would the margin be wider if The Telegram did not own CFTO?

Mr. Honderich: No, I do not think it would, Mr. Davey. I think there are so many elements involved in this question it is dangerous to generalize.

One must recall that in the initial period after The Telegram got into broadcasting, their revenues obviously were going to retire capital or retire loans. I would imagine that at some point along the line, if not now, very soon they will move into a position where their earnings are no longer needed for this purpose and then you might see an entirely different situation.

The Chairman: I think before we turn to other questions that Mr. Goodman was suggesting that he would like to comment on this statement by Mr. Basset that The Telegram has more foreign correspondents than any other paper in Canada—if I am quoting Mr. Basset correctly and I am not sure I am. He said something to that effect.

Mr. Goodman: The point is simply what are you counting? There are what you might call three different categories of foreign correspondents. The ones that are on a payroll, who according to most of the witnesses who testified here, are staff correspondents sent abroad—Canadians who go abroad to report some important part of the world for two or three newspapers through Canadian eyes and which will give people in your own newspaper a chance to say "I want to be a London correspondent or a Washington correspondent."

If you restrict the count to that then The Star—depending upon whether The Telegram has any staff in London or not at any particular time, is at least equal or better than The Telegram.

Now, in addition, you pick up certain people in the second category to whom you pay a retainer and who do most or some of their work for your newspaper and they also work for some other newspapers, and it is these people that The Telegram counts when it says it has more foreign correspondents, but these are not Canadians. They come to Toronto once or twice a year for this year-end television operation to discuss the world. But, if you are really talking about the virtue of having Canadians overseas to report back through Canadian eyes, they do not count.

We have the same kind of people in all important parts of the world as well. We do not consider them as staff correspondents. For example, in Israel we both have people who are either on retainers or at least do work for us, but who are working for other publications as well. I do not consider them to be staff correspondents, but foreign correspondents, in the sense of men who write for us and provide us with news which is of particular interest.

When it comes down to Canadian eyes abroad, which I think is the real test, the Star visits more countries and sends more people overseas and travels more miles, paid for by itself, than any other newspaper in Canada.

Mr. Honderich: Mr. Goodman, would you also mention our policy in respect to junkets and travel.

Mr. Goodman: I will do that little thing. There are a number of invitations that are extended to newspapers to come and visit some places such as Las Vegas, courtesy of the airline that flies you there or of hotels that operate there.

It has been suggested to your Committee for example, by at least one witness—what coincidence that the story which tells about the virtues of those places appears on pages that happen to advertise the same places.

As far as the star is concerned the Star does not accept any free trips. This includes political trips, travels trips for any part of the newspaper. If it is a question of a Government plane taking politicians some place and the only way to go in is with those politicians we will determine a commercial fare and reimburse for that amount. We may have to go on the plane, of course, if it is not a charter.

The main point—and we are very proud of it—is our travel writers pay their own way everywhere and the copy people and advertisers in those pages do not feel they are necessarily always glowing about what the accommodation is like.

The Chairman: From your experience that at variance with the travel records many other papers in this country?

Mr. Honderich: Most other papers.

The Chairman: Most other papers.

Senator McElman: Just to fill in one little detail; the advertisers in the newspapers, Mr. Goodman, do not get any special rates?

Mr. Goodman: I do not know.

Mr. Newman: No, there are no special rates.

The Chairman: I have only one other question on CFTO, if I might, Mr. Honderich.

In paragraph 114 of your brief you say "Government policy—simply the award of a CTC licence to the Telegram—has already created a problem for competing newspapers in Toronto. Ottawa therefore has a responsibility to redress the competitive balance, and only it can do so. The Canadian Radio Television Commission should either require newspapers to divest themselves of TV station ownership, or it should make TV outlets available to competing newspapers."

Which of those would you prefer?

Mr. Honderich: Well, we would have to start with our first principle and that is that we believe there should be many voices in the field of communications.

When we made an application for a television licence in 1959 we said at that time we were making it for competitive reasons and we thought there should be no award to a newspaper.

So long as the number of channels is limited, I think public interest requires independent ownership. With the new development of cable television opening up as many as 54 channels within a city, the problem of a limited number of voices in the field of communication no longer will apply.

It may be then that newspapers can operate without violating this fundamental principle or operate in broadcasting.

The Chairman: Well, now, on that subject, when Mr. Bassett was here one of the questions we put to him was "Which is the second-best newspaper in Canada?"

He said he wasn't sure. He said it was either the Globe or the Star. What do you think is the second-best newspaper in Canada?

Mr. Honderich: Well, I can give you an answer but the answer would not be worth anything.

The Chairman: On the contrary, I think it could be very helpful.

Mr. Honderich: I don't think you can make comparisons of newspapers in this manner.

The Chairman: Quite.

Mr. Honderich: I think you have to look at their constituency, the requirements of their constituency and the job they are doing to serve them. The best newspaper may not necessarily be the largest. I think this would be pretty difficult. One would have to go into the communities and assess the requirements of the communities and the job the newspaper is doing to meet these requirements.

If the test is, first all—what is your aim as a newspaper? We cite as our aim mass circulation. We feel we have an obligation to inform all the people in the community, not only a part of the community, and the figures show we do this in the Toronto area.

More people of all age groups, of all income groups, and of all educational levels up to college, both the Globe and ourselves reach 49 per cent of this audience, so we have more readers than any other newspapers. So by this standard we have been successful in reaching the most audience. But does this make it the best newspaper?

The Chairman: This is a question you may not be able to answer, and if you prefer not to, do not.

From your experience, outside of Metropolitan Toronto, can you give us one, or can you give us several examples of newspapers which you think serve their constituency well?

I appreciate you may not be prepared to do that on the spur of the moment.

Mr. Honderich: Well, I will give you one example. I must admit a certain prejudice here. I started my newspaper career on the Kitchener Record, and I still look at it, and I regard it as one of the finest provincial papers that I have seen published anywhere.

The Chairman: Good. For what it is trying to do.

Mr. Honderich: Yes. I would like to say I have great respect for most of the Southam newspapers published in the country because I believe they have high standards and are going, to the best of their ability, a fine job.

Mr. Fortier: On that note, Mr. Honderich, would you think the Globe and Mail has become a better newspaper since it joined the FP group?

Mr. Honderich: I want to give you honest answers to these questions, and I am now speaking about my competitors. I must be very careful that what I say is not in bad taste.

The Chairman: You should be aware they have all spoken about you.

Mr. Honderich: I have a great respect for the Globe and Mail as I do for the Telegram, but as a professional journalist and more importantly as a Canadian interested in seeing the Canadian people get Canadian ideas, I must say that I am not impressed with an organization that relies so heavily on foreign news services.

If you take the foreign news service out of that paper, then I ask you, what have you got left?

Now, if you want to hold this up as an example of a chain newspaper, it does not meet my requirements as a Canadian citizen of what I expect of it.

The Chairman: Mr. Bassett told us when he was here that the Telegram is the most quoted newspaper in Canada. Why is that? Is it true, and why is it?

Mr. Fortier: Anything you say here is privileged.

Mr. Honderich: I think the Telegram is a good newspaper and a lot of things that they print are interesting and would be picked up by other people.

Now, we have syndicates through which we sell things that appear in The Star and also things we purchase for resale.

If I wanted to give a lot of things away just to have a little scratch line, "Reprinted from the Toronto Daily Star" I think perhaps that I might challenge Mr. Bassett in this area, but it is not important to me.

The Chairman: You mentioned the Star Syndicate. I must say I am surprised that the Star Syndicate, which circulates the column of Bobby Orr, whom we were discussing the other day, finds this necessary to recruit a Globe and Mail sports writer to do the column.

Would you comment on that?

Mr. Honderich: Well, Mr. Davey, I would think you will find the Globe and Mail writer was recruited by the Bobby Orr Enterprises.

The Chairman: Not by the Star?

Mr. Honderich: To my knowledge; although, as a matter of fact, I did not know out this matter until you asked your question the other day, and then I asked for a report on it.

I wondered how I might answer your question if you asked whether I thought it proper for Bobby Orr's column—or a column written by someone else to appear under Bobby Orr's name.

The Chairman: Would you like to answer that question?

Mr. Honderich: I think then that my answer should be that Bobby Orr is a busy man, like many of the senators, and he needs the help of a staff, the same way that, I imagine, your staff helps these gentlemen in front of you to prepare questions in consultation.

The Chairman: You would be surprised how independent, the senators are in approaching their questions, I can assure you.

Mr. Honderich: All politicians make speeches. If you would like to acknowledge at the outset that this speech or part of it was contributed to by someone else, then perhaps newspapers could also say the Bobby Orr column is written in collaboration with someone else.

The Chairman: I think that is a pretty good answer. Let us go back to why you have Globe and Mail rather than a Star sports writer do it?

We used to always have Liberals write speeches for Mr. Pearson.

Mr. Fortier: That is your problem.

Mr. Honderich: Mr. Davey, as I said, I do not know about this matter until you asked the question and the information I have is that this was done through the Bobby Orr Enterprises. I do not have personal knowledge of this.

The Chairman: I hope I do not appear from this line of questioning to be antagonist towards Bobby Orr. I happen to think he is the best player in the league.

Senator Prowse: To whom does the Star cheque go for the column?

Mr. Goodman: The Star buys it from the Syndicate. The Syndicate buys it from Bobby Orr Enterprises Limited.

The Chairman: I assume this is standard practice. In other words, you carry a column by, I believe, Arnold Palmer. You have a Ron Clark column. You used to have a Nan Greene column and a Gordy Howe column. Bobby Hull wrote a column. This is all presumably handled in this way, or something like it.

Mr. Goodman: Yes. Most of the big name athletes are incorporated and we or the Syndicate buy material from the company.

The Chairman: Do big name politicians write their own material?

Mr. Goodman: We used to believe they did.

Senator Prowse: They do not get columns either.

Mr. Goodman: I assume the Prime Minister writes everything he says.

The Chairman: It is now 11.30. I am going to suggest we take a break until 11.35, to give the reporter a break. We will resume our questioning in exactly five minutes.
—A short recess.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, I would like to call the session back to order. I think that Mr. Goodman indicated to me he wanted to add just a word in connection with the final question before we had our recess.

Mr. Goodman: It was in connection with the Bobby Orr column. I would like to point it out—to use a specific example but it applies to any sort of a syndicated column by a big name figure—the stipulations that the Syndicate and the Star make with Bobby Orr enterprises are these. Whoever wrote the column in collaboration with Orr, that copy that came out had to be professional and meet our standards and that the Bobby Orr enterprises were responsible for paying the writer.

The practice that has emerged is that Orr and the writer collaborate especially in terms of ideas. Orr happens to have a lot of ideas and thoughts about his colleagues in the National Hockey League. The writer will sit down after his collaboration, and write the column. It then goes to Orr's lawyers who hand it to him before it comes out to the syndicate.

Under these circumstances we feel that the column actually reflects the thoughts and views of Bobby Orr on whatever subject is in the paper that day.

Senator Sparrow: Have you ever tried to follow that chain through to find out if that in fact happens?

Mr. Goodman: Oh yes. The example that was used, when that came up, we went to the lawyer to get his viewpoint. He made an example, this next column was one on Esposito because Orr wanted to say something about Esposito not being valued enough. Orr spied out his views on Esposito and the lack of appreciation and that is the next Bobby Orr column.

Senator Sparrow: The publisher of the Calgary Herald was here and this was when the question came up, and led us to believe he thought it was written by Orr himself. He made that statement. I would certainly think the general reader would feel that is in fact written by Bobby Orr.

Mr. Fortier: Not any more.

Mr. Goodman: But the reader surely reads the Bobby Orr column because of its ideas, not because of its style, and the ideas are Orr's.

The Chairman: Well, I think we get the idea. I am sorry, do you want to add something to that or not?

Mr. Honderich: I think the senator raised a point that from the viewpoint of professionalism should perhaps be considered. I think you are right. A person reading the Bobby Orr column thinks it was written by Bobby Orr. Maybe there is an argument that one should say "By Bobby Orr, in collaboration with so-and-so".

I am not being facetious but if that is a valid principle, then how far do you carry it? I mean, let us just take the speeches that people in public life make.

Senator Prowse: The Prime minister has told you.

The Chairman: On that note I think we might turn to other questioning. I think Senator McElman is next.

Senator McElman: We had testimony recently from the Canadian Association of Professional Journalists.

The Chairman: That was yesterday morning.

Senator McElman: Yes.

The Chairman: Of course, you know that Mr. Goodman was one of the people in attendance. I think I can say this in fairness, Mr. Honderich was also in attendance for much of the morning as well, not as a witness, but I think you heard what was said.

I am sorry. Go ahead, senator.

Senator McElman: I am reading from a newspaper report. Mr. Drea said at a later point:

"If we look at the cumulative press reports on the committee's hearings, for the average reader it seems to centre around publishers calling for an end to succession duties and that they are doing a good job."

At another point he says—this is in the brief that Mr. Drea submitted to the committee. Mr. Drea stated that:

"The almost complete lack of testimony and senatorial inquisitiveness directed to the professional standards of news reporters can only be described as dismaying".

The point was raised at that time that these matters actually had been dealt with at length in the questioning and in answers given. In fact, most of the briefs presented on behalf of the chains and independent ownership have suggested to us ways in which they help in training, and so on, to improve professional journalists.

The question that I asked of them was: how could it be that this does not get through to them; the people who are vitally interested, that these efforts are actually being covered in some depth?

Mr. Honderich: I heard that discussion, senator. What was not clear in my mind is what was meant by "standards"? Were you talking about the standards a newspaper should have in hiring a reporter or were you talking about the standards of journalism? I was confused.

Now, if you were talking about the standards of journalism, then I have failed to read in the press accounts any serious discussion of that matter.

If you were talking about the standards of a newspaper in hiring reporters and the conditions and criteria they should meet in performing their function, I do not think I have read in the papers very much about that. If the discussion has taken place then the press has been very lax in reporting it.

In the discussion yesterday morning I was very interested to hear Mr. Drea say, as an aside, that he travels quite a bit throughout Ontario doing work for the Ontario Government.

The question this brings to my mind, as a publisher, is: Is this not an inherent conflict of interest? How can a reporter accept payment from a Government agency for work he does on his own time and then be objective, if it is required, to write about that agency?

To my mind there has been no discussion of professional standards in this area. So far as the industry is concerned, I have not heard any discussion on such matters as privacy. I was touched here this morning in respect to people in public life, but what rights of privacy do exist and where is the press offending not only public taste but perhaps public interest in going beyond a certain line. I heard no discussion of this.

I have heard no discussion as to whether or not the press and magazines generally should properly pay people who have been convicted of offences for their articles. Is this in the public interest?

So, if you are talking of standards, from my point of view, no. I am not aware that you have gone into these areas.

The Chairman: Just on a point of clarification. The whole question of standards that was raised yesterday in the discussion was not raised by the senators. It was raised by the witnesses and the standards to which they were referring—I think I state it correctly—were standards for reporting and for reporters.

Mr. Honderich: Has there then been sufficient discussion in this area?

The Chairman: To answer your question, although I am not a witness—I would say I do not think sufficient, but I am sure there has been a good deal, yes.

Mr. Honderich: We have newspapermen reporting proceedings without the benefit of shorthand or speedwriting. What is the responsibility of the press to the public, not only to the public but to you gentlemen in this area? These are things that I think the committee should be discussing.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: Well, I suggest we have touched most of the basics, first of all, which you referred, and most of the questions which you raised, sir, in some depth.

The question that is in my mind out of this is that since we have in some degree covered these, does the question raised yesterday by the Professional Journalists actually constitute a criticism of the media, that the reports have in fact given emphasis to the points which the publishers and owners want to give emphasis to?

Mr. Honderich: I don't think so.

Senator McElman: You do not believe that.

Mr. Honderich: No. I think that they have listened to the hearings and as professionals arrived at a judgment of the things that they think are important and significant and interesting, and they have written about these things.

The Chairman: This is just an observation. I always feel very sensitive in this area because I feel that it is impossible to ask these questions at this type of discussion without some reference to the coverage which the hearings have received. While in terms of breadth of coverage it has varied greatly across the country, in the Toronto area, for example, the coverage has been intensive. I think it has been good. I think it has been fair. At the same time, although this is not in any sense critical of the reporters who are here, or indeed of the newspapers who have published their views—nor, let me underline this, am I attempting to patronize these people, I would suggest you cannot fully appreciate what is happening here without reading the transcript. I think that is terribly important. I cannot say it often enough.

Senator McElman: I appreciate your concern, Mr. Chairman, and I share it. Let me suggest that I was not being critical in that sense nor was I attempting a judgment on the basis of testimony yesterday.

The Chairman: Quite. I appreciate that.

Senator McElman: What I am trying to get now is both sides, to consider divergences of opinion, simply to get information on the record.

The Chairman: Fine.

Senator McElman: I was not being critical.

The Chairman: No. I take your point.

Senator McElman: I am not forming judgments on the coverage of this committee.

The Chairman: I might say I was referring to the Senators but to other people interested in the committee.

Mr. Honderich: But, Mr. Chairman, I think our people are too timid. I think that in addition to being Senators that you are Canadian citizens. You have certain basic rights. It may be your function to criticize the press. I would not apologize for criticizing the press. This is our right. The trouble with the press is that there is not enough criticism of it.

Senator McElman: I assure you, sir, I make no apologies.

Senator Prowse: We have not written our report yet.

The Chairman: If you are under the impression we have not been critical, I think that would be an erroneous impression.

Mr. Honderich: I interpreted the senator's remarks to mean he did not mean to be criticizing the press. What I was trying to do was to say he has the right to criticize the press and the more criticism we get will produce better papers.

The Chairman: If I may hone in on the point, before we turn to Senator McElman, that I had been making or he was making: we are not being critical of the coverage the hearings are receiving. I think in that specific area would be reluctant to make any observations until the hearings are completed and our recommendations are in our report.

Senator McElman: I must say, Mr. Chairman, I deeply appreciate Mr. Honderich's suggestion I do have a right to be critical of the press. In some areas I do not have such a right.

Senator Smith: It is the chain gang.

Senator McElman: As to the press council, quite aside from your enthusiastic approval of it, I take it, we have had suggestions from some witnesses that perhaps it might be a good thing but it would take some two or three years, as I recall the testimony, to set it up.

Do you see any reason why it should take such a length of time?

Mr. Honderich: Well, if the publishers were willing, it could be set up in a matter of weeks and it could be functioning in a month.

Senator McElman: We also had testimony from one of your friendly competitors, Mr. Bassett, that—I am not putting words in his mouth, I am not exactly quoting him—he believed there to be a cartel in the newsprint industry and that something should be done about it.

Have you any views to express on that?

Mr. Honderich: Well, I do not know any publisher who does not believe that the price of newsprint is too high. I am also aware of the fact that, if my memory is correct, over 90 per cent of the newsprint produced in Canada is sold in the American market and abroad. This means, in effect, Canadians do not have too much bargaining power.

To be fair to the industry and relating it to our own operations, our labour costs are going up. I assume their labour costs are going up. If I thought there was a cartel raising prices then I would certainly be taking appropriate action.

This is an area in which newspaper publishers are pretty touchy and certainly if I could buy our newsprint cheaper, this would reduce our costs substantially.

I do not think it is fair to make broad generalizations and certainly in my experience I have no knowledge of the existence of any cartel.

Senator McElman: You do not feel strongly enough about the subject to suggest that there should be any intensive investigation of that area?

Mr. Honderich: No. I can only say if I felt there was restraint of trade here or if I had any evidence to suggest it I would be the first man at the door of the Restrictive Trade Prices Commission to bring it to their attention.

Senator McElman: Your newspaper is recognized as one of the more reformed-minded newspapers of Canada. I assume that you keep a running professional measurement of your readership market. If you have such studies, what do they indicate about the percentage of youth who are reading your paper? Is it going up or is it going down?

Mr. Honderich: We are very satisfied with it. I think there is a very significant difference in newspaper readership in Canada and the United States. The readership of newspapers among young people in Canada is increasing.

Senator McElman: Are you making any special efforts for changes in your format or approach to be truly relevant to the youth of today?

Mr. Honderich: We are trying to, senator. I do not know whether we are doing enough. I think this is very important.

In our philosophy of publishing, we do not believe in putting a special section for youth. We would like to involve youth in the whole spectrum of news so we very deliberately searched out certain subjects and discussed them from the point of view of young people to try and involve them and I think, to a degree, that has been successful.

The Chairman: What would some of those subjects be?

Mr. Honderich: Well, drugs would be one of the obvious subjects.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: On the matter of Biafra that has been one...

The Chairman: May I just ask one more question before your line of questioning changes? The other day we had a full page from the Montreal Star. I intended to bring it with me this morning, but I think Senator Hays took it back to Alberta with him. There was a picture—are you familiar with the page?

Mr. Honderich: I was here during that period.

The Chairman: You saw the page?

Mr. Honderich: Yes.

The Chairman: I will not attempt to describe it. It was not an advertisement.

Senator Prowse: Go ahead, try.

The Chairman: Would that kind of page run in The Toronto Star, Mr. Honderich?

Mr. Honderich: I think you would have to go back and ask yourself what the purpose of the picture was.

If the purpose of the picture was to try exploit sex for commercial purposes to draw the attention of the readership, the answer "no".

On the other hand, if a picture like that was essential to the intelligent understanding of the subject, certainly we would print it. The question is whether it is a necessary element in public understanding of what you are trying to write about.

The Chairman: I asked Mr. Walker—y were here—about the use of four letter words. Does The Star use the so-called four letter words?

Mr. Honderich: Yes. Again you have to go back to specific stories and the background of those stories. The use of a four letter word where it is not necessary is frowned on at all places but where it is essential to the understanding of the story—for example—many years ago when Pierre Berton was writing a very fine column for The Star he was writing an article on racial discrimination and problems certain coloured people had in getting apartments, and as I recall it, he went with a coloured lady to some area of the city to rent a room; and when the proprietor came to the door and found out a negro lady wanted to rent his premises, the descriptive word he used, and which I will not repeat here, conveyed such vehemence and such antagonism towards a coloured person, it was really essential to the understanding of what went on in that interview and we used that word.

But, in another context I would not use the word, so the question is: Is it necessary to convey the full meaning of what transpired?

Senator McElman: I would like to draw attention, Mr. Chairman, to the apparent indifference between what is taking place in the United States today and the approach taken by Mr. Honderich. Perhaps he would like to elaborate further.

Currently in the United States there is a tremendous lobby on the part of the media to prevent—I think would be the proper word—congress from doing anything with respect to them in the anti-trust or combines legislation.

As a matter of fact, I think the effort is to have them excluded from such legislation.

The Chairman: They are not trying to prevent, they are trying to persuade them to exclude them.

Senator McElman: I take it your suggestion that in cases where it is felt that the public interest is endangered by the extent of range or conglomerate ownerships—correct or if I am wrong—that our legislation should be amended and strengthened in this regard to meet such situations. Am I correct in that?

Mr. Honderich: Yes. Again I do not like to generalize, but I think one must go back to the specifics. I think we all recognize by means of taxation, for example, if you want to go back to the old corn laws, we can prevent taxation on publication of newspapers but I oppose any privilege or preference of any kind by way of taxation or otherwise for newspapers.

I do not think that newspapers should enjoy any special rights. I think they should be subject to the laws and taxes which generally apply to all corporate enterprises in society.

Senator McElman: The question of Biafra, which I started to raise a moment ago, has been made the subject of a fair amount of hysteria, I believe—that is a personal opinion—by the extent and nature of its coverage by media with particular reference in our own nation.

I believe it is your issue of yesterday, the front page says "Rape, Looting 'stories exaggerated', Canadian Says reports Hamper Nigeria Relief", and it is quoting General A. E. Wrinch.

You have had one of your staff reporters on the scene, I believe, sir, Bob Reguly who, in my opinion, is one of the finest Canadian reporters and incidentally the man who, through his investigative reporting, uncovered Gerda Munsinger, and among other things found Hal Banks.

Mr. Honderich: Bob is a very fine reporter. I think he has been sending some very balanced stories from Biafra. I do not know that there was a specific question.

Senator McElman: I have not come to it yet.

Mr. Honderich: I am sorry.

Senator McElman: I was coming to the point because there seems to be a rising suggestion that there has been imbalance, if you will, exaggerated references to the sensational aspects of the great problem they have in that nation, would you in the ordinary course of events—even though you have great faith in your reporter—run checks to determine the balance and so on of the reporter? Would you accept at face value he had done a balanced job?

Mr. Honderich: Well, I think you develop confidence in certain reporters. I happen to have a very fine staff so I think I would be perhaps 99 per cent biased in support of anything the people on our staff wrote.

On the other hand, in the nature of our business there are checks and balances because in addition to the story we would get from Bob Reguly from Nigeria, we will have available to us Associated Press, United Press International, Reuters, Canadian Press, Chicago Daily News Service and London Express Service.

Now, if you see something in Bob Reguly's story that is not referred to in any of the other stories then the editors, in the normal course of events, would get in touch with Bob Reguly and say "Now, this has not been covered by anybody else. Would you like to tell us a little bit more about it?" And this is the process of checks and balances which works all the time.

The Chairman: Do you have a supplementary, Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Senator McElman: If I could just finish mine first.

The General, I believe, has not singled out your newspaper, he has spoken of the world press in this regard. Because of the nature of his comment, would your newspaper perhaps think it advisable that Reguly or some other person should interview the Nigerian authorities and perhaps interview the General himself in more depth to see if there was another side of the story which should have greater reporting?

Mr. Honderich: Well, Senator, my problem as a newspaper reader is that I have read so many conflicting reports on Biafra from all the people that you have indicated, I would find it rather difficult to decide where the truth lies.

Senator McElman: I think the Canadian people are in the same situation.

Mr. Honderich: Yes. I think the problem here is that we have not set out the various points of view but that the points of view are conflicting in themselves. Here again we are back in the area of free discussion basically, and the whole theory of free discussion is not that the truth will emerge under the circumstances in every report, but rather it will emerge from free discussion of the subject.

I think it is going to be some time perhaps before we will arrive at any final conclusion of what has been happening.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier, you have a supplementary question?

Mr. Fortier: Yes. It is with respect to something which Mr. Honderich said about five minutes ago when we were speaking about copy coming in from Bob Reguly or one of their reporters in whom Mr. Honderich has some confidence.

I believe the Toronto Star is one of the very few Canadian papers which maintains on its staff re-write men. Is that correct?

Mr. Honderich: Perhaps yes and no. We have a re-write section.

Mr. Fortier: You have a re-write section. How do your reporters react to the work which is performed by the re-write section? Does it not multiply the multiplicity of errors or the possibility of errors?

Mr. Honderich: This is the inherent danger in it, but if you have a story that is developed in four or five different points, somebody has to put it together in an office and this is the function of the re-write desk, and while we may have a special section we call a re-write desk, no newspaper can function without that service somewhere in its operation. Whether they call it re-write or whether the work is done by copy editors, someone must perform this function.

Mr. Fortier: You have not found this has discouraged any of your reporters?

Mr. Honderich: Well, I think a good paper is a reporter's paper, and that every time you re-write a reporter's original story, you run the risk of losing something.

Mr. Fortier: That is the point.

Mr. Honderich: From that point of view, do not like it. On the other hand, if you have something happening in four or five different places and you have a deadline coming up in a half an hour, there must be a physical way of getting all this information flow into a central point and have it related.

Mr. Fortier: Would this be the one instance where a re-write desk is put to work where you have stories coming in from four or five different places on one particular subject?

Mr. Honderich: This would be its prime use but stories are also rewritten quite often simply because the editor cannot understand what the reporter is trying to say, so it goes on to a re-write desk and have them try to make some sense of it, so to speak.

Mr. Goodman is much more familiar with the operation of the re-write desk than I am. He will be able to answer it.

Mr. Fortier: I think it would be very interesting to hear what Mr. Goodman has to say.

Mr. Goodman: No. Fundamentally there is no question that there is an inherent possibility of mistake. Mistakes occur every time a change is made in a story simply because human beings are doing it and he can make an error.

On the other hand, if you have a story that is either lacking in facts, which are necessary for understanding it, or that its composition is in a style which makes it difficult to understand, then the reader will be better served by someone with more skill, in effect, handle it.

and either develops these facts or adds these facts, whichever is necessary, or switches the words around so it comes out with more clarity.

Mr. Fortier: Under those circumstances, do you still give credit to the reporter who wired in the story to the newspaper?

Mr. Goodman: No. If you are talking about a story with a by-line—on a story with a by-line by and large we are talking about 95 per cent of the stories, there might be a paragraph that came out of the wire service or a background paragraph inserted if those stories are not changed.

If the story is going to be materially changed, then the by-line is taken off.

Most of the stories that are re-written are local stories which either develop in time or which were done by people who, by and large, are not as competent as other reporters. If you have a staff as large as ours, particularly when you are trying to train, as we do in the summer, for example, a large number of people, they are not as skilled as a senior reporter and it may occur that in gathering the story they may have written it too long or without the clarity required for the reader. In that case it will be re-written.

Senator McElman: Returning to this matter in Biafra, I am speaking to you more as a Canadian than a publisher, sir. There has been a great deal of emphasis by the media upon the responsibility that apparently rests with the Canadian people to feed and rehabilitate, and so on.

I appreciate this arises largely out of the fact of the war. At the same time there are many other peoples in the world, the Indian nation, for instance, where people die by the millions.

How would you relate the great emphasis upon our responsibility in the Biafran-Nigerian situation to our responsibility to the Indian people?

Mr. Honderich: Are you talking about Canadian Indians or...

Senator McElman: No, the nation of India. I will get to the other in a moment.

Mr. Honderich: I think we have a responsibility... you are asking me now for my personal views. Surely our basic value in our society is the importance of the individual. Human life is very important. You have an emergency situation in Biafra and perhaps that means their needs must be looked after first, but I think we have an equal responsibility to hunger and suffering wherever it exists in the world.

Senator McElman: Then there is not on the part of the media a continuing pressure upon the Canadian Government to assist any other nations. Should there be?

Mr. Honderich: Well, when you say the Canadian newspapers, I would think...

Senator McElman: The media.

Mr. Honderich: Or the media. We have strongly supported foreign aid for very many years. We feel much more should be done in this area.

Senator McElman: In this same context, do you believe that the media have a special responsibility to maintain pressure upon men in public life with respect to the problems of our native people and are they meeting that responsibility?

Mr. Honderich: I do not think the newspapers or the people in public life are accepting and facing up to these responsibilities. I think it is tragic the way we have treated our Indian and Eskimo population.

I think if the press was doing a better job in this area, then perhaps some people down here might be more inclined to do something about it.

Senator McElman: Yes. It was because of your attitude in your own paper that I raised this. You feel that the media should be doing much more in this respect, that they are falling down.

If there are no supplementaries on that, I would like to turn to one other aspect.

The Chairman: Fine, go ahead.

Senator McElman: By policy, radio and television are not very strong on editorializing or interpretive reporting. Does this throw upon the press media, particularly daily newspapers, a particular role to be perhaps hyper-critical of those in public affairs?

Mr. Honderich: I do not think so.

Senator McElman: You do not think so.

Mr. Honderich: I do not think broadcasters are accepting their responsibility in this area. I think that is one of their functions and they are just not accepting it. To argue you cannot take a position because you are the only radio station or television station in the community is the same thing as a chain newspaper saying it should not take the position because it is the only outlet, and it is this attitude that is really preventing in Canada the kind of discussion we should have about public affairs.

The Chairman: Mr. Honderich, there was another question. You were an officer of the Guild—one of the earliest officers of the Guild. You heard yesterday one of the witnesses say—I think it was Mr. Drea and I am not certain of the actual terminology used—but to all intents and purposes it was that the Guild was really failing in its mission of organizing papers across the country.

Do you agree with Mr. Drea's comment and if you do, why is this the case?

Mr. Honderich: Well, I think it is the right of Canadians to organize and bargain collectively. I think it is also their right not to organize and bargain collectively. It seems to me that the Guild has not been able to convince the people in the majority of newspapers that there are sufficient advantages in union organization.

I would like to mention one of the problems the Guild faces, and I suppose I must accept this responsibility because I was party to the decision many years ago.

The Newspaper Guild started in Canada as an organization representing editorial workers, reporters and editors, and after we had organized the editorial departments on the Star, we faced a basic labour problem.

Now, do you try to extend the benefits of organization to people in the advertising department and circulation department, people that clean the buildings and people that drive the trucks?

From the labour point of view there is strength in numbers so obviously you have a responsibility to carry on the organization. We spread out from the editorial departments into other departments of the business. Now, you have a situation in which the Guild encompasses very many different kinds of employees. There is really not much community of interest between the editorial employees, for example, and the people who drive the trucks. They have a general interest at the time the contract is opened to get as much money as they can, but apart from that there is nothing that ties them together as a cohesive unit.

I think this perhaps discourages some of the editorial people in the Guild which has hopes, as I had originally, that the Guild would also concern itself with professional standards, so if the Guild goes across Canada, for example, to try and organize the editorial department of a paper, they really do not have any longer the basic professional basis. It seems to me, that they require to appeal to the editorial people because their policies now must be determined not only on what is good for the editorial people, but also in terms of what is good for the secretaries and stenographers and people in other departments. Certainly the editorial people feel that their problems are different, and that perhaps the should be accorded more in wage benefits than should be accorded to other departments.

In the process of bargaining you tend to arrive at a basis somewhere so if salaries are going to go up they tend to go up on a percentage basis right across the board rather than perhaps recognizing the greater contribution in one area and giving them a large increase.

From an internal union point of view this is not accepted, so I think this is part of the problem.

Senator Macdonald: Just a question or two. To go back to this idea that you accept more and more there will be interpretive reporting would you agree that in this case then the reader is going to have to be assured that the reporter has a background of knowledge and information and texts which will enable him to make a true interpretation of events that he is reporting?

Mr. Honderich: Yes. I think it means reporters must be more competent and more knowledgeable.

Senator Macdonald: Would you also along in that event that they will have to have professional standards because they will have to be a profession in the same way the legal profession is and have to have certain qualifications before they can be hired as a reporter?

Mr. Honderich: Yes. I think there should be standards and qualifications.

Senator Macdonald: The only other thing I had in mind is in that case then would not all reporting of events have to have a by-line, so that a person would know who was doing the interpreting?

Mr. Honderich: Well, I think one has to define pretty carefully what interpretive reporting is and what it is not.

If I may use a very simple example that came to my mind. Some years ago a grand jury in Toronto brought down a report that said conditions at the Don Jail are very deplorable and something must be done about the problem immediately.

The reporter who received a report went to the mayor and said "Mr. Mayor, what about this report?" The mayor said "This is an awful situation. We have to get at it immediately."

Now, in the old context of news reporting, you stop right there. The report said this. The mayor said "Something must be done about it immediately." But then in our paper something else had been done with it which tended to make it an interpretive report and that was a paragraph that was added that said the grand jury brought down a similar report two years ago and one year ago.

Now, you see you read this story. You have to take the mayor's statement that this is a deplorable situation and that something must be done about it as if he had never heard about it before. The interpretive factor was added; is that an essential element that two similar reports had come down in similar years while he was mayor and the reader was apt to draw his conclusion that the mayor had done nothing about it.

Now, this does not require too much skill. It is the adding on of an essential element which is necessary to the understanding of the story.

Senator Macdonald: I think you go further than that. Take a more complicated case of a reporter writing about Biafra. He would have to have a knowledge of the background of that country and what had happened, and all the rest of it, before he could interpret events.

Mr. Honderich: This touches a very broad and I think important question. As I read the newspaper accounts, Mr. Chairman, of the hearings I have heard discussions of whether or not Canadian newspapers should have more people abroad.

If one was to accept your requirement, Senator Macdonald, that you have to know about Biafra to write about it, then of course you would have to have Canadians in every country of the world because one never knows when a problem is going to arise there, and if we have to know sufficient of the background of the country to present an article, I think this is one of the great problems in having enough Canadians abroad.

I think there is a danger of distortion if a reporter goes into Biafra, or any other country, without any background knowledge and understanding of the country, but I would also think that a good reporter before he gets to Biafra would have found all the literature he could on his subject and had spent many hours reading it.

Peter Newman recently made a trip to Israel and I was most impressed two or three weeks prior to his trip he devoted most of his time to reading about this subject.

Now, where time permits this must be done, but he can even do a lot of reading while the plane flies from here to Biafra.

Senator Macdonald: I had in mind also apart from that that if he was a writer on a political question that the reader might know the writer's point of view. For example, if I happen to be an admirer of Mr. Diefenbaker and if Mr. Newman wrote an article about him, my reaction might be quite different from that of Senator Smith's.

The Chairman: Which Senator Macdonald happens to be, incidentally.

Senator Smith: That was not hypothetical at all.

Mr. Honderich: To the degree that you use a reporter's name I favour it because where the information comes from many sources, sometimes it is difficult.

Senator Macdonald: You have changed the subject. On the idea of freedom of the press do you think there is need for any further safeguards for the freedom of the press?

Mr. Honderich: No, I don't think there are any safeguards. I do not think the press is using the freedom it has.

Senator Macdonald: You mentioned something about...

Mr. Honderich: May I make a comment?

Senator Macdonald: Yes.

Mr. Honderich: One of the editors appearing before you said it was not proper to write editorials about your work because in effect this was sub judice. There is a great misconception in newspapers as to what is sub judice and what is not.

I feel it is perfectly proper to start to comment on a court proceedings while it is in process provided that the comment is in good taste and provided it is not tending to place the court in disrepute or disrespect. I think there are a lot of things we can do that we are not doing.

Senator Macdonald: Just on that question, do you believe reporters should be able to have the privilege of protecting his sources of information?

Mr. Honderich: I think national interest comes above everything else. If we are talking about sensitive defence areas or a matter involving public interest, I say it comes first.

Senator Macdonald: For ordinary prosecutions in a criminal offence, and the reporter has received something prior to the charge, and the prosecution says "Where did you get that information"?

Mr. Honderich: The test that I would apply is whether the information the reporter has and does not wish to reveal is required in the public interest.

If it is required in the public interest, then I think it should be revealed.

Senator Macdonald: If the judge said "You have to answer that question", you would say he has to answer it?

Mr. Honderich: Yes, because I am arguing here newspapermen have no special rights.

Senator Macdonald: You mention something earlier about Time and Reader's Digest, if their editions continue it might affect newspapers?

Mr. Honderich: Yes.

Senator Macdonald: I was wondering if you would like to.

Mr. Honderich: Well, these magazines are moving into regional editions in metropolitan editions and, for example, they have a Metropolitan Toronto edition. The Metropolitan Toronto edition was competing directly for the retail type of advertising which is the mainstay of a newspaper operation.

They have none of the costs that we have in gathering the news. The news is dumped in from the United States, so in effect they are able to sell advertising at rates that legitimate Canadian publications cannot match for the same thing.

Senaior Macdonald: There is no reason for say Time magazine. It only publishes once a week.

Mr. Honderich: Yes.

Senator Macdonald: You say that they are in competition with a daily newspaper?

Mr. Honderich: Well, as I say they have what they call a Metropolitan Toronto edition in which they sell advertising expressly for the Toronto market. The only place it appears is in the Toronto market so now they are competing then with newspapers for advertising intended only for the Toronto market.

The Chairman: I am wondering on that point if Mr. Bannerman or Mr. Turner could tell us how successful this competition for local advertising has been in Toronto?

Mr. Murray Turner, Vice President Director of Advertising, Toronto Star: It is a fairly recent innovation on the part of these magazines, Mr. Chairman. To date it has not been too successful, quite frankly, but if they continue their pressure, which is considerable for these regional retail dollars, I dare say their revenues will start to move forward.

The Chairman: How long has Time been running a Metropolitan Toronto edition, do you know?

Mr. Turner: I cannot be positive but about a year and a half, I believe, but I am not sure on that point.

The Chairman: I was interested in your answer because I have not seen much local advertising in there and I have been watching for it.

Mr. Turner: It is in there.

The Chairman: There is some.

Mr. Turner: Yes, there is.

The Chairman: Do you think they will continue the experiment if they do not get more?

Mr. Donald A. Bannerman, Advertising Sales Manager, Toronto Star: Diana Sweets.

The Chairman: Diana Sweets. Well, then you are. Will they continue the experiment if they do not get more?

Mr. Turner: I would be inclined to feel they would drop it if they do not generate more business.

The Chairman: Mr. Honderich, you make a statement in your brief that there is no local editorial content. The reason I ask that is because there have been several letters, I thought, and Toronto-focused stories. Were they carried in other editions in Canada—say Vancouver, and so on?

Mr. Honderich: I think you will find the statement was only in view of the 5 or 6 pages dealing with Canada.

The Chairman: Of course, I quite appreciate that. But within those first few pages that do deal with Canada, I am wondering if there is any specific variance in content editorially as between the regional editions?

Mr. Honderich: No.

Mr. Turner: The editions that we have seen or the Canadian section is exactly the same or all regional editions.

Senator Macdonald: One final thing. You say in your brief, item 2 that newspapers have “shown little inclination to criticize its own performance and upgrade its professional standards in any general and systematic way—despite obvious shortcomings and some disturbing tendencies.”

Just what shortcomings and disturbing tendencies did you have in mind?

Mr. Honderich: Well, let us take for example the Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association. This is an association which must reflect the views of the publishers and all of the publishers have very different ideas so it is very difficult to find a common denominator. I was most dismayed as a member of that association with the brief they presented to its committee.

To give you a specific example: they cannot agree amongst themselves as to what constitutes freedom of the press. If you cannot agree on a definition of freedom of the press, you can hardly concern yourself with the standards or responsibilities and I would call this a rather alarming situation.

I think the second problem is that the association is unlikely to concern itself with the problems arising from concentration of ownership when in fact the majority of its membership constitutes group ownership. So the problem is that, in my opinion—and I am in a minority here—the things which they should be discussing are not being discussed because of this basic disagreement of the fundamentals of our business.

The Chairman: I think Mr. Fortier had a supplementary question.

Mr. Fortier: Why, Mr. Honderich, is there not a Canadian Society of Newspapers Editors?

Mr. Honderich: There should be but you will run into the same problems with the Society of Newspaper Editors that you run into with the Canadian Press.

If we were to have such a society and if we were to propose in such a society that we should have a press council, would the decision be any different than if we get the owners together?

Mr. Fortier: Would you, as a publisher, encourage and subsidize such an association?

Mr. Honderich: By all means.

Mr. Fortier: As you do for the C.D.N.P.A.?

Mr. Honderich: By all means.

Mr. Fortier: Have you done anything towards establishing such a society?

Mr. Honderich: No, because of the basic characteristics of our business. I think one can only talk about standards of professionalism. Perhaps you have decided on a basic definition of freedom of the press because I think all the responsibilities and obligations and criteria flow out of that.

Now, if you cannot get any agreement on that, and if in fact you have sat through three or four meetings of Canadian Press and other societies—NOT Canadian Press but the Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association in which they have argued about freedom of the press for hours on end without being able to reach any agreement, you really do not see much point then in trying to get editors together and see whether they can agree on something that the owners cannot agree on.

The Chairman: Let me say for the guidance of senators that I would hope we may adjourn at one o'clock. I know I have questions from Senator Sparrow. I have questions from Senator Prowse. I have some from Senator McElman and Mr. Fortier, and I have a couple myself. I just want to remind the senators that it is now 12.25.

Senator Prowse: I have a number of questions. Dealing with the press council, would you say that the press council, aside from disciplining its own members after the event, perhaps its chief value would be the fact that they would know the power of discipline was there and that they would then discipline themselves beforehand?

In other words, if I know I am going to get caught if I do something, I am less apt to do it. Would that perhaps be its chief value?

Mr. Honderich: No. I see its chief values in educating the public to the responsibilities of the press. Now, a press council would be formed which will receive complaints, and here I would like to make what I think is a very important point.

A lot of publishers have the idea that if there was a press council that they would be run ragged dealing with complaints and therefore a press council could not be effective. If we follow the British practice, only those complaints which newspapers themselves fail to deal with adequately would go to the press council.

Now, with a press council a complaint would be heard. The press council decision would be published and in Britain the newspapers feel a responsibility to public decisions of the Press Council. The public then get to know about the decision and in future the newspaper that chooses to take a position at variance with the decision which was handed down would have to do so with the knowledge that public opinion might be a factor there.

Senator Prowse: All right. Going on to the question of chains. You said this could be properly turned over to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission.

Mr. Honderich: What should be turned over?

Senator Prowse: The decision as to mergers or take-overs.

Mr. Honderich: Yes. We do not feel that any take-over by one newspaper or another should be allowed to proceed until it has been examined by some public body such as the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission on the basis of some criteria that will be established to determine whether the take-over met public interest.

Senator Prowse: Would you also think it would be useful in the interest of full public disclosure that every newspaper should carry either in its masthead or at regular periods during the year a list of the owners and whether there were multiple owners and they had other interests, that information as well?

Mr. Honderich: There should be full disclosure. I agree very much on this point with Clifford Sifton and I think it should be possible at any time for any reader to go to a newspaper office and be told who the owners are. I think this information should also be published in the paper.

Senator Prowse: Now, let us take Time and Reader's Digest. If Time and Reader's Digest were subjected to the same, or had to pay the same kind of penalty as other American publishers do—I think it is 12A of the Income Tax Act from which they are exempted.

If 12A was made to apply to them, or they were put in the same position as other foreign publishers, would it be practical or possible for some enterprising Canadian publisher to provide Canadians with a Canadian magazine of this type which might be able to serve a function in this country?

Mr. Honderich: Well, I believe there is about $10 million, if my figure is correct, in advertising revenue going into these magazines.

Mr. Bannerman: At least.

Mr. Honderich: At least. Now, $10 million being spent by Canadian advertisers in American magazines which even the late Mr. Luce described as American magazines, not Canadian magazines. If this money were available in Canada for the magazine press, it would certainly encourage development of Canadian magazines.

Now, if your question is would someone then produce a magazine similar to Time, I do not know. The Canadian market and $1 million would not support the kind of editorial operation that Time magazine is now able to engage in because the market in the United States is much larger, so perhaps it could not go to the same length that Time does today in covering news; but what you would get are Canadian magazines edited by Canadians for Canadians and expressing a Canadian point of view.

I think you must recognize here that newspapers are regional. We do not have national newspapers in Canada because of our geography, so therefore we only have such things as the CBC and CTV and in the print area very few publications dedicated to developing point of view; and it seems to me these are the cohesive elements that are needed to tie this country together. This is what we are being deprived of.

Senator Prowse: As long as Time and Reader's Digest enjoy this privilege, it is going to be practically an economic impossibility for any enterprising person to set up the type of thing you and I have been talking about here.

Mr. Honderich: Senator, I submitted a brief some years ago to the O'Leary Royal Commission on Publications. I said at that time if the Government did not act that slowly Canadian magazines would disappear from the scene. I think all that has happened since then supports the statement I made.

Senator Prowse: You have been very respectfully correct.

Moving from that then to the question of criteria: I can think of nobody who would be better able to give this committee some basis for a report on the criteria which will be useful for editors to consider in selecting their staff than yourself.

Now, can you tell me what you look for when the Star hires a reporter? What criteria do you use in first taking men and then promoting them.

Mr. Honderich: We look initially for people with a pretty liberal education against which they can apply the techniques we can teach them.

Senator Prowse: By pretty liberal education, can you translate that down into—does that mean a B.A. or a B.Sc., or how do you determine that?

Mr. Honderich: A liberal B.A., I think, is a good starting point.

Senator Prowse: By liberal, does it indicate what kind of subjects would you think he ought to take?

Mr. Honderich: History, economics, English. I think those are the three important ones.

The Chairman: Any politics?

Mr. Honderich: Canadian politics, yes.

Senator Prowse: I have another hang-up on these things, political scientists and sociologists. In other words, you would give them a pretty general basis. You look for this first.

Mr. Honderich: Knowledge of the country and the society in which they live.

Senator Prowse: And then you can give them the techniques when you get them.

What about journalism schools in Canada? Have you found that they have been any kind of fruitful source of material for you?

Mr. Honderich: I would like to answer this in two ways: that you find in the journalism classes people who are interested in newspaper as a career and if a person has an interest in following a profession, this is certainly an added advantage. So we do find some of our people in the school of journalism. My own view is that there should not be undergraduate schools of journalism, but journalism should be post-graduate because I think that before you concentrate on techniques, that you need to have the background against which you are going to apply these techniques.

Senator Prowse: You need the box of tools before you can use a tool that tells you how to use it.

Mr. Honderich: You need the knowledge of your tools, yes.

Senator Prowse: When you get a man that you feel has this basic education, what personal characteristics do you look for in that man?

Mr. Honderich: Well, my bias is going to show here now. I look for inquisitiveness, some healthy skepticism. I like somebody with a keen social conscience, somebody that is concerned about the society in which he lives and wants to do something about it.

Senator Prowse: Now, when you come to promote a man from being a reporter—after he has proven himself—for what reason would you fire him? What faults would he have—I do not mean the obvious things like theft and drunkenness and this type of thing.

Mr. Honderich: My greatest concern is—one of my great concerns as a publisher is accuracy. If this reporter was accident prone with his facts, this would be a reason. If I felt or the situation was drawn to my attention that a reporter had deliberately omitted certain relevant facts, that he was aware of, for some reason . . .

Senator Prowse: Intellectually dishonest.

Mr. Honderich: Yes. I would sever the relationship. If I found that a reporter was accepting payments of any kind, either for work performed or not performed, from someone he was writing about, this would be a cause—someone who really failed to perform an honest job for the public, and again we are journalizing in an area where it is most dangerous.

Senator Prowse: Well, the reason I am asking you this question is that we have been asking people pretty general questions and we have been getting pretty general answers. Yesterday we came in for some fairly specific criticism which I must assume is justified, otherwise it would not be made.

What I am trying to do is correct a situation.

There is nobody on this committee who has the knowledge to set up criteria. We can only collect the evidence by which we can judge.

Now, my own idea here is that I have in front of me three people who are at least as well qualified to give the criteria as anybody in Canada.

Mr. Honderich: Well, Senator, if I may I would just like to suggest that both Mr. Newman and Mr. Goodman should comment on that.

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Mr. Honderich: Before doing so, I would like to say you have associated with your committee one of the most knowledgeable and responsible newspaper people in the country—Borden Spears.

Senator Prowse: We also like a variety of voices.

The Chairman: Mr. Newman first.

Mr. Newman: Well, I have a very brief comment because I subscribe to everything Mr. Honderich has said. I would only like to add there is a kind of an ideological compatibility which I think is a criterion at the start. We are, as you know, a very nationalistic newspaper. We believe we were nationalistic before vis-a-vis Britain, now we are nationalistic with the United States. And certainly in hiring editorial writers I look for people who are compatible in this area.

I also look for people who have a very strong reform-minded kind of approach to things. By that I do not mean radicals, but I do mean people who are, small "l", liberals and who believe in the evolution of a better society so that there is a kind of ideology content as well as the criteria that Mr. Honderich mentioned.

Mr. Goodman: One of the points I would start out from—I suppose I am in a kind of technical area. The staff of a newspaper as it operates day by day is very much, in my analogy, like a football team. It is a team effort. It is a lot of people; a lot of different skills are needed, so that when we go out to recruit we are very much in the nature of a team that knows we need something here.

In other words, when we look for a labour reporter where we had a gap for a couple of years—we did not feel our labour coverage was what it should be. That man's knowledge of labour became very important.

What does he know about the background of the movement? Can he spot trends? In other words, in addition or going further, from what Mr. Honderich just said, after apprising ourselves of the basic element, we need somebody who is a particular specialist and then we start to examine further the knowledge that the man has in those areas.

Additionally, we have tried to give people knowledge, to impart to people knowledge that we think they will require. We are trying very hard to find ways to make specialists and to give people the ability to carry out interpretive and other kinds of specialized reporting, about which you have heard great deal, as being necessary in the production.

There were certain basic characteristics in terms of inquisitiveness that are certainly required. There are also technical skills that are required.

If a man has all these things and cannot write with clarity, that man is really not much use to a newspaper that is going to communicate in writing.

There were some people we have had who have been intellectually stimulating, a very good background, but who just cannot write and it is very difficult to find jobs for them in newspapers in terms of an editorial department if they just do not have these background skills.

I think Mr. Spears is exceptionally well qualified to tell you this. He hired me.

Senator Prowse: Do not pass the buck.

Mr. Goodman: It is a mutual admiration society.

Senator Prowse: I think he has done very well.

Mr. Goodman: I just wanted to get that point across.

We also have another difficulty, quite frankly, that we can tell you sometimes in terms of judging people—I have found this myself—being a very good or experienced political or economical reporter does not always mean that one is a good personnel expert.

What we have tried to do is set down on a piece of paper—which I did not bring with me—but which is “What are the reporter’s skills?” What are we looking for? He is a good reporter. What do I mean?

We have tried to define these skills that people have and we rank, for example, all the people on our summer program, our summer raining program.

The Chairman: We would be grateful if you would do that.

Senator Prowse: The point is this: when you talk of freedom of the press, we get a different explanation from everybody that comes here. The impression you get is that everybody is trying to write out his own essay that will be a little better than somebody else’s. I am not sure basically that once you get under the semantics there is that much difference.

Would you say in the setting up a criteria that each paper would have to have its own criteria but first of all they would have to outline to satisfy themselves as to what their own philosophy or their mandate of publishing was; and the criteria would then flow from that.

Mr. Goodman: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Would this be a fair assumption?

Mr. Goodman: I would think so.

Senator Prowse: So we may have several sets of criteria or the average chain or group; they like to be called would perhaps have different ones.

Now, editors and technical people—Do we have to set down a criteria for these people, aside from honesty and technical capacity.

Mr. Honderich: I think you have touched on another good point. A man is hired as a reporter basically because he can write and then he does a good job as a reporter. He becomes an editor. Not all reporters are good editors, so you need a different set of criteria there. You need a different set of criteria for each level you go to.

Senator Prowse: A man can be elected because he can talk and then you find out he cannot administer.

Let us take one more then and this is my final question.

Senator McElman: May I have a supplementary here?

The Chairman: Do you want to hear Senator Prowse’s final point?

Senator McElman: You are going to a new point, are you?

Senator Prowse: I am going to a new point.

The Chairman: All right, Senator McElman.

Senator McElman: Once you have established a criteria and have what you consider a really promising reporter developing, then looking to your special field of which you spoke, do you consider it useful to give paid sabbaticals so you can get those people out into the area concerned for specialist training?

Mr. Goodman: We have not at the moment a policy of sabbaticals as such. We have discussed whether we can implement it. We have encouraged our reporters wherever possible to make use of available programs of this nature, which effectively removes them from the profession for a year to sit back and look.

I personally was most fortunate in this respect of having been a Nieman fellow from Canada.

The problem is that there are effectively very few programs of this nature here. You have the Southam fellowship, which is four. Virtually everything else is American. There are no more Nieman Fellowships in Canada because no one will pick up the program.

There is Stanford University which has a type of fellowship on which we just have a reporter going on now. We make use of them, I think, more than any other paper. But the availability of it is very limited. One of the things we have been discussing in terms of all our training is perhaps that this is exactly the kind of thing we are going to have to embark on—take up the university idea that every three or four years a person is going to have to go back and immerse himself and be up to date in what is the state of his particular specialty after four years change.

Senator McElman: In the absence of such fellowships do you believe there is a special responsibility on industry itself to fill this vacuum?

Mr. Honderich: Yes, I am not sure as to the best means of doing it. We are going to require more and more specialists. I am not sure that we are going to get specialists Niemans Fellows, as much as I admire this course.

I think perhaps we may have to get specialists in a different way, by perhaps arranging that writers spend some time in industry, or government operation, so they can develop intimate knowledge of the field.

We do not have sufficient intimate knowledge in certain areas. I think this can only be acquired by having people involve themselves in that period of time.

Senator McElman: Do you think that the industry indicates at the moment, that it would be prepared to financially underwrite a development program of this nature.

Mr. Honderich: I can only speak for the Star. We are prepared to do what we feel is necessary, to achieve the degree of proficiency in specialist areas that we require.

Senator McElman: In other words, you feel a sense of responsibility.

Mr. Honderich: Very much so.

Senator McElman: Up to this point there is no constructive program along these lines.

Senator Prowse: I will just follow that comment, if I may.

Might something be done in this regard, keeping in mind the need of some more newspapers, and less wealthy newspapers, for the same kind of assistance, similar to the Canada Council Grants in this area, or would you be afraid that anything that the government might do would jeopardize the freedom of the press, or the independence of the press.

Mr. Honderich: Well, Senator, Mr. Goodman, who was a very good administrator, in addition to being a very good managing editor, is aware of certain grants made available by the government now, for training purposes, and we avail ourselves of these grants, and they are used, are they not, as part in our summer training program, so I do not see any conflict here at all.

Senator Prowse: So there is some assistance available to the smaller newspaper who is having difficulty now, if they want to use it?

Mr. Honderich: Yes, but the problem is an industry problem. There is a growing need in the newspaper industry, for good copy editors now.

A copy man who takes a reporter's story after it has been checked by the city editor and the managing editor and checks it finally for spelling, and so on and so forth.

You cannot publish a newspaper without them and yet there is a dearth of good copy editors in Canada. If we could act as a profession what we would really do is establish a training program for copy editors and not only for the Toronto Star but for all newspapers, encouraging people into this field but who seem to be handicapped in acting as an industry.

Senator Prowse: The industry has some reluctance to get together and act as an industry. Are the individual members afraid somebody might benefit from what he did.

Mr. Honderich: No, I think it is a two-edged sword. When I wore my hat as the present I was worried about the fact I might say something differently. The fact of the matter is that if you bring someone up to the level of confidence, a good copy editor, he is worth $50 or $100 more to you than he was before.

Senator Prowse: The evidence we have is that, for a variety of reasons which we do not have to repeat, there will probably be a greater concentration of ownership of newspapers in either present groups or additional groups in the future.

In other words the owner-publisher looks like he is apt to become as rare as a woodpecker. With this and the possibility of the views which you have stated, can you suggest to us any device which we might recommend as a means of ensuring the independence of the editorial news sections of the various newspapers that are going to be gobbled up in this way.

Mr. Honderich: Well, Senator...

Senator Prowse: This will apply to other media.

Mr. Honderich: I would hope first of all your basic assumption is not correct.

Senator Prowse: I would hope it is not too

Mr. Honderich: And that appropriate action is taken to prevent not only this happening but perhaps to redress situations in which the public are presently being denied free discussion.

I think in fairness that you should be entitled to hear two opinions and I will give the opinion of the publisher and Mr. Newman can give you the opinion of the editor.

I believe in giving our editorial departments maximum freedom but there remains the constraint that I must exercise having regard for the overall well-being of the company and I feel that this judgment is essential and needs to be available to the editors in some of the decision-making processes and that if you take that away then perhaps there will be less responsibility in the news columns than there is today.

One of the things that I find about many reporters and editors who do a first class job—in the area—for example, involving libel. They would be more inclined to take risks than I as a publisher would not take.

When I say “take risks” I think that they will be sometimes prepared to publish stories which, in my opinion, they can not support in court of law and I think this is the test. They would argue this is in the public interest. I think that this constraint is very necessary in the decision-making process. Over the years a publisher, if he has any merit at all, requires a pretty general knowledge of public affairs and I think his background is useful gain in the editing process.

I saw in our paper recently an article from Washington which said that the United States was going to permit subsidiaries in Canada to trade with Free China. This passed all our editors. Yet it did not make sense to me because it really meant in effect that if they were going to do this that the American Companies could set up branch plants in Canada. I get around what is called the “Trading with the Enemy Act” so it was only the publisher’s insistence here... Mr. Goodman happened to be away at the time or he would have caught it... it was only the publisher’s insistence that he be sent back to Washington for checking and finally it came out differently.

This is not what was going to happen. They were changing one regulation but there was nothing else that still amounted to the same thing. I think the publisher acquires a broad background which I think can play a useful role if the publisher himself takes an active part in the newspaper.

Before I ask Mr. Goodman to comment on this I would like to say, I, as a publisher, have been disturbed by some of the suggestions made before this Committee that publishers exercise this power in an arbitrary manner in a denial of what I would call freedom of the press.

I would like to say I think these are very, very rare incidents. I cannot cite one incident in which I know this to have happened and this brings me the testimony that was made here yesterday by the gentleman from the University of Western Ontario.

The Chairman: Two days ago, I think.

Mr. Honderich: Speaking about the so-called Dickins incident.

I am not thoroughly familiar with the fact but I think from a publisher’s point of view, I understand that Mr. Dickins in fact was counselling young people to join a demonstration which had as its purpose the blocking of a public highway, in other words violation of the law.

The Chairman: An international bridge.

Mr. Honderich: Now, as a publisher I think a newspaper has a responsibility to uphold the law. If the law is wrong, change it. I would not permit anyone on the paper to counsel anyone to break the law.

I think this is what happened in London and I think that some of the remarks which have been made here have been very unfortunate and unfair because Mr. Blackburn is a man of integrity. I disagree with him on many things, particularly the ownership of a newspaper, a radio station and a television station, but I would have taken the same approach he took there and yet I feel quite sure that we have people on our staff today who feel it is proper for a newspaper to counsel someone to break the law because the law is bad.

Now, if you were to separate the overall responsibility for the financial operation of a newspaper from the editorial function, in my experience, you would be losing a lot.

Senator Prowse: In other words you would not accept the Figaro type of thing where the news editors themselves take over the running of the paper and have responsibility only to themselves, subject to the ability of the paper to survive under their directorship.

Mr. Honderich: When you say “subject to the ability of the paper to survive”, you are saying a lot of things. You can only operate a newspaper provided you have the financial wherewithall to do it and if the group editors do not have financial responsibility and follow courses which result in the demise of the paper, you will have lost everything.

I think great responsibility comes from having to balance your accounts at the end of the year and I would like to say again that the publication of a newspaper is something like a public trust. You have, you know, to provide profits. Profits are essential and while some of this profit motive must be secondary to the dissemination of full and frank discussion of the information and opinion... this is sort of a contradiction and how one approaches it.

Senator Prowse: But you have to live with it, do you not?

Mr. Honderich: And how one approaches it really determines what kind of papers survives and goes on.

The Chairman: I think Mr. Newman was going to say something.

Mr. Newman: Well, I would like to land somewhere in between Mr. Honderich and the Figaro experience. I do think there should be some measure of internal democratization in newspapers. I do not think that the editorial department should run a newspaper because I think the man who owns the printing press has to have the final word but I think that there could be established something like your advisory editorial committees which would consist of editorial department people who would meet with the publisher, so that at least the publisher knows as an articulate example what the editorial department thinks, and I think this should be part of the decision-making process.

Senator Prowse: In the main there are two things here. One, as I understand Mr. Honderich to say, is that the owner can not escape really his responsibility as a publisher. There is no way out of it whether the owner is a corporation or whether it is an individual and the corporation must have somebody to finally make decisions "Yes" or "No". This is one factor.

The other is that we have the need that there should be some authority to weigh public responsibility and the necessity for standing consultation and so there would be balance; there has to be a great deal of independence in the hands of the editorial news end of it.

Is there any formula by which this can be worked out? For example Southam has suggested they give their people complete independence and that they take care of that when they select a publisher.

Mr. Honderich: Senator, I do not want to oversell a Press Council but I think a very effective Press Council can achieve public involvement in what a newspaper does.

If you have a Press Council in Ontario with a chairman who has the eminence of Lord Denning in England and it takes its responsibility seriously and with good public representatives and there is any discussion about these problems of what newspaper should be doing, particularly newspaper where there is only one in a town, I think you will start to generate public pressures that will reflect themselves in the newspapers including the Star.

Senator Sparrow: You operate two dailies and 13 or 14 weeklies. Would you have figures of how many of the subscribers to your weeklies take the dailies? How many of your subscribers would take both your newspaper or at least the daily newspaper as well as the weekend newspaper?

Mr. Honderich: I do not have these figures on the overlap.

Senator Sparrow: Would there be figures available on the overlap?

Mr. Honderich: I do not think those figures are available.

Senator Sparrow: Would you give us your opinion then as to whether normally people in a market such as you serve would in fact take a daily newspaper as well as a weekly?

Mr. Honderich: Well, there are approximately 32 weekly newspapers within the Metropolitan Toronto area. The weekly newspapers, with which we are associated either part owner or majority owner, have a total distribution of 200,000.

Now, this distribution is also in the area where the Star is the leading daily newspaper.

Senator Sparrow: I asked you this question because a great many people in Canada in great many areas are not serviced by daily newspapers and must rely on the weeklies.

Mr. Honderich: This is not so in the Toronto market.

Senator Sparrow: No. I was wondering whether the average person who was restricted to a weekly newspaper, if there were a daily available if, in fact, he would purchase it but you cannot answer that question.

One other question that interested me would be Rhodesia, as an example, how do you get your news from Rhodesia?

Mr. Honderich: At the moment we depend upon services. If a situation develops in Rhodesia that is of interest to us, we would probably send either Bob Reguly out from Rome or Val Sears from London.

Senator Sparrow: You mentioned earlier about either "contract" or "contact" reporters.

Mr. Honderich: We probably have people in Nigeria, for example, or whatever the country is, who contribute articles to us occasionally or who we can ask to write articles but these would not necessarily be Canadians.

Senator Sparrow: Would you have sources in Rhodesia that would get reports both from the black and white community in those areas?

Mr. Honderich: No. I think we would be pretty hard pressed to get it from the black without sending someone there ourselves, as we have done.

Senator Sparrow: It would be very difficult then to actually get a true picture of the conditions in Rhodesia, as such?

Mr. Honderich: Well, I am not aware at the moment of the freedom of movement that is allowed in Rhodesia but our attempts to get stories of the black people in South Africa have been very difficult and Norm Phillips, our late Ottawa editor, just about lost his life trying to get the story of the black people in South Africa.

The Chairman: Mr. Honderich, I would like to read a quote from an article by Dennis Morton in the Canadian Forum.

It says:

"It does not matter whether the North Bay Nugget belongs to Roy Thomson, Max Bell or the local drygoods merchant. They are all, without a single exception, in the same kind of hands. They all belong to the Canadian business community and they all do what that community wants."

Do you agree with that statement in regard to newspaper publishers?

Mr. Honderich: Well, I can give you your answer again but it would not be of much value. This is a broad generalization. I said in my brief that the tendency of chain ownership was to reflect the establishment point of view. Business is certainly one of the establishments.

The Chairman: Why is it no daily newspaper in Canada has ever, to my knowledge, supported the NDP at election time? More specifically, why is it that the Toronto Star, so our NDP friends tell us, support the NDP except at election time when it supports the Liberal Party.

Mr. Honderich: When you say "support the NDP—"...

The Chairman: Advocate the election of a NDP Government.

Mr. Honderich: The Toronto Star does not advocate the election of a NDP Government within elections. I think the problem here is that the CCF-NDP is rather a Johnny-Come-Lately to the idea of social welfare in this country.

The Toronto Star back in 1892 published its first editorial when we did advocate free hospitalization for people with tuberculosis; and long before the NDP was developed, the Toronto Star was carrying on an active campaign for many of the social welfare measures which now exist, including minimum wage laws, mothers' allowances and things of that kind.

Now, for example, we agree with the NDP on many social welfare matters but that doesn't necessarily mean that we regard the NDP as the best means of achieving these ends.

I think that is the distinction. We agree with them on many of their programs. We do not necessarily believe that they are the best means of achieving this end.

There is nothing to prevent the Toronto Star some time in the future supporting an NDP Government. Indeed, if we thought the NDP Party provided the people with an effective alternative to government, we would have no hesitation in supporting them.

The Chairman: I asked the question because from time to time in your Letters to the Editor Column, you see letters from outraged NDP'ers saying you support us but when the chips are down you do not.

Did you want to add a comment, Mr. Newman?

Mr. Newman: Yes. I think our criterion is not political parties but issues. We do not regard a public newspaper as an exercise in ideological purity. We try to back the party that we feel is most capable of implementing the issues we stand for but historically we have supported the NDP and Conservatives. In 1908 to 1918 we supported the Conservatives in Ontario because they were nationalizing the power industry.

The Chairman: I did not ask about the Conservatives. You supported them in a Provincial election quite recently. I am asking about the NDP.

Mr. Newman: Well, the NDP; in 1919 to 1923 we supported the Drury Farm Labour Movement, which was one of the predecessors of the CCF.

In 1945 we endorsed E. B. Jolliffe when he was running as leader of the CCF in Ontario.

In 1969 which is last year, we supported the NDP in Manitoba and British Columbia.

The Chairman: Well now, really. I have often wondered why Mr. Schreyer was successful. Now I know.

Mr. Newman: One of the first things I did when I became editor was to change the label in the annual publications which list the political affiliations of the paper.

We had always been listed as "Independent Liberal" or a large "L" Liberal, which was changed to "independent."

I think if I could sum up the ideology in one sentence it would be that the test in the future is between revolutionary ideology and evolutionary tide of human energy, working for the gradual transformation of society and it is this tide we support.

The Chairman: Mr. Honderich, in the same area: does organized labour get a fair break when it comes to news coverage?

I ask you that not just from the Star but from the newspaper across the country, to the best of your knowledge. The CLC presented a brief in which they argued they did not.

Mr. Honderich: As I am sure you know, labour is one of the establishments which I think has access to the press.

Senator Prowse: May I ask a supplementary question?

The Chairman: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Am I correct in assuming that what you said in answer to Senator Davey's question was that the Star had its own policies and every once in a while the NDP finds itself agreeing with the Star?

Mr. Honderich: That is the way I put it.

Senator Prowse: That is what I thought.

The Chairman: Incidentally I would say to the Senators we will sit until 1.30. Can you stay until 1.30?

Mr. Honderich: Yes, sir.

The Chairman: I have first Senator McElman and then Mr....

Senator McElman: I just wanted to get back to one we dropped earlier.

This situation where the media are becoming an element of the opposition to government, I think we have pretty well agreed that the critical commentary and so on emanate largely from the print media, the daily newspapers; and I take it you advocate that radio and television, even although it may require broadening of the guidelines of the CRTC should get into this role as well, not that you should diminish but they should come up.

Would you think in our system if the develop two proposals of critical interpretation that the reporting and editorializing might take on such weight that any government would find it very difficult to survive beyond one term?

Mr. Honderich: No, not if you ensure there are many voices in the field of communication.

Let us look at Toronto. You have three strong daily newspapers each one reflecting somewhat different point of view.

In addition to that you have eight or radio stations. I know the owners of many those stations. I know they have different shades of opinion to mine so, so long as you have many voices working in the field of communication I would not be concerned, but if you had a concentration I think there might be a problem.

Senator McElman: You have suspected what my second question would be. With the trend of this development and if something is not done to stop that trend of concentration and multi-media ownerships and so on, they were not halted in some fashion, would there be a danger?

Mr. Honderich: I think there is always a danger in concentration of power.

Senator McElman: Do you feel the danger would, say, give rise in this area?

Mr. Honderich: Well, in the specific area you are concerned with...

Senator McElman: Well, the specific area I raised, yes.

Mr. Honderich: Yes. I think there is a danger in concentration but whether even without concentration you would have all the outlets turning against one government or one party, I do not know.

Senator McElman: Thank you.

Mr. Fortier: I am tempted to ask a question at this stage. You give your reason in your brief as to why you have acquired weeklies in the Toronto area. How do you reconcile the actual fact of acquisition with your view of the potential danger of group ownership?

Mr. Honderich: Well, I think our function in Toronto as a publishing company is to provide people of the community with a service. We have a situation where the population has developed in suburban areas and are no longer in the downtown central core.

What we are doing here is protecting the future of the paper—it is as simple as that—we will have a base for future operations.

Mr. Fortier: You do not feel there is any valid comparison for what you are doing here and the expansion or increase in the concentration of newspapers within groups.

Mr. Honderich: No, because let us assume that instead of having weekly newspapers at the circulation of the Star was 100,000 higher per day. Would it be wrong for the Star to have a circulation of 500,000 rather than 400,000? I say "no".

In addition to this—I do not put this forward as an argument because I have effective power of control—in many of these weekly newspaper operations, we have local partners who have a capital investment—some of them as much as 50 per cent—and I think this helps to contribute to a healthy situation.

Mr. Fortier: You make a very strong case for local ownership of the news media.

Mr. Honderich: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: How do you explain the fact that a year or so ago you applied for a UHF licence in partnership with Infocor which is a Montreal based company?

Mr. Honderich: I think you must go back to 1959 when the first television application was heard in Toronto.

In that application we said we would make an application to protect our competitive position. We did not think newspapers should be involved in broadcasting because of the concentration of outlets at that time and we were prepared to withdraw our application if this point of view would prevail.

We said too if the BBG of those days awarded a licence to one of the newspapers, it was going to upset the competitive relationship and I think the inference there was the other newspapers would have to think in terms of trying to get into this area to protect their competitive position. So it is on those grounds.

Mr. Fortier: I still do not understand why you went to Montreal when you looked for a partner rather than looking for a partner in Toronto.

I am all for Toronto people looking for resources and knowhow in Montreal.

Mr. Honderich: I think in looking for a partner, we were trying to find someone with views similar to our own. We went to an independent newspaper.

Mr. Fortier: I see, that is the reason.

Mr. Honderich: If the present policy of multi-media ownership is to continue, then for competitive reasons, independent reasons, we will have to get into this area.

If we are going to remain competitive it is essential we do so with people who have ideas which are compatible with ours otherwise...

Mr. Fortier: Would you wish to see this working in reverse? In other words, would you at the Toronto Star like to be involved in some form of electronic news media in Montreal?

Mr. Honderich: If we had the money to do so and we had partners who were compatible, yes. I think we could contribute something.

Mr. Fortier: What is the nature of your relationship with Infocor?

Mr. Honderich: We have no direct relationship with Infocor except the very infrequent relationship that exists between Southstar Publishers and the Montreal Standard Publishing Company in respect to Weekend and Canadian Magazines and the people in Infocor were involved at one point in some of the discussions but there is no direct Star relationship with Infocor.

Mr. Fortier: No share participation?

Mr. Honderich: No.

Mr. Fortier: I have many subsidiary questions but because of the time I will switch to another point.

Do you feel the Star, as a publisher of the largest newspaper in Canada published in the City of Toronto, has a particular role to play in explaining the Quebec situation to your readers; and if so, what do you do towards that end?

Mr. Honderich: We feel that we have a responsibility to report to our readers the significant developments in the Province of Quebec and to do this we maintain in Quebec two correspondents, one in Montreal and the other in Quebec City.

Mr. Fortier: I notice in your brief that insofar as basic principles are concerned at the Toronto Star, at No. 13, you speak of:

"Defence of the rights and dignities of racial and other minorities," and another one,

"staunch advocacy of Canada's Nationhood against all influences, external and internal, which tend to limit or undermine it."

My first question is: do you consider the French Canadian to be one of the minorities whereof you speak over here?

Mr. Honderich: I think in the past as far as the communications media is concerned, they have been a minority and I think that the media in Canada, and particularly the press, was very late in realizing that there were certain problems in Quebec that had to do with our nationhood and should have been brought to the attention of the Canadian people.

Latterly I think that they have ceased to be a minority in the media because we have improved our coverage and I think there is some acceptance for their point of view.

Mr. Fortier: In view of this perhaps I may direct one last question to Mr. Newman.

In the brief, which was read this morning, it was stated that "Development of advertising acceptability standards should go well beyond any local requirement and serve as a model for our industry".

Can you elaborate on this, Mr. Newman?

Mr. Newman: May I speak, Mr. Fortier and Mr. Chairman for about five minutes on the experience of the Star.

The standards of practice have been going for a long time before I was associated with them and it is constantly revised and is being continually revised. To my knowledge I doubt if the ICA or anybody else had a standard of practice.

The ICA have one now, their guide to ethics and practice.

I think the Star through Mr. Atkinson and Mr. Campbell found what they would take and would not take; we have turned down a awful lot of advertising that sometimes is published.

Mr. Fortier: This has happened quite often?

Mr. Bannerman: Quite frequently.

Mr. Turner: I have a file of this. They do get through occasionally. They may mislead them. Mr. Newman can catch them. To my knowledge though we make large publishers draw this to our attention.

Mr. Bannerman: We believe it is equally important to avoid inaccuracy and forms of misleading statements in our advertising columns as in our news columns and if the document—I see you have one in front of you—has been developed over many years and is the result of a great deal of experience in measuring the believability, fairness and credibility of advertising as it was being directed to the—shall we say—ordinary reader whom we feel should not have an approach advertising with a slide rule. I should be able to understand it. It should not mislead from something it says to something it does not say.

Mr. Fortier: How far do you go in verifying the advocacy or accuracy of a representation?

Mr. Turner: As far as is necessary but specifically the requirements in the...

Mr. Bannerman: I have no legal opinions, I think it is covered on the page. If you went to the last paragraph it says:

"When the public places confidence in a certain media, this confidence embraces the advertising in it. Therefore it is of the utmost importance of the advertising acceptability standards set forth in this manual be strictly followed."

This is distributed to all agencies and national advertisers and it applies to classified too.

Mr. Fortier: Can you supply us with the particulars?

Mr. Bannerman: Yes, we will leave some copies.

Mr. Turner: For instance, to give you an example. Let us say a new drug product comes on the market. We will refer the initial advertisement to the Deputy or to a division of the Department of National Health and Welfare for an opinion. We will not carry the advertisement until we get at least their opinion to satisfy ourselves it is in the best interest of the reader and the public.

I would like to make another significant point if I may. A lot of our time is taken up with censoring. That is they have to be approved by the Ontario Censor Board. This is one of the areas on censorship we take on.

Mr. Fortier: I would be very interested in getting this.

The Chairman: I am sure you would, Mr. Fortier, however I must say I promised some of the senators whom I know have appointments . .

Mr. Fortier: Just one last question.

The Chairman: Do you have one last question? This is literally the last question.

Mr. Fortier: I will direct it to Mr. Turner and this is picked up from Senator McElman. On page 4 of the Star yesterday just out of curiosity—we find this advertisement, and I note

THE FACTS
OVER 30,000 MENS' MADE-TO-MEASURE SUITS AND READY-MADE OVERCOATS WERE SOLD
DURING 1969
792 PEOPLE DID NOT SHOW UP
TO SEE ANY OF THE 792 GARMENTS
AND SAVE 39% OFF BEN BERKE'S
FORMER $66 PRICE
FINAL 3 DAYS
$39.95

BEN BERKE

DOWNTOWN TORONTO: 272 YONGE STREET

Did you verify the exactness of these statements?

Mr. Bannerman: We have done business with the Ben Berke organization for a number of years and they have never given us any reason to doubt the accuracy of any of their advertising statements. We therefore did not actually check the statement in the advertisement in question but accepted it at face value based on previous experience with the Ben Berke people.

Mr. Fortier: I won't push my luck and try another.

The Chairman: I will say to you and the Honourable Senators and ladies and gentlemen, Mr. Honderich, we are grateful to you for having come here this morning. I may say I think it is an indication of our interest of the senators that are here. I sent a note around saying we were going to stay and one of them said he could only stay until 1.30.

I am always anxious that you will understand that although we may not have asked questions on every significant and special section of your brief, nevertheless what you have said and what is contained in your brief will be studied and will be considered seriously before we ultimately come to the preparation of our report.

Meanwhile your oral testimony is a criteria of your overall knowledge which I think we at least are beginning to acquire and so perhaps you will accept our thanks which we express to you and the other people in your contingent.

I would say to the senators the next meeting of the Committee is next Friday morning at 10 o'clock at 140 Wellington Street.

I would also say that the next public meeting of the Committee is at 10 a.m., Tuesday February the 10th. That is a week from next Tuesday, at which time, as you know, we will have a round table discussion with the University Student Editors whom we hope will give us their comments on the Student Press and indeed on the media generally in Canada.

Thank you.

The Committee adjourned.

Second Session—Twenty-eighth Parliament
1969-70

THE SENATE OF CANADA

PROCEEDINGS

OF THE

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE

ON

MASS MEDIA

The Honourable KEITH DAVEY, Chairman

No. 17

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1970

WITNESSES:

Canadian University Press: Mr. Allan Saxe, President; Mr. Ron Thompson, Vice-President; Mr. George Russell, Bureau Chief. Mr. David Chenoweth, Managing Editor, McGill Daily, McGill University; Mr. David Scott, Editor, The Gazette, University of Western Ontario; Mr. Mike Smith, Editor, The Journal, St. Mary's University; Mr. Allan Scarth, Editor, The Gateway, University of Alberta; Mr. Lawrence Jones, Assistant Director of Information Services, University of Toronto; Mr. André Villeneuve, Editor, Au Fil des Événements, Université Laval; Mr. Harry Thomas, Editor, McGill Reporter, McGill University.

MEMBERS OF THE
SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA

The Honourable Keith Davey, Chairman

The Honourable L. P. Beaubien, Deputy Chairman

Beaubien	Langlois	Phillips (Prince)
Bourque	Macdonald	Prowse
Davey	(Cape Breton)	Quart
Everett	McElman	Smith
Hays	Petten	Sparrow
		Welch.

(15 members)

Quorum 5

ORDERS OF REFERENCE

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Wednesday, October 29th, 1969.

"With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator Davey moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lang:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to consider and report upon the ownership and control of the major means of mass public communication in Canada, in particular, and without restricting the generality of the foregoing, to examine and report upon the extent and nature of their impact and influence on the Canadian public, to be known as the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media;

That the Committee have power to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry;

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have power to sit during adjournments of the Senate and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation to this Special Committee from 9th to 18th December, 1969, both inclusive, and the Committee have power to sit during sittings of the Senate for that period;

That the papers and evidence received and taken on the subject in the preceding session be referred to the Committee; and

That the Committee be composed of the Honourable Senators Beaubien, Davey, Everett, Giguère, Hays, Irvine, Langlois, Macdonald (Cape Breton), McElman, Petten, Prowse, Sparrow, Urquhart, White and Willis.

After debate, and—

The question being put on the motion, it was—

Resolved in the affirmative."

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Thursday, November 6th, 1969.

"With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Smith:

That the names of the Honourable Senators Giguère and Urquhart be removed from the list of Senators serving on the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media; and

That the names of the Honourable Senators Bourque, Smith and Welch be added to the list of Senators serving on the said Special Committee.

The question being put on the motion, it was—

Resolved in the affirmative."

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Friday, December 19th, 1969.

"With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Langlois:

That the names of the Honourable Senators Bélisle and Phillips (Prince) be substituted for those of the Honourable Senators Welch and White on the list of Senators serving on the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media.

The question being put on the motion, it was—
Resolved in the affirmative."

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Tuesday, February 3, 1970.

"With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Langlois:

That Rule 76 (4) be suspended in relation to the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media from 10th to 19th February, 1970, both inclusive, and that the Committee have power to sit during sittings of the Senate for that period.

After debate, and—

The question being put on the motion, it was—
Resolved in the affirmative."

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Thursday, February 5, 1970.

"With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Haig:

That the names of the Honourable Senators Quart and Welch be substituted for those of the Honourable Senators Bélisle and Willis on the list of Senators serving on the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media.

The question being put on the motion, it was—
Resolved in the affirmative."

Robert Fortier,
Clerk of the Senate.

MINUTES OF PROCEEDINGS

TUESDAY, February 10, 1970.
(17)

Pursuant to adjournment and notice the Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 10.00 a.m.

Present: The Honourable Senators: Davey, (Chairman), Beaubien, Hays, Macdonald (Cape Breton), Petten and Smith. (6)

In attendance: Miss Marianne Barrie, Director and Administrator; Miss Nicola Kendall, Research Director; Mrs. Barbara Sullivan, Researcher; Mr. Yves Fortier, Counsel.

The following witnesses were heard:

Mr. Allan Saxe, President, Canadian University Press;

Mr. Ron Thompson, Vice-president, Canadian University Press;

Mr. George Russell, Bureau Chief, Canadian University Press;

Mr. David Chenoweth, Managing Editor, McGill Daily, McGill University;

Mr. David Scott, Editor, The Gazette, University of Western Ontario;

Mr. Mike Smith, Editor, The Journal, St. Mary's University, Halifax, Nova Scotia;

Mr. Allan Scarth, Editor, The Gateway, University of Alberta;

Mr. Lawrence Jones, Assistant Director of Information Services, University of Toronto;

Mr. André Villeneuve, Editor, Au Fil des Événements, Laval University;

Mr. Harry Thomas, Editor, McGill Reporter, McGill University.

At 1.00 p.m. the Committee adjourned to 2.30 p.m.

At 2.30 p.m. the Committee resumed.

Present: The Honourable Senators: Davey, (Chairman), Beaubien, Hays, Macdonald (Cape Breton), Petten, Quart and Smith. (7)

In attendance: Miss Marianne Barrie, Director and Administrator; Mrs. Barbara Sullivan, Researcher; Mr. Yves Fortier, Counsel.

The following witnesses were heard:

Mr. Allan Saxe, President, Canadian University Press;

Mr. Ron Thompson, Vice-president, Canadian University Press;

Mr. George Russell, Bureau Chief, Canadian University Press;

Mr. David Chenoweth, Managing Editor, McGill Daily, McGill University;

Mr. David Scott, Editor, The Gazette, University of Western Ontario;

Mr. Mike Smith, Editor, The Journal, St. Mary's University, Halifax, Nova Scotia;

Mr. Allan Scarth, Editor, The Gateway, University of Alberta;

Mr. Lawrence Jones, Assistant Director of Information Services, University of Toronto;

Mr. André Villeneuve, Editor, Au Fil des Événements, Laval University;

Mr. Harry Thomas, Editor, McGill Reporter, McGill University.

At 5.40 p.m. the Committee adjourned to Wednesday, February 11, 1970, at 10.00 a.m.

ATTEST:

Denis Bouffard,
Clerk of the Committee.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Tuesday, February 10, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 10.00 a.m.

Senator Keith Davey (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, ladies and gentlemen. I apologize for the delay. I have a set of introductory notes here somewhere which I will struggle through to the best of my ability.

We are going to turn our attention this morning to the university press or perhaps more accurately the student press. Hopefully we can examine its size, scope, dimension and impact.

Our guests today are a group of people, whose numbers I have not counted, but who play varying roles in the university or student press community.

I should make it clear at the outset although they are not representing a student press community as such, they are not here as delegates or representatives of that community, but rather on an individual basis; I think it is fair to say that they do represent a cross section of the student press in Canada. These people and others like them have cooperated with Mrs. Barbara Sullivan in preparing a background research paper on the student press in Canada. Ultimately that document will be made public. Meanwhile, of course, it is available only to the members of the Committee.

Hopefully today we can have a discussion which can complement or augment that document. Indeed some of the views expressed here may change our views on the document which Mrs. Sullivan has prepared for us. Today the witnesses, unlike other witnesses appearing before the Committee, have not been asked to submit a formal written brief. In the sense the publishers of daily newspapers and others were; although we are grateful for one or two informal explanatory documents which we have received from several of the people who are here today.

I think if I could address myself to our guests for a moment that we are really interested today in finding out two things: the first, as I have mentioned, is your comments about the student press in Canada, and then secondly and as well, and I think equally important, we are interested in having your comments and views on the role and function of the mass media generally in Canada.

I would suggest we might perhaps turn to that part of our discussion after lunch or whatever time seems propitious and I would hope in terms of some kind of organized approach we could deal with the student press this morning and then perhaps turn our attention this afternoon to your views on the mass media.

I do not think that should preclude anybody from expressing views on the mass media generally this morning but, as I say, in terms of a simple basic organization, perhaps it would be more helpful to us, because this is really why we are here today, if we were to deal with the student press this morning and the mass media generally this afternoon.

I do not think you should feel this is a restraint. I think the procedure this morning might be as follows: that after a brief introductory note by me, I will just call on each of our guests for an opening statement and perhaps that opening statement could be as general a description as your views on the role and function of the student press in Canada.

If you want to make particular reference to your own organization or paper, that will be satisfactory, but following the opening statements by each of our guests, we will turn to the Senators.

I hope that we can have this morning, Senators, a relaxed and fairly free flow of exchange of ideas and opinions. I hope all of the Senators will express themselves as freely as I hope our guests will.

If I can perhaps identify people here, as best I can. As a matter of fact, I think I will leave the identification to you because I am not familiar with all of the members. We can start and go down my right, If that would be useful.

On my immediate right we have Mr. Chenoweth. Just give us your name and the capacity in which you serve the student press community.

Mr. David Chenoweth, Managing Editor, McGill Daily, McGill University: Dave Chenoweth, Managing Editor of McGill Daily.

Mr. Lawrence Jones, Assistant Director of Information Services, University of Toronto: Larry Jones, Assistant Director, Department of Information Services, University of Toronto.

Mr. Stewart Saxe, President, Canadian University Press: Stewart Saxe, President, Canadian University Press.

The Chairman: If I may at this point interrupt to say that Mr. Saxe received a formal invitation. Those of you who were here before the meeting began this morning observed Mr. Saxe wanted to sit with his colleagues. We have no objection to that, of course.

Perhaps you could introduce them as well, Mr. Saxe, or they could introduce themselves.

Mr. George Russell, Bureau Chief, Canadian University Press: George Russell, Bureau Chief, Canadian University Press.

Mr. Ronald Thompson, Canadian University Press: Ron Thompson, also with the Canadian University Press.

The Chairman: So we have three people here from the Canadian University Press.

Mr. David Scott, Editor, The Gazette, University of Western Ontario: Dave Scott, Editor of The Gazette, University of Western Ontario.

Mr. Michael Smith, Editor, The Journal, St. Mary's University, Halifax: Mike Smith, Editor for The Journal.

Mr. Allan Scarth, Editor, The Gateway, University of Alberta: Al Scarth, Editor of The Gateway, University of Alberta.

Mr. Harry Thomas, Editor, McGill Reporter, McGill University: Harry Thomas, Editor of the McGill Reporter.

The Chairman: We have one more guest who is not at the front but because he will be speaking in French, we have put him by a microphone for purposes of translation.

Will you identify yourself?

Mr. André Villeneuve, Editor, Au Fil Des Événements, Laval University: André Villeneuve, Editor, Au Fil des Événements, Laval University.

The Chairman: Thank you. I think we might now turn to the introductory comments which you may wish to make, perhaps taking hopefully no more than five minutes because we want to discuss a number of matters with you this morning.

If I could have your comments, please, gentlemen, on the role and function of the Student Press; and if you wish to make specific reference to your own publication or your own organization, then that would be helpful. So, before we question each of you, perhaps you can deal with it in turn. So we will start...

Mr. Chenoweth: Might I suggest we could start with the Canadian University Press because they do not represent any newspaper or a locale, but the general press service of the university papers in Canada.

The Chairman: If that is satisfactory with Mr. Saxe, it is fine with me.

Mr. Saxe: Fine.

The Chairman: Go ahead, please.

Mr. Saxe: Is it necessary for anybody to use a microphone?

The Chairman: No. I think we can all hear you.

Mr. Saxe: I am sure that I should probably start with a brief introductory remark of what the Canadian University Press is. The Canadian University Press was probably founded somewhere before World War II—the exact date I do not have, but I would imagine its commencement was somewhere before World War II. We have papers dated from 1938.

The original purpose of the founding was that there would be some annual meeting at which the editors of the Student Press could get together and decide how they could best help each other in exchanges of information of what was happening on the individual campuses.

With the growth of university campuses from the late 1950s and early 1960s, and the accompanying growth of the Student Press in Canada, the Canadian University Press took on a much larger role. Around 1960 it took on its first professional staff. In 1964 it saw the staff grow to three and in 1965 five full-time people were working out of Ottawa.

Somewhat in the vague resemblance of Canadian Press, the Canadian University Press is a co-operative. We tend to be proud of the fact that we believe in it a little bit more in practice. The exact function of the organization, what it does and how it does it, and who does it are subject to an annual review, in many ways a day-to-day review, by the entire membership.

The full time national officers serve as an executive with a consulting committee available if they tend to make any large changes, and with a set of by-laws which bind them very closely to the membership. If they try to make any additional changes, the membership decides those at the annual conference. The conference takes place usually or regularly not by by-law, around Christmas.

In the same sense that the organization is a co-operative, the national office works as a collective and that is one of the reasons I am not here alone because being here alone, particularly with the title "president" attached, would mystify any forum in which we showed up the content of what we do.

There is no way whatsoever that I can make any individual decisions because that is not the way the Canadian University Press was ever set up to be run or to continue.

This group gives all sorts of things and also allows the kind of things we are trying to do with the Canadian University Press, particularly in view of the fact that in the past we have noticed from C.P. reports at least, that the committee has tended to see certain titled functionaries from the rest of the media. In other words, publishers or editors are the kind of people who usually appear and who talk fairly conveniently about their entire publication or their entire editors; the embodiment of which we decided it was particularly important that we not make the same mistake.

So, instead of my showing up and if not looking as the embodiment of the Canadian University Press at least, being read that way, we decided to bring you the embodiment of the Canadian University Press.

The Canadian University Press cannot in any way speak for its members nor, of course, do we in any way speak for what the students on the university campuses feel. We can make observations on what the members are doing. When the members ask us, of course, we can represent them in some specific field. We have no mandate to appear before you representing the members in any way, so when we talk we talk as some sort of group staff in the office, very far removed from the people and very far removed from most of its membership.

I think with some apologies to the Senators and the Chairman, I would find it impossible in my remarks to make the division which he suggested at the beginning, that we talk about the student press and maybe later talk about the role and function of the mass media in Canada. As a matter of fact even if I did, I would find it impossible to make that kind of division away from Canada itself.

It seems to me that to talk about the student press divorced from what is happening in its community—and I certainly do not think this community can be limited to the university—or to talk about the mass media primarily divorced from what is happening in this community is to take a very tragic approach. You cannot talk about the manifestations of any problem without knowing what the problem is or the manifestations of any situation without knowing what the situation is.

I would submit to you that the student press is a manifestation of its society and that a particular group in that society intimate but the society as a whole. I would submit further that the entire mass media is a manifestation of a particular type of society. I think that is important, particularly in our being present here and in taking a look at what the Senate Special Committee can possibly be accomplishing and further why, in view of what they can possibly be accomplishing, we should bother showing up here, which certainly represents the majority feeling on our part already, which I have no intention of trying to cover.

The two page set of guidelines, which I presume you have in front of you, were sent out to the University Press. Those guidelines, of course, were designed to apply more to the traditional papers than they were to the co-operative, but I found one question which rather interested me.

It was labelled point eight and this was: "Is there an 'establishment' which controls the mass media in Canada, or any one of the media?" I have a feeling that question has shown up because somebody, drawing up this list of questions, has heard vague rumblings of "radicalism" in the Student Press, and radicals, of course, "attack" the establishments.

The Chairman: May I just interrupt you, Mr. Saxe? For your own edification that question in the guidelines was sent to every publisher and broadcaster in Canada.

Mr. Saxe: Well, it is nice to know that question is spreading throughout the entire media.

The Chairman: I thought you should know that.

Mr. Saxe: Thank you, sir.

Well, I found other places where the word "establishment" was interesting too.

I would indeed suggest to you, to probably come down bluntly and quickly, that there is indeed an establishment which controls mass media in Canada; that what they control is the total, that it allows for no deviation whatsoever, but that in the understanding of that and what I mean by that—I have a feeling people are going to read something into that that I did not mean—. I do not mean to suggest that there is any establishment which holds regular meetings around a board table anywhere in Canada, at any given set of intervals, to decide what the mass media shall do or shall continue to do and review it without any deviations, which may have come up in the past.

I suggest in fact that the way in which those board meetings take place is at a much more subtle level and a level which stems from the kind of organization which in the entire society we face; that in fact the mass media is part of a society. It is controlled to rule people by class, one particular class, and that class is the particular elite; that in fact we face a transformation of society because of the press, because of the financial costs involved in the press, because of its importance, and that it is completely and totally in the hands of that class.

Now, that is probably where I think one can talk about the role and function of the mass media in Canada. In saying that, I think it is important I say something else. I think that any press is going to be a reflection of the class of society in which it exists, and any mass media is going to be a direct reflection of the kind of society in which it exists. That is why I do not think the two can be talked about in any kind of separate formation whatsoever.

Nor do I suggest therefore, that in fact in any other country or organization in the world that we presently see, that the mass media in that country represents anything but the ruling class in that country. That is going to be true of any country that faces a small elitist ruling class that is going to face a press which talks for it and represents it, otherwise the press is silent. That is the totality of the class.

I would suggest in Canada that may happen in more subtle ways than we may find in some other countries, but the totality is the same and that subtlety is very important because it allows us to see mass models of ourselves. We can convince ourselves that there really is freedom of the press and so when that freedom looks like it might be abused by our society under a set of rules the Senate hold a Special Committee.

I do not think that the formation of any kind of Press Council—so they all, the C.J. can get my remarks on the Press Council like everybody else—it is on the record, if I want it—I do not think that the formation of any kind of Press Council means a thing. The people who sit on the Press Council or the Press Council is going to utilize directly will be the kind of people that society is, the first place. There is nothing changed by the formation of a Press Council.

In many ways, if I could give you a somewhat imperialistic analogy because it comes from the United States: I do not think I can find anything very noble about an all white jury sitting in South Alabama in the trial of a white man for killing a negro. It does not seem to me that there is anything terribly revolutionary about the jury meeting in that case. Now, 100 years after, they might not have even bothered about bringing the jury in; the results seem to be the same.

The Chairman: Mr. Saxe, I hesitate to interrupt you at this point. I said an opening statement of five minutes. You have now been speaking for 12½ minutes. By all means complete your statement.

Is it your intention to have Messrs. Russell and Thompson speak as well?

Mr. Saxe: I do not...

The Chairman: That being so, why do you not take 15 minutes and finish in two and a half minutes, if you can. If you need longer, take it. I do not want to be arbitrary on this thing, but there are a lot of other people

Mr. Saxe: I do think that throughout the remainder of the session, I will have some observations and remarks to make about the student press as someone who has been involved in the Student Press for a long time, and as an observer of the Student Press, and mainly because you paid my way here.

I think the student press offers, as I said in my opening remarks, a somewhat unique possibility. The student press, unlike the so-called professional mass media, or at least large scale mass media—can be captured by a small vociferous minority, usually identified as radicals, much easier than any of the other media can. In this society the only productive press, the only worthwhile press is going to be a press which comes from such a small vociferous minority and that it is in this way that the student press remains unique. The way in which it is run; the way in which its customers are chosen, the way in which controls are imposed over them and the cost involved in printing it lend it to the sort of event happenings which occurs in every part of the mass media; despite claims from some government circles that the C.B.C. has also had that happen to them.

I think then it is in that context that at some point we may want to talk about the student press and what function the student press can have in our society; indeed to what limits can it possibly be a revolutionary press? Obviously, while not varying very much in my words, what I am calling for is some form of revolution.

Before I finish, I caution against—particularly because of the brevity of my words—the possibility that any of these words can be misunderstood and in a particularly narrow frame. By revolution, I am not therefore suggesting that we pick up arms and perform Russian 1917 action in Canada in 1970. The countries are not the same. The results would not be the same and the reasons for the revolution are not the same.

Nor am I suggesting that we call for the control of a small vociferous minority. I suggest one elite simply would be taken over by another elite. I think the constructional way in which that happens and the process in which it is engaged in is crucial, and that it is in fact from that process I suggest the antithesis of that usual process that I have been calling for antithesis, but that process in the first place.

Any control of the press in Canada—in fact any control of the entire society in Canada—in fact the oppression and exploitation of most of the people in Canada comes from some sort of a ruling elite control—that is, as I say, from around those board tables. Those board tables exist in many ways but it is done through a process; and it is only in looking at that and in looking at the subtleties of that process we can understand exactly why some sort of antithesis is needed.

I think we would like to—and we will try to do that within some sort of time limit—offer at least some series of proof or evidence, if you like, in a very academic sense of what we are trying to say.

The Chairman: Fine.

Mr. Russell: From the things I have heard I will not obviously be given the time and I will not go into them all now. There are other reasons why I cannot go into all of them because looking around I see a number of names, tags or plaques of the Senators supposedly on the Commission, have changed from the names that I was able to get before, which was on the letterhead on the letters we have received.

I just went into this last night. Some of the Senators are not here. At that time it began to appear that maybe the Senate Commission's Senators met over the lunch hour in order to discuss the dealings of an organization called Denison Mines Limited, whose directors include besides J. Wilson Berry, Charles F. W. Burns, F. H. Jowsey, Edward A. Merkle, Louis R. Perini, Anthony Roman and B. E. Willoughby, the Hon. Harry A. Willis, who is written on the letterhead, the Hon. Louis De G. Giguere, who was listed on the letterhead I saw, the Hon. D. Keith Davey, which is also listed on the letterhead I saw, and strangely enough these board rooms seem to make these economic bedfellows of the strangest people, the Hon. George A. Drew.

The Chairman: I would agree with that statement.

Mr. Fortier: Maybe you could point out that it is Denison Mines that convinced the Senate Committee to remove these people from its membership.

The Chairman: I was going to let you finish your statement. I would only point out that if you had received an up-to-date list of the membership of the Committee, you would have realized that neither Senator Willis nor Senator Giguère is on the Committee.

Mr. Russell: I mention Senator Desruisseaux is no longer on the committee.

The Chairman: Senator Desruisseaux is not on the committee.

Mr. Russell: His name was also on the letterhead. His corporate relations went through from...

Mr. Fortier: He is not on the committee.

The Chairman: I do not see too much point in reading his corporate relations. If you want to put them on the record you can, by all means.

I see you have the Financial Post Directory of Directors. Perhaps you can table it and save a great deal of time.

Mr. Russell: If I felt it would have any effect...

The Chairman: I do not want to interrupt you. You carry on. We will be very, very patient.

Mr. Russell: Well, I think the point is made. Anyway, whether or not Senator Desruisseaux is in the room or not.

The Chairman: Senator Desruisseaux is not only not in the room, he is not a member of the Committee.

Mr. Russell: His name at one point appeared on the letterhead as a member of the Committee as late as October 28, by which time the Commission, I believe, had spoken to me.

The Chairman: No. This is wrong. Our first public meetings were on the 9th of December.

Mr. Russell: O.K. We will leave that for now. That would be correct because there are only four or maybe five Senators here now.

Mr. Fortier: Six, Mr. Chairman, so the record will be correct.

The Chairman: Why do you not read my entire list of directorships? For your information, you just have.

Senator Smith: Read mine too.

The Chairman: Why did you not look up Senator Smith's? I will look his up.

Senator Smith: Look up Senator Macdonald as well from Nova Scotia.

Mr. Russell: I would rather not take up that time now. We can analyse them as they become due.

The Chairman: Well, I will be curious to know. Are you a director of any company, Senator Smith?

Senator Smith: No.

The Chairman: And you have read my entire list.

Mr. Russell: I didn't read your whole list.

The Chairman: You did not read Central Hospital.

Mr. Russell: I did not read "Keith Davey Limited".

The Chairman: I am not a director of that.

Mr. Russell: That is the only reason I found this out. You will have to check with the Financial Post.

The Chairman: Does that complete your presentation, Mr. Saxe?

Mr. Saxe: I think probably that is some sort of form.

The Chairman: You made reference to the brevity of your remarks. I hope that throughout the day you will have ample opportunity to expand upon them and so will your colleagues, and if you wish to farm out questions to your colleagues, that is fine with me.

Senator Beaubien: Well, when are we going to be able to ask questions?

The Chairman: Well, Senator Beaubien, I agree that the opening statement was much longer than we had anticipated but this is a organization rather than an individual paper and I think in fairness to the other people who are here, we did say there would be opening statements and I think we should have them.

If I may say for the record if you could confine your statements to five minutes, we would be grateful.

Mr. Scott: For the record, I would be willing to forego my opening five minute statement and have the questioning.

Mr. Chenoweth: Mr. Chairman, since I am not reading from any prepared statement, will be talking off the top of my head. I would just like to point out one thing: In my opening here, I am the only active representative of a college newspaper. This is not an editor-in-chief so my editor has requested me not to say anything I might say is not at all binding on him, so bear that in mind, please.

I actually do not know where to begin. The college press has been an interest of mine for—I have been in it now for five years. It is an area of media I think personally deserves much more support than has been given in North America and Canada, so I am apt to be probably over-wordy on the whole thing.

Actually I would like to confine any comments I may make to the student press, although any comments I may make on the national press, I will leave to questions. I was one of the people that submitted an informal brief and that in itself rambles quite a bit because to give a cohesive picture of the student press in Canada from any point of view, is highly difficult.

There are a couple of points I would like to make and I will probably, in order to make them more adequately, make direct reference to the McGill Daily and a little recent history.

I will allow you to draw conclusions. If you want to ask me for my conclusions on this, or if I may challenge you on what your conclusions are later, I would appreciate it.

The McGill Daily is right now the oldest college daily in Canada and services a market of some 14,000 students. We have often been, especially over the last three years, I would say one of the most prominent, at times, influences in the student press, for lack of a better term.

This fall the editor of the McGill Daily was fired after only three days as editor of the daily on the grounds he had not registered as student. It was interesting. This is the first time that any student body has been successful in firing the student editor at McGill (though in the five years of my attendance at McGill, every year, every single year, there have been major attempts to fire its editor by students).

McGill itself has only made one attempt to discipline the Daily and that was over what is now known as the Allnutt-Fekete case, and I am sure McGill highly regretted ever doing it because it created an awful lot of bad publicity.

The reason I make these remarks is to point out a form of agreement with a statement that Mr. Saxe made and that is that the mass media represents the ruling class, or reflects the ruling class. I agree with this in terms of the campus, if you are later on involved with the term "ruling class", that the student press too, often reflects.

A group of students who through their own ambitions, or interests, or inclinations have come to, at least in the public eye, dominate the campus—do not read into this any necessary condemnation of the group,—but we are and we have been for too often a narrow group.

The student press in Canada is also a political thing.

The student press—C.U.P.—the Canadian University Press—I do not think Mr. Saxe would agree with me—formally disclaims the concept of what generally is termed "objective reporting". Nobody can disagree that no man can be totally, totally objective to himself. We all have biases but in the form that this has taken in the student press of Canada, it seems that the student press in Canada has taken upon itself the job of educating the Canadian student.

My personal objection to so much of what is in the student press in Canada—and something which I have, to dramatize a little, fought against, at McGill, is that the student press of Canada is undoubtedly one of the most arrogant groups ever to be seen. Arrogance in itself is never necessarily wrong. The form of arrogance displayed here and the arrogance in deciding to educate the student are such that we, a small group—can control the press because the controls of the student press on the campus are nil. We are undoubtedly the freest press in Canada, the fewest economic controls, the fewest local controls, and actually the fewest social controls in their own environment.

We have captive audiences which is both a boon and a bane because when we are given a captive audience, it must contribute to our upkeep. We do have some responsibility to reflect this group as they desire, not as too many of us, who are active in the student press, want to reflect them or to educate them, or to guide them.

Education by statement of facts and a presentation of different interpretation of facts is one thing. Education by ideology, which seems to have been the hallmark of the student press—of a certain section of the student press in Canada in the last five years at least, is one of the worst perversions of the press ever seen.

This is a blow directed to the student press by a member of the student press.

In my brief I have also stated I do not believe any other organization except the Students' society should ever attempt to discipline the press. In the hands of ideologists the Student Press has been irritating, admittedly, very irritating at times, but it is ineffective.

The student press has a potential beyond most other presses simply because of our freedom but this potential can only be recognized when we are effective and effectiveness, no matter what your political aim, requires moderation and requires taking into consideration your audiences. This consideration most presses are not taking into consideration and therefore it has become ineffective. Concrete proof of this ineffectiveness is hard to give. I can only state from five years experience. I can only state what I know from the new management of the McGill Daily.

Whereas last year when the Daily was distributed across Canada for free, at five o'clock in the evening you could see thousands of Daily's lying there untouched. Our readership has picked up this year immensely. Our advertising has correspondingly increased. And the receipts for us have correspondingly increased.

The very fact the student press in McGill has been nearly destroyed in terms of effectiveness, (we will have to try and rebuild for years), is demonstrated by the fact that in 1964 when McGill raised the fee $100, the Student Council through the help of the McGill Daily, managed to mobilize a massive protest which got a reconsideration of the fee increase. This year we have written a number of articles and editorials upon the fact that McGill University, firstly because of certain educational developments in the Province of Quebec is in the process of totally cutting themselves off from the rest of Canada and the rest of the world. The reaction of the campus has been nil.

We seem to be coming into a period of student apathy where the student is just sick and tired of everything. In my opinion the student press is largely to blame.

We have a very great potential. We have a great role to play. We are the only press in Canada which attempts in any way to investigate university environment. This is a serious condemnation of the Canadian press simply because the university environment is crucial to our society; and what is going on at university.

Whether you agree or disagree or whether you agree with my personal stand or not, whether the university should be changed or not, we at least should examine it. The fact is that the university is only examined basically by the student press and by its own organs and by nobody else, save when demonstrations or disruptions occur, then we find the creation of stereotypes.

The fact is that we are the only public communications organ dealing with this—my apologies to the university press, which is finally emerging, the McGill Reporter is a good example of that—leaves us in a position of great potential importance. Unfortunately it is my opinion that the Canadian university press, not the organization, but the college press in Canada has destroyed itself and has abrogated most of its responsibilities.

In my brief I said, just to cap it off; to quote myself:

"Altogether, the student press has been put (and put itself) in an increasingly difficult position over the last decade. Due to its excessive political nature, it has created a massive credibility gap, both in its own environment and in terms of the general public. This will not be changed until the Student Press grows up and learns that effective reporting and communication requires a greater self-discipline than has yet been evidenced."

This is all I have to say, I have made some wide generalizations, I will probably have to clarify a number of them later.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Chenoweth.

Mr. Chenoweth, as he has mentioned, is the Managing Editor of the McGill Daily.

Next to him is Mr. Lawrence Jones, Assistant Director of Information Services, University of Toronto.

Mr. Jones: I wonder if it would be worthwhile to have the other student editors continue and then perhaps I can speak.

The Chairman: I have no objection to that if they do not.

Mr. Scott, why do you not go next?

Mr. Scott: All right.

The Chairman: Identify your name and your paper.

Mr. Scott: My name is Dave Scott. I am Editor of The Gazette, in the City of London.

My remarks will be very brief because anything that is said before this committee will probably turn out to be a cliché. I think there have been hundreds and thousands of clichés uttered before the Senate Committee on Mass Media since it began.

Mr. Chenoweth is not representative of the student press in Canada. He made that fairly obvious himself. Some of his ideas of how the student press is abrogating its responsibilities and how it is an infant and it has to grow up is matched pretty well by his feeling about what a newspaper is within the university environment; his feeling that the Daily "services a market"; the fact he would consider the success of the Daily is increasing because its advertising rates are going up, that would merely indicate to me maybe the advertisers believe there are a lot of people to be reached. It does not mean they respect or disrespect the Daily, one way or the other.

However, I will not turn this into a harangue against the Daily, I have a fairly low opinion of it as a newspaper.

Within the context of my own newspaper...

Mr. Chenoweth: Can I answer that?

The Chairman: He wants to know if he will have an opportunity to answer. In the question period you will.

Mr. Scott: I am sure he will reply.

As it affects The Gazette which is isolated, the staff and myself feel isolated from the rest of Canada probably more so than the McGill Daily feels isolated from the rest of Canada; London is a peculiar town. It is a market research town which I think most people in business would realize. It is a good place to test your detergents and the kind of people who live there and the kind of people who go to university there are a direct reflection of that.

The Gazette in the past has perhaps had in its own small sphere of influence a worse reputation than the Daily used to have, mostly for smut. Three or four years ago The Gazette was burned publicly by a large group of students at the university, and the morality squad was very up-tight about the newspaper. At that time The Gazette was a titillation, something you would not take home to your parents but you would giggle about in your residence room. That was the kind of newspaper it was. It had no information but it had a lot of childish patter which indeed reflected the education of the people who ran it. In fact, the people who ran it had very little education although they were in university.

Over a three year period we have built The Gazette up to what we would consider to be an organ of opinion and information and I hope to go a lot further than it has even this year with me as editor. We have tried to reflect the fact that people at university, although it is very rarely demonstrated, are somehow educated people, who would be willing to accept or if not accept at least discuss other ideas and ideologies.

We are also basing it on the belief that people who worked in a student newspaper in particular had the right to say what they wished to say by reason of the amount of work that they put into that newspaper.

Now, we discussed this for a very long time. We hashed it over quite a bit, about what right did we have to express our ideas, or were we supposed to merely reflect the ideas of the students of the university? We came down pretty firmly on the idea that we were not to be a reflection of the university. We were to be leaders.

In other words, we were to demonstrate to people what we believe. We were to demonstrate what our ideas were, how we formed them and what we believed to be true. I think probably everybody in the room would agree that truth is probably what a newspaper is supposed to be about.

We did not feel we have any necessity to reflect what people who are at university had to say. If those people wanted the newspaper to reflect what they had to say, then they had every opportunity, in the structure of newspaper, to come in and work for us. In other words, they could come in and take over the newspaper, if they wanted to.

It is such an unstructured medium that I am the managing editor in the space of a year and a half with no experience when I started. Now, the fact is that anyone at the university could come in. And the fact is that only about 30 people ever do, and those 30 people, I think, by reason of that, have the right to say what they wish to say, everything short of criminal libel, quite frankly, and to put forth their views to put forth their beliefs and to put forth an ideology, if they care to.

Now, if the students at the university do not care to listen to that ideology—I think they would be admitting their narrow-mindedness if they did not—if they would like another ideology to be presented, or if they wanted no ideology to be presented, they have the opportunity to get rid of it.

The Gazette is perhaps different from other newspapers in Canada. In fact, I am sure it is, in that the students do not pay for it. We are a disgustingly rich newspaper. Interim financing is provided by student funds, which is included in the students fees at the beginning of the year and at the end of the year The Gazette breaks even and they should probably make money. We will try to find a way to spend that money before the end of the year comes. As it is now, we are receiving so much advertising, it is becoming a burden to us. So, in other words, The Gazette does not cost the students anything.

Now, whether or not you say the students really do own the newspaper is another matter altogether. We do not parade any Student Council line. Any editorial opinions are editorial opinions worked out in a staff context in some sort of attempt at staff democracy, although it has not been carried very far at The Gazette.

Now, in the final analysis most of the editorial opinions, I suppose, are mine because I write them.

We attempt to present the news in a fair way. I do not believe in objectivity because I think the word has lost its meaning. Fairness is the only way. People from the time they are born have preconceptions in their own minds and those preconceptions cannot help but be reflected in the way they write and the way they perceive something. Therefore, objectivity is impossible to achieve.

Anyone who says let us try to be as objective as possible, is begging the question. Let us try to be as fair as possible. In our news coverage we try to be as fair as possible. We delineate news coverage from opinion on the editorial pages and I think that is the full extent of my responsibility.

The Chairman: Thank you. Mr. Scott, as I have already mentioned, is the Editor of The Gazette of the University of Western Ontario.

Next to him is the Editor of the St. Mary's Journal, St. Mary's University, Halifax, Mr. Mike Smith.

Mr. Smith: I did not come in with any set preconceptions as to what I was going to say.

The Chairman: Do not feel you must say anything.

Mr. Smith: No. I have some things I want to say although my presentation may be a little disjointed. One point, Mr. Davey, is that we are not the St. Mary's Journal any more. We are The Journal.

The Chairman: I apologize, of course.

Mr. Smith: First of all, I would like to make several maybe basic assumptions in the way of how I think a student newspaper should operate. The first of these is that the basic purpose of any newspaper is to represent an accurate reflection of the real world. That is what is out there—to present a reflection of that world as it affects the people that the newspaper is being read by.

Now, that relates to the campus because of course, the campus is not a segment of the world which is off somewhere in some white tower. It is, in fact, a segment of that world. You might note that generally the university campus is the upper middle class segment of that world, but that is a detail at this time. Within the campus, the students are a majority and are, particularly in the situation that I am in, a looked-down-upon majority because our university administration is very paternalistic; paternalistic to the point of being willing to throw three girls out of residence rather than sit down and negotiate the problems, and they threw three girls out of residence this fall in a move which I can only describe as some sort of hostage hold.

Senator Beaubien: What did the girls do?

Mr. Smith: As I remember they cried and went home.

Senator Beaubien: What did they do to get thrown out?

Mr. Smith: That situation was one in which the administration refused to negotiate on residence regulations and residence regulations...

Senator Beaubien: You are begging the question.

The Chairman: The question period comes later, Senator Beaubien.

Mr. Smith: So that the university campus being part of the world is generally a reflection of the world and, of course, the political divisions of that world are reflected, et cetera et cetera, but the university also reflects the screw-ups of the real world. That is about the only word I can think of. It reflects the compartmentalized way we look at things.

A good example, of course, would be sports where it is compartmentalized. Sports is something you look at on television but it is not something you do yourself.

The role of the university press then, as would see it, would be to provide accurate information about the contradictions which develop and which face people in the university environment. That is, paternalistic and ministrations, of course, as opposed to maturity and independence. Contradictions between so-called education and lectures; the contradictions between faculty parking lots and student parking lots, if you will; these contradictions opposed to a general world view which says "all men are equal and all men are free".

What I am trying to say is that the university presents certain ideologies. By ideology I mean the basic study of ideas which says that—in the work of the American Constitution—"Men have a right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness", and having said that proceeds to deny it completely. That, of course, is a function of the world.

Our job then, or the job of a good newspaper and particularly the job of the student newspaper is to provide factual information which will point out these particular contradictions in the hope that with analysis and interpretation people will become sufficiently tight to do something about it rather than sit back and saying "we cannot do anything about that".

I think that is all I have to say.

The Chairman: Thank you. Mr. Smith is the Editor of The Journal, St. Mary's University, Halifax.

The final student editor we have with us is the editor of The Gateway, University of Alberta, Mr. Allan Scarth.

Mr. Scarth: I think I have a letterhead which includes the senators' names as late as January 30. It might be possible to change.

Mr. Fortier: No money.

Mr. Scarth: We had to stop printing for a while this year too.

The Chairman: You know the feeling, Mr. Scarth.

Mr. Scarth: The comment that Mr. Chelmsworth made that he was a representative editor, I am an editor-in-chief and as with Mr. Scott, I do not represent their views. We tried to get a little bit of a collection going in conservative Alberta.

The first comment I am going to make is on Senator O'Leary's statement from the original guidelines which goes something to the effect—no freedom—he was speaking of the freedom of the press—includes the right of privilege—the right to enter the society granting that privilege.

If journalists follow that kind of ethic, and to a certain amount they do, we are not going to get anywhere, student or otherwise journalists.

The second thing is what is The Gateway trying to do and what is news? The basic problem going around is that people think that the press should be—in the words of last year's Gateway editor—"a responsible press, not a biased political press". I think what is being ignored in statements like that is that if you want to call it a sin, the sin of omission is just as bad as the sin of commission.

In other words, if you are going to be safe in your coverage, treat the thing in the non-political fashion, you are supporting an ideology just as strongly as this, you have come on the other side and argue for a different ideology.

Now, I think underneath what The Gateway is trying to do is to tell the students that they are niggers. I think probably the Senators if they read their own Hansard will be familiar with that term. They have lost their guts and the whole bit after 12 years or more of sin, so that brings the Gateway to a definition of what is news.

Now, they realize they are a small group of people. They know they want to tell the students they are niggers and yet they know that the students do not think that way. They know they will be accused of Fascism if this small group tries to tell them the truth; so to get out of that hang-up, they ignore it. The main news becomes student union news. It becomes a tenure dispute. It becomes when the swimming pool is going to be open on the campus, and that is a fact.

The press is not going to get anywhere doing that. At the same time I will agree there is a service function if you treat the campus news. You are an information media; but if you are not going to be agitative, you have lost the only alternative to the daily professional press.

Now, that pretty well takes it as far as The Gateway is concerned. The fear of being undemocratic perpetuates the surface, safe coverage of news, when you are afraid of hurting somebody or overstepping your bounds, so I will agree with Mr. Scott.

To bring it specifically down to the Gateway, I want to make a point here—I do not think there is such a thing as a university press. There is the student press, which is a very important point. At least at the U. of A.

the administration has no use for a free press, and I will back that up with specific examples.

There was a cartoon, this is the cartoon here, that was published in the U.B.C. originally and is a cartoon on the Vietnam war, which uses a sexual connotation to get across the point of view.

Now, that cartoon appeared in four or five student newspapers before our printing service co-ordinator refused to print it.

Now, I do not want to make the point this cartoon is important.

Mr. Fortier: I am sorry. Who refused to print this?

Mr. Scarth: The printing services co-ordinator. He is in charge of the printing shop.

The point I want to make is what ensued after that refusal. Then we were forced to publish a blank space with a little note saying he considered this objectionable. He didn't raise legal reasons. He said "I consider this objectionable, in poor taste".

Now, it was appealed by myself to the Vice-President in charge of Finance and Administration. He is directly under the President and he is the final boss over the print shop. He refused to print it so we took it to the general faculty council with two parts to the motion: one, that the university install an appeal board. The appeal board would be composed of faculty, administration and students. This was a suggestion which came from the student union president which to me had a great deal to say for it.

In other words, if there was a hassle over printing something this board, composed of the whole university, could be gone to for an appeal by the paper.

Now, the general faculty council, which is a major governing body at the University of Alberta, refused that. They laughed at it. They did not think it was a good idea and that is how open they are. So whether we want to print a poor taste cartoon is not the point. The point is that when you do something that really gets somebody upset—for example, if we really slammed somebody in a political sense you could have the print shop carry out that same kind of action with complete impunity. We were working for student control of the press on a small specific example and we got nowhere, so that is the state of the freedom. It is still being appealed. It goes to the Board of Governors. I doubt they will give their approval.

That is all I have.

The Chairman: Mr. Scarth, are you going to table this with the committee?

Mr. Scarth: Yes. Do you want some more copies?

The Chairman: We simply need the one. I think it would be useful for our record.

Senator Beaubien: May I see it, please?

The Chairman: Now, we have three more people to hear from. I am going to ask them to take about the same amount of time and then when we have heard from them I think we will break for a moment before we begin the questioning to give the reporter a break.

The next group we are going to hear from are representatives of the administrations. The first is Mr. Larry Jones, Assistant Director of Information Services, University of Toronto.

Mr. Jones: As Assistant Director of the Department of Information, I have a dual function. I am the editor and I am also press relations officer, for lack of a better term. Our department is responsible for the relations of the University of Toronto with the press. I should explain first that I am speaking strictly for the University of Toronto. I do not pretend to be able to say what the policies are of over 40-odd degree-granting universities in Canada.

In our work as special relations officers, we deal with the student press on the campus exactly as we do with the media downtown. There are at the University of Toronto two campus-wide student-operated communication services—the Varsity, published three times a week during the winter session and about three times during the summer, and the U. of T. Radio which carries closed circuit radio programs to various student gathering places on the campus.

Our department is responsible for the dissemination of news of the University, particularly—I may as well say it—administrative news, the administration side of the issue, factual statements, announcements of all kinds to the various "publics". We have, we think, particular responsibility to the taxpayer and most of our money comes from the taxpayer, especially the taxpayers of the Province of Ontario, to our alumni, to our staff and to our students. We reach these people in various ways. As publishers we have three public tions on a regular issue each aimed at a different audience and also through the public press.

This year we had 26,000 full-time students and 8,000 part-time students. We have a staff, academic and non-academic, of approximately 9,000. Last summer there were 10,000 students taking summer courses. This year there will be 11,000.

All these students have access to the Varsity and to the U. of T. Radio. For these reasons we feel it is pretty important to deal with the student press exactly as we deal with the daily newspapers, television stations and radio stations. Everything we do, everything we release and everything we say goes to the Varsity and to the U. of T. Radio automatically. We sometimes alert the student media in advance of something we think may be of special interest to the students and we give them material quickly especially if the press is facing a publishing deadline. We have on occasion held releases up a day or two in order that a student paper and radio station could use it before or at the same time as the daily press.

One of the major news stories that the University of Toronto in recent years was the report of the Commission on University Government. This came out on a Sunday afternoon and copies were printed. The press run at the University of Toronto was completed by three o'clock in the afternoon of Sunday afternoon. One hour later we had copies down on the office of the Varsity and at U. of T. Radio, and then we took them to the daily press and the television and radio stations.

When we have a news conference—we do it do this very often because it is a highly re-used technique—the Varsity and the U. of T. Radio are automatically invited.

We always welcome any student reporters to our offices and our only complaint is we hardly ever see them. If they are covering the campus, they do not include us in their coverage very often.

We do not try to stop or block any interviews with any administrator on the campus acting as an intermediary in this way. In other words, you set this thing up. If an interview is desired with the President, we try to arrange it, but we do not stop them. We do not feel everything should go through us. We do not entirely agree with that.

We do not always agree with the treatment given to us in the student press of the news that we supply, but that is their business.

They have the right to present the news as they see fit, just as we have the right to present it in our own way in our own publications. And a story we think is important may not be used or presented in a way which offends our editorial sensibility does not affect our open-door policy. I think if there is any department or division of the University of Toronto which has an open door, it is the Department of Information. When the student editors were speaking about it, I do not think I heard one of them complain about any interference by their administration of their right to access to the news. So to sum up...

The Chairman: They are not through yet, Mr. Jones.

Mr. Jones: The student media have the same right of access to the university administration for news as any other media. They have no more and they have no less, and we are treating them accordingly.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Jones.

Next we have the editor of Au Fil des Evénements, Laval University, Mr. André Villeneuve.

Mr. Villeneuve: Yes. I think, Mr. Chairman, you will have to use your earphones.

The Chairman: Yes. By all means speak in French. We are quite prepared.

Mr. André Villeneuve, Information attaché of Laval University, Editor of "Au fil des Evénements": Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak to you about a rather special situation regarding student newspapers in Quebec, at least where the French press is concerned. The people from McGill may do the same regarding the English press.

We have a special situation in the sense that there no longer exists, either at the University of Montreal or Laval University, a so-called well set up student organization.

The student body as such can no longer be defined and, consequently, this student body which financed the student newspapers in the two main French-language universities has as a result caused Le Quartier Latin to disappear locally in Montreal and Le Carabin at Laval University. Through USEP, a student organization which brought together the students in Quebec universities and colleges, Le Quartier Latin has become a provincial newspaper promoting certain ideologies even though USEP, as a Quebec student organization has ceased to exist. Le Quartier Latin went on a commercial basis. On campuses, this situation creates a rather special problem. At the present time, the lack of funds justifies the absence of a student newspaper and the university is attempting to remedy the situation and to fill, at least partially, the roles which the student newspaper played. This situation is problematic because the university, since it edits the newspaper itself, cannot but promote the value system which its administrative body endorses and maintains.

The fact remains that, for almost a year already we have been constantly endeavouring to allow greater student participation in the planning of the newspaper which the university puts out and that, on the other hand, we are not assuming any kind of control over anything which a student, or a student group, may write in the newspaper itself.

We believe this to be important for several reasons because, though society has specific information requirements, they cannot be defined in the same way for a university society, because here again the word is distorted.

The university is not a society; it is an artificial environment where we find almost all ideologies, whether they be economic, excessively permeable, very heterogeneous. Indeed, it is a sort of laboratory in which society constitutes the basis for experiments. It then becomes of prime importance that a student press, or semi-student press, be able, easily and without constraint, to analyze the world around it, to criticize it when necessary, to promote new values, and to do so with full freedom of action.

If we go back to the comment by Senator O'Leary who stipulates that it is not a right to revile the society that believes it, we should also bear in mind that the university environment is one which seeks, but it does not involve only seeking, but the discovery and dispensing of new values which may, in some cases, even be an extension of the values which a society currently holds.

Someone said that the university was the nation's forum. The fact remains that this is still true and that, of all the media, the student press in particular must be its instrument. Mr. Chairman, I make these comments especially to point out the difficulty that a member of a university administration has in being both the editor of an official newspaper and someone who tries to perform certain functions which the student press used to perform.

This situation is paradoxical, even abnormal, and means should be found at our university level to make a press controlled by the students economically possible without outside advertising revenue, or other control mechanisms.

The Chairman: Thank you very much.

Finally we have the Editor of the McGill Reporter, Mr. Harry Thomas.

Mr. Thomas: Thank you, Mr. Davey.

I think I should start with a brief explanation of what the McGill Reporter is and how it came into being because I think that we are still quite a unique publication in the academic world within Canada, and within the United States; although many universities various ways have tried to do a similar kind of thing that we are working at.

Back to the comment that Mr. Chenoweth made about the past history of the Daily, would like to state that the reason we exist, I suppose, in a sense the fact I have the job that I have is a direct result of a certain disapproval or concern about the way the Daily was functioning at that time.

We were established in the fall of 1968 and I think the University had in mind—the Senate Administration—felt that there should be an alternative publication on campus that would be open to points of view from all sectors of the community as the McGill Daily was operating on a somewhat exclusive editorial basis and, it was not all that amenable to accepting material from people, students, faculty, who disagreed with their viewpoint.

We started publication sort of not knowing exactly what we hoped to accomplish and really how much life this particular publication would have.

When I took on the job I asked for certain things. One is that I would be relieved of any responsibility of reflecting or articulating the public relations role or the administrative point of view. At that time the Senate had passed a resolution which stated that all information within the university was to be considered public unless otherwise specified and we took the view that this opened the whole thing up to everybody, to the student press, to the external media, and to ourselves. We just sort of competed and worked within that framework and asked for no special favours from the administration or government bodies that exist on campus.

The other thing that I asked for and received was in the area of editorial freedom, an opportunity to exist outside the context of the information office. Although administratively and although my office is within the same building that the information office is in, and I get my budget through the information office, editorially I am responsible to a Senate Committee which is in turn responsible to the Senate and in deciding what material goes in or is left out of the Reporter, what things are covered, I make my own decisions although monthly I appear before—I am a member of the committee actually—which can censor me to a certain extent. They discuss the kind of editorial judgments I have made in past issues.

I think this has allowed us to develop in quite an interesting way so that the Reporter is plugged in very much with the academic, social and political life of the University, involving students and faculty, and we do attempt to relate more to the academic aspect of the University than student publications do. We have a very broad type of coverage.

We do have one responsibility, and that we try to carry out, and that is to provide editorial coverage of the major governing bodies of the University so that in a sense we act as a record and the Daily does cover these same meetings, although sometimes they may add and sometimes they may not. They get the information first and it is on the campus, but we still cover the same ground in order to provide this permanent record.

I think the Reporter has come to be an acceptable part of the university communications although we did not try to be a mass publication in any way.

This year from a graphic point of view the Reporter is quite dull and is really only of interest to people who are interested in reading, who are really interested in views and opinions and articles of comment, reports, and so on, that are done in some depth with some intellectual effort.

As far as the student press is concerned my feeling is that if I felt the Reporter was a threat to the viability of the student press on the campus, I think the Reporter may be done away with. I think that the most important thing is to have a free, active, critical student press. I think the opportunities for that press are not well developed at McGill at the present time. I think there seems to be a lot of self-questioning among the students as to what their student newspaper should do, but I think that they will work this out for themselves.

Mr. Chenoweth made a comment about student apathy. This year I think that in part is almost a reflection more of the kind of newspaper that the Daily has been so far, although it has shown signs of livening up a bit, and a real desire on the part of the students to have a really objective and non-critical publication that they can rely on for this objective reporting.

I think that the Daily's of the past were quite popular with the students although the students may have got upset by some of the things that appeared in them. They were lively publications and I think everybody on campus looked forward to seeing what The Daily had to say about things.

The editor who was fired, I looked forward to his term of editorship because I thought he had the potential of being a very dynamic critic of the University. I think we are lacking that on the campus, although through the Reporter we try to provide opportunities for people of that nature who want to express themselves. So in sort of summing up, I think my view is that the life of the student press is paramount and our publication is supplemental. It is a kind of alternative and I think that we are not a threat at the present time, and I certainly hope we do not become one.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Thomas.

I am going to propose, honourable Senators and ladies and gentlemen, that we adjourn until 11.35 which is about eight minutes from now. This will give our reporter a break and everybody will have a chance to stand up. We will come back at 11.35 and turn directly to questioning. I propose we sit until one o'clock and we will then resume at 2.30 p.m.

We will adjourn for eight minutes.

—A short recess.

The Chairman: We will reconvene the session now, please.

Ladies and gentlemen and honourable Senators, I am going to propose we go through now until approximately one o'clock and we will then come back at 2.30 and in this discussion we are going to have and in this question and answer session, which is billed as a round table discussion, I think that is what it should be.

I hope we can have a fairly free flow of information from the Senators and from the people who are here as our guests. If any of you who are here and who are our guests wish to chip in on any part of the answers, I think you should feel free to do so. The Senators will be mindful, I am sure, to put their questions to the various individuals who are here so we do not ask a disproportionate number of questions to one person, and I think, as I have said, for purposes of simplicity we will try to deal with the student press this morning and the mass media generally this afternoon.

At the same time I think that Mr. Saxe's initial point was well taken and I agree with him that the student press does not exist in a vacuum nor does the mass media. The interrelation is pretty consistent and perhaps to be meaningful it might be we will want to look at the entire picture—but within reason, or within the realm of possibility I hope we can deal with the student press this morning. If we do not complete it, we will resume it this afternoon, and then turn our attention to the mass media.

As I say, this is not a hard and fast rule. I think perhaps Senator Hays, you might wish to put the first question. Would you identify to whom you are putting the question.

Are you all familiar with the names of all of these people? We have Mr. Villeneuve over here. Mr. Thompson, Mr. Russell, Mr. Saxe, Mr. Jones, Mr. Chenoweth, Mr. Scott, Mr. Smith, Mr. Scarth and Mr. Thomas, so try to identify to whom you are speaking.

Senator Hays: I would like to put this question, Mr. Chairman, to Mr. Scott.

You mentioned, Mr. Scott, that in financing The Gazette, you did not know what to do with all the advertising. I wonder whether you would inform the Committee how The Gazette is financed, whether you receive anything for being its editor, and so on.

Mr. Scott: Well, I did not say I did not know what to do with the advertising. I know what I would like to do with the advertising, but I am not the publisher, and I work within the framework that I was given when I took the job.

The Chairman: What would you like to do with the advertising?

Mr. Scott: Well, I would not want to put that on the record.

The Chairman: Why, Mr. Scott?

Mr. Scott: Well, I quite frankly would like to have greater control over the amount of advertising I carry. As it is now I carry all the advertising that is given to me, and in any particular week when I do not have any news, the advertising still goes. I have had a week in which I have had 55 per cent of the paper in advertising.

My guidelines are about 40 per cent.

Senator Hays: Well, will you give us a run down on how the paper is financed?

Mr. Scott: The paper is financed—all publications at Western are all advertising and all publications at Western are funnelled through a central agency called the Central Advertising Bureau. That has a full time manager and secretary and the manager is a former advertising salesman for the London Free Press. He hustles advertising for the paper, works during the summer to get volume contracts, large advertisers and national advertising for it.

Senator Beaubien: Does he get a commission?

Mr. Scott: Yes, he gets a commission, understand.

Senator Hays: Do you have a financial statement?

Mr. Scott: The newspaper?

Senator Hays: Yes.

Mr. Scott: No, not at present because we are not a corporation. The corporation itself has a financial statement and we are listed in it.

Senator Hays: I am not getting the information that I would like. I would like to know: how many dollars worth of advertising you have, whom do you pay: where does your money come from, and this sort of thing.

Mr. Scott: Well, The Gazette costs approximately $1,900 a week to produce. At least somebody claimed $100 and $300 extra, you know, after the cost of production was met so far. Some of that goes towards my salary. I am paid to do the job.

I listed myself in my brief resume as earning $85 a week. What I meant was the editor's job pays $85 a week, mine does not.

When I was with the Student Council setting up the scheme of a paid editor I insisted that they should not set it up in such a way that a student could not have it. In other words, I did not want it set up that a non-student from now on would always be the editor of the paper, so we set up a sliding scale whereby at top salary you got $85 a week, or whatever that works out to a year from September to April, but as you took each course, they pay the tuition for the course and lopped off about $800.

As it is now I get paid $1,200 for the year and they pay the tuition for the three courses I am taking. My salary amounts to $34 a week.

Senator Hays: What is your advertising take? How much do you receive from advertising?

Mr. Scott: I really do not know the figures. I could give you a guess. It is something probably in the area of $50,000 a year.

Senator Hays: So you make a profit? You said your expenses were around $2,000 a week.

Mr. Scott: In the past four or five years The Gazette has never made a profit, it has always lost. Last year it lost somewhere in the area of $1,000 because I insisted on putting out a supplement, a picture supplement if Western with no advertising which cost approximately $1,000 over budget, that had not been budgeted.

Senator Hays: Who picks up the loss?

Mr. Scott: The Student Council absorbed it.

Senator Hays: Where do they get their money from? I have never gone to university and I do not know.

Mr. Scott: It comes from the student fees. The student fees are paid compulsory. Eighteen dollars is taken from each student at registration.

Senator Hays: Mr. Chairman, if Mr. Scott could give us the financial statement in so far as The Gazette is concerned, I think that it would be well for this Committee to have it.

The Chairman: You would like to have it?

Senator Hays: I would like to see this. I would like to see this for all the university papers, if it is available.

The Chairman: I think Mr. Scott has explained that information will be available only from the Student Council at the University of Western Ontario.

Mr. Scott: You would have to have the financial statement of the Student Council because, as I said, the student newspaper is a creature of the Council. The Council is the only corporation.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier, do you have a supplementary question?

Mr. Fortier: If I may, yes. On this question of advertising in student newspapers, I think I should direct this supplementary question to Mr. Saxe.

The Chairman: Just before you do direct your supplementary question, Senator Hays is anxious, apparently, to get the financial statement from The Gazette, but I think the point that Mr. Scott has made, as I understand it, is we can get that information only from the Student Council at the University of Western Ontario.

Mr. Scott: I could not provide it to you.

The Chairman: If you wish, the Committee will approach the Student Councils in question.

Senator Beaubien: It would not be very hard to take the figures out of the Student Council financial statement.

Mr. Scott: I would not be at liberty to do it because I am only an employee of the Student Council.

The Chairman: I am sure we can get this information.

Senator Hays: I think it would be nice to have this information in lieu of all the statements that have been made.

Mr. Fortier: I was very interested to hear Mr. Scott say he had so much advertising he did not know what to do with it.

I have seen somewhere in our research material, Mr. Saxe, that the C.U.P. was setting up some form of co-operative advertising office.

Could you tell us (a) who demanded the setting up of this office and what was the impetus that gave rise to it and (b) whether or not it has started operating and if so, how effective is it?

Mr. Saxe: Well, I think probably before doing that, I could answer a few things for Senator Hays as well. If Senator Hays was to pick the average student newspaper in Canada, which did not exist, some sort of fictional paper, it would have a budget of around $30,000, of which it would receive approximately $15,000 in ad income, and $15,000 as a direct grant from the Student Council.

That $15,000 that is raised is almost always from a compulsory student levy that is turned over to the Student's Council and then the Student's Council decides how you divide that money up, and that is where the $15,000 would come from.

Senator Hays: That answers my question.

Mr. Saxe: Now, as far as Mr. Fortier's question is concerned, the Canadian University Press had this conference in December following a history of consideration of the National Ad Co-op which would probably go back to the founding of the C.U.P., which has been very active for the last seven years. It was decided to embark on another attempt to set up a national advertising co-op, and this attempt has now reached the stage where it has been approved by almost all—there are two exceptions, both of them sitting at the table.

Mr. Fortier: Would that be the McGill Daily?

Mr. Saxe: Yes. The McGill Daily voted against and Western Ontario Gazette abstained.

Mr. Fortier: We will ask them why after, but go ahead.

Mr. Saxe: Other than that, slightly over 40 of our 50 members at the conference voted in favour of the scheme. The way the scheme would operate is only for national advertising, and not for local advertising in the city or publication, but for national advertising attractive from a major national advertiser.

It would have exclusive rights to represent all the people who signed under the scheme. Hopefully that would be approaching all members of the Canadian University Press.

Mr. Fortier: Would you be looking for this advertising on a regional basis?

Mr. Saxe: We would be looking for it on a number of bases.

This way we can present to advertisers a market which makes economic sense to them which, at the individual level, the student papers, because of the cost of publication of advertising and the size of their readership do not make economic sense to national advertisers. Those national advertisers who do advertise at the present moment do so because they want to reach that audience despite the cost.

Mr. Fortier: There seems to be three national advertisers in student newspapers across Canada, Coca-Cola, Tampax and Bank of Montreal.

Mr. Saxe: All of the student press probably has those.

Mr. Fortier: Why is that? How has the student press been able to keep those advertisers?

Mr. Saxe: Actually, it comes the other way. What happens, Coca-Cola, Tampax and the Bank of Montreal tell their agencies that they want the press. In other words, if the agencies want our contracts, we want the student press.

Mr. Fortier: Why would not 7-Up, Modest and the Royal Bank do the same?

The Chairman: I am not sure that is a fair question to put to Mr. Saxe.

Mr. Fortier: If he doesn't know the answer...

Mr. Saxe: All I can say is I wish they would and as we pointed out, there are enough corporate connections in this room to help out.

Mr. Fortier: Are you suggesting that those corporate connections are preventing some national advertising?

Mr. Saxe: No, by no means. I just thought might as well make use of showing up here and do a little selling.

The Chairman: May I ask a question of Mr. Saxe?

Mr. Saxe: I do not feel I have answered Mr. Fortier's question.

The Chairman: If you are going ahead please do. I just wanted to ask you a hypothetical question. You mention $30,000 half of which came from advertising revenue. Of the half from advertising revenue, how much of it would be national and how much would be local?

Mr. Saxe: At that size of paper that would probably have a budget of $30,000, about $3,000 of his $15,000, I imagine, would be national.

Now, when you get up to the larger papers, they do get a much larger amount of national advertising. When you get to the small papers even their proportion drops, so if a paper whose advertising income is $5,000, $1,000 would not be national. They would be lucky if they had $1,000 national. In other words, the small paper may have Bank of Montreal, Lampax and Coca-Cola. That is probably about it.

In the larger papers we can identify approximately 48 national consumer advertisers. That is, to separate them from national advertisers who are out doing hiring work. In other words, advertising for student employees. That is only in the largest four or five papers.

The average amount carried even on papers with a circulation of 10,000 to 12,000, there could not be any more than 18 national consumer advertisers. For financial reasons I don't think they want to waste money. Suffice to say it does not make much economic sense to that agency to go into these overhead costs of placing the ad under the present organizational scheme.

What we can do by printing the entire package together and selling it either in readership packages and if all the C.U.P. members get on, we would run one-quarter of a million readers. Either readership packages or specific market packages; i.e. all schools of engineering students or all schools with women on the campus, all schools without women on the campus, whatever the particular interest of the advertiser is with his own product.

We would like to put together this sort of market and sell them through a full time professional office, and we feel we could grasp to increase of national advertising.

Now, another interesting aspect of that is, of course, that it will also guarantee some degree of political freedom in content to the number newspapers, apart from the advertiser. There are some papers who have experienced advertising censorship. Most notably Carleton University—I am sorry, the year during a major fight between administration and the student paper The Carillon, and in other instances—The Chevron at University of Waterloo immediately following an overback page devoted primarily to an obscene word, and things like that, experienced advertising censorship.

The Chairman: What do you mean by advertising censorship?

Mr. Saxe: The advertiser says "In view of what you have published we are cancelling our ads or will not advertise with you any longer."

Mr. Fortier: Who is this?

Mr. Saxe: The advertiser.

Mr. Fortier: Who were you talking about, which advertiser?

Mr. Saxe: I don't think that I could—not that I would not—file that information, but I just do not have it at the moment.

Mr. Fortier: Oh, you do not have it.

Senator Hays: Is it available?

Mr. Saxe: I imagine it will be available simply by writing Chevron. I know they would be very glad to forward the names of advertisers.

Mr. Fortier: Would any newspaper representative here, Mr. Chairman, wish to comment on that point?

The Chairman: I think Mr. Fortier's question is, have any of the newspapers here experienced such a problem?

Mr. Scarth: The Gateway will lose local advertising once in a while.

Mr. Fortier: What about this editorial freedom you spoke of earlier and the fact your newspaper was not free? It was very much administration controlled. Would you say the same thing about your newspaper?

Mr. Scarth: I did not say it was very much administration controlled in the general content.

Mr. Fortier: No.

Mr. Scarth: I told you which perimeter you could reach.

Mr. Fortier: Would you say the same thing about your newspaper vis-a-vis advertisers?

Mr. Scarth: No.

The Chairman: Does anybody else wish to comment on this topic?

Mr. Smith: We have had a lot of problems that way. Our advertising people continually come back and say "Listen, do you mind not saying things because..."

The Chairman: Is this with national or with local advertisers?

Mr. Smith: Largely local. We do not have any trouble with national advertisers. We had a contract with Eaton's of Canada—up until two weeks before our first publication was put out this year. They cancelled it, explaining that they were not advertising in any college newspapers in Halifax this year.

There are four college newspapers in Halifax and numerous high school papers and all of them except us have an ad from Eaton's every week, so we kind of figure that explanation would not wash but they keep telling us they just do not have the money.

Senator Beaubien: You do not know why the stopped with you? They did advertise with you?

Mr. Smith: Yes. Last year we were involved in a fairly major hassle in which the editor and staff there were suspended from the University. They were later reinstated and the University admitted it had acted irrationally. They never made that admission public. In the meantime our radio stations and newspapers had carried on a series of defamatory statements.

Mr. Saxe: There is also one comment I wish to make which may complete the answer. There was also another reason. It was said there was competition in the field and since it had not at any time negotiated with the co-op, it never had any contact with the hard negotiating team that could present the other side; it was becoming very dangerous so that individual people tried to silence the student press individually with separate contracts separately negotiated which obviously was not in the interest of the student press at all, and also a number of people went out and claimed they represented the student press without any contractual right to do so and so the co-op is trying to put a stop to that.

Mr. Fortier: To bargain from a position of strength.

Mr. Saxe: That is precisely what it would be.

Mr. Chenoweth: On this question of advertising, unfortunately because of the fact that on the McGill Daily I was not in a senior position in past years—however, I can frankly say that when I was a freshman and a sophomore at McGill between the years 1965-1966 and 1966 to 1967, the McGill Daily senior staff dreamed or hoped or thought it definitely possible within two or three years they would become totally self-supporting by advertising.

What happened in the year 1967 is what is known as the Allnutt-Fekete case. For the next two years our advertising did not, to the best of my knowledge, increase at all. Where as I do not think many ads were withdrawn because we are a very lucrative publication being the only daily college paper in the country, the very fact our ads remained static, I think will indicate—. I do not know if the editors receive letters or contract cancellations. I would gather the two might be related.

In view of the fact that now we are putting out—I will totally admit to this as Mr. Thomas put it—a rather innocuous paper, our advertising—although we lost the advertising manager within the first week of the year and had to make out for two weeks before we brought a new man in and trained him—we reached on our first term the estimates of $31,000 annually.

Mr. Fortier: When was that?

Mr. Chenoweth: This year.

Mr. Fortier: 1969-1970?

Mr. Chenoweth: Yes, as of December. For the months September, October, November and December our advertising income was approximately $31,000.

Senator Beaubien: So that is better than the year before.

Mr. Chenoweth: That is right.

Senator Beaubien: It is already better.

Mr. Chenoweth: That is in terms of the same period last year, yes, we are in a better position.

Mr. Fortier: Your student grant was also increased.

Mr. Chenoweth: Well, the operating costs are going up and our student grant has been increased, yes.

Mr. Fortier: A supplementary question which comes to my mind with this question of advertising is whether any of the newspapers represented here have ever refused to publish an ad which was submitted to them.

Mr. Chenoweth: Under Messrs. Mark Stankowitz who was the editor last year, and under Mr. Wilson, who was the editor for a first three or four days of this year, I know our circulation and advertising department maintain the right and do exercise this right to reject certain ads relating to companies who were engaged—I think the words used are “in anti-people research”. I personally say I fully agree with this thing.

This would be the production of war materials and, let us say, the military-industrial formation of the United States and Canada.

Mr. Fortier: Is this still the policy?

Mr. Chenoweth: No. This is not our policy this year basically because the McGill Student Society seems to be in a very tricky financial position.

We have had to accept as much advertising as possible. If we ever become self sufficient I would hope the Daily would exercise its right to reject these.

Mr. Fortier: I wonder if I could get a comment from any of the other newspapers.

Mr. Scarth: There is one establishment we will not accept ads from, being a situation which would not allow people with long hair into this restaurant.

The Chairman: This is a local advertisement?

Mr. Scarth: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: I can see you would have the last say in that.

The Chairman: What about national advertisers? I wonder if I could ask Mr. Saxe one question on advertising. I do not mean to erminate the topic and if you want you can talk about it.

How would the rates compare—. Maybe I can put this to Mr. Scott or Mr. Smith. Let us take The Gazette at Western. Its circulation is what?

Mr. Scott: 11,000.

The Chairman: How would the national advertising rate of The Gazette compare with the advertising rate of a daily newspaper in Canada with 11,000 circulation? Is there any real change?

Mr. Saxe: It is probably much worse in cost of our papers.

The Chairman: Much higher or much lower?

Mr. Saxe: Much higher. You see, we are dealing with printing costs which do not remain static. In many of our larger student presses their rates are very close to rates of the daily in their own city, which would usually have as much as 30 times more circulation. So, if we find that the University of Waterloo the circulation is 12,000 your rate is about 75 per cent of the Kitchener-Waterloo Record for the same city.

This, of course, is not unaccepted since there is a specialty market involved and the advertisers realize they are dealing with a very special market.

The Chairman: There are now controlled circulation magazines appealing to your market. I think of a magazine like Campus.

Mr. Saxe: I do not want to say anything libellous about that but they are not...

The Chairman: Everything you say here is privileged, so relax.

Mr. Saxe: This could get to be lots of fun then.

Mr. Fortier: We are hoping.

Mr. Saxe: I should have named all the people who were trying to pull these dirty schemes a few minutes ago.

A major magazine attempting to represent itself but purporting to represent the inability to hit the students in a controlled way is called Campus Magazine. It certainly does not. It simply does not hit the market in any way whatsoever and its claim to do so is a complete misrepresentation.

The Chairman: Does it do very much national advertising?

Mr. Saxe: It does have the content. It does a fair national advertising content. This occurs mostly in liquor ads which are barred to the student press in many different ways but the net result is that they are barred to the student press. There are travel ads, et cetera. I say that with the qualification that I am not too sure they are maintaining their rate card but I think they are trying to build up a reputation to some day be able to maintain their rate card.

The Chairman: Is that the only publication that has attempted to do this?

Mr. Saxe: That is the only publication that has really attempted to do this.

Senator Beaubien: Where is it published?

Mr. Saxe: Well, the actual publication is done in Toronto. I think the printing once again for the liquor ad is done somewhere in the Province of Quebec.

Mr. Scott: May I ask something here?

The Chairman: Yes, by all means.

Mr. Scott: I speak from first hand because I started for the Campus Magazine when they first started. A former editor of The Gazette was the editor of Campus for its first year. Roy Whitsed is the name of the publisher of the Campus Magazine.

During the first year Campus gave promise of being a good magazine but Mr. Whitsed was not interested in the students but just for the student market. He sees the students as so many cattle.

Originally when the Campus Magazine came out its idea was to be distributed by controlled circulation. Mailing lists would be bought from the Student Council and any other sources possible, and the magazine was mailed out to third and fourth year graduate students. Now, he called it "Canada's National Student Magazine".

This year it has turned to "Canada's Magazine for Graduating Students" which is what he originally meant it to be. What it started out to be was a very beautiful publication. In other words it was something nice to look at and the material was attempting to be—and I hate using the word—relevant to what students wanted to read.

As it turned out, Mr. Whitsed did not really feel it mattered a damn what was in the magazine as long as he could say it is reaching 50,000 people. It is my understanding for the first year it did reach 50,000 people although very sporadically because a lot of Student Councils just gave him a very incomplete list taken from computers.

Mr. Whitsed in subsequent cases somehow resold that list, which is illegal under his agreement.

The Chairman: To national advertisers?

Mr. Scott: Yes, to national advertisers. In one case I can swear to it because I delivered the national list to a national advertiser.

Mr. Fortier: Who was the advertiser?

Mr. Scott: The advertiser was Supertest. The point being that the past year I understand... I have not the figures to substantiate this but this year I understand The Campus is not reaching the circulation that it is telling its advertisers it is reaching. In one of these issues it published at something less than 50,000 yet told its advertisers it was publishing 50,000 directly to the students.

In fact, on most campuses now since the campuses have refused to sell him the list, he has found the list cumbersome, because he has lost all of his partners and his original editor, he is now mailing them in bulk.

In fact, he mailed bulk packages to The Gazette and asked us to distribute them, so we threw them in the garbage. That is the way the Campus Magazine is going. He is making money though.

Mr. Fortier: Do you feel it is a bad magazine?

Mr. Scott: It is a very bad magazine.

Mr. Fortier: Why?

Mr. Scott: Because it represents to people in Canada what the students are actually thinking. What he has turned it into is a career magazine. For instance, each month he features a particular career. The most recent one was natural resources. O.K. You have a picture of Dofasco foundry on the front. The colour preparation is beautiful. The picture of the molten steel, you know, the colour separation works real well on the back.

Mr. Fortier: Should you not let the students decide whether it is good or bad?

Mr. Scott: They have.

Mr. Fortier: Rather than taking it upon yourself to throw it into the waste paper basket.

Mr. Scott: Well, it is not my job to distribute it to the students either.

Mr. Fortier: No, but surely if you were asked to do it and then you automatically put it in the waste paper basket, as you have just said, because it is a bad magazine, you are exercising a certain risk...

Mr. Scott: I certainly am. This is based upon a lot of conversations with a lot of students who would not read the magazine.

Mr. Fortier: They do not get a chance to look at it.

The Chairman: I do not believe they do

Mr. Scott: They have a good deal of chance. They hire people at the registration at our university to distribute them to students coming in for registration and most of them dropped them in the garbage because I was there.

In his magazine he cares nothing about his audience. Let us put it this way: the man is not a publisher. The man is an entrepreneur. He has found a way in which advertisers are out of touch with the market in which they are advertising and as long as he tells them "I represent the students" they will continue to advertise in the paper until they find out differently. So far they have not found out different. Nobody has told them.

Mr. Chenoweth: Mr. Chairman, may I add something to this?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Chenoweth: At McGill, the Campus is sent to McGill students because the mailing list was not obtained through the McGill Students Council but through McGill University.

I will take an area with which I am slightly conversant. Let us call it the prime selling area in the McGill fraternity. Large numbers of the Campus magazine are sent out to the members of McGill fraternities. The Campus is regarded by the fraternity members as junk mail. It makes wonderful fire paper, wonderful fire paper.

No matter what the class division, no matter what the political background, the Campus from the best of my knowledge, and I have talked to friends and associates, is regarded as arrogant and paternalistic.

It is just a terrible publication, no relevance. Use that word again.

You know, it is like the type of thing you expect to get at the end of high school. Like you want to be a lumberjack. You want to do some market research.

They had a wonderful one which maybe Al can remember more about—about the press in Canada, careers in the press in Canada. It was one of the most ludicrous pieces of writing I have ever seen. Its presentation was superficial, corny.

I was next to guess—perchance, do you have any idea of the way they are trying to place certain ads to certain careers?

Mr. Scott: Oh yes. That is the way they sell it. They say this month we are featuring linking, so all the ads in the paper are from links. They are getting all those students who are interested in banking—we are going to reach them. They see the covers and all the rest of it.

The Chairman: I think Mr. Fortier has a supplementary question.

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

The Chairman: Before you go on to that, did you want to say something, Mr. Saxe?

Mr. Saxe: I was just thinking there are one or two others of Senator Hays' and Mr. Fortier's questions that I would like to answer. We have gone off the whole business. I am sure there are a few other things I can assist on from my notes.

The Chairman: Is this agreeable to you, Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Chairman, my question has nothing to do with the business aspect of the newspaper, but this sort of information which the Campus seeks to propagate, do the student newspapers in Canada give this information to members of the university community?

Mr. Chenoweth: It is beyond us. Well, companies seeking graduates, seeking people involved in the company advertise in our papers or advertise the appointment dates. The information for any company is available from almost any university office. The company seeks placement offices directly.

Generally, I think in terms of the university press our job is not to tell third and fourth year students what careers they ought to be seeking; because that is basically their responsibility and it is beyond our facility to investigate an area such as that. You know, we would be just as biased.

The Chairman: Well, I will agree with Mr. Saxe. We do not want to leave the business part of the mass media.

Senator Hays: You mentioned that the university papers were financed 50 per cent out of the Student Council.

The Chairman: You are clear that was a rule of thumb.

Senator Hays: Yes.

Mr. Saxe: Roughly.

Senator Hays: And 50 per cent by advertising. Now, you are proposing to have national advertisers so that our friend from Halifax would not have any problem with local advertisers and you would not be receiving this pressure.

Supposing you get pressure from the national advertisers—your particular group. Say Coca-Cola is not going to advertise in any of the student papers across Canada. What position does this put the Student Council in? Can you go back to them and say "We have lost all our advertising. It is not going to be subsidized 50 per cent by advertising, but we are going to have to make a levy for the whole amount." Now, I know this is rather hypothetical, but you are putting yourself in a position where you are easy to be sort of nationalized.

Mr. Saxe: I do not think that is going to be a problem in practice, Senator Hays, because you see when it is put together in this kind of package on a national basis, you have a very lucrative market and a very economically feasible market for these advertisers to buy into.

Also done on a proper business level, advertisements will be paid for a year in advance in most cases, so their ability to respond immediately to something that is not in a particular situation is somewhat limited.

Also their ability to respond without damaging themselves is somewhat limited. I think we have certainly found in many wide ranging aspects if the advertiser is seeking a lucrative feasible economic market, that he is not going to worry so much. He is selling Coke and that is what he is after, to sell Coke.

Also, of course, looking at the history of a number of upsetting incidents that occur in the student press, their advertising is very limited—actually very disturbing incidents. Certainly they may have some sort of feeling of antagonism but they do not take that to be all the student press.

It is only one or two papers that seem to be becoming antagonistic and that they will be upset about.

I think particularly in those circumstances the national advertiser is not going to cut off his approach to 50 student newspapers because of what one or two may be doing.

If in fact the co-op proved to be working to the contrary, they would probably be cancelled. One of the prime things in the co-op is that it has to be renewed every year. It is not a long term exclusive contract.

The other few things which I thought you might just be interested in putting out on the table are once again, speaking generally, because there are exceptions within the 50 papers to almost everything, but once again speaking generally, I think probably it would be of interest to say that most student newspapers are not interested in breaking even. They are interested in continuing their Student Council grant.

This relates mostly to the fact that whatever advertising ratio they can economically set up, be it anywhere from 20 or 50 per cent, given their own printing costs, relating to what the market will bear in their advertising costs, they are always interested in less. In other words, they would always like the ratio of advertising to be less to maintain the Student Council grant.

So, speaking for most papers they are interested in continuing the grant.

Of course, most publishers are somewhat interested in abolishing the grant so that sets up certainly one not unusual dynamic within the publisher which is reflected at the student press level.

Mr. Scott: There is a footnote to this with regard to Western. We are a special case given that our Student Council is perching on the brink of bankruptcy. They are between $14,000 and $20,000 in the hole. They have hopes of borrowing half of it this year and half the year after.

Mr. Saxe: The national co-op through providing some sort of guaranteed income will be able to offer some sort of reasonable guarantee to the student press so it can continue publishing, at least at a very minimal level in the event the Student Council is bankrupt or in the attempt at any level to cut off the income or its grant which, once again, is almost on every campus collected by the administration and turned over by good will to the Student Union. There is definitely an area of censorship possible there.

The Chairman: I am going to turn away from this discussion. Senator Beaubien, you had some question to ask?

Senator Beaubien: I would like to ask Mr. Scarth. Mr. Scarth, I looked at that cartoon of yours and I just found it disgusting. Why would you want to publish it? Have they got any young girls on your campus? Is that the sort of thing you would want to show them?

The Chairman: I think the question which Senator Beaubien put to Mr. Scarth has been phrased very well. I think he deserves an answer. Why would you want to publish it? It is his question and how would you answer that?

Mr. Scarth: I take it on two levels. Number one, nothing could be obscene enough to represent that war.

Senator Beaubien: Just a minute. We are not in the war.

The Chairman: Let Mr. Scarth give his answer and then you can comment, Senator Beaubien.

Mr. Scarth: Number two, if you are going to consider something obscene, it is without redeeming social benefit. Now, I do not consider that cartoon falls into that category.

Number three, the reason I would personally publish it is that it was a paid cartoon. One of them, was more brutal than that, without the sexual connotation, in which an American soldier was hanging on the cross, which I think could be censored on religious or political grounds.

And this one. This point of view on a paid cartoon—all of them ended the Vietnam war.

Senator Beaubien: I have no objection at all or anybody being against the Vietnam war but why would you want to publish something in the paper that is kind of disgusting and that really...

Mr. Scarth: That is the whole point.

Senator Beaubien: And is kind of filthy.

Mr. Scarth: Not because it was filthy but because it portrayed a very strong and brutal point of view on that war because it is a very strong and brutal war.

Senator Beaubien: Any war is strong and brutal.

Senator Hays: May I ask a supplementary?

The Chairman: Well, before you ask a supplementary question, I think in fairness to any of the other people who may want to comment on either the question or the answer, we should hear them.

Mr. Chenoweth: As I have said in my brief which, in the first sentence, is rather heavy and I will qualify it.

"I also believe that obscenity in its normal application is a meaningless phrase. The only things we can consider truly obscene are the miscarriage of justice and war to damage another individual. The only sexual obscenity is material which might damage the sexual outlook of children. I do not consider university students children. Therefore, I believe that the student press should be totally free of any controls in this area."

You know, "meaningless phrase", that is totally subjective. Any subjective thing is meaningless in terms of anybody else, not meaningless but impossible to debate.

What may be filthy to one's parents is not necessarily filthy to another.

The one thing you might say is that that cartoon might have damaged another individual. I personally fail to see, in the arrogance of my youth that that cartoon would damage the morals of any sweet young lady at university.

Senator Beaubien: If so, I would like to meet her. There are no bars at all, you just do what you like?

Mr. Scarth: Number one, there are libel laws and slander laws. It all comes under slander. Number two...

Senator Beaubien: That is a different sort of thing. I am talking about things that are disgusting and you can put anything on you like.

Mr. Scarth: It is my decision as editor to publish anything I feel is in the public interest. That is the final say.

Senator Beaubien: If a newspaper came along and said it could publish anything it wanted...

Mr. Scarth: In the public interest.

Senator Beaubien: Who decides it is in the public interest? You decide it is in the public interest?

Mr. Thompson: The same way as any editor does.

The Chairman: Mr. Thompson, did you want to say something?

Mr. Thompson: I just wondered what the relationship to obscenity is adopted by organizations like Inter City Papers Limited and Holt, Renfrew & Co. Ltd.

The Chairman: Now, Mr. Thompson, what is your question specifically?

Senator Beaubien: I am on the Board of those two companies. That is why he is bringing it out.

The Chairman: I am wondering what the question is.

Mr. Thompson: I really do not understand why Senator Beaubien is so upset.

The Chairman: Well, I think my comment on that is that I do not share his upset either, but the fact that he does is his privilege.

I think it is a perfectly valid question he has put and I think it was a good question and the answer has been interesting.

I do not think we can quarrel with Senator Beaubien's personal judgment of the cartoon any more than you can quarrel with his personal judgment or he can quarrel with your personal judgment.

Mr. Saxe: There seems to be a point there. There is a reality, Senator, I think...

The Chairman: Yes, we will come to that.

Mr. Saxe: The only thing I can respond to that is that I think that one of the most obscene things in Canadian life is life insurance. And that there are many levels on which life insurance is very interesting in an equal society and of course, Senator Beaubien is a director of The Empire Life Insurance Company.

Senator Beaubien: Empire.

Mr. Saxe: That was a Freudian slip. I think that obscenity...

Senator Beaubien: What is obscene about a life insurance policy?

Mr. Scott: What is obscene about the cartoon?

Senator Beaubien: It is disgusting.

Mr. Scott: We will come right down to it again, sir. It is my personal opinion...

Senator Beaubien: To me it is just disgusting. If I am walking down the street and I see something disgusting on the sidewalk, I would want somebody to arrest him. You would not want him to go around doing that thing every day, would you?

The Chairman: Well, if I can just bring the conversation back into some kind of perspective and ask a couple of questions which relate to things you said, Mr. Saxe.

Would the advertising bureau which you are in the process of setting up decline national advertising from a life insurance company?

Mr. Saxe: No, the advertising bureau would not. The advertising bureau plainly is going to be completely independent of the C.U.J. decisions on that level.

However, in the individual student newspaper, under the terms of the contract will specifically be allowed to inform the national co-op that there are areas of advertising which they will not accept.

If the top national offices from its conferences could definitely encourage student newspapers to inform the co-op they would not be interested in life insurance advertisements.

At the present moment in general the student press is declining national advertising that has discrimination and one of the new forms of that is sexual discrimination by the Bell Telephone, I believe. I would not want to say for sure, but I believe Bell Telephone is one company that applies sexual discrimination; i.e., they have male only or female only applications. And these ads are starting to be turned down more and more by the student press.

Other ways, as a matter of fact, that we have dealt with objectionable ads which have been dealt with much more commonly by the student press is what has been referred to as a blue graded ad. The ad is placed in the space which is purchased and immediately beside it is placed editorial comment of one kind or another.

Mr. Fortier: Europe encourages male telephone operators and in Canada and the United States we have female telephone operators. There must have been some thought that has gone behind that.

Mr. Saxe: Looking around it may be the rampant male...

The Chairman: Well yes, I have some questions too, but you go first, Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: What upset me about what Mr. Scarth had to say was the fact that the university printing press—took the decision and refused to allow publication of the cartoon. That is the aspect that troubles me.

The question I ask of you is: have you not considered doing what other student newspapers have done, so I am informed, in Canada, and that is to change printers?

Mr. Scarth: Most papers are printed privately. Number one, that is not what upset me. What upset me was the administration saying this cartoon was demeaning the image of the University and therefore it will not be published.

Mr. Fortier: We are really saying the same thing.

Mr. Scarth: Yes. The personal decision of the Budgeting Services Co-ordinator did not really upset me. The fact was we could not get an appeal board.

Number two: The Gateway is probably the best printed paper in Canada, the cleanest when it comes to type and style and format. Now, I do not want to lose that so I am not prepared to change printers on that level.

The second level I am not prepared to change printers on is that the University press should be the freest in Edmonton. That is the rationale. They have suggested we change printers, but we will not.

Mr. Fortier: Who has suggested?

Mr. Scarth: The Vice-President. He has said it is getting to the point where we no longer want the Gateway's business.

The Chairman: The Vice-President of the University?

Mr. Scarth: Yes.

Senator Hays: The fact that you are not able to publish this as editor and they have taken this freedom away from you, are you considering resigning as editor?

Mr. Scarth: It has been considered but we have not gone through the final appeal to the Board of Governors.

Senator Hays: But you will probably resign if you are not permitted to do what you wished, as you said earlier.

Mr. Scarth: At this stage I am not that concerned about the cartoon. At this stage there are five months left in the year and it would not do me any good to resign. No, I will not resign.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier, you were putting the questions to Mr. Scarth.

Mr. Fortier: I was, Mr. Chairman. Whose taste should prevail within the pyramid of the student newspaper when it comes to the publication of news stories, the writing of editorials, the publication of cartoons and small ads?

Mr. Scarth: Ideally the staffs.

Mr. Fortier: How does it work in fact on your newspaper?

Mr. Scarth: In fact, in my newspaper a basic comes down to the smaller editorial board. Maybe I can clarify on what level this occurs. The editorials of the Gateway are labelled with my name. In other words, that is my opinion. It comes under the editorial column.

Mr. Fortier: They are signed.

Mr. Scarth: They are signed. Should the Gateway see an issue that is important enough to have a staff editorial, it would say "Gateway Editorial" at the top.

This is now the taste prevails in that section. Usually I have the final say on most of what was in the report. The only basic change is in taste and what you do in editing.

Mr. Fortier: I do not know of any English daily newspaper in Canada where editorials are signed. On the other hand, as you are probably aware, most editorials in French daily newspapers are signed by the editorial writer.

Why is that and more specifically why is it that in your newspaper, published in English-speaking Canada, do you sign your editorials?

Mr. Scarth: Well, I do not represent that paper entirely as editor-in-chief. It is my personal opinion. I do not feel I have the right to say that the entire staff of the Gateway has this point of view.

However, on an issue that is very important we will take an editorial position and possibly will hand it around to the staff or have it read out as we did just last week. That is the reason.

The Chairman: Mr. Villeneuve, I think, has a supplementary question.

Mr. Villeneuve: It is on the same point, Mr. Chairman. I would like to point out that it is not a question of taste, "whose taste should prevail". I do not think that the question can be asked in that way. In fact, it is a question of finding out who is responsible. I think that the best solution to appear, at least in American student newspapers of any size, was the creation of a separate corporation to manage the newspaper. Then the student association, or the university, can finance a part of the newspaper, but it cannot have direct control over the newspaper's content, other than appointing a new staff after a year, and this is done at a general meeting, or after a year, and withdrawing the funds that it had granted to the newspaper. I think that insofar as the student newspaper is to a certain extent financially independent at least in its daily action, then at that time, the internal responsibility of the newspaper can be ensured in some cases by the editor-in-chief, and in other cases, by the production staff itself. All depends on the internal working methods of each newspaper, and I think that each of these two methods can be defended very well.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Villeneuve, if I understand what I gathered from what Mr. Scarth said a while ago, it is not the student body, the council that had refused the publication, that had not authorized the publication of the cartoon in question, but rather the administration of the university. I believe that the problem is not the same.

Mr. Villeneuve: I think that the environments are entirely different because in so far as our university is concerned, the administration might do the same thing. It was not only a general strike, but we would have closed our doors, and even people within the administration would have been the first to protest. Because, actually, the character of taste or the prime responsibility of a student newspaper is not to be part and parcel of a university, but to be a student group that, in a given environment, is called upon to look at events and things, and to play the role of all-dispenser. It is not guardian of the values upheld by the university administration, and I do not see how a university administration should in any way censure where the editing of a newspaper is concerned.

Mr. Fortier: Along this same line, Mr. Villeneuve, do you believe that the student body at Laval or at the University of Montreal is suffering at present from the fact that there is no exclusively student newspaper?

Mr. Villeneuve: Yes, I think that it is suffering. I think that the ideal solution, from the university's point of view, is what McGill adopted; in other words, by creating a field for competitive action by permitting the administration, the university, or other components, employees or administrators, to express their point of view in a newspaper which is not a student newspaper, strictly speaking. But, because there is not this tandem—a student newspaper and administration mouthpiece—then, at the end of the line, at the very least, there is not only a single point of view which comes through, but a lack of information, in view of the fact that our value system, the university's, is not the same as the students'.

Mr. Fortier: Do you believe that this vacuum is going to be filled at Laval and the University of Montreal in the near future?

Mr. Villeneuve: I do not think so...

Mr. Fortier: Do you believe that this gap in this vacuum at the University of Montreal and at Laval is going to be filled in the near future?

Mr. Villeneuve: No, because there will not be, even in the not too near future, a constituted student body. The University Students Council, in our university, is in actual fact dead, and I think, has been dead for a good number of years.

Mr. Fortier: Would you, if you would kindly do so, try to explain why this phenomenon has been experienced with French-Canadian universities, in recent times, and why it has not yet reached English Canadian universities?

Mr. Villeneuve: Let us say that—and I will do so at this question rather personally. I believe that the French Canadian environment is much more politicized, at least on the university level, than is the Anglo-Saxon environment and that as a result, certain events will happen, and I am sure of it, in the next five or ten years, in the English environment which are already happening among us. I have witnessed a phenomenon which can be divided into four phases.

Phase 1: There used to be a strong student association which provided the student body with services: co-operatives, student newspaper, and other similar services, even collective life insurance.

The fact remains, hand in hand with this, there developed a feeling that this student body could not represent within a strong executive, namely a group of elected persons, the various ideologies that were observed on the campus. They were minority ideologies, but the fact remains that their proliferation made these different ideologies, at the very least, a force equal to the dominant ideology. They no longer wanted a student association which was a services association, strictly speaking. They wanted to change the student association and, at the same time, the newspaper which was one of the services, into an association which actually has a political role to play in the environment, in the internal policy of the university, and in external policy; that is, events which, directly or indirectly, influence life in the university environment. At that moment, as the third step, here was a test of strength among all those ideologies which leads to, what I call, the fourth step where everyone represents only himself, and where, actually, people who have common goals, join together in small work units, each to promote their goal.

Mr. Fortier: Is the circle going to close?

Mr. Villeneuve: Personally, I think that, as the fifth step, we are going to witness a proliferation of posters, or media which are less rich, less profitable economically, and as the sixth step, eventually the university will integrate more into the society strictly speaking. This is through existing communications media at the level of society in general, or in any case, as a first step, of an underground press, and afterwards, at the level of present communications media, that the students will manage to express themselves. The student newspaper, relates, in my opinion, much more to that small college, closed-environment mentality, and it is going to develop into an instrument which has an influence outside the university.

Mr. Fortier: Has this increased politicization of the student body at Laval and at the University of Montreal, been effective on the municipal level, or on the provincial level, or even on the federal level?

Mr. Villeneuve: I think your question is quite difficult. Let us say that on the municipal level, I think so. I think that the phenomenon of the urban community, in Quebec, for example, where the development of the municipal structure is somewhat due to the increasingly effective integration of students in society.

On the provincial level, I think that a new political force is emerging. Whatever the membership in parties may be, there actually is participation which is less obvious than it was when we had the Student Liberal Club, or the club of any other student group which, actually, is just as effective, I think.

21437-33

On the federal level, let us say that the question is quite perplexing, in view of the fact that there are three major political trends, in my opinion, in the student environment. There are some who are federalists; others are separatists. There is a third trend which makes fun, at any cost, of the first two, and they are the radicals.

The Chairman: Mr. Thomas and then Mr. Saxe.

Mr. Thomas: Yes. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make some comment about this business of taste and whether there should or should not be some restriction to the editorial interests of some campus publications. I think this has to be related to what is happening in the university and it is directly related to discussions about the nature of the university that seems to be taking place on a lot of campuses, particularly at McGill.

I think that whereas McGill three years ago sanctioned or—not sanctioned—but took administrative action against the editors of the McGill Daily for the running of a particular article that was deemed by the Disciplinary Committee as being obscene, this would not take place today. I just have a feeling about this because I think that the University has moved so far in a short period of time in the direction of exploring all areas of human activity, that there is really no sacred ground. Although maybe an editor might get in difficulty on McGill campus right now, I think the risk of that is much less now than it was a while ago.

Maybe student groups or faculty groups would get upset and make petitions, and this type of thing, but I think the University administration would be much more reluctant now than it was earlier to take the same kind of action that it did in the Allnutt-Fekete affair.

My own view is that I think that a campus publication which functions in an environment that does discuss and consider the kind of area and the kind of things that Senator Beaubien was upset about, is just a part of campus life. There are forces on eroticism and there are films; there are teach-ins—all these things; the Underground papers come on to the campus. There are lectures. There are so many forms now that are available to the students and to the faculty to explore the most obscure and what the public outside would consider to be obscene or in bad taste. I think this has become so much a part of campus life now and the attitude of the students—even the freshmen students that come in, their sensibilities and their sensitivities are so developed as to accept this as just a normal part of the...

The Chairman: Do you feel they accept this, Mr. Thomas?

Mr. Thomas: Yes.

The Chairman: Carry on. I am sorry I interrupted you.

Mr. Thomas: No, I think it is and that is the point I wanted to make.

The Chairman: All right, thank you, Mr. Thomas.

Now, Mr. Saxe, you wanted to say something?

Mr. Saxe: Well, just further to what you gentlemen have said, I think the first visible signs of very much the same process—I would not agree with the exact way he described that process, but it is very much the same process as was visible in English Canada.

I think at one level the decline of the Canadian unions of students and its eventual abolishment points to what identifies the central problem.

There are many student unions in English-speaking Canada at the present moment that are talking about self-abolition. There are a few campuses that, for different reasons, are without councils and are without student union councils for special reasons.

I think what can be seen happening there, once again using the short form of rhetoric, is that for the student newspapers it may start happening—or at least to papers that I would like to call student newspapers—I think to an extent it has happened.

I think the student unions and the student newspapers are presently being run by active, aware, concerned individuals.

Senator Hays: Would you call these the elite of the universities; the people who run the newspapers?

Mr. Saxe: Well, it depends on what basis we were judging for "elite". I think they are probably...

Senator Hays: The students would judge the newspaper.

Mr. Saxe: I think there certainly will be some basis for saying that, especially when there tends to be their function to lead or when they can appear as leaders.

I do not think the ones I would feel most comradeship for are approached in some strong way as elite, because I think the kind of work they do stems more among the students they are trying to talk to and the things they read about and then they can take right to the students much more.

I think the same sort of dynamic is being seen and I think the cause of the dynamic is the satisfaction for the efforts that are being made by these people. The only legitimate response to them comes in extra-parliamentary forms.

It is impossible for the real demands that these people are making and for the answers to real questions and problems that they are raising to be satisfied through the existing channels of the present society and that includes the channels of university campus.

Probably my strongest disagreement with the gentleman from Laval University is that he made statements like "The university moving closer to society". The universities which I am aware, are so intangibly tied in their present society that no separation can possibly be seen except at the methodological level. Certainly any real union is one and the same as society. There is no separation possible, and the channels of that university are the same kind of channels, with certain modifications, only because of the fact that you are dealing with a university instead of corporate enterprise turning out a consumer product with a visible useful thing like glass. They are turning out a consumer product called "a student", and there is a slight difference in cause there; but they are still the same kind of channels except you have just added the satisfaction that these problems can only be reached in some pragmatic way.

The literal consensus of the student newspaper, is the structure—the structure of the student press is the literal consensus.

That is why the problem that Senator Hays raised: "At what point would you consider yourself tied into the decisions of the students" and "To what degree are you disturbed by the reaction of what they want" is a very crucial problem for these people. To the degree the student press is in the hands of a small vociferous minority, they are in contradiction with the construction of the student press—i.e., that it is being paid for by the students, et cetera, et cetera.

That contradiction has eventually to resolve itself. In some ways since that contradiction is in fact a contradiction to what they are trying to accomplish—a change in a non-elitist way—i.e., at some point that contradiction becomes too much for the papers, and the activists, aware, concerned students, give up the Student Council and the student press. Many times in doing that they destroy it, or destroy it by leaving it a shell which cannot continue in any real way in which case it only partially exists by any standards, as has been happening in some cases. Or they destroy it by leaving it so it is unable to continue in any form simply because there is no one left who wants to be bothered running it.

The Chairman: I think Mr. Chenoweth wanted to add something.

Mr. Chenoweth: I wanted to add a number of statements.

The difficulty, of course, we are reaching here is the fact that the student press is a political press and we are getting into varying forms of political retort, political points of view.

The McGill Daily stands out, I think, now as the exception to the Canadian norm. I do not think anybody will argue that, whether it is a good or bad exception.

Mr. Saxe: You are afraid.

Mr. Chenoweth: Well, we have a certain direction. I would like to reply to the statements made of the McGill Daily stating it has regrettably fallen into the hands of those who could not be insulted if we referred to them as moderates and that in this regard it is a retrogression.

Mr. Saxe: It is certainly a retrogression but only in terms of the Canadian liberal consensus of student press.

Mr. Chenoweth: Perchance I do not agree is contradiction mentioned by Mr. Saxe is correct. There have been a number of comments directed toward the McGill Daily and before I sum them up, I want to deal with this.

I have been cast by myself as a hide-bound reactionary, which is a fairly common aspersions around here, but I just want to say something firstly to Mr. Scott.

Mr. Scott got very nasty about the fact that I had charged the student press with abrogating its responsibilities in terms of being political. I do not know whether they abrogate their responsibility by being political. I support the political press. I support the critical press. The McGill Daily should be more so. We are too innocuous. What I said was and what I meant was they abrogate their responsibility by their format which has created ineffectiveness.

The student press has been particularly ineffective in discharging their obligations. This is where I come down to consider Mr. Saxe's contradiction.

I think there are too many members of the student press who in their polarization, desire too many things to come too quickly and use the wrong means. They try to hit the campus over the head with a hammer for years and have turned on their audience.

Mr. Thomas said the McGill Daily was much more interesting and much more read. Although I would argue that it was read—it was more interesting.

The question is: What did the McGill Daily achieve? What did it ever set out to achieve in three years of radicalization? My answer would be "Basically nothing". They were remarkably unproductive years. In my opinion this one year on the campus has seen more achieved in the general campus environment, whether we were responsible for it or not is irrelevant, than the McGill Daily and its cohort achieved in the three years in the past.

I think they were remarkably unsuccessful and in fact destroyed themselves. Those that I would call the cohorts of the campus left. Whether Mr. Saxe says it is because these people got out—I would say they left McGill which is formally classed. There is no strong left wing organization in McGill which is because they have totally destroyed themselves by overpossession, overpolarization and by overpublication. The campus was turned off and sick.

Whether I agree with their political aims or not is irrelevant. I am just saying their motives were particularly ineffective. They did neither the campus any good nor the rest of Canada any good.

One of the reasons we are innocuous is because we are trying to rebuild the credibility gap and in this you have to be innocuous. Secondly, when the staff quit, the entire staff, these dedicated men, to the change of society—when Mr. Wilson was fired, the entire staff quit, leaving me to reform this entire newspaper staff—a daily newspaper staff with a budget of $102,000, with only two people in general news with any professional experience and with only another two people with any technical experience. In other words, when we needed a functioning staff of 50, we functioned for about three weeks with four people who were living there day and night.

Well, if this is devotion or dedication of any form—I am not saying it is, but this is what we were left with.

O.K. We are innocuous this year. We are innocuous because we were forced into being innocuous because those who want to be critical are at the same time saying "We are not doing it for you".

We are a daily paper. We are not being critical of the rest of the papers simply because we have a day-to-day news protection which, because of staff members, we just cannot fulfil. We cannot produce a daily newspaper and at the same time go and research things in depth because those who have an awareness in certain areas or generally fall within a campus group have decided for various reasons they don't want to work us and our source of material is highly cut off.

Now, what can we do to get them back? We have deliberately attempted to try and get as much as we can. We will print anything from anybody on which some of these former members may decide to come back; we have given them editorial independence basically in overtly political supplements. It is called the Political Supplement of the McGill Daily. It deals totally with political affairs.

We are trying to re-achieve some sort of critical analysis. The fact we do not have critical analysis is not really our fault.

They were ineffective because they destroyed themselves through an over-use of retort. And pointless; and this is the trouble with the university Press; not that it is too political but mainly that it is ineffective.

The Chairman: Thank you.

May I say Mr. Fortier has his hand up. I may say to Mr. Russell, whom I promised could speak, we live in a real world.

I said we would adjourn at one o'clock. I think what I will do—I will allow Mr. Russell to say what he wants to say and then Mr. Fortier, I am going to adjourn until 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Fortier: I think, Mr. Chairman, that we are all familiar with that poem.

I think we will listen to Mr. Russell and then we will adjourn.

Mr. Russell: Basically what I wanted to say was in view of the fact we are adjourning, I was wondering if I could pick it up at 2.30 p.m.

The Chairman: Fine. We will adjourn now and we will reconvene at 2.30 p.m. We will begin by picking up the discussion of the Student Press and gradually get into the mass media.

The Committee adjourned to 2.30 p.m.

Upon resuming at 2.30 p.m.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, before we had adjourned this morning, I had promised Mr. Russell a few moments to make an opening statement. I believe Mr. Russell you may proceed with that now if you wish.

Mr. Russell: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Since this afternoon's hearing was to be devoted to the relationship between the student press and the commercial media, this is in part intended as a position that the Canadian University Press has attempted to work out within the student press. It is also in part in answer to Mr. Chenoweth—just before we left. I agree with a lot he had to say on behalf of the student press and it is an attempt to integrate that also—in this statement. For approximately the last three years member papers of the Canadian University Press have been concerned with the fact that they do not perceive themselves in fulfilling the same roles as the commercial media in the country, or at least felt distaste for what they have seen in what the commercial media in Canada were doing. C.U.P. conferences and interpaper communications and a great deal of discussion have gone into the specificity of that critique.

Now, unfortunately, it is going to be a little bit abstract. Not only unfortunately, but understandably because the way the critique of this system operates, a critique of this nature has to be abstract because it surrounds the nature of the press—not only the commercial press, but the student press, all forms of media in this country. What it has to do with, basically, is the fact that there has never been established a unified theory of the nature of communications media of any sort whatsoever. What is the function of the media and how they fill that interpreter for in terms of the effort that goes into it and the social structures within which the communications takes place.

Now, the only attempt that appears to have been made appears to be the effort of Marshall McLuhan which has been seized upon particularly by the newspaper media because I think it declares the newspaper obsolete. I think a great deal of the attention given to McLuhan has to do with the statement made by a man by the name of Antonio Gramsci who was on the Committee of the Italian Communist Party until he was assassinated by the Nazis during the Second World War. He stated, in effect, that in the public mind intellectuals in our society are seen by writers, men of letters and philosophers, and since journalists consider themselves to be writers, philosophers and men of letters, they also consider themselves to be intellectuals.

A great deal of the complacency that has arisen over the fundamental question has not been asked by this Commission, or by the press itself. This is in regard to what constitutes a communications theory. On what basis are we proceeding? What are communications? It is roughly defined as the duty of the media to relate reality of the on-growing process of the society to the people to whom you are communicating.

Now, it seems to me that it is readily apparent that the media in approaching this question has missed the initial part of this question; that is, what is the nature of the on-going societal process? It seems evident that it is not in fact treated as a process at all, that in fact communications theory in this country—and I would venture further than that and say, communications theory in a capitalist society—is bound to locate itself in a framework of empiricism which precludes the inter-conductivity of events. That is the same basis upon which the media operates in this country.

Mr. Fortier: On a point of information, Mr. Chairman, what is that in English, Mr. Russell?

The Chairman: Carry on, please.

Mr. Russell: In not begging this question or in begging this question about what constitutes the normal process of day-to-day events in the society, proceeding on the assumption that that process is comic, the function of the media has changed from being one of communicating to one of systems and maintenance. That is, that the normal day-to-day operations of the press in Canada could be described as a selected misdirection of the people who form its constituency.

Senator Beaubien: Why misdirection?

Mr. Russell: I am coming to that.

Mr. Stewart Saxe, President, Canadian University Press: I think this should be heard as a whole.

The Chairman: All right, we are listening.

Mr. Russell: Instead, the media in Canada depicts the on-going process of reality in such a way as to be organizationally functional for one group in the society and organizationally disfunctional for other groups in that society. That is, the way in which the world is presented to people is such that they cannot comprehend the connection between events in their own lives. They do not see reality as forming any kind of continuum.

This is also something of which the student press is completely guilty. It is one of the contentions of this that this is a problem that underlines the structure of media—the way in which they attempt to relate reality to a constituency but with a specific difference. Now, the way that this misdirection operates is in terms of pre-realities, as a series of quantified and atomic events. We talk about the American ownership of Canadian industry and the American influence in the Canadian universities rather than talking about American imperialism as an empirical term that defines a total process which is totally interconnected and totally penetrating and links those events together.

We talk about pollution of various kinds rather than the fact that the basis of pollution is a specific relation between man and his environment which is conditioned by specific social relations particular to specific forms of society, such as a capitalist society.

We talk about the problems of Keynesian economics under the guise of a totally fetishized concept of economics or the budget rather than talking about the contradictions of capitalistic economy upon which Keynes based his theory that these fundamental contradictions could be mediated to some extent.

We talk about the problems of group ownership of portions of the media rather than the fact that sociologically there is a hegemonic control as a means of mental production in communications by society, by class.

We see the violence in the streets of Quebec rather than attempting to transmit the interconnection to the psychopathology of oppression which triggers that violence. It is only on the classes levels—on a level which this Commission has been investigating that we come to the fact—that we come to the reality of Newsweek, where one day the Toronto Star are talking about Biafrans and the next day after the war is over they talk about the Ibos. Every day that a stranded oil tanker, which is owned by Aristotle Onassis and leased by one of the many branches of Standard Oil, is polluting Chedabucto Bay this is referred to as a Liberian tanker.

All of this proceeds from the fundamental assumption that there is no interconductivity of events. Now, it is the contention of this critique that it is reproduced functionally in the very form of the news media itself. That is, for instance, in a newspaper you can have a gigantic exposé of corruption and graft or whatever in the government on one page which will attract a lot of attention and which is forthrightly exposed and well laid out and everything else, but when you turn the page you are talking about the Women's Section. I mean, there is no connection between those events even though there is an attempt to break down the ordinary productive approach to journalism into what has been called the objective approach to journalism, which in itself, in its very form, tends to treat every event as a discovery. That is, there is no such thing as an on-going protest. The classic sort of example is Mr. Boyce Richardson fighting for the Montreal Star which was done by bourgeois standards and has been one of the most hard hitting jobs of covering pollution in Quebec. The unfortunate thing about Boyce Richardson's articles is that implicit in them is that pollution is a discovery. The truth of the matter is, that in the process that is involved in our society and the information between people and their environment, that pollution happens all of the time. Pollution in fact is one of the by-products of the social arrangements of production in the society. No matter how well Boyce Richardson writes that, you have to write each case separately and in doing so he creates the false impression that there is no interconductivity between those events.

Now, it poses a crisis for the press—the student press as well as the commercial press, but it really isn't a crisis for the commercial press. The reason that it isn't is because this problem involved in not having a communications theory is functional to the secondary role of the press which is owned by members of the same classes as the people who sit on this Commission. The systems maintenance in the system—that is, it is dysfunctional to the maintenance of the system; that the people understand the fact that there is an interconnectivity between events. That underlies the ideology of the newspapers rather than the quibblings over the form which you are concerned with to a certain extent by the Daily Gazette—are both the same in view of the unified approach to communications theory. This is precisely why I agree with Mr. David Chenoweth, even though I totally disagree that The Daily is representative of the student papers in Canada and that The Daily is in fact as representative as any paper can be.

The difference comes in for C.U.P. in that it is not totally integral to our interests—to our relative autonomy due to the ambiguous class position of students in a modern unicapitalist society—that we maintain this functionality of this systems maintenance operation as a portion of our activities. So that in the last three or four years C.U.P. have been talking about the concept of an alternative press.

We have been very unsuccessful. Mr. David Chenoweth's criticism of the student press has in the main been very good. As a matter of fact, the criticism is such that I would have liked to have made it myself a lot of the time. However, rather than operating out of zero-sum logic which states that if that alternative had been unsuccessful we would flip back to what the Daily has referred to as an anti-dialectic approach to journalism which often hides sycophancy.

The question is, is that a critique of what the student press has done or is it rather a specific critique of the educational system in which people attempt to come to grips with their problems specifically on a very abstract level of critique, of the kind of logical positivism that is totally inherent in every social logical method, every social science method that we come across? More specifically, is it rather an indication of the totality of the ideological beginning of one class in society rather than the question being that an alternative press has been irresponsible? The question is that the only way in which the question of communicating the reality of the world so people can be approached is a specific one of opposition.

Now, the reason for lining it up this way is to bring it back close to where Mr. Saeed started at the beginning of this session this morning, which was conveniently specifically ignored through the rest of the session, by calling for a press in the hands of the radical minority. Now, I agree with him, but not on any moral grounds. It is simply in posing the question as to how do we break down something that seems to be structurally inherent in the media under capitalism, or how do we even begin that process?

Now, there have been others—there is another specific aspect of it which has to do with the operation of this Commission. The Commission is not concentrating on content and the total relations of content, because the media naturally from the specific disjuncture in their form—tend to concentrate on form and call it content and thus we have the list of examples that I gave. We have a Senate Commission which rather than examining communications theories as a starting point, begin by examining, as I say, from an implicit position of pluralism, contrary to interest groups who own the media and who only meet over their other board chairmen, as Ron tried to point out earlier in the session. That is part of the reason why—as I look around this room I notice that a lot of the people are not comprehending the jargon I am using.

Senator Beaubien: Would you please say it in English?

Mr. Russell: The people in this room form precisely a portion of that working class, which also forms the people who control the media. There is a specific difference. Karl Marx succinctly pointed out the ideology that the sociology of the ruling class formed the capitalistic formation—those people who form the actuality of the ruling class—that is the people whose names appear in this book—some of whom are in this room and some of whom are not.

The Chairman: Some of whom are not on the Committee?

Mr. Russell: Some of them are not on the Committee, but it is possible that some of them are within the sociology of the ruling class which delegate their intellectual functions to a hierarchy of minions to perform this intellectual function for them. That is, part of the difficulty that the daily newspapers have coming to grips with this is that, in terms of the class position and the people in it, it is impossible for you to come close to some of these functions because of your class position. Again, you have never had to think. The system as it works for you has the implicit assumption and consequently any understanding of it in its totality is dysfunctional for you.

The Chairman: Is that basically the statement that you wanted to make?

Mr. Russell: Yes.

The Chairman: Fine.

Mr. Fortier: I would like to direct a question to Mr. Russell. Trying to come to grips with practicalities, Mr. Russell—the ideal press that you have alluded to—is this pure Utopia today or is there a country in the world where this ideal press exists?

Mr. Thompson: Well, one should talk about Russia. Russia isn't as bad.

The Chairman: Now Mr. Thompson, if you would like to comment you are certainly free to, but the question was put to Mr. Russell. Would you like to put it to Mr. Thompson?

Mr. Fortier: Well, no, because this isn't the question that I was asking.

Mr. Russell: Well, I don't think it is an ideal press. I think it is a combination of American imperialism and Russian social chauvinism in their social formation that precluded even beginning to come close to the question. It is not an ideal press at all because basically in communications theory...

Mr. Fortier: Is there a country in the world where in your opinion this communications theory has been comprehended and has been translated into a medium, written or electronic, which reaches the people?

Mr. Russell: I don't think specifically so although there are some interesting journalistic approaches being done.

Mr. Fortier: And what would those be?

Mr. Russell: In terms of assessing the ideological function of a paper in a society which is not based on class antagonisms. That is, a society in which the material editions, before even beginning to approach that communications theory, are beginning to coerce.

Mr. Fortier: Is it your view that as long as we have the struggle of classes as we know it in Canada and the United States that we do not have communications theory to any effect?

Mr. Russell: Better expressed it might be as your class is smashed a potentiality for that communications theory emerges and grows greater.

Mr. Fortier: Well, would the class be smashed by the press electronic or written?

Mr. Russell: No. I think the ordinary people will.

The Chairman: May I put the same question to Mr. Thompson? I think he wanted to comment and we would be interested to hear from him.

Mr. Thompson: Well, my thinking on the question is that somehow it is irrelevant because...

Mr. Fortier: Well, I didn't say that about Mr. Russell's comments.

Mr. Thompson: Well, that might be so.

Mr. Russell: Well, that is because they weren't.

Mr. Fortier: Exactly, I didn't say it. I don't think the questions which emanate from the Committee, Mr. Thompson...

Mr. Thompson: Well, I was just saying that I thought it was irrelevant.

The Chairman: Well, I will have to exercise my prerogative as Chairman. If Mr. Thompson wishes to suggest that the question is irrelevant, that is up to him. Now, let us go on from there.

Mr. Thompson: Irrelevant in practicality of the matter because it isn't a matter of finding a model of someone else that we could translate this situation to.

Mr. Fortier: Well, it may be very helpful to this Committee.

Mr. Thompson: Well, I think perhaps that probably wherever we would find such a model of an "ideal press" that press would be in an entirely different social structure.

The Chairman: Now, Mr. Thompson, I think you are evading the question. Mr. Fortier asked if there is one, if there is such a model, and you said it is irrelevant. Now, you are going on as to whether or not it exists.

Mr. Thompson: No. I am saying that a press—if such a press was developing in this situation—if you want to talk about that—would only develop as a process. It would be part of the development of that press and the working toward that would be at the same time the working to smash the social relationships such as are perpetuated in the press which we have now.

Mr. Russell: Well, further to that, I think it is indicative to say of the process that we are after that the Special Senate Committee on Mass Media begins with the same vague assumptions as the press itself concerning the nature of the press's job. That is, that the question of what constitutes communications and what constitutes a communications theory in so far as my knowledge goes—and I have been following the Committee hearings...

The Chairman: Where have you been following them?

Mr. Russell: I have been following them in the press.

The Chairman: Which newspapers?

Mr. Russell: About six of them, I would say.

The Chairman: Fine.

Senator Hays: May I ask a question?

The Chairman: Well, I was going to ask Mr. Saxe a question, but certainly you may, Senator Hays.

Senator Hays: In your position why do you not publish a paper that you believe would be ideal or are you moving in that direction?

The Chairman: Do you mean a daily newspaper?

Senator Hays: Yes.

The Chairman: Fine.

Senator Hays: I mean you are students of university and you have the power and you have all of the things, why don't you produce a paper?

Mr. Russell: Well, basically what I have been saying is that there have been attempts albeit unsuccessful as far as the student press to try and begin to relate some of the contradictions which people have observed and which are objectively there. I think they have also been unsuccessful because of the way they have been approached. For instance, we only had been talking about it in terms of field theory—only been talking about it in terms of field theory for three months—three months ago, and I hope it is a process that will continue to go on because implicit in it is the fact that the development of a unified communications theory for the press, or whatever the description, it is totally inseparable to the fact that your farm in the middle of Calgary shouldn't have been sold to the City of Calgary for a lot of money so that through that process you could become a Senator.

Senator Hays: Well, if you had owned it what would you have done with it?

Mr. Russell: Become a Senator.

The Chairman: Mr. Saxe, I would like to ask you a question here. Relating back to your comments this morning, why do you think that I proposed this committee and why do you think the Senate acceded to the request?

Mr. Saxe: Well, I am not sure that that kind of question would be relevant, Senator.

The Chairman: Well, its relevancy is to a comment you made in your opening statement this morning.

Mr. Saxe: To an extent the answer to that would be irrelevant because you are referring to a specific model within a certain process and you are liable to take a small part of what I say and identify that as an inaccuracy. Well, that again may be indeed true, but I think you must take a broader look of what I think the motivations are behind this Committee and the work you are engaged in. I would be surprised if this Committee did not at some point in some way involve itself in the process that I imagine is just beginning seize part of K.C. Irving's empire. I don't mean to suggest that because you have the power you are going to do that, but it is going to be involved in a process which sees that it does.

I also imagine that it is going to be involved in a process which is going to see the establishment of a press council in Canada. Once again it is not going to do that, but it will send out, I imagine, very large volumes of blanket information, data and interviews and reports out of which those two things will come. The specifics of exactly how those two things come about, are probably irrelevant. I think at the present moment the system wants both of them, but one thing—K.C. Irving has been presenting a definite thorn in the side of Premier Robit- haud and the present Government in power federally, and the present Government in power provincially in K. C. Irving's province, and has a number of connections in specific ways. I think that that process then initiates some ways that that can be done. I also think, there being a real world and the contradictions we have talked about between the press and what is happening in the world, and the fact that there are people who are getting upset, that it means some of that is feeding back. I can remember certainly at the beginning of the establishment of this Commission that there were things appearing in the media—and certainly things we have talked about—by the people that they were unhappy with the press. I think that the ruling elite's response to that mystifies us. They say "Yes, you are right, there are some things"...

The Chairman: Am I part of the ruling elite, Mr. Saxe?

Mr. Saxe: Yes sir, most definitely. As a matter of fact, probably to make it more clear so that those words will not be as unfair as they might seem, would be to say the ruling class.

The Chairman: But not the elite?

Mr. Saxe: The ruling class.

Mr. Thomson: Does this have anything to do with anyone's point of view?

The Chairman: Carry on.

Mr. Saxe: You are not on the board. You are President of what—Keith Davey Ltd?—We certainly owe you an apology for that.

The Chairman: It is certainly not necessary, I can assure you.

Mr. Saxe: It is not within the framework of the system. One of the things that we are trying to say is that this system has a process too. It doesn't proceed as a set of boxes from one box to the next box. The point of that is the fact that you don't have to get together with a group of people and say that under the circumstances it would help mystify the fact that there are problems with the press, so we set up a press council. That makes it look like the people have more access to that particular field of communications.

Also in view of some of the present problems we have, and all the talk, and all the objections to the K. C. Irving empire, you don't have to get together with a series of people and say that a few powers should be handed over to the other part of the ruling class. That happens as an integral part of the unity and rationale of this particular status quo.

The Chairman: Well, so I would like to understand—the system as you see it at least I would like to understand a little more.

Mr. Russell: There is a system and it is called capitalism.

The Chairman: That is fine. I am aware of that. Thank you. I am curious to know though—in other words, my decisions—I have said many times that the decision to propose this Committee to the Senate was my own and I am sure you would take my word for that. Are you suggesting that there was some subtle osmosis from on high?

Mr. Saxe: The fact of the matter what I was thinking about was the particular way in which these things get done. That is, that it is the Davey Commission or the Senate Special Committee to look at it that particular way and what does this particular way mean, and this is the mistake which is happening. The actual way or the way it was done is of no particular importance. The thing is it was going to be done somehow or other by the ruling class and...

The Chairman: So, if I had not made the proposal someone else would have?

Mr. Russell: That is right.

Mr. Saxe: Right.

Mr. Thompson: Done it without a commission.

The Chairman: All right. I think it is very important that we understand how you people look at things.

Senator Beaubien: I wanted to ask Mr. Russell—you keep talking, Mr. Russell, about two classes.

Mr. Russell: That is right.

Senator Beaubien: Are you born to a class, or do you gradually get into a class, or how do you get into these different classes?

Mr. Russell: Well, I am not sure I understand.

Senator Beaubien: Well, let me just say that if you wanted to take these 2,500 men who are the most influential in Canada, the big majority would have come from absolutely the back woods. They come from absolutely nothing.

Mr. Russell: Well, I don't really agree.

Senator Beaubien: Well, what do you mean really by the different classes?

Mr. Russell: You both belong to the same class.

The Chairman: You mean I belong to the same class as Senator Beaubien?

Mr. Russell: Right, right on.

Senator Beaubien: Well, how do they get into these classes?

Mr. Russell: It is just bad luck.

Senator Beaubien: Well, you realize that that is not an answer.

Mr. Russell: The fact that you are in this class is irrelevant to the fact that the different classes are generated out of the different circumstances in which you find...

Senator Beaubien: Now, you are not talking any kind of language I can understand. There was a great friend of mine who became President of one of the big companies here. His name is Jo Greene. He came from an Irish father who was drunk all the time and he worked like the devil to put himself through the University of Toronto by playing football and baseball professionally, and worked his head off and as a result he became part of the...

Mr. Russell: Part of the ruling class.

Senator Beaubien: Part of the ruling class. He worked hard and he got to the top by lot of hard work. What is wrong with that? Who would we get to run things?

Mr. Saxe: Well, there are the two classes.

Senator Beaubien: Well, we all start out the same way.

The Chairman: Mr. Saxe, go ahead, please.

Mr. Saxe: I think I could possibly say little bit having started from the wrong side.

Mr. Thompson: From the ruling class.

Mr. Saxe: I think, senator, the point is how they get to be there. I am willing to dispute the figures, but I think it can be shown, particularly today, that the ruling class maintains itself through its offspring to a very large extent. Certainly, Lord Thompson did not start off in the middle of the ruling class and there are definite examples of that. There was a higher degree, higher upward mobility between the wars and before the wars than there is today, but I imagine there is still a degree of mobility, but that is not the question.

tion. The question is, or has to do with the amount of guilt personally with the people in this room. While I think there are a number of people who suffer from guilt in this room, I don't say it is because...

Senator Beaubien: Just speak for yourself.

Mr. Saxe: Unfortunately to a degree I do speak for myself, but I am not in any way suggesting that maybe they are doing it with criminal intent. I am definitely suggesting that the results are criminal and, you see, that is one of the ways in which I think it is going to be very difficult for people to understand. What we are suggesting is a different way of living. We are suggesting that you have to take a look at the process in totality. That is, whoever the 250,000 are, or 25,000, there are only that many.

Senator Beaubien: But, Mr. Saxe, who runs it under your system? Everybody can't be running the country.

Mr. Thompson: There are two points, Senator Beaubien, and that is that it doesn't matter who is in the ruling class. The fact is that there is a ruling class. It is not a moral question whether there should be more people in the ruling class, or say that there can only be 20,000 that can get into the ruling class—that is not the question. The question is how such a system which has a ruling class who press people who are not members of the ruling class or people who work for a living—the people who do not own the means of production, and maybe you might want to bring up the point that workers are well paid out that...

Senator Beaubien: Well, this is a point.

Mr. Thompson: But I don't want to debate that. This very system—this system known as capitalism—capitalism operates for a profit or the benefit of the members of the ruling class. In doing that, it is a necessary by-product of mystification. They have to mystify that process so people don't think that way. The whole process is in fact such that the nature of the newspaper system results in the fact that they are under a capitalist-socialist system and the fact that there is pollution as a result of capitalism, and the fact that there is unemployment and poverty is renowned. Those are not strange words—they are not just abstract words that you have to understand. I think we can go back to the fact that you don't have to understand me. It is not in our interest to change the system. I don't think you have real questions about that.

Senator Beaubien: Well, I am wondering how you can run it through?

The Chairman: Well, Senator Beaubien, I am going to rule you out of order. The question has been asked several times and apparently you are not satisfied with the answer that Mr. Thompson has given. It is your privilege to be dissatisfied with the answer, Senator, but there are several people who have indicated that they would wish to answer.

Mr. Villeneuve has indicated that he would like to say something and I would like to call on him in just a moment or two. I don't mean to be rude to you, Senator Beaubien, but I noticed that you and Mr. Thompson in your discussion were gradually succeeding in only getting on each other's nerves.

Senator Beaubien: I realize that, Mr. Chairman, but all I was wondering was how or what would he do with this class?

The Chairman: Well, he has given his answer.

Mr. Russell: Well, what I would like to say...

The Chairman: Well Mr. Russell, I would like to move on—not miss this part of the discussion but just to move on. Mr. Villeneuve?

Mr. André Villeneuve, Editor, Au Fil Des Événements, Laval University: I should like to comment, Mr. President, on the statements of Mr. Russell. When he speaks of the absence of a communication theory at the level of the actually existing newspaper, I think that this is entirely wrong. Nobody is able to have a particular communication theory. In short, there is only one such theory. It is the socio-dynamic force of the culture in which every person is engaged, from the time that person is living in society. Then there are events that are conditions which are taken by creators in a micro-surrounding into a macro-surrounding; and this is done by whatever the means of communication that are present so that socio-dynamic force of the culture will exist. There remain two phenomena with respect to all that. Because we are discussing it in an abstract sense, I prefer to leave it like that, and in that manner we may be able to take a look at the problem. The two phenomena that may be observed are: the phenomena of distortions that slows down that socio-dynamic force of the culture and prevent the world from continuously enriching itself and the individuals with it and the phenomena of acceleration. I believe that the one as well as the other may be as important. To wish to accelerate a communication process to a maximum extent, on behalf of some system or ideology, means to pervert the purpose, because from that time on, people, as to their personal memory, are unable to follow suit. To wish to slow it down, means as well to leave the people in a crass ignorance and to prevent the surrounding from developing. There will always be factors for a slow down and for an acceleration and they will not always be absorbed in some society, whether by a micro-surrounding, or by a group, which is called elite, or any other form it may happen to have. What must be assured in a society that is sound, is the control over the micro-surrounding, or the control over the slow down or the acceleration. Any person has the right to check it to some extent, and to express his opinion. A person must not only be able to express himself, but he must be able to collectively accelerate or slow down the movements. For the same reason that a government during a period of war will declare that certain information is of a confidential nature and will slow down the movement, for the same reason will another group, at a given time, wish to accelerate the process. This is what I wanted to get at the slow down process. But that may mean that we must change our discussion of this afternoon. By that I mean: the fact that several means of communication are controlled by financially important groups on a basis of profits and revenue, does that mean that the slow down factor is sufficiently controllable by a majority of the population within the social structures that we have? In other words, which form of control are we able to exercise? What right to check do we have? What is the efficiency of a Commission, such as yours, at the level of a possible control over these mechanisms of slow down and acceleration?

Mr. Fortier: We should like to hear your suggestions very much, after you have stated the problem in such an eloquent manner. What, according to you, are the slow down mechanisms, which the government might institute?

Mr. Villeneuve: Without having an exact solution, I think that there are solutions that deal much more with the level of control over the interest groups. I mean that preventing concentrations that are too strong at a given time in a surrounding, or a given population, would prevent the control mechanisms from being effective.

Mr. Fortier: Do you sometimes read "La Presse"?

Mr. Villeneuve: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: I am going to ask you a more precise question. You are reading "La Presse"—you did read "La Presse" before Mr. Demarais and Mr. Francoeur, etc. became its owners. Do you believe that "La Presse" is reporting the events less objectively, generally speaking, that are commented upon in its editorial pages, today, than when compared with "La Presse" of yesterday?

Mr. Villeneuve: Let us say that, on a short term basis, the risks are not very high and on the basis of your precise question, I would say, no. I have seen no difference in "La Presse", or in "La Voix de l'Est", or in "La Nouvelliste", or in the "Power Corporation" interests, or Trans-Canada. It remains true that the risk becomes larger due to the permeability of the surroundings in certain cases. When there is an impermeability of the surrounding, (as in the case of Granby, which is rather far from the big centers) and when all the means of communications are controlled by the same company, in this case meaning the Trans-Canada company it is at that point on a medium term as well as a long term basis, that there is an evident risk of information distortion.

Mr. Fortier: Is that not what has been called before the Committee, "Raw Unadulterated Power", whether it is exercised or not? I return to the question you asked earlier and that is, how are we going to hold it in check? Do you believe that this is a social problem that must be attacked head on, or should we let this process of concentration develop itself indefinitely?

Mr. Villeneuve: With respect to solutions, I believe that the Committee has a bigger field than mine, and is better able to answer. However, I believe that there is more than one kind of answer. There is the kind concerning the control over the interests themselves, to prevent conglomerations and cartels, at a given time. There is also another kind that creates competitive areas, whether public or governmental the form does not matter much. There is quite a formal area or domain in which there can be an intervention. In which domain this would be preferable, I believe.

that that subject should be considered on a short term basis, whether the direct government intervention would be good from a medium or long term point of view. I would not wish to venture in that area.

Mr. Fortier: If, for instance, "Le Soleil" in Quebec were for sale, do you think it would be a good thing for the "Power Group" to acquire it, or do you believe that a governmental organization, be it provincial or federal... we will not debate this... should prohibit it?

Mr. Villeneuve: It would certainly be an excellent thing for the "Power Corporation". I believe that Mr. Gilbert's newspaper is presently the most profitable in Canada, or among the most profitable if not the most profitable, I think.

Mr. Fortier: From a point of view of information...

Mr. Villeneuve: With respect to the government, I think that to the extent that the governments were to take hold of a means like that one, and am now speaking of the governmental entity—the public administration, the guarantee to the public would be even less, due to the political games, which are normal in any governmental organization. I rather think of the public enterprises with control mechanisms and mechanisms of intervention on the part of the public than of a "Government Operated"...

Mr. Fortier: It is often said, and is has also been presented here, before the Committee on several occasions, that the freedom of press is something sacred and that the fact that a government would wish to legislate in the matter, or that a governmental organization would have the right to check the number of newspapers which, let us say, an individual or a corporation could acquire, would represent an invasion of the government of the freedom of the press. Could you comment on that statement?

Mr. Villeneuve: I am at present unable to do so.

The Chairman: Some time ago Mr. Thomas indicated that he would like to speak and I will go to you, Senator Hays.

Mr. Harry Thomas, Editor, McGill Reporter, McGill University: Well, I think Mr. Villeneuve succeeded very well in stealing a lot of my thunder. I would just like to make a brief comment about some of the opening dialogue that took place this afternoon. I have sat through this so often in the past four years and I was really quite shocked that the C.U.P. people would be still presenting a left-wing dialectic that I think has become quite passé. I think it is quite an attempt at a snow job here in that I don't think it relates to some of the thinking that has taken place not only in the universities but within the communications field, and I think at radical political levels.

I think that the things that the radical political thinking is getting at now is something that rejects the concept of the global village and general principles that can be applied to mass situations and mass communications and that what society is really faced with now is more of a turn towards micro-community concept. I think it is something about which Dean Jacobs and many other people are doing a lot of creative writing in terms of urban organization and I think communications. The press have to be related somehow to that situation. The thing that I would like to see discussed and considered by this Commission is how we can develop in the context of mass communications hardware the capacity for the individual—the individual within a rather limited community, in a sense, in terms of his essential needs as an individual—to produce alternative means of expression and alternative means of getting the news that relates to him. The thing that I have been working with and trying to develop within my own mind is a concept of community publishing, if we can use it perhaps in the broad sense, so that you can have a viable and energetic student press; that you can have a very vital literary magazine or opportunities for the expression of a poet and a two-way dialogue that can develop in some sort of micro-situation.

One of these things that I would like to see proposed at one time is some way of giving support to the development of an environment which would permit the small communications media whether it be through publishing or FM channel outlets, or closed circuit television, or whatever form it is in, so that groups who do want to form for some particular reason—and they may be very subversive groups—but they will still have the means to communicate with one another and to communicate to other groups. I think that this would set up the basis of a really vital self-critical society and the necessity of reaching broad conclusions or general principles before the functioning of the media becomes irrelevant. They are no longer necessary because the alternatives for the expression of individuals are guaranteed. I think this is fundamental.

The Chairman: Thank you. Senator Hays, and then I have Mr. Smith.

Senator Hays: I would like to ask two questions. One of Mr. Scarth and then the same question to Mr. Scott.

In your opinion, Mr. Scarth, The Edmonton Journal and the campus—in your opinion what do you think of The Edmonton Journal which is one paper from one city of approximately 400,000 or 500,000 people. What do you think of its credibility and that sort of thing?

Mr. Allan Scarth (Editor, The Gateway, University of Alberta): The Edmonton Journal is not a bad newspaper in the context of most of the papers in Canada. To an extent in the same reference that was originally pointed out it is still working within the same framework—well, it is false. It isn't challenging the rules of society, it isn't really getting at the truth, but no daily newspaper is. However, I agree with the late Basil Dean and with Mr. Munro that if you have an eloquent staff of reporters—I am not prepared to say how often that happens in journalism—it is not too bad right now, but they feel that impending sense of responsibility comes with being on one newspaper and they do make a sincere effort to be fair.

It is very difficult to form a general opinion of a newspaper. If you wanted to talk about it comparatively. I would look at The Journal as much better than I would The Calgary Herald because it is so much more liberal.

Mr. Fortier: Do you consider The Gateway an alternative newspaper to The Edmonton Journal?

Mr. Scarth: No.

The Chairman: Well, may I quote something that you said this morning?

Mr. Scarth: Yes.

The Chairman: I wrote down, Mr. Scarth, an exact quote from you this morning and you said The Gateway is the only alternative to the daily professional press, and I took it down as an exact quote.

Mr. Scarth: Well, I was just saying that the student press will provide the only viable alternative in practical terms right now.

The Chairman: So you don't regard The Gateway as an alternative?

Mr. Scarth: Not in practical terms of circulation, no.

Senator Hays: In readability as far as the students on the campus are concerned they all, I suppose, subscribe to the Journal as well or see the Journal?

Mr. Scarth: Yes.

Senator Hays: But generally speaking you would say that it is quite acceptable and you feel it is a good newspaper?

Mr. Scarth: Well, within a frame of reference it is not a bad newspaper.

Senator Hays: Well, where would you criticize the Edmonton Journal?

Mr. Scarth: Again, as with any newspaper, the phenomenal level of coverage. They cover the surface which is what newspapers do and they don't strike at the roots.

Senator Hays: You think there should be more in depth reporting, and that sort of thing?

Mr. Scarth: Well, I was going to go along with George. Not an in-depth reporting, but you need a different analysis of the situation and completely different point of view.

Senator Hays: Well, in your opinion, does radio and television fill the gap?

Mr. Scarth: No, because radio and television are much more dependent on advertising and are much more prone to be very conservative.

Mr. Fortier: This may be the time, Mr. Chairman, to ask Mr. Scarth about this new journalism which we have heard so much about in recent weeks; about this in-depth reporting which some of the witnesses who have preceded you before this committee have spoken about and which was partly the result of the advent of television. Many have come and said that they were doing a great job now of this in-depth reporting. Mr. Russell's references to Mr. Boyce Richardson's articles on pollution, I suppose, would be used as an example. Do you not find that the reporting, for example, is being done on the opp-ed page of most newspapers today?

Mr. Scarth: Well, as I said, to a certain level.

Mr. Fortier: It is better than it used to be?

Mr. Scarth: Yes. The Journal has died. It was something that was started under Basil Dean and it pretty soon became a forum for conflicting views of university professors and not a journal of dissent against the journalists' impressions.

Mr. Fortier: Do you have room for a page of dissent on The Gateway?

Mr. Scarth: That is a very important part of our paper—the centre two pages. These stories are given big headlines because the stories are important.

The Chairman: Senator Hays?

Senator Hays: Well, the London Free Press—there is a similar situation in Edmonton and London and I was wondering what the situation is there as far as you are concerned as an editor of a university paper?

Mr. David Scott, Editor, The Gazette, University of Western Ontario: Well, in much the same vein given the context of work in sort of the middle sized daily newspaper with a medium circulation, the Free Press is among the best of its kind. This is a good newspaper; it is not a bad newspaper.

Senator Hays: Is this the feeling generally?

Mr. Scott: I think it is the feeling generally among many of the citizens of London. We wish we had a second newspaper, something that we could balance off on.

Senator Hays: Do you think this would be good?

Mr. Scott: Well, I don't think it is feasible. You can argue it from now until next week, but I just don't think it is feasible.

Senator Hays: You think the people in Ontario are better served in so far as the news is concerned than the people in London?

Mr. Scott: Again, in the context of what journalism is today, yes. They have three different forms, but the forms are all analysed the same way.

Senator Hays: You feel that Calgary is not as well served as Edmonton?

Mr. Scarth: If you are speaking about the Albertan, I don't read it. I don't think there is much difference between the papers you do read.

Mr. Thompson: Whenever you have two papers in a city they both use primarily the same copy.

The Chairman: May I just put a question to you, Mr. Scott, on an article in the Forum which appeared July of 1969 by Mr. Desmond Morgan where it says:

"It doesn't matter whether the North Bay Nugget belongs to Roy Thompson, Max Bell or a local drygoods merchant. They are all without a single exception in the same kind of hands. We all belong to the Canadian business community and they all deal with what the community wants."

You would agree with that, presumably?

Mr. Scott: Yes, in essence.

The Chairman: Do you all agree with that statement? Yes.

Mr. Thompson: I would like to take up some of the comments Mr. Thomas made.

The Chairman: Fine. Providing, of course, Senator Hays is finished. Are you finished with that, Senator Hays?

Senator Hays: No. I would like to know also...

The Chairman: I must say also that Mr. Smith is waiting patiently. Senator Hays, you go right ahead.

Senator Hays: I would like to know what Mr. Scarth and Mr. Scott think of chain ownership, and whether a city would be better served if a paper was independently owned?

Mr. Scott: I would tend to agree with you. Yes, I would agree that if the person in that community—for example, the paper I worked for in Red Deer—the Red Deer Advocate was owned by someone from Britain finally, but was started by a man in the community who basically had more community interest at heart. At that level I would be against chains. I am really not prepared to give an opinion except to say that it would be all right if you had someone from the community running it.

Senator Hays: Do you think then that newspaper should be 40 per cent locally owned and would they be better newspapers if they were 40 per cent locally owned?

Mr. Scott: This is turning into—you know you are making needling points whether it is 40 per cent or 50 per cent locally owned, or owned by a chain. Given the fact that the same kind of people own all of the newspapers, whether or not he is a small potatoes businessman in the local area or local level, or whether or not he is at the level, say, of the Brantford Expositor, or whether he is at the level of the head of the Southam chain, they still are newspapermen. Given the level of journalism, I think it's really ..

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Scott, may I ask you this question? You are not concerned about the concentration of ownership of the media of Canada because it doesn't matter?

Mr. Scott: Well, I am concerned about it.

The Chairman: Why? If they are all the same kind of people why are you concerned?

Mr. Scott: If you let me continue what I was going to suggest is that I would rather see ownership at the local level because that often prompts better reporting of local events and a greater concentration on local events because that is the community in which the owner works and lives so he would have a greater interest in that. However, in the broad concept of the word journalism it makes very little difference.

The Chairman: Well, let us take Toronto as an example. You have three newspapers and two of them are independently owned by people who are residents in the community, and one owned by a newspaper chain, but clearly as the paper tried to make clear for the committee with very much of a local Toronto interest. Do you think it would not matter if one person owned all the three papers in Toronto?

Mr. Scott: No, I didn't say that. I really couldn't say about Toronto because I don't serve in Toronto.

The Chairman: Well, I am sure you are familiar with the Toronto papers—you live in London?

Mr. Scott: Yes.

The Chairman: And you lived in Toronto?

Mr. Scott: Until the time I was seven years old.

The Chairman: Well, I am sure you must see the Toronto papers from time to time.

Mr. Scott: Yes, from time to time.

The Chairman: Do you think it would be in the interests of the citizens of Toronto to have all those papers owned by one person?

Mr. Scott: Well...

The Chairman: Well, do you think it would really matter, is really my question. Without putting words in your mouth it seems to me that you would have to say it wouldn't.

Mr. Scott: No, I don't think it would be consistent for me to say that, sir.

The Chairman: Can you explain why?

Mr. Scott: I would say that it would be a bad thing for the three newspapers to be concentrated in the ownership of one man in the sense that on a very basic level and presentation of the day-to-day local news you would not get different viewpoints. There is a possibility that if a man had an interest in a particular story, the story would be presented in the three different papers in exactly the same way. Now, the main problem with journalism is that if you have three newspapers owned separately they will all present you with a different version of the story, but at least there is the fact that you have the opportunity to say that somewhere, we somewhere in all this mass of information there are certain points for and against. There is also the coming together of the truth, and if you only had one method of reaching the truth then it is bad. If it were concentrated in the hands of one man from the local level, it is possible. Probably at the management level it wouldn't matter.

Senator Hays: Do you think that an advisory board where a newspaper is not owned locally, where it is part of a chain where the proprietorship is 2,000 miles away, that it would better serve the community where an advisory board were on a newspaper where they would be represented, and the professions would be represented, and the whole society with say a half a dozen members?

Mr. Scott: Well, this advisory board—I don't know what you mean.

Senator Hays: Well, we have this in trust companies and in the United States there are many, many people who think part of the United States—part of their success is the fact that the banks were locally owned and people knew who they were dealing with other than two or three. I am wondering if you agree with this?

Mr. Scott: Well, I have never run a metropolitan daily so I really wouldn't know what would happen.

Senator Hays: I was just asking for your opinion?

Mr. Scott: Well, it is very interesting.

The Chairman: I think, Mr. Fortier, that I would like to turn to Mr. Smith. He has been very, very patient and I believe about 20 or 5 minutes ago he wanted to say something.

Mr. Michael Smith, Editor, The Journal, St. Mary's University, Halifax, Nova Scotia: Well, I was wondering on what basis you (Mr. Thomas) put your statement that George's critique of the classes in general was passé. Passé generally means it is out of date and doesn't apply any more. Do you mean in what George says was or is not true, or do you mean what he said was true at one time but it isn't true any more. If so, why?

Mr. Thomas: Well, I don't think it is either of these things. Essentially I agree with the critique of the press.

Mr. Smith: Well, why is it passé?

Mr. Thomas: I am not saying that the critique of the press is passé. I think that perhaps some of the dialectic and the focus of the argument to me is rapidly becoming passé. I think I gave some indication of that. It is sort of the chicken or the egg—which comes first concept with me. Essentially, probably, I would identify with most of the critics that Mr. Russell would be striving for in his critique of society and the things that he feels are wrong about the North American society we live in. What I am more or less getting at is how do you provide or how do you tell people, which is the expression that he used, have the tools to subvert the existing structure in terms of, say, the consumer society and the appetite of the consumer society which threatens to destroy. How do you subvert that if there are inadequate means of expression, inadequate means of action in terms of individuals? I think that what a lot of political thinkers are turning to, particularly radical political thinkers, they are certainly influenced a great deal here by James Jacobs, that we must get those methods somehow. I think it is a very difficult thing because this is a kind of very subversive activities. This is the breakdown of the masses; this is perhaps even the breakdown of federalism, and it may even be the breakdown of nationalism into smaller communities, and it is on that level that I in my own terms think that this dialectic is out of date.

You know, this is something that you can argue on for days and nights, but it is an argument that is taking place.

The Chairman: Mr. Smith, do you want to comment on that?

Mr. Smith: I will let Mr. Russell comment on that.

Mr. Russell: In the terms that I was proposing this was not communications as a means of self-expression, but it is implicit in the whole image involved in newspapers, maybe an end in itself, namely, how do people understand in the first place? I think the strategy that you are talking about—for example, the federalist structure I think is correct.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: It seems to me that with very few exceptions that we have heard very high rhetorical dialectic distortions and Mr. Saxe said earlier this afternoon, we are dealing with a real world. There is such a thing as a real world and this Committee was set up to investigate the real press. Now, everyone has been saying that the commercial press should be improved. Now, it would be very useful for the deliberations of this Committee, if we could hear from these people who now stand before the Committee today in what way could the real press—given no major upheaval—how could this real press be bettered?

The Chairman: Well, I don't want to anticipate Mr. Thompson's answer but I would gather from his earlier comment, and the comments of Mr. Russell, that that answer is really irrelevant.

Mr. Fortier: Well, Mr. Chairman, I would be quite interested in hearing their answer.

The Chairman: Mr. Thompson?

Mr. Thompson: I think that the way to improve the press without any major upheaval is to put the ownership of the communications media in fewer and fewer hands.

Mr. Fortier: How would you do that?

Mr. Thompson: Well, I think you would just have to avoid putting in legislation in the way of more monopoly controls.

Mr. Fortier: Would you break up existing so-called monopolies?

Mr. Thompson: No. I think you would have to increase them to have more efficient newspapers. Monopoly capitalism is more efficient and if you want to better the kind of press you have now you will have to obviously go to the obvious extension.

The Chairman: Which you are in favour of?

Mr. Thompson: Yes. I think that is the logical answer without a major upheaval.

Mr. Fortier: Well, you are assuming that there won't be any major upheaval and I am just giving you back your own medicine.

Mr. Thompson: Well, I don't think we could assume that there would be a major upheaval.

Mr. Fortier: Would you like to answer my question, Mr. Scott?

Mr. Scott: Well, I just would like to know...

The Chairman: Would you like Mr. Fortier to repeat the question?

Mr. Scott: No, I can understand the question. I would just sort of like to know what he means by improvements. You mean the introduction of new type faces? Is this what you mean?

Mr. Fortier: Well, you have said, for example, that the London Free Press was not a bad newspaper. How would you improve it?

Mr. Scott: Well, I would just say...

Mr. Fortier: I am not talking of 40 per cent or 50 per cent, because your own comment was well taken. However, how would you improve it? I mean, this Committee have to deal with realities.

Mr. Scott: Well, we are not dealing with realities if there is something basically wrong.

Mr. Fortier: Well, how do you envisage a better press, how would it come into being?

Mr. Scott: No, I am not—I am really trying to be very honest about it. I can't come up with an answer.

Mr. Fortier: Well, I am pleased to have at least that on the record.

Mr. Saxe: I think that part of the frustration on the part of the Senators in this room is that the commission has heard very little in terms of how this can be done. However, I think I can suggest an answer. I am reminded before I say anything of Mr. Russell's remarks earlier on about the oppressed classes.

Mr. Fortier: The vocal minority.

Mr. Saxe: Yes.

The Chairman: The ones in the room are not a majority.

Mr. Saxe: That is right.

The Chairman: There are some?

Mr. Thompson: There are some workers here, that is true.

The Chairman: Do you feel oppressed, Mr. Thompson?

Mr. Thompson: Oppressed?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Thompson: Well, I am currently struck if that answers your question.

The Chairman: Well, I am asking you if you feel oppressed?

Mr. Thompson: Oh, no.

The Chairman: You don't feel oppressed?

Mr. Thompson: No, because I feel very much alive in the fact that I am struggling against those situations.

The Chairman: But you don't feel oppressed?

Mr. Thompson: No. I feel free to the extent that I am struggling against the structure that I live in.

Mr. Saxe: I was just going to suggest that I think part of that struggle at the tactical level—I wouldn't suggest that is happens in each instance, but I would say that the control could be turned over to the community entirely. The control of the newspapers is turned entirely over to the communities.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Claude Ryan of Le Devoir came before this Committee before Christy and he expounded the same view that more and more newspapers should become community-owned. That is the point that you are making now?

Mr. Saxe: No, it is not the point. We are talking about the question of ownership.

Mr. Fortier: Well, I am talking about the content here.

Mr. Saxe: I am talking about the content at the present moment.

Mr. Fortier: Well, can you divorce these two?

Mr. Saxe: The form of content would be completely community controlled.

Mr. Fortier: And how would that be done?

Mr. Saxe: Well, I don't think you can answer that. Again I realize Mr. Fortier that is very frustrating to receive that sort of answer. Given the kind of world view and it says, give me an alternative model. I want another model. You can show me an example even if it has to come from Red China—show me an example that we could talk about—I am saying that the process is basically at fault. I am saying that you have to find basically a new process.

Mr. Fortier: What you are saying then is give me a new system and I will give you a new model?

Mr. Saxe: No, not at all, sir. The question is matter of how that new model is going to be developed in this process not what it is. It seems to me that if you are opposed to what is, you establish the same kind of particular as. So one can create these balances. I think at part of the capital considerations of that process is to go to complete community control over the communications media, and I don't pretend in any way to imagine what this means. If I could put a blackboard up for you, and tell you what the relationship is and that the new society is, it would be simple for me to do it, but there is no change in the fact that you are totally obscure to the fact that there is a real process.

The Chairman: Mr. Thompson?

Mr. Thompson: I would just like to point out the few facts that Mr. Thomas related earlier. It is not a question of privilege because I think you are right if we do start talking about being subversive if our analysis about the people who are in the room or on the commission is correct it might not be good practically to discuss tactics in front of them.

The Chairman: Have you anything further, Mr. Thompson?

Mr. Thompson: Yes.

The Chairman: You and I are enemies, Mr. Thompson?

Mr. Thompson: If we go along we will become enemies.

The Chairman: We are not enemies yet?

Mr. Thompson: Yes.

The Chairman: Are we in training?

Mr. Thompson: Well, we don't have machine guns.

Mr. Fortier: Well, why must you have enemies within the system?

Mr. Russell: Is this a moral question?

Mr. Fortier: Well, why must you have enemies?

Mr. Thompson: I was born into the system.

Mr. Fortier: What about the cases that are not part of your organization in the press, are they working up to this?

Mr. Russell: That is right.

The Chairman: I am asking these questions because I want to know. You made a statement earlier about your social conscience—in reference to your own social consciousness.

Mr. Russell: Not a social conscience.

The Chairman: Well, do you think that the members of this Committee, or at least some of them, have a social conscience?

Mr. Russell: I suppose so.

The Chairman: You don't think we are socially conscious?

Mr. Russell: I don't think that you are in any way. I don't think that is your fault.

Mr. Thompson: I guess I would have to address my remarks to Mr. Villeneuve too. I don't think there is anything that this commission will do that will change the situation. I think they could institute different controls, or recommend different controls, and those controls could be instituted but as Mr. Scott said it really wouldn't matter because it wouldn't change the structure.

I think also there is a point to say about the breaking down of the global village—we made a study of McLuhanisms some four years ago so I hesitate to borrow on that—but anyway that is breaking down and the struggle is becoming more and more one that is starting off at the community level. I don't think that indicates the analysis of the total situation because each of these communities—whether it is a community in Montreal or a community in Regina, they are still situated in Canada which is situated in the American empire.

Alternatively, if the struggle comes from many sources, and each of them struggling for their own liberation and thus creating the critique throughout that system, I don't think we can organize a crew to bring about the kind of society we want. Otherwise, we may have to smash at least ten or 12 members of the ruling class. That is exactly what a revolution is in a society. I think—we can start talking about tactics at the local level, but I don't think it is a much tactics as it is the ability to put into process this communications theory. The people are doing those things, people are setting up newspapers at the community level, people are setting up radio stations that are community controlled, and like the city government—as if they owned the papers—the people are doing it and are given control. We should give the control to the people who work in it, and listen to it, and read the papers—they should have control over the content then that goes into it. When you start talking about a paper in Regina, you start talking about a community paper in Saskatchewan and talk about tons and tons of wheat rotting, and tractors, and other machinery—we cannot talk about those things in isolation from the rest of society. We cannot talk about the prices because the fact that you talk about the highest prices for machinery, the fact of the matter is, it is related to the fact that no one is selling wheat and we can't talk about the controls over the selling of tractors. I think that possibly newspapers are a poor tactical weapon and that is because people are not trained to really read or write a newspaper other than the kind we have. This is part of the reason, not just because it goes into the people's hands to break down monopolies, and so on.

The paper that says or talks about the poor Biafrans, or about the pollution of the water off Nova Scotia, and the Americanization of the universities, and the Imperial Oil discovery in the Mackenzie Delta are all separate stories. They are on different pages, in different sections under different headlines with boxes around them. They are not different stories. They are dealing with the different parts of capitalism today. Capitalism is doing these things in today's society under our economic umbrella, but they are not events in isolation. The fact that there are more and more tankers being built, and because Imperial Oil started to explore the Arctic and who owns Imperial Oil? One of the directors Imperial Oil is also a director of the Royal Bank of Canada and a member of the Senate who used to be on the letterhead of the commission. The chairman of the Royal Bank of Canada lives in New York and is head of the Royal Bank of Canada Trust Company.

Senator Beaubien: Well, Mr. Chairman, was just going to say...

The Chairman: I am sure, Mr. Thompson that you are aware that you are becoming repetitive but all means finish and then you can carry on.

Senator Beaubien: Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the Royal Bank of Canada is Mr. W. Earl McLaughlin.

Mr. Thompson: Well, he is the vice-president, then.

The Chairman: Mr. Thompson, is your statement nearly through?

Mr. Thompson: I am nearly through.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Mr. Thompson: So I think when those community structures begin to be set up that there will always be opposition and that opposition has to be to the total system although it grows and develops at the local community level. There will be opposition to the total system. You can't just do that through newspapers because people start to demonstrate and protest about the prices of tractors, they come in touch with more and more of the system. They can't afford money for their tractors and the banks start to take more and more from them. When they can't pay their mortgages on their farms, the banks start selling them more and more to the Americans.

The Chairman: Mr. Scott?

Mr. Scott: If you don't mind, this is returning back to some time ago when I didn't have an alternative to the London Free Press. I do have an alternative and if Mr. Foran would like to meet me after the hearing I will give him a complete list of the people that I would fire from the London Free Press, new people that I would hire, and new type files that I would bring in, and this type of thing.

The Chairman: Why wouldn't you tell us the people you would fire now?

Mr. Scott: Because I don't think their names should be on the record. I am not in charge of the London Free Press. I am just trying to reduce it to the accurate level that it should be reduced to. How can Mr. Fortier ask me how I would change the London Free Press concretely, or in principle, or in philosophy? Tell me, in what areas you would like me to give my alternatives?

Mr. Fortier: Well, first of all, I would like to know...

The Chairman: If I may in terms of philosophy, I think we have discussed that at great length this afternoon, so let us set that aside. I think your position on that has been made clear, so let us turn to content as Mr. Fortier mentioned.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, because you are appearing before us you are saying that press in Canada is bad. We, who are members of this Committee, are investigating the press. Could you tell us in what way this can be improved?

Mr. Scott: Well, in the context of this Committee, what it can do in the context of who I am, I could possibly do it. For instance, the London Free Press is almost totally anti-youth. Very, very little content in the London Free Press has to do with what the youth are doing among the few pieces that are done on youth in the paper. Would you like me to give examples?

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Scott: All right. One of their things comes out of Don Mills, Ontario, called Other Teens Other Places and talks about high schools proms. Now what that has to do with teenagers in London, Ontario, I don't know. The London Free Press's idea of a lock-out is to call it a strike and I am sure you have heard a lot of these things from Professor Beattie when he brought his brief to you. Well, the people on the London Free Press to a man—I have talked to him and management considers that everything in his brief is a lie. They consider it all to be a lie. Unfortunately a great deal of the discussions I have had with Professor Beattie in my three years of journalism—and I have talked with him at great length before I came here—to a large extent I agree with him and his brief. Professor Beattie was dealing with specific issues about putting this caption on that picture and where they had an editor who worked his way up to promotion who after making a conscious decision a few years ago that he wanted to be editor of that newspaper. He saw the way to do it was not through the newsroom but was to go up to management, which is fine. He did it. Now, how he did it, I don't know, because I wasn't there. The point is that Mr. W. C. Heine decided he wanted to be editor of the London Free Press and how Mr. Walter Blackburn came into his empire I don't know. Well, you know at the time of Blackburn becoming President of the London Free Press Publishing Company, he was in line for my job as editor of the Gazette. He had to give it up because at the age of 22 after graduation he became President of the company and it has been that way ever since 1937. Now, that man is not in touch with the city. The people who work for him are not in touch with the city, and Mr. William Caradine, his executive vice president—I don't know the exact title, but Mr. Caradine went through journalism school and has done journalism briefly and is now in management. His contact with the newsroom, I think, is pretty minimum. Now, granted the publisher should be able to choose the editor. Unfortunately I don't think Mr. Heine is an editor in the true sense of the word and I don't think Mr. Hindman is directly in touch with the people of the city, and I don't think he cares much what the lower class does in his city. I don't think he cares what the youth of the city does. I know Mr. Heine edits the letters and I know he doesn't do it because of the libel because I run the same letters verbatim and I don't get sued. Now, that may be a function of my newspaper, but I will mention this once. In the Dickins case, I ran the letter in full; the Free Press ran it in half. Now, whether that is a symptom of the way the London Free Press work, I don't know.

The fact was that they edited out five of the significant points and all the points that dealt with Mr. Blackburn were taken out of that letter. Now, you gentlemen can wrangle amongst yourselves whether or not that was the duty of Mr. Blackburn or Mr. Caradine or Mr. Heine or Mr. Williams, it doesn't matter. It doesn't matter which one of those fellows is in the power structure of our society, they just do that.

In the area of news, in the area of labour they print every letter to the editor. I am not sure how fully because I don't see them all. In the area of adult education—right now I am working on a story of adult education with reference to the Adult Education Centre in the City of London. It has been rotten for over a year and nothing has been done about it. It is not because the Free Press hasn't been told about it because they have. They just don't look into it and these are the areas where lower class people are attempting to get an education in order to get a better job and they are being denied this chance. I can say that this is privileged information, or at least in a privileged context. Now, outside I couldn't say that because I don't have all the information.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: How well are those members of the London community served at the moment?

Mr. Scott: Well, if we are going to talk in terms—let us match one paper up with another. Let us take the Toronto Star. We will match the Toronto Star, page 7 during the week against the treatment the London Free Press gives the letters to the editor. The London Free Press prints one or two letters to the editor on the editorial page, and the rest of them are filled in beside the ads of what Loblaw's says.

Mr. Fortier: There is no alternative medium in London?

Mr. Scott: Where would there be an alternative in London? In the print medium the London Free Press is the only source for local in-depth coverage of news. There are three other radio stations within the range of the city which people normally listen to. They are supposed to deal with local events, but if you talk to the news directors of any one of those radio stations they will tell you that a great deal of their information is taken directly from the morning and evening edition of the London Free Press. There are some radio stations in town that go out and hustle their own news, but what can the two methods say about the same issue. Either you are dealing with expropriation or you are not dealing with it.

Mr. Fortier: Do you think a competitive paper in the City of London would remedy a lot of the ills of which you have spoken?

Mr. Scott: I am not sure it would. I am sure, for instance, if somebody came along out of the sky and went into Mr. Walter Blackburn and told him not to publish in the morning and the morning slot was open for another newspaper to come out, another newspaper chain would come in because they are the only people with the capital. I am not sure that the people with the money would do any better, because I am not sure whether the people of London would be better served. They probably would be a little better served.

Mr. Fortier: What are your views on community-owned newspapers?

Mr. Scott: Well, I haven't thought enough about it. I can't think in terms of how these community-owned newspapers would work. I am willing to think in terms of an alternative because an alternative has never been tried in that city.

Senator Hays: Is not the London Free Press owned locally?

Mr. Scott: Well, certainly it is owned locally. It is owned in an imperial structure that is incredulous to view. The London Free Press Holding Company Limited, Blackburn Broadcasting, and there is a little lady out of the country some place who owns only 9 per cent of the London Free Press. It has been in the family—I don't know—for the last while. Now, I don't know where this last 15 minute harangue went and I don't know what it told you about me or the London Free Press, but it didn't say a darned thing about journalism.

Mr. Fortier: Well, maybe it is important to go from specifics to generalities and from generalities to specifics.

Mr. Scott: Well, we are just plain work-ins.

The Chairman: Mr. Smith?

Mr. Smith: The point is we all probably have word series, but the point is...

Mr. Fortier: Let us hear about Mr. Denis?

Mr. Smith: Well, the point is that would be irrelevant because the case in point where the St. Mary's Journal managed to scoop the Halifax Herald on important issues that in fact were covered on four previous days by the Canadian Press was due to the fact that we got to it.

Mr. Fortier: What was the issue, Mr. Smith?

Mr. Smith: The expulsion of those nine Polish seamen.

Mr. Fortier: Are the people in Nova Scotia getting the newspapers that they deserve?

Mr. Smith: I don't know, but the point is I could go into those horror stories but that would be irrelevant because the reasons for those come back to generalities.

Mr. Fortier: Well, I think we should deal in generalities.

Mr. Smith: Well, maybe we should.

The Chairman: I think the generalities that Mr. Smith is talking about we had dealt with at considerable length. If you would like to repeat them...

Mr. Smith: Well, I would only say that I thought a discussion of horror stories would be irrelevant. I believe they would be irrelevant at this time.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Chairman, are we talking generalities?

The Chairman: I believe Senator Smith has question.

Senator Smith: I think Mr. Smith has been pretty well neglected around here and I think he has something pretty interesting to tell us. It is my impression, Mr. Smith, that St. Mary's University, perhaps due to its rapid rate of growth and so on—can you give me any explanation why it appears to me from what I read in that local press—and from what your fellow students tell me—there have been more revolutions between the student body and the administration of the University than all of the rest of the Nova Scotia universities put together. Now, I make that statement without any real substantiation, but it is my impression of the situation.

Perhaps what my question really comes down to is this. Have the editorial views of those who have been running the St. Mary's Journal—has that been responsible for making the students take a different kind of look at the administration policies than they give in some of the other colleges?

Mr. Smith: I would certainly like to think so. The situation in St. Mary's as I stated earlier is like a great school with 400 girls and no high fence. I think the average age of our students is 20 and the average image that our average students have is pretty well distorted. That is probably responsible for what you would say is revolution. In fact what happened—I noticed someone down here a while ago saying something on the press function and the latitude. If you sit back and think that you are going to be oppressed and for about 150 years as the people at St.

Mary's did do nothing, then when you try and do things, you realize that you are oppressed.

Senator Smith: Does your paper, for example, have anything to do with the stimulation of the demonstration of the turning down of the food in the diningrooms at the time of that commotion on the campus?

Mr. Smith: No.

Senator Smith: That was just a natural thing that happened in the boarding school?

Mr. Smith: Yes. That whole thing was a protest of non-representative governing structures. It came across as a protest about the food.

Senator Smith: Did not the administration at that time make some public statements in that regard and indicate that they were at fault and things were going to be changed and they were changed immediately?

Mr. Smith: I don't remember but there is a possibility that they did that.

Senator Smith: My only information comes from the morning paper in Halifax.

Mr. Smith: Well, as I recall what happened they said: "Oh, O.K." They were just looking for something to say and to make sure that the food was even better. All this happened except that it didn't start out as a protest against the food.

Senator Smith: I would like you to clarify for the Committee the purpose that your paper might have given the incident that involved the three girls in the test case that I recall. It was on the campus and I would like you to compare your coverage with that that was given to the incident by the Halifax press?

Mr. Smith: I am not sure that I can do that because I was a very young fellow, but I brought a copy of our entire production for this year, and I can show them to you. Basically our coverage was more in-depth. I don't know whether that is relevant to this discussion.

Senator Smith: Well, I am trying to arrive at a point where we may be able to judge the impact or the influence of the student press...

The Chairman: May I just interrupt you, Senator Smith and Mr. Smith, and ask you to relate just exactly what the incident was for some of us who may not know.

Mr. Smith: Well, as I said our university is a very paternalistic university and we have Grand View Residence which won all sorts of architectural awards but they clamped on 1910 boarding school rules for the people living in it despite the fact that it was designed as an apartment building for responsible young students. The people took that for about three or four months and they decided that they were not going to have any more of it. They were negotiating at the time with the administration, and said that the administration was stalling. They said that they would make regulations governing their own conduct and that doesn't mean, of course, that they wanted to take over the administration of the building at all. They were going to govern their own conduct in terms of hours and visiting and the administration responded by throwing three girls out of school and they did that largely as hostages.

The Chairman: When was that in point of time?

Mr. Smith: It happened over the period of four weeks, roughly around October 9.

The Chairman: Of 1969?

Mr. Smith: Yes.

The Chairman: Now, your question was what, Senator Smith?

Senator Smith: I was wondering what was the extent of the impact from what you have been publishing in your newspaper—your weekly publication—on the thinking of the student body and their willingness, apparently, to join with their fellow students and support such a revolutionary tactic to gain more power in the administration setup.

Mr. Smith: I don't know what actual influence we have, but I know that during that period our coverage was much better than it usually is and people were quite happy with what we were saying. After the thing was over we took the centre page of one of our issues and then printed two or three stories from the Mail Star and the Chronicle Herald, which are the daily papers there, and we printed various documents which disclosed just exactly how the media was distorted.

Senator Smith: You don't have a different kind of student body there than they have in other universities in the Province of Nova Scotia?

Mr. Smith: No.

Senator Smith: It is just that your circumstances were different?

Mr. Smith: Yes.

The Chairman: I am just going to call for a break for about 90 seconds so the report can make adjustments and then we will return to the brief

—A short recess.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, if I may call the session back to order.

I propose to begin with some comments by Mr. Chenoweth who has been most patient for the last number of hours. Then I am going to turn from Mr. Chenoweth to Mr. Saxe who has a comment, then I will return to the Senators. Mr. Chenoweth.

Mr. Chenoweth: With the indulgence of the Committee and the people here, I have a number of comments to make. I cannot present you with a detailed hierarchical analysis or opinion of view on anything here; I am just reacting to what has been said. May I first say that I am very sorry, in a way, that I have come here only because of the term which were obviously of much more interest to this Committee. Had a member of the McGill Daily staff that we have replaced come here, he would have made much better copy. He also would have been much more interesting and you would have been presented with a fairly well unified front down the line here. I personally am not a system analyst in politics. I am just—I guess I would be called a technician. I see myself as a newspaperman—a newspaperman who is fairly conscientious. I may be a victim of the system, a product of the system, I really don't care. I am going to be arrogant enough to offer opinions on practical considerations of the press in Canada, since I personally feel much more humble to present my view of the system than to challenge your views of the system.

An interesting point I would like to make is that the very dialogue which has been going on here for the last two hours is probably the best exhibit I could use to show why the university press in Canada has lost its audience. This type of rhetoric—I would even agree and I have very grave reservations upon the critique of interconnective news reporting, but at least that is better than the cop out of arguing policies and systems that comes to a level of "I have my view and you have your view, and you are wrong and I am right, and that's it, baby—bug out." This is what it seems to have come to at times.

I am not so fully alienated against society or total change to the system. All I am interested in doing is trying to create, in my own terms, and you know I will not justify my own terms to anybody save myself because it is based on my philosophy—I just want to create the best form of news media given my terms. If you are interested in my terms we can argue for two hours and they will be opposed by the other gentlemen here and you can categorize me, stereotype me, as I have no doubt some of the press men do. They are going to stereotype all of us up here and we will fall into polite little moulds. They are the reactionaries and I am a hide-bound conservative. However, the term most used on my campus is Fascist. You must realize that the rhetoric on university campuses is very easy these days. A Fascist is one or anybody who is a moderate—we don't use the word communist. We call him a dirty, nasty radical for anyone who doesn't fit the pigeonhole. In terms of what we have tried to do with our newspaper—we just wanted to create a newspaper to best serve our community by analysis of present day alternatives by offering the truth in its many forms.

All we have tried to say here is that truth comes in a thousand and one forms. Mr. Saxe, Mr. Thompson and Mr. Russell—interpretive analysis—that is what my brief has said that this country needs. A single fact in terms is irrelevant. Just like statistics—Mr. Winston Churchill, "Lies, lies, damned lies and statistics." You have to perceive an interpretive analysis, the interaction of events, the cause and effects. The very fact that we have different points of view here shows that there can be two, three, a thousand, a million different forms of this interconnective analysis here, and from what I gather the interconnective analysis presented by my colleagues is one of a very narrow form. They used the dialectics, the semantics. Instead of saying American domination of industry, they will categorize it under American imperialism. If I set my mind to it I could probably find four other words or semantic terms that would do equally.

Let me just get away from the campus and talk about, briefly I hope, about the press. I have worked for three summers now in Montreal as a member of the Montreal Gazette. Montreal is an interesting city to work in terms of this. We have two papers. The Montreal Gazette and the Montreal Star. The Montreal Gazette is now a Southam paper and I know you received a brief from Mr. Charles Peters as to why this is so. I feel very nervous about saying anything, you know. I don't know—not only am I hoping that I might go back to the papers this summer, I am also just receiving answers from papers across Canada asking if they will hire any of my staff for summer jobs because they need them. So whatever comes of this will be interesting to watch. Whether I condemn myself and shove my foot in my mouth thigh deep...

Mr. Russell: They will hire you.

Mr. Chenoweth: I don't like the concept of the chain. I personally don't. I think the concept—just because of the potential. Economically, obviously, I guess it is necessary and the brief says:

"I wish the Government and this Committee would consider the subsidization of what I call emerging media forms."

That means anything from a local community paper to the underground press. The subsidization, actually, of certain parts of the student press. I don't think our political parties right now—no one has mentioned today culture except Mr. Thompson. There doesn't seem to be any viable creative form except a little press, little magazines across Canada which die almost every five minutes almost. The student press, we seem to be the only people who are presenting most of the creative writing and analysis of the university students. None of you read a term paper for political science at 329, but some of you once in a while pick up a student newspaper and read what some of the kids there think. Some of that is pretty damned good writing.

I couldn't give you the methods of subsidization, but I would just like you to consider it. Community control of the paper. Well, very, very definitely but in what form? In my brief I support what has come to be known, I guess, as the European concept primarily demonstrated by Le Monde. The staff of a paper, the junior staff in particular, might be considered that they are offered to do not only hard core reporting but to do analysis; not the analysis questioned of you by your senior editor whether you have been covering a labour beat or albeit a general story, but upon what they think.

Of course, it has to be balanced if you are not going to have a completely arrogant view of the press as we become not only the fourth estate but the fourth world or the over-world almost as opposed to an under-world.

Letters to the editor is a crudy concept. If you check what most people write, letters to the editor ask—who writes the analysis? Either newspaper staffs or academics. I have a certain amount of respect for academics; they are wonderful people and I have spent four years under them and now within three months they are going to decide whether I get out of university, but surely there must be other ways. I wish these—my colleagues for a second would drop systems analysis just out of plain working and without trying to play games suggest just how this can be done. People, community councils give four, five, six pages of newspaper once a day, once a week, two groups of people that number as many extremists as you can find. As many extreme groups and let them allocate it to whom they want. The only way it will hurt the paper is that it may turn off the readership in terms of the fact that papers in Canada are commercial ventures and by this they are condemned. They have just to cater to their audience no matter what methods you come up with. You have community councils—I am only suggesting that this be done—the paper might find itself going bankrupt, I don't know, simply because it might alienate them because more of the masses seem to be alienated by almost anything which threatens in any way or opposes in any way concretely.

They do not mind academic or intellectual opposition, or concrete opposition in our world system.

This is what my brief says to give the young people a chance, and perhaps the papers at the same time should hire student journalists and it might achieve two things. It might achieve, I think, what some of you want, that is more in your terms a responsible student press. It might achieve a more responsible press in ten years, and in this case we can find there is a role for them. At this time you have to climb your way up through a ladder of copy boy and junior reporter on the police desk which wonderful training to teach you how to write but not a chance to feel, not just involved in a facts machine and churning out facts day, by day, by day, but someone who could also offer your interpretation no matter how humble or stupid it may be.

Perchance the best definition of freedom of the press is freedom of the press—as long as it does not hurt anybody in a way that may be considered too dangerous to be right or as wrong as possible. Radio and television doesn't do this. I could get into the nature of communications, the nature of the media, Marshall McLuhan stuff. Pictures are more misleading than stories and at the same time pictures tend to deaden horror. Our whole radio and TV culture, particularly TV has trained us to an entertainment media, a media in which 90 per cent of the day you are watching westerns; you are watching situation comedies. How can you expect that people who for ten minutes at seven o'clock or 11 o'clock watch the news can emotionally accept that this is any different? Watching a Vietnamese colonel put a gun against a prisoner's head and blow his brains out isn't any different than John Wayne having 4,000 Indians bite the dust. I think there are some studies being done and a lot more to come so I can't see how people can so easily make the jump from the mass amount of fiction they present to a brief minute of reality.

The actual coverage in Montreal—in my brief I play heavily upon one part and I think this will be my final comment. Of all the areas that the national press has ignored it is that of the university. Maybe it is just because—that is my environment right now, so that is what is of supreme importance to me. It is not only my environment. It is a training environment, it is an environment of the people who are going to be sitting in your seats 30 or 40 years from now. I have a feeling that you don't really give a damn. Let the administrators run it. The press doesn't give a damn, there is no entertainment value no news copy in the universities. The public is not interested in reading—and I don't blame them—in reading about the university so what is the value when you are catering predominantly to an audience that is not university trained and giving them stuff on the university. They have no form of relation and what is the point. Where does that leave us? Where does that leave the student press? So we scream and we raise issues. We are polarized and we are put in a position because there is nobody else speaking out for us except for the creation of stereotypes—Mark Rudd, the dirty fearless radical and the guns of Cornell.

Recently now the press is making a small effort to do some articles on what the real student is like except all I have seen is the standard cliché, you know, between the radical and the nice sweet pleasant student, he doesn't exist in those terms. How are you going to find out? From right here, right now, how are you going to find out and how is the press going to play this up? What am I sup posed to do? Am I supposed to write a letter to the editor of some paper and say what I think the press in general should do? Am I supposed to write an article on that and have it edited? I don't know. Am I supposed to write a column on what five years of university has done for me? Where am I going to put it? In my paper; but as students we know that already. How am I supposed to get it to you? I don't have a chance in hell basically of getting across to you in any form. Maybe I am being arrogant in asking for it, but the reason I am asking for it—the one final point of view is, you say "O.K., work your way up." In 20 years you get to a point where you can sneak out but in 20 years I won't be a university student. Twenty years I will be something totally different and I won't have any right to speak to university students. So why isn't there a way—and this applies to all other sectors in Canada not represented anywhere—to sit down—in God's name! I don't give a damn about helping or not helping the revolution. I personally would like to see this whole system of ours in Canada, the government system, modified. Give everybody a chance to say something, and this doesn't exist. This is a basic fact. I don't think there is anyone here in this country or room who can argue that. We don't have a chance to speak. The only chance we have is in our papers and the fact that our papers are bitter and nasty is a reflection of the fact that we don't have any other chance to speak out. How can you honestly say to yourselves that I am mature enough to deal with the intellectual concepts which face this world and at the same time say I am not intellectually mature enough to have a chance to express my opinions or the right to express them as predominantly as you gentlemen and ladies of the Senate do. You who can walk into a newspaper office and fairly well demand—not in any legal terms—but the fact is you will be given the space to have your ideas known.

If I walk into a newspaper office and demand that, what do you think will happen? This is a very emotional thing.

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Chenoweth, don't you think you and the others, Mr. Saxe and Mr. Thompson, Mr. Russell and all of my friends on my left here have had a pretty good opportunity today of putting your views before the people of Canada?

Mr. Chenoweth: You have asked us in five, six hours to deal with a section of the press—the very fact that the amount of discussion we have had proves that there is such a gap here that it would probably take a week to begin having any aligning of ideas. You have put us in a forum where we are debating. We have tried not to, but we have found ourselves debating. I have tried not to debate politically with these gentlemen, but I can't help it. Maybe it is my feeling, but I can't help being put in a position where I am polarized against them and where I will debate them.

We sit upon heavy trivialities about whether the McGill Daily is a good newspaper or bad newspaper in my terms, or Mr. Saxe's terms, or anybody's terms. If you are getting anything out of this why do you give just one day to a sector of the media? One day only out of how many months? You have given eight of us a chance to speak, and you must realize that we don't represent anyone but ourselves and you are having a lot more people—O.K., nobody represents themselves who works for a newspaper. You are having a lot of people representing other sectors. You are giving us one day, and not even giving us—I assume you think I am highly arrogant but—not even giving us a chance to speak to you directly, and you and me, not him and me, and the three of us running in funny circles and getting caught up in the most ridiculous things. We are polarizing against each other. I very much appreciate the fact that George and Stewart are here. There are differences between the McGill Daily and C.U.P. but we have tried to—nobody tries to steal. A lot of them are technical and philosophical words between us and as I say they are philosophical and will never be resolved between us. We have been forced to, and I am probably as guilty as the others, forced to deal in trivialities such as the Dickson case, et cetera.

Senator Hays: Don't you think though that all of us have been exposed a little bit? Most of us have children who have gone to university and you will some day too. I think you will get some exposure.

Mr. Chenoweth: Sir, are you as exposed to me as I am exposed to you?

Senator Hays: Well, I think children go to university.

Mr. Chenoweth: Sir, how much do you know of my environment compared to how much I know of yours?

The Chairman: Well, I would just speak for myself. I think I know more about your environment than you know about mine.

Mr. Chenoweth: Well, I am not really talking about the Senate. I am talking about general society.

Senator Hays: I think you had had a pretty good go, when I stop and think when I came up I didn't have a school bus and I had to ride a saddle horse seven miles to school and took my lunch. When it came time to go to high school we didn't have any money so we had to go to the City of Calgary. I went through that. I had seven brothers and sisters...

The Chairman: Well, if I may ask you about this point. Let us be frank here. When Senator Hays went through that revelation of his early days, some of my friends on the left here sort of groaned and sort of threw up their hands. What would your comment be on that? In other words, you started to say that you went wherever it was and there was on my left a sort of collective groan, a throwing up of the hands as if to say, "Oh, here we go again". What would be your comment on that?

Senator Hays: Well, I think most of this exercise today has been very good. I think you change in life. When you are 18 or 19 you are a communist, when you are 24 you are an NDPer and you have your house half paid for, when you are a Liberal...

Mr. Chenoweth: And when you are 110 you are dead.

Mr. Thompson: When I was 15 I was a capitalist, when I was 18 I was an NDPer and now I am a communist.

Mr. Fortier: And at 35 you will be a Senator.

Senator Hays: If you have lived with children that go to university, I think you know what is going on.

Mr. Chenoweth: Sir, how many of your children have been members of the student press and how involved were your children—may I ask you a personal question?

Senator Hays: Yes.

Mr. Chenoweth: Do you have children in university presently?

Senator Hays: No.

Mr. Chenoweth: You see, our contention is and this is one a lot of people argue about—I have been in university for the last five years and I don't think any of you will argue that the university the last five years has seen changes which make the past 30 years look incomprehensible. When, sir, did you ever imagine that students would come out of a building on an American campus armed with rifles and shotguns? Sir, was that in your frame of reference before 1969?

Senator Hays: No, but I have been to Russia and I have been to China and Africa and I am pretty pleased when I come home to Canada. In this cold, harsh country we get along pretty well and my observations when I was in Russia were that 80 per cent of the people lived like our welfare people.

Mr. Chenoweth: I agree, sir. When I was in the States and came across the border, I breathed a sigh of relief too.

Senator Hays: I have seen their universities and I think we are pretty good here. I think you people have had it pretty good go here, and you have had a pretty good go here today.

Mr. Chenoweth: I hope so.

Senator Hays: It was my first opportunity to really be associated with the intellect and academics and that sort of thing, and I have a great appreciation of the things that you are saying.

Mr. Chenoweth: I wish you had perhaps given us more time because Mr. Russell brought up an entire concept on communications theory. This is an academic and political field but you can't discuss philosophy in just 25 minutes and this opinion, point of view and philosophy in view of society is instrumental on the press that is being put out is totally correct. I just don't think that you can discuss some things as wide as that in one day with as varied a group as we have here. We have been sniping at each other all the way down the line.

Mr. Thomas: I agree with you.

Mr. Chenoweth: Yes, and I was as shocked as you were. I won't argue the systems with you.

The Chairman: Well, let me just make a comment on your comments and then I will turn to Mr. Saxe.

Mr. Saxe: I am prepared to pass, Mr. Chairman, to let the Senators have more time.

The Chairman: Well, fine. If you are prepared to pass, then I will pass. Senator Macdonald?

Senator Macdonald: Just two things to get back to the university press. Is there any influence apart from universities...

The Chairman: Who are you putting this to, Senator?

Senator Macdonald: Well, it doesn't matter, one of the editors.

The Chairman: Well, let us put it to Mr. Scarth.

Senator Macdonald: It concerns the university students. Now, after they are through university and go out do they still subscribe or is it just only through a short period while they are attending university?

Mr. Scarth: Almost exclusively only during the period they are in the university. This brings up an interesting point about the student press. Our attempt this year to go out into the community was blocked by financial reasons.

Mr. Fortier: To go where?

Mr. Scarth: The attempt by The Gateway this year to go out into the community was blocked by financial reasons and distribution costs but it is an interesting point that the university papers are realizing society and the universities are doing the same thing.

Mr. Macdonald: Well, the point I was getting at is this. Do the students themselves who graduate this year—would they continue to take the student press?

Mr. Scarth: No. This is why I would like to bring up the point that the student press is attempting to get into the community. Our attempt in the first part of the year was to all the high schools in Edmonton and for downtown distribution.

Senator Macdonald: Thank you.

Mr. Scarth: They are attempting to talk about things and I guess the best way to put it is student to citizen instead of student to student.

Mr. Fortier: Will that happen do you think?

Mr. Scarth: Mr. Stewart Saxe will probably give you a better indication. I am hoping it will happen. It has happened in other places but it is usually done once a year. In the last two years the university papers have come out with a supplement. It is a well researched paper.

Mr. Fortier: Well, how far should this go, Mr. Saxe?

Mr. Saxe: I think it is going to stop, Mr. Fortier. I think it is going to stop because of the remarks that someone made earlier. I think it is something that is primarily done by a group that in most cases is presently in control of that press. As I said earlier, I have doubts about how much longer this form of media or that group is going to be in control of the student press.

Mr. Fortier: Don't you think it is economically possible for the student newspaper in any given community to reach out?

Mr. Saxe: Really it does depend on the specifics at the moment. It should have been economically feasible or possible in a given community but it depends very much on the specifics at that university, the student fees, the student councils, co-operation between the councils and the student newspaper when they are paying their fees. The student press, however, has been expanding more and more and in fact I came very close to bringing you in a sample today.

The Chairman: A sample of what?

Mr. Saxe: Of a community newspaper.

The Chairman: I would be most interested if you would send those in, please.

Mr. Saxe: Fine. They have been established more and more in the community in an attempt on a practical level to respond to some of the students who are saying "Well, what can I do today?" I can go out and can write up an article on the corrupt way in which downtown redevelopment is being handled". This is the type of thing which is not getting to the local press at all.

Mr. Fortier: This is the alternative that we were talking about earlier?

Mr. Saxe: Well, this is certainly one portion. There has been a search for members for some way of expressing a view to an alternative press. The other thing that has been done is that the press has occasionally gone out into the community on specific actions, or with specific issues, or in specific areas. Other times it has covered many things affecting our community. The rate of times this is happening in the year is going up. In other words if you just wanted to plot a chart it is definitely on a marked increase, but I think there are too many things that will eventually affect it. What is happening is that it cuts off those other sources of papers that are available and I am sure this is the opinion of the McGill Reporter—the availability of offset printing, the cheapness of offset for eight tabloid size pages—we are producing more and more of that kind of paper in the community and Mr. Thomas earlier addressed some remarks to what that type of paper could do. It does not bring up the entire question which I think at some point lay on the table here, but I don't want to discuss it because of time.

This was in regards as to whether the printed media can respond. Can it possibly respond to any of the problems that we have raised?

Mr. Fortier: Is this brought about by one of the points that Mr. Chenoweth made that the commercial press continues to be very lackadaisical about coverage of events at the university?

Mr. Saxe: It has in some cases. At the University of Windsor last year they turned out a special community edition which was designed—not to acquaint the community with events, but to acquaint the community around them with the reality of the kind of university education that was going on and the kind of things that were happening at that university which for obvious publicity reasons the administration wasn't interested in talking about. I have certainly found that the universities I have attended, the local reporters are really in the hands of the administration. What appears, appears in the local press in the university towns. This happens with very few exceptions.

Mr. Fortier: Well, would Mr. Chenoweth care to comment on that?

Mr. Chenoweth: Well, yes I will.

The Chairman: Well, I think we should be clear that we are all trespassing on Senator MacDonald's question. I believe he has a second question.

Senator MacDonald: I have two more. This one I would like to address to Mr. Smith.

You mentioned the case of the news story of the Polish seamen where your journalists were ahead of the commercial press. What about the other university or other student papers such as the Dalhousie Gazette. Did that cover the story?

Mr. Smith: I believe it did. At that time we were publishing on a Friday and they were publishing on a Wednesday and as a result we beat them there.

Senator MacDonald: Is there co-operation between The Journal and The Dalhousie Gazette or are they both on their own?

Mr. Smith: There is not co-operation in terms like—"Listen, we have a good news story and we would like you to help us run it". We are both members of the same co-operative and I would like to think that we operate, you know, in a non-competitive way.

Senator MacDonald: You say you distribute on each other's campuses. Do they charge St. Mary's students for their papers or are they free?

Mr. Smith: They are distributed without cost. We distribute I think between 800 and 1,000 on Dalhousie campus which is a drop in the bucket because I believe their enrolment is something like 7,000.

Senator MacDonald: My last question I addressed to any one of the student editors.

The Chairman: Supposing we address it to Mr. Scott at this time?

Senator MacDonald: All right. It seems to me that the editors have a great deal of authority from what I have been listening to to what goes into the paper, and somebody mentioned the fact that one of their responsibilities was to educate the student body. Various editors have been talking about publications and they mention "my paper". Now are there any checks or balances or criticism in the paper, in your own staff, as to prevent an editor becoming perhaps what we call intellectually arrogant?

Mr. Scott: Well, speaking in terms of my own paper, I think there is. Although I started this year with almost completely a green staff and had to institute a system whereby I was the final word. That is not the system I would like to see eventually. As it was, I held weekly staff meetings where I discussed what they wanted to do the following week. We discuss what we have done this week and the staff—and this works on a majority system—if the staff decides what my editorial said was essentially wrong, then they tell me.

They are presented the opportunity to change that. That hasn't happened this year by the way. I don't think it is because anybody is terrified of me, but I think it is just because I am in tune with what they think. There is a heck from my publisher, certainly. They can't put me under certain guidelines within my contract, but that is essentially it.

Senator Macdonald: Do you realize that there might be a danger there?

Mr. Scott: No, I don't think so. It is practically impossible. I think if anybody here said 'my paper', it only would mean the paper they represent.

The Chairman: Mr. Scarth and Mr. Smith both indicate that they would like to comment on this.

Mr. Scarth?

Mr. Scarth: On that first point, my paper is that anybody calls it, and secondly I think the checks and balances on a student newspaper are much closer than they are on a daily newspaper in the professional sense, and that there are fewer checks and balances by the time that you get up to the hierarchy—the managing editor—assistant editor—editor—ad publisher—than there is with the whole staff there. The staff and the editor are very close.

You will never find a reporter being able to put a check or a balance on a daily editor, but it happens all the time in the student press.

The second point which I think is very pertinent to determining just how serious this commission was and is about investigating the university press is, how many of the Senators here have read a university newspaper? How many of the Senators here have read a university paper recently, or have any of the Senators tried to get a hold of copies of the university press for the Senators to read?

The Chairman: Well, I think I should perhaps answer that on behalf of the Committee. There has been a very comprehensive research paper on the student press which has been prepared and the Senators have it and it is confidential, all of which I mentioned this morning. Ultimately it will be made public, but I should speak for myself and say that I read a number of student papers fairly regularly.

Mr. Scarth: Well, do any of the other Senators read the papers and why is that information in the report not available to us?

The Chairman: It will be.

Mr. Scarth: Well, would it not be better for us to have the same amount of information as the Senators do?

The Chairman: Well, that is a question which was put to us even before the hearings began by the Canadian Daily Newspaper Association and in our wisdom, or lack of it—and you may quarrel with the judgment—we decided that it would be more useful for us to have the research papers available.

I have said many times at the start and I say again now, particularly in light of Mr. Chenoweth's comment that this hearing phase of our studies as it relates to the student paper and as it relates to the daily papers, and radio and broadcasting, and so on, is certainly not intended to be nor is it in any way an end in itself. It is simply one phase of our study which began with a research phase which is now in the hearing phase and which will conclude with the deliberate phase and each phase more valuable because of the other. No phase an end in itself. We have given from time to time serious thought of making these research papers public.

Mr. Scarth: Well, we have no idea of what you are thinking?

The Chairman: Well, you will see. We are more interested...

Mr. Scarth: Well, how can we have a dialogue if we don't know what you are thinking?

The Chairman: Well, in a very few minutes when we gradually run out of time I am going to terminate the discussion and when I do I will make a point which I will make now and repeat then, that from our point of view this has been a very, very helpful day.

Mr. Scarth: Well, I don't think you have answered the question.

The Chairman: Well, I am not the witness.

Mr. Scarth: Well, are you putting me in a subordinate position or...

The Chairman: No, I am not putting you in a subordinate position. However, it puts me in a position of not having to answer any questions.

Mr. Chenoweth: I think we should set up a newspaper committee to investigate The Special Senate Committee on Mass Media.

The Chairman: Well, I can assure you, Mr. Chenoweth, that the press has investigated the Senate fairly frequently.

Mr. Scarth: May I ask the Senators a question?

The Chairman: Yes. The question the witness is putting is he was wondering if the Senators had read student newspapers recently?

Mr. Scarth: And what do you think about the research the Senate has already done and if it could be made available to us?

The Chairman: Well, they agree with that. I don't want to put words in their mouths...

Mr. Scarth: Well, I am asking for reasons?

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Scarth, you know I want to be as generous with you as I possibly can be, but I think if you were to go around the room and ask each Senator why our research has not been made public, it wouldn't really serve the purposes of the Committee. I will simply answer for the Committee and say that in our wisdom, and you may disagree—I shouldn't say may, perhaps you do, perhaps you don't—that we have decided that our approach to these hearings will be to complete our research phase and then with our research papers as background proceed into the hearings phase. In this context, we are treating the student press no differently than we are treating the weeklies, or the ethnic press, or the farm press, or daily newspapers.

Mr. Scarth: Well, I was questioning the basic concept that all the information available should be available to everybody.

The Chairman: Well, I take note of your point, it is an interesting one, but that is not the way we are doing it. I look forward to your comments when you see—ultimately you will see the research papers and I will look forward to your comments. Senator Quart, are you going to ask a question?

Senator Quart: Yes, this is my first dip into the Committee and I was delighted to hear from the students because I wonder if you young gentlemen realize—you say that we don't read your student press. Well, I for one differ with you. First and foremost I have had three sons at McGill. I have 23 grandchildren and three great grandchildren. Now, do you realize that if your parents don't always agree with you that later on they probably will and you will be surprised by the influence you have on grandparents. I assure you—I have grandchildren in McGill, two or three in Loyola, Waterloo and I have had a graduate of Laval who dips with the press frequently and is writing a bit. When they get together like we do at various times during the year, don't imagine that the students are not heard. They are the most vocal of all the groups, so think you have a tremendous appeal.

Since I have been sitting here today I feel that you imagine that we are becoming your enemies because of the generation gap. Please don't feel like that.

Mr. Scarth: Well, I only asked the question but I haven't received an answer from the other Senators as yet.

Senator Hays: Well, I would be very pleased to receive it and I would be very pleased to pay for it.

Mr. Chenoweth: If anyone would like subscription I told David you could have one free.

Mr. Saxe: C.U.P. has one for $150.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Chenoweth, are you suggesting that there is a conscious effort on the part of newspaper editors and publishers—us talk about Montreal—a conscious effort on their part not to publish news with respect to the university?

Mr. Chenoweth: I do not think it is a conscious effort not to publish news. I just do not think that news at the university in the minds—what constitutes news in the university is such a minor level, you know, such as the appointment of a new principal. There is a point if I may deal with a particular case. McGill is supposed to appoint a new principal and you sir, if I am not mistaken, were appointed to the Board of Governors. Was it you that was appointed to the Board of Governors?

Mr. Fortier: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Chenoweth: Let us take the point of the principal.

The Chairman: You have been appointed to the Board of Governors of McGill?

Mr. Fortier: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chenoweth: From our editorial this morning—you are calling for a principals' poll on the principal question?

Mr. Fortier: I was not appointed because I read the McGill Daily.

Mr. Chenoweth: This principalship is of massive importance to McGill and Quebec. Obviously, this is the man who is about to deal with Quebec universities probably for the next decade and we all know what this is going to mean. I have yet to see one article in the professional type press examining what is needed, asking the student opinion over what is needed of looking into what McGill should be looking for in a principal. They just quoted the fact that McGill has a new principal three or five months ago and it has been a dead issue ever since. The thing is going to affect an entire province. There is not a conscious decision, but it is simply because this is not news to the readers. This is not what they want to read because this has very little interest to most people.

Mr. Fortier: I suggest to you it would be news to the reader.

Mr. Chenoweth: Well, perchance it might be. I obviously cannot speak for readership and it might be interesting, but the point is it is not in there nor are there any remarks about looking into the new chancellery, nor is the fact been presented in any viable form in the Montreal press. At McGill University the students are represented at almost all levels and there is now a student on the board of Governors. That one point has been totally ignored. This has raised a great heated discussion about tokenism and all this has been ignored.

Mr. Fortier: A student appointed by the senate?

Mr. Chenoweth: That is right. The nature of all this has been ignored. I would not condemn them because I don't think it is deliberate but this is not in a normal sector and is not what they have been told to cover. I don't know why. Maybe you can tell me why they don't cover it. I won't condemn it, because I enjoy working for newspapers.

Mr. Fortier: I was just going to say you have worked on newspapers, I never have.

Mr. Chenoweth: Well, I have worked on newspapers in Montreal. I am not party to this decision.

Mr. Fortier: Well, you may have heard people comment within the newspaper as to why it is that they do not consider it worthy news?

21437—5½

Mr. Chenoweth: Mr. Fortier, these decisions are made on priorities and whether you are a newspaperman with the responsibility of presenting news which involves the world, Canada, province to city, the university often falls lowest because this involves your whole concept of society. It may be due to the fact that an awful lot of the senior men are not university graduates, because of the nature of the press in the thirties and forties. The press was more of a craft and not of professional journalism, and even now it does not really exist as an academic field in Canada. The number of journalism schools I think you can count on one hand. They are undeniably—well, in my opinion, very poor. Most paper editors I have spoken to would rather have a kid who has a general liberal arts B.A. to work on a paper than anybody from Carleton or Ryerson.

Mr. Fortier: Did you say that you editorialized on the appointment of a principal yesterday in The Daily?

Mr. Chenoweth: They were calling for a principalship poll amongst the students and we were putting up certain candidates—not putting up the student council suggested list of candidates—we were writing these men asking them what they thought should be required of the principalship, and if the council did not hold it, for The Daily to hold it.

Mr. Fortier: As you know, there are some students on the committee—sitting on the committee now.

Mr. Chenoweth: Well, as you well know, sir, or may know, they are boycotting it.

Mr. Smith: I have a question which I was going to ask at this point.

The Chairman: Well, again Mr. Smith we will attempt to answer it subject only to the fact that you are a witness. We are not, you know, and those are the ground rules, but by all means go ahead.

Mr. Smith: It is based on two things on what Mr. Scarth was saying and on something you, yourself, said, Senator Davey, this morning. You said that you have here a fair cross section of the university press. I am curious to know on what grounds the papers were selected because, in fact, you don't have a fair cross section of the university press. You have three of the largest papers in Canada and one of the smallest. I am sort of curious to know on what basis these were selected?

The Chairman: Well, I have an answer to that if you will let me find it and I will let Mr. Thomas give an answer.

Mr. Thomas: I just wanted to take exception to the picture that Mr. Chenoweth has presented about the coverage of the university affairs in the City of Montreal. I do know for a fact that the Montreal Star has five members of the newsroom staff who covers university matters almost exclusively. In addition, there are many feature articles by senior staff writers about basic issues that have been developing within the various universities within the city over the past two or three years. I think the pages opposite the editorial pages has—particularly the Montreal Star—have regular features and in-depth articles by local, national and international writers, largely from within the field of higher education. I think the French press through Le Devoir and La Presse are to a considerable degree well tuned into campus events. The fact that the Board of Governors does have a student now was covered in a significant way by television, radio and the Montreal Star and the Gazette. I think that—you know, as a matter of fact as far as we are concerned, and I know my experience at McGill and my relationship with the information office is that we have a fantastic amount of work to keep up with press inquiries and providing documentation and background material to reporters and people who are working on the development of material of various sorts for the university. I don't think the impression should be given here that at least in the Montreal situation—and I certainly can't speak for other situations in other cities in different parts of Canada—but I think the universities are quite well served in terms of coverage of news events. In fact, some complaints are being received by the Montreal Star that it has given too much coverage to what the people might consider as non-news things and the internal workings of the university. So, I just wanted to say that for the record.

The Chairman: Mr. Chenoweth?

Mr. Chenoweth: In my terms, the type of news I am dealing with, the last person that I think the reporter should come to speak to is the information officer at the information office at McGill Administration. The type of news that I was talking about is the news in the student area, of students' concern, and I think to myself why in the hell don't they come and speak to us.

Secondly, the news fact alone—you must admit that they have articles on irrelevant things. A news article on page 48 is not the same as an article on page 7. The only analysis I have seen on the university environment has been in the Saturday Star in the editorial section which is an entire section on analysis on everything under the sun, and I have a feeling that most people don't read it because it is just a waste—not waste, just so much in it. It is where you put something that counts. Maybe we should say “Well, does it deserve the priority we are giving it”, which is a point of argument.

Mr. Thomas: Just to answer you on the point of the function of the information service—this is something that was not discussed today. Really, the reporter does not rely on the information office for interpreting. What the information officer does is direct or attempt to direct reporters to people, who can comment on the things that were discussed, and certainly to get the student point of view is something that is always stressed in the McGill information setup.

The Chairman: Well gentlemen—I go back to your question, Mr. Smith. You asked me earlier about how the people were chosen and I have a note which I was going to read this morning as I rather expected the question would come earlier on. If I could read:

“The McGill Daily was selected as a newspaper in which the editor was replaced by council due to the style of newspaper wanted on campus. The McGill Daily is produced on campus where an administration press also exists.

The St. Mary's Journal was chosen because it was an activist newspaper from eastern Canada which has an editor who is involved as a participant or an observer in conflict with the administration point of view. A paper widely read on campus and whose side is representative of 18 of 55 student papers of campuses with 2,000 or below enrolment.

The Gateway was chosen as an activist newspaper from western Canada which has moved this fall from a triweekly to a daily publication.

The University of Western Ontario Gazette was chosen to replace Bob Verdun of the Chevron who was replaced by a student council at the university of Waterloo. We made this particular replacement at the suggestion of Mr. Stewart Saxe who is the president of CUP.

We asked Le Quartier Latin, the French language student press in the province of Quebec, whose readership is within the student community and has active political views. They of course didn't come as you know.

The McGill Reporter, an administrative produced newspaper with an important publishing purpose serving as an alternative to the student media and a second purpose of meeting broader goals than those handled by the student press and presenting to a wider community.

The University of Toronto, the News and the Bulletins were chosen, because they were administration-produced journals serving to inform of activities at the University and produced as an alternative to the student publication.

The Laval University Information office was chosen as an alternative to the French Language Carabin in the Province of Quebec.

And finally the Canadian University Press is representative of the co-operative news agency of 85 per cent of the student newspapers in Canada."

I have a footnote if I may, Mr. Saxe. We understand that no one that has been invited speaks for other than themselves and not for the university or not necessarily for the particular press or organization of which he is a part.

I think, Mr. Saxe, I made that clear this morning or at least I tried to.

Mr. Saxe: Mr. Chairman, just because it is a matter of record, I think I should read the following.

The Chairman: By all means.

Mr. Saxe:

"In accordance with the by-laws of the Federation of Students University of Waterloo Incorporated and the statement and principles of Canadian University Press, the staff of the Chevron the student newspaper at the University of Waterloo petitioned the Canadian University Press to institute the investigation commission on a procedure that is mentioned here in our by-laws and is in there as a safeguard for our editors, newspaper publishers, a group of newspapers who feel that the statement of principles of Canadian University Press had been violated by a paper."

Now, in accordance with that the staff petitioned the national executive and asked for an investigation commission to investigate alleged violations or the statement of principles by Mr. Verdun at the time he was editor of the Chevron.

Now, the Canadian University Press instituted the investigation in accordance with the by-laws and at the beginning of the investigation Mr. Verdun saw fit to voluntarily resign as editor of the Chevron. The investigation in itself had no provokial powers since it was also in accordance with the statement and principles of the Canadian University Press. We believe that an editor should be fired only by the people who hired him and at the University of Waterloo that is a combination of the staff of the student newspaper and indeed the student council.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Saxe.

Well, I think we will terminate by having Mr. Scarth, Mr. Thompson, Mr. Fortier, Mr. Saxe, then I think that will be the end, I believe. Mr. Scarth?

Mr. Scarth: There is one basic point. It is a small point but I would like to mention it. Student newspapers at least in one province, my own, and I believe in two other provinces, are not allowed to carry advertising for—basically what we call the tribunal—that is the Provincial Liquor Board. I think it is a question which is worth looking into and I could send you some information on the five year fight that has been going on at the University of Alberta. They do it basically on the basis—they say it is a young readership. Considering it is a specialized readership, and the average age in our university now is about 21, I think they should take all the advertising of liquor out of the Edmonton Journal.

The second point is—I have read in the press criticism that there weren't enough reporters and people who were doing the actual day-to-day work coming before the commission. It was stated that you were basically taking your views from the publishers and editors, and I know from my own personal experience on the Edmonton Journal that is a long way off. I was wondering whether or not there were reporters coming before the commission?

The Chairman: Yes. We have had several groups of reporters before our Committee already representative of the Society of Professional Journalists. We had an English speaking group from Quebec and we had an English speaking group from the Canadian group. We had a group of French speaking reporters from the French Society of Professional Journalists, and we have had a number of groups of reporters. We are always anxious to obtain more news from the members of the working press and if I may just add to what Mr. Fortier said, if you would be good enough to send us the information on liquor advertising because that is not the first time that that matter has been raised, we would be very interested to hear from you.

Mr. Thompson?

Mr. Thompson: I would like to make some perhaps more personal comments or remarks and I will start off by saying to Senator Hays that I worked through college and my father walked ten miles to school several years because they couldn't afford a horse. So I have some sort of understanding of where that so-called social garble comes from. But regarding some of the suggestions that Mr. Chenoweth made I think the commission should—I give you my mandate to recommend whatever you can, will or wish to about changes. I would only add that I don't think that the kind of pluralism of putting a few pages of literature and making those pages available does anything to change the nature of the press. It results in the same thing that Mr. Chenoweth himself talked about. That is the fact that interesting news is being placed on the back pages in the midst of a paper that is full of advertising about capitalism and doesn't really change or evolve any free play of ideas. I would refer the commissioners to press the tolerance until it is a little more conclusive.

I think that a number of the Senators in questioning about individual events on different campuses would say is it the sort of situation on your campus, or would say is it because of the revolutionary action? Those "revolutionary actions" did not come about because of the papers or what they are saying or doing. Those come about because of the actual situations in their experience on the campuses and as evidence of this I will cite again Mr. Chenoweth's remarks, and I quote—this isn't exactly verbatim but I believe it is close. To people or readership any concrete change is challenging. They don't mind intellectual ways. That is what he said and I agree.

I think where you indicated about jobs for yourself and the McGill Daily talks about the jobs, and this is because they feel the kind of oppression. Your relationship to the university, I believe, is well summed up when you said under the academic for your years now and in a few months they will decide whether you get out of university or not. I think that is the kind of situation which is bringing about the reactions on campus. It is just a reaction against that maternalism. It isn't revolutionary. I think that the commissioners should look into the history of papers in English Canada and watch for those papers that are getting smashed by the editors of the empire and which papers are being abolished. I think this comes about in two ways. It comes about, I think, by the students deciding that the paper is irrelevant.

However, it does not come about by pressures brought about by advertisers. I think it comes about as in the case of the McGill Daily because of the fact that those people who are on the paper decide to push to the extreme their viewpoints particularly because they don't want to be on that paper any more because they feel that the university is not the correct forum to work in. The wage earners struggle and a lot of them leave and develop themselves in the community and community newspapers, and I think that is particularly the case in Quebec.

The other case comes in spite of their ineffectiveness and there is a large history of this when the newspapers start to criticize in any way whatsoever the provincial Government, the federal Government, or the university administration—especially when it starts to take the papers out in community issues and talk about such things as the university budget such as in the case of the Regina campus a year or a year and a half ago. Last fall—a move came up, the provincial Government requested the Board of Governors that they stop the paper due to criticism of the cabinet ministers and they cut off the university fees. I think these are the things we have to worry about, advertising, or grants from student councils. I think that is my closing remark, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Thank you. Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Since Mr. Saxe will close the debate, Mr. Chairman, I will direct the last question to him.

The Chairman: Well, in fairness to Mr. Saxe...

Mr. Fortier: Well, I was just wondering to whom I should direct this question and I think I should direct it to him.

The Chairman: Fine.

Mr. Fortier: Much has been said about campus magazines this morning and I would like to read from an article by John McHugh, publisher of The Campus, and the title is "The Student Press, What's Wrong?" John McHugh is managing editor of the Gazette for the University of Western Ontario.

The Constitution of the Canadian University Press states in part, and I quote:

"The major role of the student press is to act as an agent of social change striving to emphasize the right and responsibility of the student citizen."

Last year while the student press strove to accomplish this they failed as newspapers.

He goes on:

"They failed because they did not reach the mass of students who are necessary to effect any change. This is a problem when politicians run the press and with few exceptions it was politicians who ran the student press in Canada last year."

Would you care to comment on that?

Mr. Saxe: Well, I am going to comment very briefly. First of all it is something that I wanted to say all day. There is no one who doesn't hold an ideology. You, all the members of the Senate, and all of us here hold to an ideology. We practise it. We practise it in deciding what we are going to do and how we are going to do it. We have a political ideology. Unfortunately today there are some people who maybe because they don't have to exist or have to recognize exactly what they are doing. I think the student press has always been in the hands of politicians because anyone who is going to be active in their society, they could be defined by that as being a politician who is actively going to play that role. I think all reporters, all editors, all people involved in the student press are as much politicians as anybody sitting in the room. In other words there is a definition of politician—what he is actually saying is ideolize. Everyone holds to an ideology.

Mr. Fortier: Has the student press failed?

Mr. Saxe: I think we have already said that in many ways the student press has failed, but I don't think or know what else could have been done at the time. I think it is trying to learn from its failures. I think the people who are running the student press are going to learn from their failures. That is why much of our critique today may seem as far as the student press is concerned a negative critique because of much of what comes out of what we have said. Actually this is a real possibility in the student press and all of the press, because they are just not capable in the actual dynamics of what it is—printing words on paper and the transmission of communications in that way.

To be successful in the line we are talking about we say that from all experiences there is a very real possibility that that is true. I am going to say something that I think from any point of view of journalism—any journalist who has any familiarity with that article would say it was bad journalism—I think he would have said that when he was working for the Georgetown Herald where my critical views were very different.

The other side, the other group was never even asked.

Mr. Fortier: Well, we have other good articles.

Mr. Saxe: At any rate, I think that is a disappointing article.

Mr. Russell: Further on that, about this objectiveism that we are involved in and saying "You are a politician because you are doing something different from what I am doing" is the fact that further down in that article there is a section that you didn't point out which states that papers which McHugh picked out as the brightest light in Canadian journalism is precisely the McGill Daily that was recently purged.

Mr. Chenoweth: It was not purged.

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Saxe, I wonder if you could state—you said you wanted to make an announcement.

Mr. Saxe: Well, I think I said all I am going to.

Mr. Russell: Mr. Chenoweth has stated several times that they were the best newspaper in Canada but they were also the most outrageous.

Mr. Fortier: It is not such a bad article.

Mr. Saxe: At some point during the last two hours two things occurred to me. One, we didn't present a brief and I am sure in view of all the reading that has been presented to the Senate Committee has lightened the load somewhat, but I would like to return to a suggestion that it would be unlightened if indeed and surely I feel that the members have been honest in saying that they found some of the ideology which was presented today interesting.

If indeed they have found that and I have said many times that we were doomed to many kinds of shorthand. I know most of my colleagues would recommend different texts. The list of texts I would like to recommend one that I feel to a large degree could be read in substitution for our brief and I think it should be read by the Committee. This is a book by Herbert Marcuse entitled One Dimensional Man. I think this would be very, very crucial to the kind of research you are doing and the work you are doing. As a matter of fact I came very close at lunch to running down to the Classic Book Store and if they had had 29 copies I would have rushed back and said we have just published a brief. It is easily read, I think, and is cogent to many of the points that have been brought up here this afternoon.

The second thing that occurred to me is that I have some sort of economic reality as the President of Canadian University Press, so I thought I would begin the debate all over by mentioning that subscriptions are available for the Canadian University Press and that for the very, very token sum of $150 a year you can get subscriptions to our entire membership, because a subscription to all of the members comes with it. You also receive our daily news service in a weekly package. In other words we save it up and send it out all at once. If you pay more we will send it to you more regularly. Our daily news service runs about an average of six stories a day during the academic year and probably for many people who are interested in what is happening at university it is at last a good source of some information. Even the University of Toronto Information Office subscribes to it.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Saxe. Mr. Chenoweth?

Mr. Chenoweth: I just wanted to rewrite three points. I just wanted to make sure and say that there is no conspiracy in the Montreal press. Nor the university press. I just think that it is an unfortunate situation which could be improved and secondly I want to agree with Stewart Saxe that the Canadian Press is political. This is a great thing because it should be political. The only question is that some of them are effective and some of them are ineffective. I think you might well consider what is an effective press and I believe you might have some additional hearings on it to give it some thought.

Thirdly, I think a subscription to the Canadian University Press would be a great idea for the Senators.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Honourable Senators, if I may thank our guests on your behalf—Mr. Villeneuve, Mr. Russell, Mr. Thompson, Mr. Saxe, Mr. Jones, Mr. Chenoweth, Mr. Scott, Mr. Smith, Mr. Searth and Mr. Thomas.

I would close by saying that I am in a sense disappointed that Mr. Saxe referred to a second ago on what was going on here as a debate. Somewhat earlier on this side of the table there was reference to an investigation of the student press, and I assure you, Mr. Saxe, and whoever it was that made reference to the investigation, that this is neither a debate nor an investigation. It is a study and it will only be meaningful if it includes some examination of the role and function of the student press in the board media spectrum. My disappointment is at least offset by some modest delight at leaving the room feeling perhaps something like a right winger. This is a new experience for me and it is rather an interesting situation.

I must say in candor that you have given us whether you intended to or whether you wanted to—I am sure you have wanted to—but you have given us I think a great insight and a good working insight into not only the student press but the student community at large. As well I must also say that your attitudes towards the mass media and the attitudes of most of you to the mass media in Canada has brought to the Committee's attention a set of views which often—up to this point at least we haven't had put forward, so we are grateful for that. I must sincerely think you all. I might say to any of you that if you have any additional thoughts or information or ideas that you would care to send them along, we would very much appreciate it. The hearing phase of our study will go on until mid-April. We would be delighted to hear from you. The committee adjourned.

Second Session—Twenty-eighth Parliament

1969-70

THE SENATE OF CANADA

PROCEEDINGS

OF THE

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE

ON

MASS MEDIA

The Honourable KEITH DAVEY, Chairman

No. 18

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1970

WITNESSES:

Canada Ethnic Press Federation: Dr. J. M. Kirschbaum, LL.D., Ph.D., President; Mr. Charles E. Dojak, Immediate Past President; Mr. Lech W. Mokrzycki, Advertising Consultant; Mr. Vladimir Mauko, Secretary.

Canadian Scene: Mrs. Barbara Osler, President; Miss Ruth G. Gordon, Editor; Mr. John Gellner, Vice-President; Mrs. Douglas Jennings, Vice-President; Mr. Trevor Hamill, Director.

Dr. Stanley Haidasz, Member of Parliament (Parkdale).

Mr. Charles Caccia, Member of Parliament (Davenport).

Canadian Business Press: Mr. Gabriel Marchand, President; Mr. George Mansfield, General Manager; Mr. Aubrey Joel, Vice-President; Mr. J. V. Deragon, Committee Member.

Business Press Editors Association: Mr. W. Bruce Glassford, President; Mr. Gilles Véronneau, Immediate Past President; Mr. Barry Kay, Chairman, Toronto Chapter; Mr. George Keefe, First Vice-President; Mrs. Doreen Sanders, Director; Mr. Alan Hewittson, Director.

Post Office Department: Honourable Eric Kierans, Postmaster General; Mr. F. Pageau, Director of Postal Rates and Classifications; Mr. G. M. Sinclair, Assistant Deputy Minister (Finance and Administration); Mr. William Houle, President, Canadian Union of Postal Workers.

MEMBERS OF THE
SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA

The Honourable Keith Davey, Chairman

The Honourable L. P. Beaubien, Deputy Chairman

Beaubien
Bourque
Davey
Everett
Hays

Langlois	Prowse
Macdonald (Cape Breton)	Quart
McElman	Smith
Petten	Sparrow
Phillips (Prince)	Welch

(15 members)

Quorum 5

ORDERS OF REFERENCE

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Wednesday, October 29th, 1969.

With leave of the Senate,
The Honourable Senator Davey moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lang:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to consider and report upon the ownership and control of the major means of mass public communication in Canada, in particular, and without restricting the generality of the foregoing, to examine and report upon the extent and nature of their impact and influence on the Canadian public, to be known as the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media;

That the Committee have power to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry;

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have power to sit during adjournments of the Senate and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation to this Special Committee from 9th to 18th December, 1969, both inclusive, and the Committee have power to sit during sittings of the Senate for that period;

That the papers and evidence received and taken on the subject in the preceding session be referred to the Committee; and

That the Committee be composed of the Honourable Senators Beaubien, Davey, Everett, Giguère, Hays, Irvine, Langlois, Macdonald (Cape Breton), McElman, Petten, Prowse, Sparrow, Urquhart, White and Willis.

After debate, and—

The question being put on the motion, it was—

Resolved in the affirmative.

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Thursday, November 6th, 1969.

With leave of the Senate,
The Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Smith:

That the names of the Honourable Senators Giguère and Urquhart be removed from the list of Senators serving on the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media; and

That the names of the Honourable Senators Bourque, Smith and Welch be added to the list of Senators serving on the said Special Committee.

The question being put on the motion, it was—
Resolved in the affirmative.

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Thursday, December 18th, 1969.

With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Smith:

That Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation to the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media from 20th to 30th January, 1970, and that the Committee have power to sit during sittings of the Senate for that period.

After debate, and—
The question being put on the motion, it was—
Resolved in the affirmative, on division.

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Friday, December 19th, 1969.

With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Langlois:

That the names of the Honourable Senators Bélisle and Phillips (Prince) be substituted for those of the Honourable Senators Welch and White on the list of Senators serving on the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media.

The question being put on the motion, it was—
Resolved in the affirmative.

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Tuesday, February 3, 1970.

With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Langlois:

That Rule 76 (4) be suspended in relation to the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media from 10th to 19th February, 1970, both inclusive, and that the Committee have power to sit during sittings of the Senate for that period.

After debate, and—
The question being put on the motion, it was—
Resolved in the affirmative.

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Thursday, February 5, 1970.

With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Haig:

That the names of the Honourable Senators Quart and Welch be substituted for those of the Honourable Senators Bélisle and Willis on the list of Senators serving on the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media.

The question being put on the motion, it was—

Resolved in the affirmative.

ROBERT FORTIER,
Clerk of the Senate.

MINUTES OF PROCEEDINGS

WEDNESDAY, February 11, 1970
(18)

Pursuant to adjournment and notice the Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 10.00 a.m.

Present: The Honourable Senators: Davey, (Chairman); Beaubien, Hays, Macdonald (Cape Breton), Petten, Quart, Smith and Sparrow. (8)

In attendance: Miss Marianne Barrie, Director and Administrator; Mr. Borden Spears, Executive Consultant; Mr. Yves Fortier, Counsel.

The following witnesses were heard:

Dr. J. M. Kirschbaum, LL.D., Ph.D., President, Canada Ethnic Press Federation;

Mr. Charles E. Dojak, Immediate Past President, Canada Ethnic Press Federation;

Mr. Lech W. Mokrzycki, President, New Canadian Publications, Advertising Consultant to Canada Ethnic Press Federation;

Mr. Vladimir Mauko, Editor of Slovenska Drzava, Secretary, Canada Ethnic Press Federation;

Mrs. Barbara Osler, President, Canadian Scene;

Miss Ruth G. Gordon, Editor, Canadian Scene;

Mr. John Gellner, Vice-President, Canadian Scene;

Mrs. Douglas Jennings, Vice-President, Canadian Scene;

Mr. Trevor Hamill, Director, Canadian Scene;

Dr. Stanley Haidasz, Member of Parliament (Parkdale);

Mr. Charles Caccia, Member of Parliament (Davenport).

At 1.10 p.m. the Committee adjourned to 2.30 p.m.

At 2.40 p.m. the Committee resumed.

Present: The Honourable Senators: Davey, (Chairman); Beaubien, Everett, Langlois, Macdonald (Cape Breton), Petten, Quart, Smith and Sparrow. (9)

In attendance: Miss Marianne Barrie, Director and Administrator; Mr. Borden Spears, Executive Consultant; Miss Nicola Kendall, Research Director; Mr. Yves Fortier, Counsel.

The following witnesses were heard:

Mr. Gabriel Marchand, President, Canadian Business Press;

Mr. George Mansfield, General Manager, Canadian Business Press;

Mr. Aubrey Joel, Vice-President, Canadian Business Press;

Mr. Jack Deragon, Committee Member, Canadian Business Press; Vice-President, Marketing, National Business Publications;

Mr. W. Bruce Glassford, President, Business Press Editors Association;

Mr. Gilles Verronneau, Immediate Past President, Business Press Editors Association;

Mr. G. Barry Kay, Chairman, Toronto Chapter, Business Editors Association;

Mr. George Keefe, First Vice-President, Business Press Editors Association;

Mrs. Doreen Sanders, Director, Business Press Editors Association;

Mr. Alan Hewittson, Director, Business Press Editors Association.

At 6.00 p.m. the Committee adjourned to 8.00 p.m.

At 8.00 p.m. the Committee resumed.

Present: The Honourable Senators: Davey, (Chairman); Beaubien, Everett, Langlois, Macdonald (Cape Breton), Petten, Quart and Sparrow. (8)

In attendance: Miss Marianne Barrie, Director and Administrator; Mr. Borden Spears, Executive Consultant; Miss Nicola Kendall, Director of Research; Mr. Yves Fortier, Counsel.

The following witnesses were heard:

The Honourable Eric Kierans, Minister of Communications and Postmaster General;

Mr. G. M. Sinclair, Assistant Deputy Postmaster General (Finance and Administration);

Mr. F. Pageau, Director, Postal Rates and Classification Branch, Post Office Department;

Mr. William Houle, President, Canadian Union of Postal Workers.

At 10.30 p.m. the Committee adjourned to Thursday, February 12, 1970, at 10.30 a.m.

ATTEST:

Denis Bouffard,
Clerk of the Committee.

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Wednesday, February 11, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 10:00 a.m.

Senator Keith Davey (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, I might call the meeting to order, please. This morning, we move to yet another significant area of the Canadian mass media structure; particularly we turn to a study of the ethnic press, and this morning we are going to receive a presentation from the Canadian Ethnic Press Federation, followed later this morning by a presentation from Canadian Scene. I should say to the Senators and to our guests that although we are examining the ethnic press in the hearing phase of our study this morning only, you should realize, as I think you do, Doctor and gentlemen, that we have prepared a great deal of background information and done a great deal of background research on the ethnic press generally. This information is available to the Committee, and I think you are familiar with some of this research, and ultimately we are hopeful that this information, which, I think, is in the public interest will be made available.

At the same time, the research papers are not, by any stretch of the imagination, ends in themselves, and they become far more meaningful because of the presence here of people like yourselves.

If I could introduce our guests: sitting on my immediate right is Dr. J. M. Kirschbaum, who is the President of the Canada Ethnic Press Federation, and serves on the editorial board of "Kanadsky Slovak".

Sitting on my immediate left is the Secretary of the Ethnic Press Federation, Mr. Ladimir Mauko who is as well the editor of "Slovenska Drzava".

At the right end of the table is the Immediate Past President of the Canada Ethnic Press Federation. That is Mr. Charles E. Dojack. Dr. Dojack is from Winnipeg, and publishes a group of Ukrainian newspapers, and at the left end of the table is Mr. Lech Mokrzycki, who is an advertising consultant in the area of the ethnic press generally. In particular, he is here today as a part of the presentation from the Federation.

Dr. Kirschbaum, if I may speak to you first as President, the briefs we requested were received some three weeks in advance as we required. They have been circulated to the Senators, and generally they have been studied, and I think for purposes of our discussion this morning, we can take your brief as read.

At the same time, I am now able to offer you ten, twelve, fifteen minutes—I won't say as much time as you need, but that long if you need it. You needn't feel that you must use all of that time but you may to summarize the contents of your brief, to expand upon it, to explain it or anything else which may be on your mind.

Following that, the Senators will put questions to you, which will deal with the contents of your brief or with your oral comments. Indeed, they may wish your views on matters which you do not raise either in your brief or in your oral statements. If, at the time of the question period, there are questions you wish, in turn, to direct to any of your colleagues, you will be free to do so.

Dr. J. M. Kirschbaum (President, Canada Ethnic Press Federation): Mr. Chairman, Honourable Senators, Ladies and Gentlemen: I didn't prepare a separate statement, but I am very pleased to have the opportunity to make a few remarks on the ethnic press.

As we stated in our brief, the ethnic press was serving the various communities for more than eighty years until now, and there are over one hundred newspapers in about eighteen languages published across Canada.

We have some similar problems to the rest of Canadian mass media, but we have also specific problems because our press serves a community which is a little different, at least in the first years of immigration, from the general Canadian public.

Until now, the ethnic newspapers were published mostly by the sacrifice of editors, publishers, which are mostly the fraternal organizations, and, of course, by contributors.

Probably only the ethnic press is published without paying anyone for contributions.

The other feature of the ethnic press is that, of course, it has to deal not only with Canadian matters, which at the present time, most of the papers give a large percentage of their coverage, but with the matters which any other Canadian paper doesn't deal with.

It deals with the problems of various communities. In addition to it, there are many times problems of the country of origin, because there are, of course, still people who couldn't forget where they were born; and especially in the Second World War, many Canadians, who are naturalized Canadians, were under Soviet rule. The people in ethnic groups and the editors of ethnic newspapers feel that it is their duty towards their country of origin, as well as their duty towards Canada to fight for freedom, for democracy, as we understand it here in this country.

Then, this press has a special mission, and it is actually a mission to serve the community here which cannot be reached or be reached only partly by either the English or French papers. The second mission is to help the countries or the struggle of the countries who are not free or who have different systems than democracy to achieve freedom and democracy.

Most of the papers started in a very modest way by sacrifices of a few individuals, and, of course, if the community is large like the Ukrainian, Polish or recently Italian, then there are many papers, and some of them are six to eight pages; some are weeklies; some are twice a week; some are monthlies. All together, there are hundreds and hundreds of publications in ethnic languages, but with what we call "newspapers", it is about hundred and twenty across Canada.

Now, the readership is very hard to determine because it is a sort of family paper. Then, we can guess quite seriously that about two million people read the ethnic press; some only the ethnic press. The percentage again is very hard to determine.

There are studies. Professor Richmond published a book on this subject where it is indicated that in some communities up to sixty-five per cent read only the ethnic press. In other communities of course, the percentage is different because some groups have been here for a long time like, for instance, Ukrainians, Poles, Slovaks and so on. They started to move to Canada in the 1880's, and started to publish their papers right after their arrival.

Also, many American papers in ethnic languages were coming here. This problem was studied, but we didn't come to any exact figures on how many people read the ethnic papers and are influenced.

Now, the mission of the ethnic press towards this country is primarily to introduce the country to the newcomer, to make him acquainted with the laws and customs of this country, to help to integrate him into the Canadian nation.

This service, sometimes in the past, was overlooked, and the editors and publishers of the ethnic press complained in the past many times that they didn't receive adequate help in comparison with the service they did to the community and to Canada.

Especially recently, there are problems which probably can hit the ethnic press very hard because the cost is rising. As I mentioned, about eighty per cent of the ethnic press is published by organizations who contribute, but the members are against increasing subscriptions. The editors are less idealistic than they were in the beginning to work for nothing or for very little pay.

Then, the ethnic press goes through serious problems, especially since the increase of postal rates, and since the decrease of government advertising in the ethnic press.

The ethnic editors and publishers would like to say to this Committee that the first purpose of the ethnic press at the moment is to serve Canada, to help a large segment of Canada's population to become better Canadians, to take part in the public life in Canada; but, of course, it is expected that the various government departments and government agencies would help this press to survive.

There are many newspapers who can survive because they have behind them large and financially quite rich organizations, but there are many papers who are really now published only because of the sacrifice of the editor who sometimes works in a factory or in some other business during the day, and makes his paper at night or on Saturdays and his community is very small, especially the educated part of the ethnic group. You know that until about 1950, Canada did not admit any educated people from other than Great Britain or France—then of course, we have either first or second-generation of Canadian-born people who many times don't read or write in their mother tongue, or we have now mostly editors who came after the Second World War who are educated in Europe, and who, of course, at this time, would expect to be paid properly for their job, especially since they are convinced that they perform a service to Canada. If the Government on various levels had to do the service to the ethnic community which now is about twenty-six to twenty-eight per cent of Canadian population, it would cost much more than the ethnic press has received until now from any government of this country.

This problem is quite serious, especially since last year, and we were asked by the delegation here to mention this to Senate Committee.

As far as the ideological polarization of the ethnic press is concerned, of course, we have ninety-nine per cent of the press which is on the side of democracy. There are a few papers who side with communist regimes in their country of origin, and they are not members of our Federation or regional association.

There is a very similar polarization to the Canadian press, but still there are some differences. Of course, the editors educated in Europe and still taking an interest in the problems of their country of origin, there are many times you can say the polarization is closer to the press than it was before the Second World War in Poland or in Czechoslovakia or in Yugoslavia and so on.

It means the press doesn't follow the Canadian pattern, Liberal, Conservative, NDP or Communist. We have some who side with Communists, but it is not the exact pattern the press follows, but it is democratic up to ninety-nine per cent.

Now, another feature of the ethnic press is, of course, that it tries also to educate. It is not only an information press, either on Canadian matters or on the matters of the country of origin, but they still try to keep alive the traditions of their country of origin, the culture, the literature. There are many who are writers, who publish books and poetry in their mother tongue in this country.

There is a problem, of course, how to look at this literature, which is extensive. Is it a part of Canadian literature or is it a part of Polish or Ukrainian or Italian literature? We are inclined, as Canadians, that it should be considered as a part of Canadian literature, but from the Canadian side, there was no claim until now on this literature either in book form or published in newspapers, magazines, almanacs and so on.

Now, besides newspapers or weeklies, bi-weeklies or we have even dailies, there are, of course, in the ethnic press, almanacs and there are magazines. There are papers which are devoted just to literature and to education.

These papers also face big problems now, and the reason besides the rising cost and the little advertising and the rising postal rates, is the general cost of life and claims of the editors and publishers to be paid properly. We cannot claim to be paid as well as Canadian editors or correspondents or people employed in mass media like radio and television.

We know that the situation for the ethnic groups is quite different, but the problem is here.

This would be a few remarks I would like to make in introduction of the brief. I would just add that I only did the brief in answer to the questions on a Canadian Press Council.

The Chairman: Yes.

Dr. Kirschbaum: We discussed the problem, and, of course, we feel that especially during the past decade in the Canadian mass media, there were tendencies which were not very much liked by many of the ethnic groups, especially as far as the moral side is concerned—sexual problems and religious problems. Also there is a feeling that very often that the Canadian press—there are exceptions—generally it goes after sensations.

There is a feeling that if a body can be organized which would somehow regulate this trend without, of course, limiting the freedom of the press—if there is a body which could help even in the ethnic press or any other press to settle problems of attacks on persons or on groups, which sometimes should be libel suits—but of course, as I say, the ethnic people don't have ten or twenty thousand dollars to deposit with a lawyer to defend their honour—if such a body, and I did some reading on the British Press Council, could be organized, then we except for our group in the West who didn't feel that we should be part of such body, we think it should be organized.

We in Ontario, and the majority of the press is in Ontario—we would be for such a council, but we don't think that there should be a special council for the ethnic press. We feel that we should be treated with the rest of the Canadian mass media, with a little special regard for the functions and the situation of the ethnic press which I tried to outline there in my remarks or in the brief.

Now, since I speak only on behalf of the Ethnic Press Federation, I omitted to mention that there are many radio programmes in ethnic languages. In this regard the ethnic groups have problems because many stations simply started to stop renewing programmes in ethnic languages either in Quebec or in Ontario, and of course, there is no TV in ethnic languages and ethnic groups appear only on the invitation of either CBC or other TV media.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Dr. Kirschbaum. I think you have covered many of the points. We are delighted that you did.

As I said, if you wish to pass on any of the questions to any of your colleagues, please feel free to do so, or if the Senators wish to direct a question of any of Dr. Kirschbaum's colleagues, they should feel free to do so.

I think Senator Sparrow is the first questioner this morning.

Senator Sparrow: Dr. Kirschbaum, you made reference—you felt there were two million readers. Canadian Scene is making a presentation later today and they refer in their brief to a circulation of about seven hundred and fifty thousand, with three million readers. How would those figures compare with yours?

Dr. Kirschbaum: Now, I said it is a guess, because our papers are mostly family papers, and we know that family newspapers are read, but not all read the paper in the family; for instance, my children don't, or not all of them. Then, it is a guess.

I think they are as close to the figure as we are. Now, we were rather modest as is perhaps our advertising expert, when he said probably we should put two million, but it is between two and three. It depends, of course on the group. It is hard to say, because there is no direct study.

As far as the circulation is concerned again we cannot give exact figures. Our guess is up to one million because not all papers disclose exactly what is the circulation, but from our studies, during the years, our sincere and honest guess is about one million.

Senator Sparrow: Two million, one million?

Dr. Kirschbaum: One million circulation and over two million readers.

Senator Sparrow: I see. Are there press clubs within the ethnic press? I understand there is one in Winnipeg.

Mr. Charles E. Dojack, Immediate Past President, Canada Ethnic Press Federation: Yes, we have a Canada Press Club in Winnipeg. We made a submission at the request of Senator Davey. I don't know if you got it.

The Chairman: Yes, we did.

Mr. Dojack: These were merely observations as submitted, because we realized that the Federation was making a proper brief and rather than present an additional brief we presented observations.

In our introduction, we mentioned that the Canada Press Club of Winnipeg was formed in 1942, during the War, in an effort to coordinate the ethnic papers and the war cause and from there developed a wider range of an ethnic press organization, and to the development of an ethnic press federation, and there are ethnic press clubs in British Columbia. There is the British Columbia Ethnic Press Association. There is the Ethnic Press Association of Quebec. There's about eight members in Montreal, and there are about ten members in B.C. In Winnipeg, we have about thirty-eight members in our Ethnic Press Club, and I think there would be about forty or forty-five in Toronto, the Ontario Ethnic Press Association.

Our press club in Winnipeg did not support the formation of a Press Council; however, we did stipulate that should, however, such Council be formed, its effectiveness as far as the ethnic press is concerned, would depend on the Federation participation in the deliberations and decisions of such a Council.

The reason for that was that we felt the problems of the ethnic press were somewhat different than the English and French press in Canada.

The approach could be made with deliberation with the member or representative from the Ethnic Press Federation.

The Chairman: Just supplementary Senator Sparrow, what is exactly the real tionship between these clubs and the Federation? Are all the clubs members of the Federation?

Mr. Dojack: Oh, yes, we are all members of the Federation. The Federation is the national body and the individual press associations are localized with their individual problems, and we work very closely with the Federation.

By the way, it is interesting:—amongst ethnic groups, it is the only organization in Canada where you will find Chinese press, Japanese, Jewish, German, Ukrainian, Polish—all ethnic groups working together.

It's a unique organization in that regard. There is no other organization in Canada where you will find all these ethnic groups working together for a common cause of building a stronger and more unified Canada.

Senator Sparrow: You mentioned Chinese press. Have you Chinese press in your Federation?

Mr. Dojack: Yes, we have a Director, Mr. Roy Mah, who is one of the Vice-Presidents of our Federation, the publisher and editor of the 'Chinatown News'.

Senator Sparrow: Do you associate the ethnic press with the other newspaper associations, such as the Publishers' Association or the Editor's Association?

Dr. Kirschbaum: Now, no special association with them—we are still independent or we are alone.

Mr. Dojack: The individual publications could be.

Dr. Kirschbaum: Yes, but they are special association or regional clubs. We have no special ties, but individual publishers, of course, have.

Senator Sparrow: You have some individual publishers that belong?

Mr. Dojack: Oh, yes.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow, I don't think, has taken the answer. Your question is: o they have individual publishers who belong to the CDNPA or the Managing Editors' Conference? I don't think you do.

Dr. Kirschbaum: Not in Ontario.

Mr. Dojack: There are some members who belong to the Canadian Newspaper Association or the Manitoba Weekly Newspaper Association or the Winnipeg Press Club, but they have no association, to my knowledge, with the Canadian Publishers' Association.

The Chairman: With the exception, presumably, of Corriere Canadese? Is it a member of the Federation? He is also a member of the CDNPA, I think.

Dr. Kirschbaum: There may be some individuals.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow.

Senator Sparrow: What about Jewish-English-language newspapers? Are they a part of your group?

Mr. Dojack: Oh, yes.

Dr. Kirschbaum: If I may, it is the only exception. According to our by-laws, we include only papers published in other than English and French, but the Jewish paper, even if published in English, was admitted to the press club in Winnipeg, and the publisher is first Vice-President of the Federation.

Mr. Dojack: He publishes in English.

Dr. Kirschbaum: The Toronto Jewish newspaper didn't ask for membership. They are not, but in Winnipeg, they are members of the Federation.

Mr. Dojack: We have three Jewish papers that are members. One is published in Yiddish. The others are in English.

Senator Sparrow: They are the only English-language newspapers, then?

Mr. Dojack: No, there are some others. There is the 'Icelandic Quarterly'. It's published in the English language. There might be some others, but their basic trend and their interpretation and their audience is all of that ethnic group.

Senator Sparrow: You made reference, and I am not so sure I follow it, to having done no studies or little study on your readership, and you referred to Professor Richmond having done a study. When was that study? When did that study take place? Do you know?

Dr. Kirschbaum: Our own studies or the Richmond studies?

Senator Sparrow: Professor Richmond's study.

Dr. Kirschbaum: He published his book—I think I put it into the brief—in '66, if I am not mistaken. If I am not mistaken the book was published before the Centennial Year.

Senator Sparrow: But you, as a group, have done no studies?

Dr. Kirschbaum: No, we published the last thing about six years ago, a study on the ethnic press. In the meantime, we ask at every biennial meeting about the situation, but it is not a scholarly study. But six years ago, we published general information on the ethnic press and we gave approximate numbers and names of publishers and editors and so on. That is a published study, but it was six years ago, the last one, and at different general meetings, we discussed our problems and of course we could gather some information.

Senator Sparrow: In our studies and in your brief, I believe in your brief, you say that new immigrants tend to keep the ethnic press alive. Is this a correct statement: that you require these new Canadians to keep it alive. Maybe at the same time when you answer, would you have an idea what the life expectancy for readership of a new Canadian would be? Would they disappear within a year or two years?

Dr. Kirschbaum: It would be very hard to say, but just logically since the Second World War, the number of papers increased to a degree that even papers who expected to die were enlarged and new papers in various groups were established and published. For the first time now we have, for instance, an Italian daily; and the German press has increased considerably, as has the Polish press since the Second World War.

Then, certainly the influx of immigrants after the Second World War prolonged the life and new papers, like Portuguese, for instance, started because Canada admitted Portuguese immigrants. We even had some attempts at admitting a paper published by people from India, and it was not done before.

Then, certainly the influx of immigrants not only prolonged the life, but caused the increase of newspapers to a great degree after the Second World War. Now if the Spanish immigration continues, certainly there will be a Spanish newspaper. For instance, Canada admitted many thousands of Slovaks and Czechs after the Soviet occupation. Now, there is a new paper in Toronto since that time. There is no doubt that if immigrants will come here, they will prolong the life of many of the existing papers or new papers will be published. At least the experience of this twenty years since the end of the war warrants this statement.

Senator Sparrow: Very good.

The Chairman: Are you going to return to this question of facts and figures? May I ask a question. I would like to put it to Mr. Mokrzycki. We are old friends so you won't mind me asking you a very unpleasant question. I think you can answer it. I think the Committee would be most interested in the answer.

You are one of the chief people selling national advertisers on using the ethnic press. You are one of the most important people in this area in the country. It must be enormously difficult trying to sell advertising to the national advertisers who have become very sophisticated and selective and statistic-orientated, with really nothing more to go on than just general, sort of off-the-cuff information about the readership.

We have had a good example this morning. Canadian Scene says three million. Dr. Kirschbaum in his brief says two million, and in effect he says, and I am not being critical, Doctor—he says, "What's a million?". A million is a lot, as you know better than I do when you are trying to sell advertising; so the question I would like to put to you and with just one other note in preface, and that is, we have had before us the Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association. We will be having the Magazine Advertising Bureau next week. We will be having the Magazine Advertising Bureau next week. We have the broadcasters coming. We have all of their sales organization, and they are, and I think you know this, armed to the teeth with facts and figures. When they go in to call on General Motors and Coca-Cola, they can practically tell you how many left-handed teenagers in Calgary read their particular publication. This is the kind of information increasingly which agencies demand; so how on earth do you cope with this problem?

Mr. Lech Mokrzycki, Advertising Consultant: Mr. Chairman, Honourable Senators ladies and gentlemen:—Now, as far as you question in regard to the circulation and readership, according to the statements provided by individual newspapers and published in Maclean-Hunter's Canadian Advertising Rates and Data every month, the recent total circulation of all ethnic dailies, weeklies, that appear in a section called "Foreign Language Publications" is approximately seven hundred and fifty thousand copies. This is total circulation.

As far as readership is concerned, we conducted, or Gruneau Research conducted a study for the ethnic Press and about the ethnic newspapers in Canada, and at the time the study was conducted, Gruneau Research estimated that the average readership of ethnic newspapers is three and a half million.

We took the modest figure of some two million readers, multiplying seven hundred fifty thousand circulation by less than three.

I didn't have a chance to read 'Canadian Scenes' presentation, but I would say that if they suggest that the readership is four instead of three and a half, they are probably also correct in many, many instances, especially with ethnic newspapers in some groups.

I mean, an ethnic newspaper is not an identical newspaper in every group. We are dealing here with approximately one hundred publications publishing in more than twenty-five languages, and the readership of the Italian newspaper or Greek or Portuguese would be different from the readership of a German newspaper, for example.

Why? As far as our studies are concerned, our knowledge and information provided to us by individual publishers, the Italians, Portuguese or Greeks, consider the newspaper as the only source of information especially as they don't have any other information at least in the early years.

If we look back some five, six years ago to the Toronto market, there was no single Portuguese newspaper in Toronto. If I recall correctly, there was no single Greek newspaper, and at that time there was only one Italian. Now, we have four Italian newspapers in Toronto, a few Portuguese, a few Greek and I believe that entire Greek, Portuguese or Italian community depends on these; therefore, I think the readership differs.

We cannot, of course, generalize and put all the eggs in one basket, but at the same time, we are as close as we can be, if we are forced to generalize, if we are asked to determine what is the total circulation.

Now, as far as your remarks as to the sophistication of the media in general and the requirement of advertising agencies are concerned, I would say that we are aware of this problem, and we consider ethnic newspapers at the moment as much more sophisticated media than it was some twenty years ago.

It's hard for anybody who is not familiar with the language of the newspaper for those people in the public service either in Ottawa, or in Ontario, to glance at the ethnic newspapers for comments or to determine a stand that an individual ethnic newspaper is taking on one specific matter.

Those people comment quite often about the different points of view, about the sophistication that the ethnic press right now presents when taking a stand on, let's say, the most important events in our Canadian life or on matters of international interest, or relations between Canada and the country of origin, you know, of one specific newspaper.

Now, when I am selling advertising and promoting any media, it is not an easy task, and you emphasized this, and I know that you are very aware of this, but at the same time, we have much more than the figures, and we, of course, are asked many more questions than just the figures.

We are also asked how many Italian women live between Dufferin and St. Clair in Toronto; but with assistance of individual publishers, we are trying to answer this question, and we are doing this through individual presentations that are prepared especially by us to deal with specific problems, to make an accommodation for one specific advertising agency, for one specific client.

The Chairman: Could I just interrupt you long enough to ask: which national advertiser, setting governments aside, would be the largest annual advertiser in the ethnic papers in Canada? Is that possible to say?

Mr. Mokrzycki: Yes, since I was prepared for this question to be put here, I have in front of me a list, and to generalize, national advertisers that are using ethnic press, besides the Federal, Provincial and municipal governments are—if we like to group them—banks and let's say investment funds, groups, airlines, other lines of transportation like steamship lines. There are breweries, distilleries, there will be some food producers, some consumer goods producers...

The Chairman: Which would be the single biggest? If you can't say, I am not trying to pressure you. I am just interested to know who.

Mr. Mokrzycki: Well, I could say I don't want to single anyone because I just don't have the figures here, but I could say that there are large banks, Bank of Montreal, Bank of Nova Scotia, Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce. Among breweries, there is Molson's Brewery and Carlings. Among the distilleries, I remember off-hand Seagram, Schenley, Hiram Walker, McGuinness, Acadian. Those are just a few examples. Amongst airlines, airlines related to the country of origin, such as Alitalia, Lufthansa, Sabena, KLM, but also...

The Chairman: Would you agree with me that you have got one of the toughest jobs in Canada?

Mr. Mokrzycki: Senator, I think so; if it were not for the reason that I happen to believe that it is a job to be done by somebody, I believe I would switch to probably a simpler job, but as far as belief is concerned, we believe that to bring immigrants here is only part of the job. To make them happy citizens of this country is another job. In our opinion, that is part of the job of the federal government and the department responsible for immigration, in this instance, the Department of Manpower and Immigration. However, since we don't get the support that we would like to receive, although we had many favourable supports all in the last ten years, as I recall, from the leaders in the public service in the Government of Canada, we believe that somebody has to do the job, and to refer to the question of the Senator who asked the question before if it is true that the ethnic press is alive, I mean that new immigrants keep the press alive.

The Chairman: Perhaps we could return to Senator Sparrow.

Mr. Mokrzycki: Yes, I would like to return with one comment, that not only immigrants keep the ethnic press alive, but the ethnic press keeps immigrants alive.

Senator Sparrow: Just further on that particular point—I am jumping a little—in your brief on the bottom of page seven, you say, "There are no translation problems for advertisers and no additional costs. To our knowledge, no advertising agency has ever been charged", and so on.

Do the advertisers believe that statement?

Mr. Mokrzycki: They do believe and they are aware of this. Translation service is provided by individual publishers or by media representatives presenting it in the newspapers. This is done free of charge and is done as a service to advertisers and advertising agencies, not only to solve the problems, but also to guarantee uniform and identical translations for, let's say, three or four German papers or three or four Italian newspapers, just to assure a national advertiser that the message is delivered in a proper form and the message is translated properly.

Senator Sparrow: So, this is not a selling problem then?

Mr. Mokrzycki: No, this is not a selling problem. This is a service.

Senator Smith: May I ask: is this really, in fact, a good translation of the English version or are these specially designed or specially written in the language in which they are intended to appear?

Mr. Mokrzycki: The reason for translation for offering the service, is that we intend to provide the best translation. As a rule, I would say that it isn't a literary translation of the English message because when we deal with the fact, or let's say with a slogan—I would just like to comment here on a slogan I remember, "Put a tiger in your tank". We could hardly imagine putting a tiger into the Greek tank or the Italian tank, and therefore we had to find an equivalent. Looking for a proper linguistic equivalent, this is what we are trying to accomplish, and this is why this is done in offices of media representatives of ethnic newspapers, where people have been doing this for the last ten or fifteen years and they specialize in this sort of translation.

Senator Smith: Is this a very difficult area particularly to transpose from the language in which it was written, which would likely be English or French, into the language in which it would be printed? Slogans, for example—isn't that a very difficult area? Coca-Cola slogans in English aren't the same in French. I am sure they would be far different in any of the other languages.

Mr. Mokrzycki: I believe that this is a very hard job, and quite often we are asked to be involved from the beginning in the planning that takes place in an advertising agency. Before they decide to use the media, they ask us for an opinion of what we think is going to happen to a slogan or to the question or to the headline, and at which time we try to investigate the matter further with individual translators in newspapers, and to answer the question before they make the final commitment. But actually I don't remember when a advertisement was turned down because of the translation problem.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Dr. Kirschbaum: I just failed to stress that as far as translations are concerned not only advertising but of articles, the ethnic press is very grateful, and I wish to stress it here, Canadian Scene. Canadian Scene provides the ethnic papers with articles on Canadian life, either on the history, culture, geography and so on, and it is a service for which we wouldn't really pay, and they also provide translations.

They have for each language an educated translator, and in this respect, I think the translations are regularly very good. This, as President of the Ethnic Press, I would like to stress—I see Mrs. Osler and Miss Gordon here—the ethnic press is indebted to Canadian Scene for a great help without asking a penny for the service. This is a service not only to the ethnic community, but to Canada, because their articles are especially about Canadian matters, about culture, history, geography and so on.

Senator Sparrow: I believe it refers in one of the briefs to fourteen translators. Is that sufficient to cover twenty-five languages? Is that sufficient overlapping?

Mr. Vladimir Mauko, Secretary, Canadian Ethnic Press Federation: I could probably answer that. There are some smaller publications, maybe just one publication in one language, and sometimes these publications ask them to supply them material in English because usually they are monthly, and they have sufficient time to translate that in their own language. Otherwise, it will be probably too costly to Canadian Scene to translate just one article for one publication, especially if that article is for one particular period of the year. It would be a waste of money for Canadian Scene.

I know for my own publication, we ask them to supply the English information because the editor of Canadian Scene reads the paper.

What I like to ask here, if I may...

The Chairman: Yes, by all means.

Mr. Mauko: ...is that I am Acting President of Ontario Association because they are mentioned. We have over thirty publications, and we have even associate members like the new Canadian publication which is represented by Mr. Mokrzycki here, and what this fellow asked me at the last meeting is that I should stress a point here. Is it possible that when the Government places advertising in the ethnic press—that it should direct the agency, which is placing the ad. That the agency should not just look to see if we reach a market of fifty thousand and over, because not every nationality is represented in Canada by fifty thousand immigrants. Those are paying taxes too who have fewer members in Canada, and they have the same right to get the information as the others are getting. So if it's possible they should not exclude the small papers because sometimes it's just done by five or six or seven bigger papers getting ads and the rest not, and then if you take a look, maybe only half of the ethnic population get the information.

The other half is represented probably by one hundred per cent more publications than the others and they are left out because they have a smaller number of readers, because they are smaller publications. But they still serve the same purpose, this is for the unity and for the better progress of Canada. They are sometimes completely left out because no advertising is coming to them because they say "It is only one publication for the whole of Canada, and you are publishing just five thousand. We want you only if you have fifteen or twenty thousand readers. Then we will place the ad." I think this is a mistake for the smaller publications. They have the same right to receive this information.

Senator Sparrow: I understand that the ethnic press received about $64,000 in federal government advertising. I understand as well that in March, I believe it was, 1969, you sent a delegation to Ottawa to try and get additional advertising funds from the federal government.

I believe the figure that was mentioned and promised to you was $120,000.

I would like to know two things:—who did you discuss this with when you were in Ottawa, and have you received an additional amount or if, in fact, you received $120,000 in Government advertising?

Mr. Mauko: Well, I could answer just partly to that, Mr. President, and answer that in general.

We were received by the Prime Minister at that time, and the promise was made by him that day when we visited his office.

The Chairman: What did he say?

Mr. Mauko: I have the figures here that he approved. It was between $116,000 and $117,000 for the coming year.

The Chairman: One hundred and...

Mr. Mauko: Seventeen or sixteen, I can't remember. That's what he said and we were about nine men in the delegation at the time he made that promise. We also saw at that time some other ministers and the honorary president here, and Mr. MacEachen, and I could say for my paper, one of the smaller papers, that up to now, we didn't feel anything different from last year. Now, maybe some larger publications filled that amount from $65,000 to $115,000. I have no knowledge of that. Probably Mr. Mokrzycki could answer.

The Chairman: Dr. Kirschbaum...

Dr. Kirschbaum: Now, I just wish to complete the information. The Prime Minister was prepared for receiving us, and he knew we would complain—or some of us would—because part of us are interested mainly in the ideological and cultural side of our press, and there are, of course, publishers who are interested in advertising. But the Prime Minister was prepared and he said, "Oh, yes, I know. We received your complaint, and you complained you didn't receive enough, and the figure for this year will be approximately close to $120,000." We also discussed it with the Secretary of State, Mr. Pelletier.

We have very good relations with the officers in Ontario from that Department, and he also said that he would try somehow to help us. But how much we received, I think the only person who knows how much approximately we received would be Mr. Mokrzycki. He can answer because he deals with advertising.

The Chairman: Mr. Mokrzycki, your comments, please?

Mr. Mokrzycki: Yes, today is, I believe, February 11, 1970, and the fiscal year ends on March 31st, and since the time that some indication of the increase in federal advertising for the ethnic press was made, I believe, in March, '69, there is no single advertisement or no single federal department that advertised in the ethnic press which would indicate that that increase will be made or that some progress is being made, unless something will happen between now and March 31st.

The Chairman: Which is unlikely?

Mr. Mokrzycki: There is an indication that the Department of National Revenue will place some information about income taxes which we recommended for several years because we believe that those people have to get that information in order to fulfill their obligation properly.

Also, I heard that there was a small portion of the Department of Labour budget allocated for the ethnic press, but an advertising agency informed me last week in Toronto that the campaign has been temporarily stopped; and there was also an Unemployment Insurance Commission series of advertisements that was originally planned, but none of the ethnic newspapers received any, so as far as the rate of today is concerned, we cannot say that there is any indication of increase.

The Chairman: If you received the Department of Labour campaign, the Unemployment Insurance campaign and the National Revenue campaign, would you reach the $120,000?

Mr. Mokrzycki: It depends on the size of the advertisement as well as the number of newspapers that will be included in the campaign.

The Chairman: But it's conceivable?

Mr. Mokrzycki: Yes, everything, I believe, is conceivable.

Mr. Dojack: Well, Mr. Mokrzycki, answering that, would you not confirm that the lineage used by the federal government for the present year is actually less than it was last year?

The Chairman: Good question!

Mr. Dojack: It's actually less than it was last year.

Mr. Mokrzycki: Mr. Dojack mentioned lineage, and I was asked the question in terms of dollars. As far as lineage is concerned, yes, I agree. I believe the Departments are working within the same budget, and therefore because of some increasing rates here and there, they have to cut the size of the advertisement.

Senator Smith: Mr. Chairman, could I ask a question on this very point? Do you estimate the equivalent amount of Federal Government advertising or publicity that would compare at least on an equal basis with the amount that is given to the English or French?

language weekly newspapers across the country?

Mr. Mokrzycki: Should I answer this question?

The Chairman: Yes, please.

Mr. Mokrzycki: No, we don't. This is the very point that we are trying to make. The total budget of Federal Government advertising was twenty-four million dollars. Excluding Crown Corporations, I believe it was eleven million dollars, and in the fiscal year that ended on March 31, 1969 we received around sixty-four thousand dollars out of eleven million dollars scheduled by different federal departments.

Now, I don't believe that that is in proportion to the population that's represented or the number of readers that subscribe to the ethnic press.

Also, I believe that if we leave the matter of proportion aside for a while, there are some departments that have an obligation towards immigrants to provide them with the basic information. I would like to emphasize here the Department of Manpower and Immigration as an example.

I believe that this is the department that should provide basic information for those people who find themselves behind the language barrier for at least a number of years, or a few years. Let's leave aside discussion of his three, four, five or six years or whatever, but nevertheless there are people who find themselves behind the language barrier until they are able to read fluently in English or French.

Senator Smith: I think, Mr. Chairman, that that point that was just stated is a very valid one, and perhaps that should be explored by all concerned, but it's still not clear in my mind whether, apart from that kind of advertising which you referred to just a moment ago, which wouldn't ordinarily appear in the weekly press, are you getting the share that's the equivalent of that general advertising that goes to the weekly press. I didn't understand your answer.

The Chairman: I believe he said he is not, didn't you?

Mr. Mokrzycki: Yes, I said that.

The Chairman: Well, I think he did. Now, I would like to ask another question. Why aren't you? I just hoped to follow it up. Why not?

Mr. Dojack: Could I answer that a little bit just to take the pressure off Stan?

The Chairman: I hope he doesn't feel he is under pressure.

Mr. Mokrzycki: I don't.

The Chairman: I am sure you don't.

Mr. Dojack: I think an interesting comparison to your request for information is provincially too, the provincial governments. It is interesting to note in Manitoba, the Manitoba weekly budget for advertising from the Manitoba government last year was $160,000. The same allocation towards the over twenty ethnic publications in our province was less than $10,000.

Senator Sparrow: Sorry. That was $160,000 and you, the ethnic press, received $10,000 of that?

Mr. Dojack: Yes; now I agree most of the ethnic press don't just serve a local area, and perhaps this is part of the reason. Most of our papers are national in nature. Our papers have a correspondent in Toronto, Vancouver, Edmonton, Regina. We have a Manitoba page and a Saskatchewan page, as well as a national page; so in that respect, there is some difference. I think that exists to some extent, maybe not to that proportion as far as the federal government is concerned. There are certain departments that give us more lineage, such as the Department of Citizenship, than they give the Canadian weeklies because they are directing their advertising to our audience. But getting back to an earlier question, too, regarding the advertising agencies and the purchase of...

The Chairman: Well, before you get back to that, Mr. Dojack, I would like you to...

Mr. Dojack: There was one other thing directing to this.

The Chairman: I am sorry.

Mr. Dojack: I was going to reach it in another way.

The Chairman: All right, fine.

Mr. Dojack: A lot of the government departments, and we mentioned this in our observation—well, every government department has an advertising agency, and not all, but many of the agencies find it expedient to use the English press rather than the ethnic press. Their rates are higher. The amount of commission is a little more remunerative. There is less production cost; no translations. They know what they are publishing. We often wonder whether it's right or not, but I think they kind of take the easy road out. In our observations, we did mention that some agencies, and thank goodness there are not too many, find it easier to deal with the mass media rather than a select market, and many advertisers...

The Chairman: Would you care to specifically indicate which agencies?

Mr. Dojack: Well, let us take the...

The Chairman: If that answer would prejudice your position, then don't answer it.

Mr. Dojack: Well, I think the Department of Revenue, for instance—we always used to get four 800-line schedules directed on the Canada Savings Bond issue. Now, in discussing this with the Minister, he has indicated to me that he always wanted that same lineage used, but yet when we get the ad. from the advertising agency, which is MacLaren in this particular case, we only get one ad now. It's been cut, and we think the buyers of Canada Savings Bonds are...

The Chairman: If I may just make a correction? Well, I think you are going to correct him on the department.

Mr. Mokrzycki: He said Department of Revenue. I said Department of Finance.

Mr. Dojack: Thank you. That is correct.

The Chairman: Now, let me hasten to add I have absolutely no brief from MacLaren Advertising, but you would agree with me that they are the largest agency in the country, billing the most money? They have a great number of international accounts like Imperial Oil, General Motors, an endless list, as you know better than I do. Would you honestly have us believe, and if you would, say so—that their people are too indifferent or too lazy?

Mr. Dojack: I wouldn't use the word "lazy".

The Chairman: Or indifferent or too inactive to go to the trouble of advertising in the ethnic papers?

Mr. Dojack: Well, they are running one 800-line ad, on the Canada Savings Bonds.

The Chairman: Well, why do they not run more?

Mr. Dojack: Well, previously, the Department has always run four 800 line ads. Now the market has expanded in the ethnic field, and they are far more acceptable to purchase Canada Savings Bonds than ever before. Yet because the mass media, television, colour TV and so on is consuming so many of the dollars, they feel that they have to cut the ethnic press, the special market, down, and we are suffering because they are directing more dollars to the mass media.

Now, they probably feel that that's where they are going to sell more of the bonds. They possibly have more of the government interest at heart, to some extent, but it is doing damage to the lineage offered to ethnic publications.

The Chairman: Well, I want to return to Senator Sparrow, and pause for one moment—would the rationale not perhaps also be that they reach your reader through national television and through national magazine advertising and national radio and so on?

Mr. Dojack: This is possibly true. I wouldn't want to say that they are discriminating against the ethnic press. I am not saying that.

The Chairman: I realize that.

Mr. Dojack: They are using us, but they are cutting down on our lineage, and they are directing it into other areas, perhaps because they are getting a greater impact. But we always feel we are being gradually reduced, and it won't be very long before we may not get any lineage from that particular department. I think, as far as that particular issue is concerned—I think our publications can do a very outstanding job. Our people are very prone to accepting Canada Savings Bonds and purchasing them because they know they have a...

The Chairman: Well, I may want to come back to this point, but I would like to come back to Senator Sparrow.

Senator Sparrow: I understood that your association was happy with the Ontario Government and the Manitoba Government as far as advertising in the ethnic press was concerned.

You seemed critical of the Manitoba situation. Would you have a dollar figure of what all provincial governments spend on ethnic press advertising, so we can compare it to the federal budget?

Mr. Dojack: The total figure?

Senator Sparrow: Yes, of all provincial governments.

Mr. Dojack: Well, it would be very difficult to give you, but I think the major ones are Ontario and Manitoba where we have got a more active organization.

I might say in the case of Manitoba, it wasn't but then years ago when their budget was in the vicinity of $500 for all the ethnic press; so our association has built up a recognition in the Manitoba Government in recent years, but I would think that your budget would be what—about $40,000?

Mr. Mokrzycki: As far as I know, there is some $40,000 allocated by the Ontario Government for advertising in the ethnic press, and you mentioned $10,000 for Manitoba. That would be $50,000. I am not aware of anything in British Columbia, and I know that there is some in the Province of Quebec, but I don't know to what extent.

Mr. Dojack: I wouldn't think it would be in excess of $60,000 all told. I don't think it would be in excess.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow, have you got anything for Mr. Dojack?

Senator Sparrow: I will leave that just for a moment at least. You referred to government assistance in some area for the ethnic press apart from advertising.

Are you suggesting government grants to the ethnic press or what are you really suggesting so that it wouldn't affect the freedom of the ethnic press, as such?

The Chairman: Dr. Kirschbaum?

Dr. Kirschbaum: Now, Mr. Chairman, when we were received by the Prime Minister, there was an idea that some way should be found to help the ethnic press, especially since the postal rates were increased in some cases by up to two thousand per cent; but there was no practical way indicated how to solve the problem. We were told that the Departments will look to help somehow the ethnic press to survive or at least to get some compensation for the losses we are suffering as a result of the increased postage rate, and, of course, increased cost. But so far, nothing was done, and if it is a grant or if in some other way, the departments could help, it was not worked out. It was a discussion, an indication that they would look for some ways.

The Chairman: Well, I think Senator Sparrow's question was: would you be in favour of grants?

Dr. Kirschbaum: Of course, we want to be independent politically, but in view of the fact that this press serves the interest of a group in a way which other media cannot serve it and it is serving or giving information or education or help in integration, which other media cannot do, somehow we feel that there should be a way to help to do this job of integration, of education, for the New Canadian, for new arrivals and so on, but there is no clear idea of what it should be.

If it is a grant for educational purposes of the new immigrants or immigrants who are here but still remain as immigrants, probably the ethnic press would accept that, but we would still say we wish to be politically independent, of course.

It means that if there is a Liberal Government, next time a Conservative Government and a Labour Government, we wouldn't switch from one to the other. We want to simply perform the service we have done until now to the Canadian community, which is neither Anglo-Saxon nor of French origin.

Senator Sparrow: Canadian Scene appearing later, I believe, are suggesting government grants to them. If a grant was made to that organization, would that suffice? Would that still maintain your freedom of the press?

Dr. Kirschbaum: No strings attached, I think it would help prolong the ethnic press, and the role the ethnic press plays for one-third of Canadian population.

The Chairman: Could I ask a question again? It is a question of political independence that we spoke of. You make a reference in your brief—you say, "Except for the leftist newspapers, which do not fall into the Canada Ethnic Press Federation"—how many Leftist newspapers are there in Canada? How many Leftist ethnic papers are there in Canada?

Dr. Kirschbaum: We have in Ontario, I think, three.

Mr. Mauko: I think so.

Dr. Kirschbaum: Three in Ontario—there is none in Quebec.

Mr. Dojack: None in Manitoba.

Dr. Kirschbaum: None in Manitoba.

The Chairman: What do you mean by "Leftist"—Communist?

Dr. Kirschbaum: Communist.

The Chairman: Now, might I refer to a quotation which appeared in an article which I am sure you are familiar with, which was in the Globe and Mail Magazine July 12th, 1969, entitled "Babel is a Corner News-stand". Quoting it in part, he says,

"The ethnic press is as vigorously anti-Communist as it is pro-Canada", and I believe that you mentioned this in your opening statement, Dr. Kirschbaum.

It goes on to say that:

"Dr. Kirschbaum, president of the federation, last month asked External Affairs Minister, Mitchell Sharp, for assurances that Canada's opposition to communism would not be changed. We want to see Canada in the role of a fighter."

The next paragraph quotes Mr. Rudy Tomich—I hope I am pronouncing his name correctly—a Toronto real estate salesman, and Editor of "Nas Put" a Croatian monthly—he says:

"We wouldn't need ethnic newspapers if there were not threat from the Communists".

Would you agree with that statement that "we wouldn't need ethnic newspapers if there were no threat from the Communists"?

Dr. Kirschbaum: Certainly not. Even those groups, whose country of origin is very good still need ethnic papers. Some ethnic papers were organized after the Second World War by new refugees mostly for the purpose to fight communism in their own lands; for instance, some ethnic groups during the war from among the Slavs, and of course the Soviet Union.

Then, it was an inner struggle, and after the war when the Soviet Union made an orbit in Central Europe, of course other papers also joined the ranks to fight Communism. But regardless of Communism in Eastern Europe or not, I think that the ethnic groups would still publish and would need the ethnic papers in their own language.

The Chairman: Well, now, Mr. Mokrzycki said earlier that the circulation of the papers belonging to the Federation is about, if I quote him correctly, seven hundred and fifty thousand. What would be the circulation of the so-called "Leftist" papers in Canada? Could you guess at that, Mr. Mokrzycki or Dr. Kirschbaum?

Mr. Mokrzycki: Five thousand.

The Chairman: Five thousand?

Mr. Mokrzycki: Total.

The Chairman: Per what—per week?

Mr. Mokrzycki: Total circulation of all publications per issue, about five thousand, yes this is just a guess.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: Going back then just a moment on that statement by the way—the assurance you asked for from Mr. Sharp—what was that Dr. Kirschbaum? Would you elaborate on that?

Dr. Kirschbaum: I was not quoted exactly. I read it when it was published. It was a long discussion and we discussed many things, and I, on behalf of the Federation, was invited to join Canadian correspondents in a conference two or three times. Then I discussed with Mr. Sharp just as you read, and I mentioned that the majority, but not all of the ethnic press of course, expect that Canada should have some clear idea as far as Communism is concerned; and that we should be rather fighting it than just be neutral or not interested in it. There were at that time—of course, there are some who feel that probably this is a different ideology and we shouldn't be very much interested in it, a different system. We should build bridges and forget about what happened in 1945 in all the countries behind the Iron Curtain. This was a casual remark, but the idea is there, that the majority of ethnic editors and papers feel that Canada should fight Communism inside and outside and not just take the view that it is another system, and so far we have to make agreements with the countries with this specific Communist system.

The Chairman: Would you think that the Senators might agree that it's regrettable that Dr. Kirschbaum wasn't with us yesterday Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: And does the ethnic press take a stand on the recognition of Red China?

Dr. Kirschbaum: Some newspapers commented negatively. Some just put it in their news.

Senator Sparrow: No particular stand by the ethnic press?

Dr. Kirschbaum: There was no general opinion because our papers are still independent. We have a Federation but our association doesn't try to direct the policy of the papers; the editors would not accept it. But the views vary. There were some negative political comments and there was news taken out from other television or dailies.

Senator Sparrow: Going back just for a moment on your statement on postal rates, you say on page seven that it is not unfair to state that the average increase is about one dollar per paper per subscriber in reference to the new postal rates. Is that an actual figure?

Dr. Kirschbaum: Yes, the group in the West prepared the brief. Our Vice-President, Mr. Mazack and Mr. Dojack made a study, and they gave some examples and they came to this conclusion.

Senator Sparrow: Would that be daily, weekly or monthly or yearly?

Mr. Dojack: That would be the on an annual subscription.

Senator Sparrow: Oh, it says "about one dollar per paper."

Mr. Dojack: Per year for postage—to meet the postage increase.

Senator Sparrow: Oh, I read that as a dollar per weekly newspaper; that is, an additional cost of fifty-two dollars per year.

The Chairman: Where are you reading from, Senator?

Senator Sparrow: Page seven, the third paragraph.

Mr. Dojack: No, no, that's meant on the far-round basis, a one-year subscription. The average cost of a weekly subscription is in the vicinity of six to seven dollars at the present time. Some have gone up to eight dollars. Some have gone up to nine dollars.

I would think the average subscription rate now would be in the vicinity of seven dollars. I would think a good number of the Ontario papers are within Ontario; whereas most of the Western papers are national in scope, covering Canada from coast to coast with a fair circulation in every province, and they are more affected by the postal rates than many of the papers in Toronto. For this reason, the responsibility of preparing the brief and filing it on the postal rates was left with the Western group to complete, and in that regard, we did find that the increase in postal rates would require an average of one dollar increase per subscription; that's per yearly subscription per publication.

Senator Sparrow: How many of the ethnic press have been forced out of business directly attributable to postal increases?

Mr. Dojack: I wouldn't say directly.

Dr. Kirschbaum: So far none, because we hope that we will find some remedy, and they were again approaching the Government, I think, in January, and are waiting to find ways to save the paper. I don't think anyone stopped publication.

Mr. Mokrzycki: I want to correct the statement.

The Chairman: Mr. Mokrzycki?

Mr. Mokrzycki: Yes, there is a Maltese paper in Toronto that ceased publication because of the financial difficulties.

Senator Sparrow: Which one?

Mr. Mokrzycki: The Maltese paper in Toronto.

Senator Sparrow: Is that the only one?

Mr. Mauko: There was a Finnish paper in Toronto. They published before three issues a week. Now, they are publishing two issues per week for the same price, and they did have quite a big difficulty explaining to their readers why they changed, but otherwise they would have to charge so much more for their subscription.

Mr. Mokrzycki: Since the question was how many ceased publication, I had entered only one, but what Mr. Mauko is adding here, it is a case with many publications. Many of the ethnic publications had to find some other way such as publishing once a week instead of three times or two times or publishing six pages instead of eight pages and things like that. Different publications used different approaches to be able to survive regardless of the increased postal rates, but as far as ceasing publication, we know of one newspaper in Toronto.

Mr. Dojack: I think there will be many more before the end of this year. I would predict that there will be at least a half a dozen.

Senator Sparrow: Unless there is a change, or is it too late for change?

Mr. Dojack: It might be too late even now.

Senator Sparrow: I am sorry. Time is getting on, Mr. Chairman. There may be other questions. Could I just ask a couple quickly?

The Chairman: Sure.

Senator Sparrow: Just for the record, how many of your membership are daily, weekly and monthly newspapers?

Dr. Kirschbaum: How many in Ontario?

Mr. Mauko: Well, in Ontario, there is one daily. There are three or four monthlies. The rest of them are weekly or twice-weekly.

Senator Sparrow: Corriere Canadese is the only daily?

Dr. Kirschbaum: And in Manitoba?

Mr. Dojack: Well, in Quebec, there are eight weeklies. In B.C., there are eight weeklies. In Manitoba, there are fifteen weeklies, two semi-monthlies. There are about four monthlies and three or four quarterlies.

Senator Sparrow: Are there many ethnic press that don't belong to your Federation?

Dr. Kirschbaum: Now, there are, of course, all these magazines, almanacs and few other things who are not members.

Then, the press which is published by religious organizations and still has some coverage of news or educational materials also don't belong, but what we call "newspapers", now, the great majority are in the Federation or regional associations.

Mr. Dojack: We print, as national publishers, ten religious publications in other than English or French. None of them are members of the Federation, but I am sure some of them do use 'Canadian Scene' material.

Dr. Kirschbaum: The University of Calgary published a report called "Canadian Ethnic Studies" and they list for Ukrainians about three hundred and seventy publications, including bulletins and so on, just for Ukrainians. We, of course, when we refer to it, we don't deal with all of this material. It goes into hundreds and hundreds.

We are just dealing with weeklies, not dailies and monthlies.

Mr. Dojack: This could be part of the reason for the difference in figure between 'Canadian Scene' and our member publications.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: You feel at the moment that you have complete freedom of the press as far as the ethnic press is concerned. In the event of a world conflict, what do you foresee—do you still foresee within your group of newspapers that same freedom existing?

Dr. Kirschbaum: Yes, I think so.

Senator Sparrow: There were problems the last war. You don't foresee that those problems would arise again as far as your...

Mr. Dojack: What problems were there the ethnic press?

Senator Sparrow: Well, I understood that in some areas, some of the newspapers ceased publication, as an example, in the last year.

Mr. Dojack: No, we published a German paper, for instance. It didn't cease publication. Mind, we did co-operate—we are a Canadian publication specifically, but we did publish many articles in the English language, and we realized we had a problem there, but there was no termination of publication.

Senator Sparrow: So, the only ones that would be affected, primarily, would perhaps be the "leftist" ones, as you refer to them now, that don't belong to your press club?

Dr. Kirschbaum: Yes, as there was during the Second World War at the beginning, the "leftist" publications ceased to be published in 1939 to 1941; and then it depends on which side Canada will be, but we hope on the right side, because there are no other publications in the ethnic press now except those few Communist papers.

The Chairman: Senator Smith?

Senator Smith: I just have two or three points I would like to make.

The Chairman: All right.

Senator Smith: One is perhaps in the way of a suggestion. Has there been any approach to the rather newly appointed Minister Without Portfolio who is responsible for citizenship matters in the Government in order to discuss some of the problems that you have not only with the press, but also with ethnic groups in general?

The Chairman: Dr. Kirschbaum?

Dr. Kirschbaum: Now, we presented our troubles to Mr. Pelletier last March, and we are in a very good relation with the officers of the Department of the Secretary of State. Mr. Allen in Toronto is especially active, but many of them are aware of the difficulties. We were promised help and in many ways they do help, but then there will be a new Minister, Mr. Stanbury.

Senator Smith: Well, that was my question. Have you discussed your problems with the Minister?

Dr. Kirschbaum: We have invited him to Toronto in April, and we want to discuss with him these problems in detail.

Senator Smith: I hope that you would show him the minutes of your last meeting in the Prime Minister's office to remind him.

Dr. Kirschbaum: Well, he's from Toronto, and we hope very much that he will be quite co-operative, but he knows our problems and will be helpful.

Senator Smith: I have just another point, Mr. Chairman. I wonder, first of all, whether or not one of the areas that you might discuss would be to make some concrete suggestions with regard to the functions of the Liaison Officers of the Department of Citizenship.

Are they performing all the functions that you think they can with regard to the ethnic community as well as the ethnic press, or should there be some enlargement of their functions?

The Chairman: Well, if I may, given the time at our disposal this morning, I think your answer, Doctor, should relate only to the liaison with the ethnic press.

Senator Smith: That's all. I would be satisfied.

The Chairman: I think your liaison with the community generally is probably good, so in terms of the ethnic press perhaps you might answer Senator Smith.

Dr. Kirschbaum: Now, so far, the Liaison Officers were co-operative with us, but couldn't help us solve certain problems. They tried to co-operate with us because they are in charge of the ethnic communities in general problems either from the Department of Citizenship or Manpower and Immigration Department. But we would appreciate if more attention is paid, and they are allowed to give more time and more help to the ethnic press and more co-operation, because we feel we perform a service in the same way as the Department of State or Manpower and Immigration.

Senator Smith: Mr. Chairman, I just have one final question which I would like to ask of Dr. Kirschbaum.

The Chairman: Yes.

Senator Smith: I understood you to say, and perhaps I read it in the background papers, that many of the United States ethnic papers found their way into Canada, and they have a number of Canadian subscribers. Is that kind of competition a serious one for you?

Dr. Kirschbaum: In some groups it is a competition, of course, because originally, in Canada some groups didn't have their papers and organizations, and then American organizations organized members here and sent to their members the newspapers from the United States.

Now, I think in the Polish group, they still issue as many American-published newspapers or copies as Canadian-published.

Now, I don't know what the situation amounted to, but I think that with Slavic groups, it was a situation because originally the American organizations started to organize the immigrants in the fraternal field, and every member of the fraternal organization received the newspaper, but also independent newspapers from the United States still are coming to Canada. They have readers.

Mr. Dojack: We publish a Ukrainian paper called the Free World. It's an American paper. We have American editors who send their news up to Canada. It's printed in Canada, published and owned by National Publishers, but it is distributed exclusively in the United States.

Senator Smith: When you say "We have"...

Mr. Dojack: That's our firm, National Publishers. Well, I have had one incident. We published another paper called "Der Sendbote". It's a German Baptist publication. We have been printing it in Winnipeg for something like twenty-five years. On Monday morning when I was leaving for Montreal, Reverend Kerstan came up from Chicago to advise us that because of the increased postal rates and excessive costs they find it cheaper now to get the publication printed in the United States. So we are going to lose that publication because of the postal rates specifically and it's going back to the United States. We were able to print it here and distribute it in the United States at a rate competitive or less than they could do it for in the United States, but because of the increased postal rates specifically, we have lost that publication.

Senator Smith: What do you think about the editorial content of some of the newspapers that are published in the United States and find their way into Canadian subscribers' hands? Does that compare in general terms, do you think?

Mr. Dojack: It's like Newsweek or anything else, wouldn't you think? Acceptance is about the same, wouldn't you say, Dr. Kirschbaum?

Senator Smith: I was wondering whether there was any difference in what the readers might gather from American attitudes versus Canadian attitudes that might be expressed in the collection of the news and in the editorial pages.

Dr. Kirschbaum: Now, of course, Canadian ethnic Newspapers comment on Canadian matters, and American newspapers mostly on American policy. What is common or is comparable is what they say about the problems of the groups. Then there is not much difference, but in editorials, there is a difference, of course, not in the global understanding of our external policy, but they mostly deal with American problems.

The Chairman: I have two questions only. I think the second one I will put to the people from Canadian Scene also. I perhaps could ask a final question, which I think has to be asked in a discussion like this. I am going to be very unfair with you, Dr. Kirschbaum, and I ask you to answer rather briefly because of the time, and this relates to the basic function of the ethnic press.

Your brief says "it's a guide, an interpreter, a teacher and an intimate friend. Its role has been to introduce the new immigrant into his new environment as efficiently and as painlessly for himself and the community as possible in order to enable him to become a full-fledged citizen of this country, willing and able to contribute his talents and his abilities for the benefit of all Canadians."

Now, I am sure you would agree with that. Obviously, it's in your brief. May I then read a quotation from an article which appeared in the June 20th issue of Time Magazine, and ask you to comment on it:...

"The more successfully the ethnic papers smooth the way for their readers to enter the Canadian mainstream, the more quickly they should put themselves out of business."

Dr. Kirschbaum: Now, it would be true if there were no influx of immigrants, and we referred here in general to the ethnic press when immigrants come and don't understand English or French. The ethnic press was the only communication medium which could inform them about Canada and help them to integrate.

The Chairman: Yes.

Dr. Kirschbaum: The situation is such that even if somebody is integrated, reads or speaks one of the official languages, he still refers to his paper sometimes in the second or third generation because still he finds some education, some readership in his paper. Secondly the ethnic groups don't want to abandon, at least some of them, the cultural heritage, and the ethnic paper remains even when an immigrant is fluent in some of our official language. Still it is only the ethnic paper who informs him of his background, culture, heritage, history and so on. I don't think they will cease to be published or they should be put out of commerce or out of the fire.

The Chairman: Well, I am not suggesting or implicit in my question is not that suggestion at all, but I think it's an interesting observation. It's one which I wondered about—Mr. Dojack.

Mr. Dojack: You know, it's rather interesting. It is a good comment. What are the publications doing to reach the younger market? Now, our Ukrainian weekly, for instance—wrestling figure curling is one of the national sports of Canada, and we have done much to encourage Ukrainian curling rinks. As a matter of fact, in Winnipeg itself, there are over sixteen Ukrainian curling rinks, and we put up the Canadian Farmer Curling Trophy in order to not only see the Ukrainian people more interested in Canadian sports and the development of that sport, but also in their paper. Their paper is taking pride in their development, and we also have the Ukrainian Canadian Athlete of the Year Award, which we have presented to such people as Terry Sawchuk and our amateur golfer in Toronto, Mr. Westlock and others.

There is a lot of participation by the ethnic press in developing and showing an interest in our young people, and so we are not just counting on immigration from Europe as our circulation builder, but we are looking to our young people to keep in touch with the language and so on.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Mr. Mauko: I would like to add to that that I saw a report that by the year 1980 or something like that, Canada should have thirty-three or thirty-five millions. I think the difference between twenty-one and thirty-five millions, with new immigrants would support our publication. I hope so.

The Chairman: I hope so, too. I think at his point, gentlemen, I will perhaps...

Senator Macdonald: Could I ask one question?

The Chairman: Oh, I am sorry, Senator Macdonald.

Senator Macdonald: I was wondering how many of your papers now being published were published prior, say, to 1940.

Dr. Kirschbaum: Prior to 1940... there is a study on this subject by the former President of Acadia University. He was in the West. He is a Canadian scholar. About forty-five newspapers were published before the Second World War.

Mr. Dojack: Our German publication is eighty-four years in publication. Our Ukrainian is sixty-four. We started the 'Croatian Voice' thirty-five years ago... actually thirty-eight years ago. The Polish paper Czas which we started, was started over thirty-five years ago, about forty years ago.

I would think that almost ninety per cent of the ethnic papers in Western Canada were started well before 1940, and I would think almost thirty per cent of the Ontario papers were started before 1940.

Senator Macdonald: And then apart from the immigration, to keep your readership, you must have the younger people understand, and be able to read the language. Tell me this: do you think the news media in general give adequate coverage to the activities of the ethnic groups?

Dr. Kirschbaum: No, we cannot say they do. I just wish to mention one instance. We are very much surprised with the disinterest shown in the ethnic groups. The Federation invited Quebec editors in 1967, which was the year of unity and so on, and in Toronto, we gave receptions, actually for the Provincial Government and others to sit in our Federation. We didn't get any coverage in the Toronto media whom we invited, in the daily papers. We invited the CBC. We invited other media. They were not at all interested.

It is a funny thing, but generally there is not much interest except when a good reporter comes and writes something. But if we consider the population, twenty-six or twenty-eight per cent and the coverage in any of Canadian media, of course there is no adequate coverage of the life, problems or activities of the ethnic groups.

Mr. Dojack: Actually the English press gives poor coverage to ethnic matters and ethnic community matters. This is one of the strong points why the ethnic press is such a vital force to its readers; because they do concern themselves with church matters, community matters, soccer reports. As far as the Italian and German press is concerned, it's the right hand of our young people today, and they look to their ethnic press for scores and so on. I think that our young people turn to our sports pages before they turn to anything else, and they can't find the scores in the English press. I think this is very vital.

The Chairman: Senator Macdonald?

Senator Macdonald: There is just one other thing I would like comment on. On page eight in your brief, you mention:

"The ethnic editors complain of lack of proper lines of communication between the Federal Government and the ethnic groups who may not fully appreciate the efforts and accomplishments of the Government because of the language barrier".

Would you care to comment on that statement, just what it means, page eight at the bottom of the page?

Dr. Kirschbaum: Now, of course, we feel that the ethnic press for a long time was treated as a step-child; that there was not much understanding because probably it was also the fault of the readers of the ethnic groups that there was not much communication or understanding—it was just left alone.

Many times also it was because the people who published the paper didn't speak proper English, and they were not very eager to contact the Government on any level. On the other side, I think that you know better than I—I came in 1949—that there was a tendency in Canada somehow not to assimilate and not to pay much attention to these ethnic groups or to their life in their own communities.

Actually, the active life mostly started between the wars and after the Second World War because they were not strong groups, not well-organized. The papers were small. Then, there was not much communication, and when you mention "not appreciated very much", the service the ethnic press performed, until recently, five, ten, fifteen years ago, there was no agency of government like now, the Liaison Officers or Manpower Centres and so on to get in touch with the ethnic groups. It improved considerably, but in the past, really they were a sort of ghetto and a separate community living in Canada. But it improved and it is improving steadily.

Senator Macdonald: That's all.

The Chairman: Ladies and gentlemen, I am sorry. I hate to terminate the discussion, but we do have some other people we are going to hear from this morning.

I am going to suggest to representatives from the Federation—I am sure you will want to stay and hear this presentation, and it may be in the course of that presentation that remarks may be directed to you, although I appreciate that Canadian Scene is not the Ethnic Press Federation, but certainly there is a good, close working relationship. It may be that we will want to direct questions in that question period to some of you, but I think, in fairness, I should now turn to those people. If there is anything you want to say—Mr. Dojack.

Mr. Dojack: Our President, Dr. Kirschbaum, did touch on the subject of our Centennial Project. We took forty-eight ethnic editors from across Canada and spent ten days touring the Province of Quebec to get to know and understand our French-Canadian leaders, press, educationalists and so on, better.

Then we invited better than seventy French-Canadian news editors radio and TV personalities from Quebec to tour Western Canada, including Toronto west of Quebec right through to Victoria to get to know the people of Western Canada, and, in particular, the ethnic groups better. These tours were very successful, but I must say that the Liaison Officers of the Citizenship Branch were outstanding in their co-operation and assistance with these projects. In this regard, if it was not for the assistance given by these Liaison Officers of that Department, I would say that these tours would never have been as successful as they were.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Dojack. I am going to suggest that we adjourn for about ninety seconds to give the reporters a break.

Recess.

...Upon resuming...

The Chairman: If I may call the meeting to order, please? Thank you. If I may call this session to order, we are going to receive, in brief, as the Senators know, from Canadian Scene. I won't say anything more about Canadian Scene, but I will allow these people to speak for themselves.

On my immediate right is Mrs. Barbara Osler who is the co-founder and the President of Canadian Scene and on her immediate right at the end of this table is Mrs. Douglas Jennings who was the co-founder of Canadian Scene with Mrs. Osler. On my left is Miss Ruth Gordon who is the Editor of Canadian Scene. At the far end of the table is Mr. John Gellner who is a Vice-President of Canadian Scene.

Mrs. Osler has asked me to apologize. Listed as one of the people coming here this morning is Mr. Trevor Hamill who is a Director of Canadian Scene, but I think as the Senators are aware, there are slight problems in and out of various cities around and about and Mr. Hamill, I gather, is grounded in Montreal.

Mrs. Osler, the brief we requested has been received, and perhaps it is not necessary to repeat all of the things I said this morning. I know you were present when we received the brief from the Federation. I propose, therefore, that you now take a few minutes to make an oral statement. Following that, we would like to question you on your written brief and on your oral presentation, your oral comments, and perhaps other matters as well.

Welcome, Mrs. Osler.

Mrs. B. B. Osler, President, Canadian Scene: We are very pleased indeed to be invited to appear before this Committee. I hope we will be able to explain the function of Canadian Scene and how it operates. Our brief dealt very briefly with the mechanics.

Oh, here is Mr. Hamill now.

The Chairman: Mr. Hamill, please come forward, sir. We are just starting.

Mrs. Osler: I am very glad that some of the ethnic editors have stayed to hear us. We also have several government officials who have worked very closely with us, Mr. Zybala who is one of our editors and who is now with the Department of the Secretary of State, and Mr. Glen Allen, a Senior Liaison Officer with the Citizenship Department.

These gentlemen have known about our work for a great many years, and I am sure if you wish to question them, they would be only too pleased to answer.

As you saw from the brief, Canadian Scene was originated because of the concern for the Communist approach to the newcomers to Canada, and we hoped to counteract this by giving the newcomer unbiased material about Canada, to enable him to sift the truth from the false—we hope the truth.

We found that the change in emphasis came very slowly over the years. While Communism now perhaps isn't considered as much of a danger—although I sometimes wonder if that's the right approach—still, the information that is needed by the newcomer in all phases of Canadian life is very much apparent.

We have been able to give them information that they cannot appear to get in any other way. It's like no other press service, I think, in existence. In fact, we believe we are the only press service of this type in North America.

There is a very large American one, subsidized by Government with hundreds of employees which puts out a great deal of information, but there is no such small, personal organization which has such personal contact with the editors.

We have no research staff. We discuss with the editors the type of information that they require, that they know their readers want to have, and we also maintain personal contact with the editors in their own homes. They come to our homes, and many valuable discussions take place at those meetings.

The information that they receive from government, and a good deal has been spoken of that this morning, has to be rewritten because the government pamphlets that come out—all the requirements of The Income Tax Act, the requirements of The Citizenship Act—are written for what we might say the "mass media", the people as a whole; but these people are a segment of our population who have difficulty in understanding some of our English terms, and I think some of us, ourselves, have difficulty understanding government terms. So we get these pamphlets or the information and our editor re-writes it, has it checked and re-checked—when I say "checked and re-checked", she is in very close contact with government departments.

In fact, one article that she wrote on the Canada Pension Plan was evidently considered so good—I think it was Canada Pension, wasn't it, Miss Gordon?—that the Department reprinted it in booklet form, and as one of our Directors, a former journalist said, it was the first time she had understood it. So you can see that there are areas where we can perform a valuable service.

We understand the ethnic problems, and we think they have confidence in us. We have been working very closely with them for the past nineteen to twenty years, and this personal contact from a small group is, in our opinion, infinitely more important than information which is sent out direct to them from a large information press service.

The material, as I said, is designed for a special segment of Canada's population. Over three and a quarter million immigrants, many of whom were familiar with neither French nor English, have settled in Canada since World War II.

Even though this tide has slackened, over a hundred and eighty thousand immigrants arrived during 1968; so there is still a problem.

Inevitably the first five years are the hardest, and they turn to their ethnic newspapers for the information in order to integrate or to adjust to a new language and culture.

We know that our material is reaching these people. We have a small office, as you have seen in the brief. We have an editor and an office secretary. Our finances are looked after for us by a Treasurer loaned to us by a large company, and the books are kept there and the bills are paid from there.

Our secretary is a member of a legal firm so that he makes sure that everything is done in the proper manner.

We are approached for assistance and advice in every phase of Canadian life. We are asked where they should go for legal advice, how to plan their funds and housing, and by this I mean they come to our office and ask us. Even government representatives often come to us for information, and—the percentage was mentioned this morning—twenty-eight per cent of the Canadian population depends on the ethnic press partly or totally for information, which will help them to become more integrated.

The ethnic Press Club has been represented here today. We helped, I think, encourage the editors in Toronto to form the Toronto Ethnic Press Club in 1951. The one in Winnipeg had been established for a great many years. We now have Ethnic Press Clubs in British Columbia, and one, I believe, is in the process of being organized in Quebec. An acknowledgment of our close co-operation with the Ethnic Press was the plaque presented by the Toronto Club on the tenth anniversary of its founding.

I should like to pay tribute here to the English-language press. We will be reading in the papers that they have appeared before this Committee, and I don't think that they said very much of the assistance that they gave to the Ethnic Press. They have done it through us. True, they don't publish very much about ethnic community organizations or problems or things like that, but I do feel that these newspapers understand the ethnic problems, and through Canadian Scene, they have been of considerable help.

We could never have operated our press service without the assistance of the Globe and Mail who gave us mats and free tear sheets, everything, for the first eight or nine years of our existence. Since then, they have made an extremely low charge that doesn't begin to cover their costs, and we pay a very small amount for that.

The Toronto Telegram has given us free mats, absolutely without any charge whatsoever. We have had to drop one mat service because of the postage charges on the large envelopes, and so we continued with the Globe and Mail because they allow us to put in with our tear sheets, mats from other newspapers, such as the Winnipeg Tribune, the Calgary Herald, the Edmonton Journal, the Vancouver Sun, and the Fredericton Gleaner.

These ethnic papers, as you will recognize if you have looked at Canadian Advertising Rates and Data, although they are published in Toronto or Montreal, they go right across the country. I have been surprised to find how many of them go down to the Maritimes, and how many from the centre of Canada go out to British Columbia, Manitoba and Saskatchewan, as well as the ones that are published in those western provinces.

The distribution amongst these ethnic peoples is very large, and I will stick to our figure of three million readers because we feel that there are very often in the house two families. One paper is subscribed, perhaps, to that house, and I think we are low in our estimate of the readership because there are very often more than four people in each household reading that paper.

I should also like to say that I am very sorry, and I apologize that due to our financial situation, we have come with money problems too, Mr. Senator. We were not able to provide for every member of the Committee copies of our exhibits. We couldn't include them independently.

The Chairman: You have them all right here, yes.

Mrs. Osler: You have received the Letter Patent and By-laws, and you have received the list of Directors, the Advisory Council, which goes from coast to coast, and the members of the Corporation.

This is a non-profit, non-share organization. We have also a copy of Canadian Scene as it goes to the translators. This is a large, eight-page mimeograph sheet. This is a translated copy in Italian, and this is the one in English. Our picture service is planned with very large cut lines underneath, more than an English press puts under their pictures, and very often there will be a story or an article illustrating that particular picture. Pictures are used extensively, particularly pictures about Canada. I am not talking about new pictures—prominent individuals, yes, but mostly pictures of various parts of Canada.

I think you also received a list of the number of articles that we have published since 1964. I will just show you by the number of pages how many were in 1964. Those are the articles under the heading.

you have seen these, please say so; so I am not taking up your time.

The Chairman: I think some have seen them and some haven't seen them. You might just go ahead.

Mrs. Osler: Well, the headings are "Government of Canada", and we ran six articles in the last year on "Bilingualism in Canada", which were prepared especially for us by the Citizenship Branch of the Secretary of the Department of State.

We have also done for the Department of Manpower and Immigration a longitudinal study of the settlement of immigrants in this country: "The Story of Canada's Government: 'In the Beginning,'" "Canada, the Nation"; "The Government Serves the People"; "Canada's Political Parties". Then there were articles such as "Ethnic Organizations in Canadian Society", and several more on the government of Canada.

We have an "Ottawa Report" written by a member of the Parliamentary press gallery. We have articles here on the "Provincial Government", "Municipal Government", and "Canada's Cities and Towns".

We have had "Buying and Owning Land in Canada", and the importance of having every contract checked by a legal adviser before it is signed, no matter what they buy, house or land or insurance or anything. Under "Education" we had an article called "Careers for the Future"—the number of scholarships that are available and the various schools across the country, and the services for newcomers, and the first degree course in hotel food administration which the CBC tells us they are going to use on their international service.

We have had articles on business and industry, articles on the arts, and articles on the history, and one in 1969, a series on the original Canadians which were our Canadian Indians, was picked up by practically every paper.

We also have articles on sports and on art, and that only covers the year, 1969.

Exhibit "E" is the type of picture that we sent out. These are all free, I may say, to the ethnic press, and the tear sheet that goes with it.

The drawings that you see have been provided by—not this particular one—but some of them from the C. W. Jefferys Collection of Canadiana. Others are done for us by artists, who are interested in our work, at a very low cost.

The newspapers and radio stations served by Canadian Scene are listed by provinces, and, as I say, go right across the country.

Since 1968, on account of shortage of funds, we have not been able to provide a usage report, and so this usage report on the number of the articles was taken over an average of the years, '66, '67, and '68.

We feel that they have increased from a low of one per cent Canadian content to an average of sixty per cent Canadian content. Our special projects were the Hungarian Bulletins, eight issues, which as I said in our brief was the only translated material on Canada that went over to Europe for these Hungarians. It is practical information.

Then we have the radio and the booklets which even our Embassies abroad heard about through the CBC International Service and wrote, and requested copies.

We had a radio programme in Italian. At the end of 1964 was the last time we were able to do any particular project, but since then, we have a new Italian newspaper in Toronto, and I am sorry not to see Mr. Ianuzzi here because his paper...

The Chairman: They made a separate presentation.

Mrs. Osler: Because his paper is absolutely outstanding in the amount of material on Canada that he uses. These are the sort that we have provided clippings from the papers as to how the news is picked up. I think that I have probably taken more than that.

The Chairman: Well, you are a most persuasive and effective saleswoman, and we are enjoying your presentation. That was a very compelling presentation. Notwithstanding the fact that it was a compelling presentation, I am sure there will be questions.

Mrs. Osler: I hope there will be.

The Chairman: I think before I turn to Senator Sparrow, perhaps I could just ask you one question first myself.

You say at page three of your brief:—

"Although the general public knows little of our service"...

Is that by design on your part?

Mrs. Osler: Yes, I think so. No, it's not by design. It's because we haven't had the funds to expend on advertising. The newspapers have been very good to us whenever we have had a special project. They have given us news. Speaking about the editors, we used to send them our annual report every year, and sometimes it would be picked up and sometimes it wouldn't.

Miss Gordon has been interviewed. I have been interviewed on the Betty Kennedy Show, and Betty Kennedy, who is one of our outstanding news commentators, said she had never heard of Canadian Scene before. I am afraid it wasn't any interview, it was a one-woman talk, which was most unfortunate, but, however, we got the message across, which was the main thing. But Betty Kennedy was extremely interested, and as a result of that talk—it showed us the value of radio in our work—we were very interested to receive a donation from a sixteen-year-old boy. I don't know whether it was because he heard the show because her programme's at three, but he had heard of us, and he wrote to us and said he was very concerned that there were a great many newcomers in his area and he felt not enough was being done for them. He was an English-speaking boy an Anglo-Saxon, I suppose, and he thought that we were doing amazing work and he would like to contribute five dollars. We felt very encouraged that a sixteen-year-old took that interest in his fellow-citizens.

The Chairman: Presumably you would be open to donations this morning? Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: Is two-fifty all right?

I don't want to let you think that the word "donation" is being used in this next question, but you refer to government assistance. I believe you refer to it in paragraph 31 and in the last sentence of the last page, number 33.

Mrs. Osler: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: "We need financial support from the Government". I would like you to explain the amounts you are referring to and how those grants or assistance might be forthcoming, referring back to number 31 again where you say, "Canadian Scene does not wish to become a governmental organization in form or in fact". Can you relate those two statements.

Mrs. Osler: Well, first of all, when we say we don't wish to become a government information service...

The Chairman: Where is that?

Senator Sparrow: Paragraph thirty-one.

The Chairman: Oh, yes, fine.

Mrs. Osler: We feel that we don't want to be a government propaganda mouthpiece. We feel that the small organization that can have personal contact with the editors is far more valuable than a large, government agency.

When I say we would like support from the government, for years, we have been sending out information on the various government departments, and industry has supported us up to the present time. Donations are falling off tremendously because, I suppose, of high taxation; also because they feel their money should go towards educational scholarships and hospitals, health and welfare projects, and they feel that this is perhaps not quite so necessary in their opinion as other types of organizations; they feel they should give their money to cancer research, that sort of thing, but our costs have risen considerably in the last few years; so we feel if we could get support from the government, we, in turn, will continue with the material that we send out about government facilities and what the Government of Canada has done for the people.

We did a series on social legislation—how Canada looks after its people, which was a series of five or six articles which were well taken up; all right, we feel that we are going to do this sort of thing. Why not have some return?

Now, in the last week or so, we have been approached by several government departments, and I think that there may be some consideration given to us for help, but when you ask for the amount, that's all in the matter of discussion.

We should continue with the services that we have cut back on. We have had to reduce some of our postage to third-class mailing. We have had to dispense with a full-time secretary. There are only two in our office, remember, and we also feel we could do a little bit more if we perhaps had a part-time researcher.

We have drawn up a budget—oh, and there are also our translators who, as I think we mentioned in the brief, are practically volunteer assistants of this programme. They definitely should be paid more than they are getting now because their expenses have risen too. True, they have their own jobs, but as you know, most immigrants take two jobs anyway. Now, these people, if they do our translations, can't take a full-paying job as their second job; so that they are doing it because they feel that there is a value for their services, and the costs would go, I would say, up to something like—at the present time it's twenty-seven thousand—it would go up to almost fifty or fifty-five thousand.

Senator Sparrow: So, your budget is twenty-seven?

Mrs. Osler: Twenty-seven thousand.

Senator Sparrow: That's the total budget?

Mrs. Osler: That's our total budget. We have done all this on twenty-seven thousand, and we are getting in an average of twenty-one to twenty-two thousand a year.

Senator Sparrow: How much, specifically in dollars, are you asking for from the Government?

Mrs. Osler: I have asked fifty, but I won't get it, I know.

The Chairman: Who have you asked?

Mrs. Osler: Our Minister Without Portfolio.

The Chairman: Mr. Stanbury, and how did he react to your request? He said he would go away and think about it?

Mrs. Osler: Yes, he said I was joking.

The Chairman: I don't think you joke. I am sure he took you very seriously.

Mrs. Osler: Well, he, first of all, I think, thought I was joking because apparently their budget is less for extra-curricular things than what we were asking.

True, it's not a good thing to ask for the total amount from the Government because this should be a combination of Government and industry, but we see that if we get a grant from the Government, that industry possibly may fall off even more.

The Chairman: Could I ask you at that point—you mention on page six, "With financial assistance from five major Canadian corporations"—this was when you began in 1951?

Mrs. Osler: Yes.

The Chairman: Could you tell us who those five major Canadian corporations were?

Mrs. Osler: Yes, Abitibi, Massey-Ferguson, Imperial Oil, Eaton's and Simpson's.

The Chairman: And then could you also tell us, Mrs. Osler—you made a reference in your oral presentation about your Treasurer being loaned to you by a big company. Would it be fair, and if it isn't, say so—would it be fair to ask who that company was?

Mrs. Osler: I would prefer not to say.

The Chairman: Well, then, let me address myself to a concern that I have, and perhaps you can allay my concern—it seems to me that you said you are very anxious not to become a government propaganda mouthpiece, if I am correct. Aren't you possibly open to the charge of being a mouthpiece—that's a word I don't use, but you did use and I am sure you don't use it often either—of the business community? I note you mentioned that your support should come from government and industry. I am curious to know if you ever approached the national labour unions, for example, and what their reaction was.

Mrs. Osler: Yes, the Canadian Labour Congress has made a small donation each year, but we have never approached them for a large donation.

The Chairman: I might just put the question fully and then you can come out and answer it perhaps fully. I looked at the Directorate of the Advisory Council. We have done a study of the articles which have appeared in Canadian Scene. I have no criticism of them, but it seems to me there is almost a discernible absence of information about labour unions. There seems to be a preponderance of business activity evidenced in your articles and in your budget and in your thinking. Now, I am sure it's not by design. I am not suggesting anything conspiratorial at all. I am just wondering if you would comment on this.

Mrs. Osler: Well, when you say "business", we do point out where the economic possibilities for employment are, through writing articles. I think perhaps Miss Gordon could answer.

The Chairman: Well, Miss Gordon, fine.

Miss Ruth Gordon, Editor of 'Canadian Scene': You perhaps noticed—the Labour Congress did a very splendid series of articles. I am not just sure which year it is. Now, I could find it for you. We only have twenty-six issues per year; so, of course, you may not find anything on labour for a few months because we have so many things we are trying to tell these people about.

You rather startled me when you said that, because I wasn't aware of any preponderance of material concerned with business, and just latterly I think it has had two stories, and I have a Canadian writer doing a series on companies and businesses, beginning with the Bell Telephone, going into communications and we are going to go into mining, because we have never done a series to let immigrants understand the different industries across Canada, or at least try to introduce where the opportunities might be—what it would be like to live in British Columbia—where he might settle in Newfoundland. This is the feeling behind that.

I just wondered if you had perhaps hit those two pages.

The Chairman: Perhaps I did. I have been through this several times.

Miss Gordon: I was startled when you said it because I didn't have any realization that perhaps there was so much emphasis on that.

The Chairman: Well, I am perhaps more aware of it because of the relativity of your financial structure. Again you said a moment or two ago that you think you should be supported by the government and industry, and, you know, I think I would be concerned to have an organization like yours supported totally by government and industry, being accused, and I am not making this accusation—by people of having a bias. Does this not trouble you?

Mrs. Osler: Well, it isn't only industry. We have had also from foundations; we have individuals, a small number, it is true, and the I.O.D.E. chapters across Canada contribute and they have from the very beginning, but that is true. You can't depend on just one organization helping you or one special part of Canadian economy.

The Chairman: One special cross-section of the community?

Mrs. Osler: Yes, also you may wonder why we haven't approached more people.

The Chairman: Well, that was my next question.

Mrs. Osler: Yes; we haven't had the funds to mount a large campaign like some organizations are able to do. Our philosophy has been that every cent, that is given to us, is used to promote the service of Canadian Scene; therefore, there should be no expense in campaigning.

I would like to point out that for the last two years, our travelling allowance was a hundred and fifty dollars. What organization can do anything on that?

The Chairman: Well, now, I am going to ask you a question. You could, perhaps, answer it with a question; so let me declare myself on the question you might put to me. Personally—I am not speaking for my colleagues on this Committee—I am one of those who would be in favour of full disclosure of where political parties get their funds from. I think it would be in the public interest.

Well, the question I put to you: would it not be in the public interest of the readers of the ethnic papers who ultimately receive your information to know that it comes from the Canadian Scene; to know what Canadian Scene is; and to know who is footing the bill?

Mrs. Osler: You mean the readers of the ethnic papers?

The Chairman: Are they aware of Canadian Scene?

Mrs. Osler: They are.

The Chairman: They do?

Mrs. Osler: They are.

The Chairman: Dr. Kirschbaum, are you readers aware... yes Mr. Mauko.

Mr. Mauko: Most of the articles in our newspaper have a notation at the beginning or at the end as to Canadian Scene or at least initials, "C.S.".

The Chairman: Yes, but do your readers know what Canadian Scene is?

Miss Gordon: We have written several stories.

The Chairman: You have written actual stories on what Canadian Scene is?

Miss Gordon: Yes.

Mr. Mokrzycki: Now, we have very close co-operation for many years, actually from the beginning; the ethnic newspapers, editor and readers are acquainted with the work of the Canadian Scene.

The Chairman: Fine, I am just delighted.

Mr. Mokrzycki: And in each paper it is mentioned that articles comes from the 'Canadian Scene.

The Chairman: I think it's very important to have on the record this kind of discussion, because I think it's useful for us to know that your readers are aware of this. Mrs. Jennings?

Mrs. Jennings: Mr. Senator, the Canadian Citizenship Council several years ago said that Canadian Scene is one of the outstanding organizations and gave us their award—mounted beaver pelt—and that was widely published. So I think everybody that's interested in Canadian Scene, especially the foreign language press, certainly knows where and how we...

The Chairman: Yes, Mrs. Jennings, I want to make my point clear. I am less interested in the foreign language press than I am in the readers of the foreign language press. Yes, Mr. Gellner, I am sorry.

Mr. John Gellner, Vice-President, Canadian Scene: I would just like to say that if it seems that Canadian Scene is mainly supported by industry, it is simply because we started working immediately and thereafter always wanted to raise our funds in the simplest possible way and without any expense.

I would like to especially emphasize again that Mrs. Osler said that our raising of funds was cost absolutely nothing; so the raising of funds was in itself a charitable act by the person who raised this money.

I can't think of any other charitable organization in this country which is raising money totally free of cost; so we had to turn to public-spirited individuals who would do it on their own.

On the other hand, we couldn't very well ask this public-spirited individual to go and do some very big and costly campaign; so in practical terms, the money was raised by somebody having a lot of friends and writing to these friends, "Please contribute to Canadian Scene". This was the cheapest and fastest way of doing this; the only way we could get such a charitable gift actually from somebody. It's obvious that such a person who can raise, I don't know, twenty-three thousand dollars just by writing to friends, will necessarily be a banker or a president of a corporation, or a big insurance company and so on; so we were directed in this direction of big business through the necessity of raising money quickly and without cost.

If we could mount a campaign like other charitable institutions and pay anything between eight and fifteen per cent of the money raised, we would obviously then go to the public.

The Chairman: My concern about big government and big business parallels a concern I have about big labour, but in all instances I think it should be broadly represented and that's why I raised the point, and I think we discussed it.

Mrs. Osler: May I just say that never in the twenty years that we have been operating has any company criticized or asked us to do a certain thing.

The Chairman: I think that's good to have on record. Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Yves Fortier: It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that one obvious source of funds for the maintenance of the services which Canadian Scene is providing would be subscriptions from those immigrants now having become full-fledged Canadians, who have made good in Canada. There are many of them.

Have you ever considered tapping that market, so to speak?

Mrs. Osler: Yes, we have, and we have received contributions from them.

Mr. Fortier: It seems to me that a group of them may even feel compelled to underwrite the costs entirely.

Mrs. Osler: No, I wouldn't think so because I feel that they are using their money, the very successful ones, to further education, scholarships, and that sort of thing in Canada as a whole, and also I think I may be right in saying that they feel that anything else they wish to give to the ethnic communities goes to the ethnic organizations.

Would I be correct, Dr. Kirschbaum, in saying that?

Mr. Fortier: But I would be correct also in assuming that they would have a definite interest in seeing to the maintenance of the Canadian Scene.

Mrs. Osler: Well, the ones we have approached have been.

The Chairman: Could I perhaps put this to you in your capacity as the editor, not about the content of the Canadian Scene, but I had wanted to ask Dr. Kirschbaum more this morning, and we ran out of time, as you know, about the adequacy of the mass media generally for the ethnic community. Would you comment on that?

Miss Gordon: Well, I feel that the radio and television are aware. No, I don't think they do, but I think at this moment, perhaps even in the last six months, I sense they are becoming suddenly more aware.

The Chairman: Why do you have that sense? Could you articulate?

Miss Gordon: I notice I was called by the Ontario Department the other day. They were putting on a new TV education series.

The Chairman: I am sorry. They want you to speak more loudly.

Miss Gordon: ...directed to ethnic groups, and they wanted me to help them on the material, which I couldn't do because I was coming down here. I have several people doing an Italian radio programme now in Toronto, who have come in, and one of them, one radio station, said he simply read Canadian Scene from top to bottom. He was in such a rush to get the material the first day. I just have never had so many requests coming in to me.

The Chairman: Well, let me put another question to you. The most popular television program in Canada, I suppose—we have this information and I have researched the matters in question, but let's say that the two most popular programmes in Canada are the "Beverly Hillbillies" and the National Hockey League broadcast. Don't the members of the ethnic community watch the "Beverly Hillbillies" and watch the hockey games?

Miss Gordon: Well, I would have to turn to the gentlemen down there to answer that.

The Chairman: Well, I will put it then to Dr. Kirschbaum.

Dr. Kirschbaum: Sir, I didn't get the question.

The Chairman: Do the Canadians of ethnic origin watch hockey games on television?

Dr. Kirschbaum: Oh, the younger generation, yes, certainly.

The Chairman: The younger generation?

Dr. Kirschbaum: Yes.

The Chairman: A majority of the younger generation?

Dr. Kirschbaum: The older ones, I think rarely, because it was not so much a European sport when they start to arrive to Canada; soccer probably more than hockey but the younger generation definitely.

Most of the stars are of ethnic origin, either here or in the United States, but the younger generation watch it.

The Chairman: How about other television programmes, programmes like the "Beverly Hillbillies" and Ed Sullivan and so on?

Dr. Kirschbaum: No. There are no studies to this effect, but television is in every ethnic home, I think, except in farms and maybe in farms too and they watch a lot. I don't think there would be any difference between other Canadians and the ethnics.

The Chairman: Well, if I could turn to you Mrs. Osler, for a moment. You were present for the discussion this morning and the discussion this morning was one which I have had many times with Mr. Mokrzycki and other representatives of the ethnic press in other capacities, and this is their grievance about not receiving enough national advertising, government advertising and particularly national advertising as well. Has Canadian Scene ever considered offering its assistance in the development of some kind of campaign to attract advertising to the ethnic press?

Mrs. Osler: We never have. I think we might answer that.

Mr. Gellner: There isn't to my knowledge.

The Chairman: Well, I shouldn't make comment. I should be asking questions; so will perhaps put this in the form of a question. The ethnic press receives, I think, an enormously sympathetic ear from Committee like this and from other government agencies and even from the Prime Minister, as was made clear at the presentation earlier this morning, but somehow, there seems to be a great slip betwixt the sympathy and the actual, hard cash advertising dollars, and I think one of the reasons is, as was implicit in the question I put to Mr. Mokrzycki, they see this themselves, they admit this, that the difficulty and I can see it must be an enormous difficulty, is putting hard, cold statistics in front of the people who make the advertising decisions...

Mr. Hamill: I think you are right. It's a matter of the proper information being available to the space buyer.

The Chairman: Couldn't someone help the ethnic press in this area?

Mr. Hamill: It's conceivable. It's something we would like to do at this point.

The Chairman: I appreciate that's not in the nature of your study.

Mr. Hamill: That's not the name of the game, no.

The Chairman: Do Senators have questions? Yes, Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: Your service to the ethnic press is free.

Mrs. Osler: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: Entirely—is that correct? There is no billing at all? The contributions come back to the ethnic press itself through the Federation or to the individual newspapers?

Mrs. Osler: Several times during the years, the ethnic press have sent in contributions to us when they have known we have been in difficulty, not the individual paper, but—yes, occasionally we have sent out a letter to our editors saying that we are having a bad time. But you can't expect a small newspaper which is being run the way you heard this morning, to send a contribution, and so out of a hundred and three newspapers, we have had perhaps fifteen contributions from the press. We don't expect it from them, but we just let them know.

Senator Sparrow: In your comments, and I may have missed this, you referred to Canadian content having increased from one per cent to sixty per cent in the ethnic press, generally speaking, I assume.

Mr. Gellner: No, no, no, in certain papers. As low as one per cent would only have been in certain papers, in the long-established ones, obviously not. You heard this morning from Mr. Dojack that ethnic papers here exist—eighty-four years. Now these papers would then have been largely Canadian oriented but in some papers it was almost nil, and his reference of one per cent refers to certain papers where Canadian content was practically nil.

remember specifically one where it was totally directed not only to events at home, but events at home, which were history, perhaps twenty or thirty years ago. It was not only so far away from Canada, it was even so far away from actual events in the home country; so I would say this one per cent is a low point, and sixty per cent would now be the average.

Senator Sparrow: The average would be sixty per cent.

The Chairman: Senator Quart?

Senator Quart: Well, to begin with, I would like to congratulate these two ladies who were co-founders, and I can quite understand it must have been your personality over the years that kept this alive.

I also feel very sympathetic towards you coming before a group such as this, and I, having been a volunteer and an I.O.D.E. member of the old Baden Powell chapter feel that too many women's groups don't put a price tag on themselves and I think governments and maybe men in general are a little suspicious. They don't evaluate your services sufficiently, but I must say that I think women's groups do a tremendous amount for both government and in general.

I was wondering if you have had any free service while the Alert Service in Toronto existed?

Mrs. Osler: Yes, Marjorie Lamb's service.

Senator Quart: Yes, because I do know how she operated on a shoestring.

Mrs. Osler: We didn't have financial assistance from her.

Senator Quart: No, no, she was having hard times herself, but now I understand from the last letter I have had from her—she operated all during the war—that she is getting out of business as it were. Well, wouldn't you probably come in for her heritage? I don't know. I am just asking.

Mrs. Osler: No, we would not have the trained people that she would be able to secure.

Senator Quart: Volunteers as well.

Mrs. Osler: Yes.

The Chairman: Would Senator Quart or the witness care to explain what the Alert Service was?

Senator Quart: Oh, well, this Alert Service was supplied free of charge to anybody throughout Canada who wanted to have information. It was used extensively by the Department of National Defence during the war years, and she did get some sort of money, I don't know the amount—I know very, very well how they are set up, but I wasn't prepared for this question. However, I do know that the organizations across Canada, including the I.O.D.E. and others supported her, and as well she did have grants from the Government, I believe, during the war.

Her work was chiefly anti-Communist, and she had a wealth of information there, and she had to move offices a couple of times because her office was broken into and all sorts of things. And she was a volunteer, from Quebec, incidentally, of which I am very proud, being a Quebecker. I was going to ask one other question. Have you had any contact whatever with the Aide aux Immigrés in Quebec?

It's a volunteer group and they supply literature to the immigrants as they pass through the Port of Quebec and really work very closely with the Department of Immigration through Madame Louise Savard. I suppose you know of her because she brings these people across Canada—well, I mean the new Canadians, across Canada, and then the Y.W.C.A.—have you had anything from the Y.W.?

Miss Gordon: We are in touch with the Y.W. on English classes, but I must point out here that I am the Editor and I have a secretary, and I go to Montreal, and I go once a year to talk with my editors, but only time and lack of resources would stop me from being in closer touch with all these places because I am sure they do a splendid job. It would be helpful to me, but I just don't have the time or the staff to do that sort of thing.

Senator Quart: I hope the gentlemen appreciated your travelling expenses amounted to a hundred and fifty dollars.

I have just one other suggestion, if I may. You mentioned, Senator Davey, I believe, the advertisements to the ethnic groups.

The Chairman: Yes.

Senator Quart: How about your Committee taking over that and charging it for professional fees for getting the advertisements?

The Chairman: I think you mean our Committee, Senator Quart.

Senator Quart: No, no, no—well, maybe, but that would be an idea. I really didn't think of this group.

Mrs. Osler: I think we might put Mr. Mokrzycki out of business. That wouldn't be a good idea.

The Chairman: Senator Hays?

Senator Hays: Mrs. Osler, do you have counterpart in the United States?

Mrs. Osler: I think Mrs. Jennings could answer that. We went down to New York when we got a letter at the time from Radio Free Europe, which was a part of this enormous organization. Do you remember the name of it?

Mrs. Jennings: No, I don't remember the name of it. It was a service which isn't quite the same as ours. It was a service to the ethnic press, who paid for it. It wasn't the same as ours at all, so we didn't find anything comparable.

Senator Hays: Is there anything like this anywhere in the world or is this unique in Canada.

Mrs. Jennings: Not to my knowledge, no—it's a completely voluntary organization.

Mrs. Osler: And providing the type of material.

Mrs. Jennings: I think this is what we keep forgetting. It's just really to give material to the people and the press who wish it. The large press perhaps don't wish it, but we are providing material free of cost, and we couldn't possibly, I don't think, go into advertising. This isn't why we set ourselves up. It was a voluntary organization to provide something that is not governmental, but is given by the people for the people.

Senator Hays: You suggested that you had asked for fifty thousand dollars. You didn't expect to get that. How much do you think you would take to function the way you would like to function?

Mrs. Osler: Well, I think I should let Mr. Hamill answer that.

The Chairman: Mr. Hamill?

Mr. Hamill: Well, Mr. Chairman, this is difficult to answer because of the "iffy" nature of the question, but I would think that our top figure is about forty thousand in excess of what we now have by way of income, and the major expenditure, Mr. Chairman, would be a tremendous increase in what we would pay our translators. We are now paying the translators fees in our current budget of about ten thousand, five hundred, and we would go to about forty thousand, and this because of the fact that we feel that the translators have been, as Mrs. Osler so well put it, virtually unpaid volunteers. They get a very small amount for the translation work they are doing. We are not really competitive with the rates paid by other publications in Canada who have translation work done by these people. That is the biggest increase and if we were to shade that down, which we probably could—Mrs. Osler could perhaps comment on that—any other increases in our estimates—none are very great, but we do have a figure for research assistants.

Our editor has had to be researcher, editor and general factotum. We feel we could do a more efficient job if we had even on a part-time basis someone as a researcher. We have an item of two thousand and eighty dollars for that, and we would like to have again usage reports.

I think Mrs. Osler mentioned that we did for many years have a usage report which was compiled through the assistance of our translators, and we had to drop that due to the lack of funds, but by the same token that radio and TV people in other media endeavour to find out what the readership is of their work, we like to know too what the readership is, and the usage, and we have put an item in for that of twenty-five hundred; so, to answer your question, sir, I would think that we could probably do a much better job and a much more effective job—maybe I shouldn't put these words in your mouth, Mrs. Osler, but perhaps half of our original estimate this year; say, for twenty-five thousand in addition to what we now have, I think we could do a much more effective job; be more fair to our translators and do a little research and even, perhaps, have a look at the usage; so that we would, I think, do a better job all around.

The Chairman: Mrs. Osler, I wonder if I might ask you this question, please. Would you compare the job that the ethnic press was doing in 1951 in promoting this integration of the newcomers into the Canadian mainstream with the job you feel it is doing now, and comment on the adequacy of the job it's doing now—in your opinion, that is.

Mrs. Osler: Well, this is purely my opinion.

The Chairman: Well, of course.

Mrs. Osler: I think that the Western papers were probably doing an amazing job. Don't forget in 1951 when we first started looking into this question, we had no idea there were so many ethnic newspapers in Canada; so that when we discovered there were a hundred and twenty-four, it was a great surprise to us, but most of them at that time, and I think I am correct, were in the West.

There were some Polish ones and Ukrainian, but Polish ones in the East—by the "East", I mean the centre of Canada and Ontario—and even they did not have the Canadian content, or the type of material that they are now using extensively.

At that time, they did not have it, and I think they were integrating their newcomers by telling them as much as they were able to find out at that particular time, but they couldn't find out the things that they are now getting. So that I would say that the job they are doing now to integrate their fellow-citizens of their own tongue is—well, as we have said, an average of sixty per cent Canadian content in the larger papers, and there has been as much as ninety per cent in some of the papers; so I would say that they are doing a hundred per cent better really. Figures don't mean anything to me, but a hundred per cent more than they were then.

The Chairman: If I may say to the witnesses and to the Senators, just so we will all know where we are at, it's about ten minutes to one. I know Mr. Fortier has a question and I have one more question. Perhaps Senator Sparrow has questions; so I hope we won't run too late beyond one o'clock because, of course, we are back at two-thirty.

I am just going to digress before I turn to Senator Sparrow or turning to Mr. Fortier to direct the attention of Senators and others to the presence in the room of two Members of the House of Commons who, I think, have a special interest in the problems of the ethnic community generally, Mr. Stanley Haidasz who is Member of Parliament for Parkdale and at the back of the room is Mr. Charles Caccia, who is the Member of Parliament for Davenport.

I think that Mr. Caccia has an observation he might like to offer at this point.

Mr. Charles Caccia, M.P., Davenport: Mr. Chairman, senators and Ladies and Gentlemen:—if I might say this on the subject of Canadian Scene: if 'Canadian Scene' were not to exist, it seems to me that it would have to be formed and very quickly in order to provide the type of service that it is providing at present, and it has provided in the past.

It was formed because it provides a kind of adhesion which keeps not only the ethnic press together in exchanging cultural news and as to what Canada is all about, but also in providing a flow of communication from, let's say, the "Canadian Establishment" into the newly established groups throughout the country, and this is what it is doing in its printed form.

Through their radio media, which is equally important amongst many families where perhaps no newspapers are read, a similar function has been performed on an experimental basis by Canadian Scene and it was a very useful one, which, if funds were to be available, would be continual.

On the subject of television, and particularly the teaching of the two official languages, here again Canadian Scene displayed an imaginative approach, and did an experiment some years ago in co-operation with Metro. and the CBC.

Of the three media, Mr. Chairman, it seems as if the television is the most popular of the three and the one that reaches the largest audience, and it is very sad if once the experiment was carried out and proved its success, that it wasn't picked up by other agencies or at the national level for its implementation on a fuller scale.

It is a tremendous need, I would be inclined to think, for the teaching of the two national languages and through such a popular media such as television; so, as I mentioned, Mr. Chairman, the existence of Canadian Scene is not only a desirable one, but it seems to me, a highly necessary one.

The Chairman: Thank you. Dr. Haidasz, do you have anything to add to that?

Dr. Stanley Haidasz, M.P., Parkdale: Mr. Chairman, I would just like to add that thanks to Canadian Scene and the sacrifice that editors of ethnic newspapers have made in the past they have saved the Canadian government and the provincial government huge sums of money because they have been providing information and news which are necessary and which, I think, the government has the duty to provide and disseminate. In the past, they have played a very important role in this public information field, and I would like to see that everything, that can be done, will be done to provide them with the tools to carry on their very good work.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: I suppose there's a question to do with the effectiveness of the ethnic press. There have been representations made by ethnic groups, and particularly, I believe, Italian-Canadians from Ontario, to have the franchise extended to Canadian new immigrants after a year of residence in Canada.

Would you like to comment on that proposal or suggestion, as well as, perhaps, the previous group that appeared before us, Mr. Chairman. Think on that; if, in fact, the new Canadian doesn't speak English, is he, in fact, in a position to vote intelligently in Canada after a year?

Mrs. Osler: May I ask one of our new Canadians?

The Chairman: Dr. Kirschbaum? Would you care to comment on that question?

Dr. Kirschbaum: I would just like to repeat that the ethnic press is very grateful to Canadian Scene and I hope that all the difficulties they have now they will solve with the help of all good Canadians because the ethnic press couldn't perform the service without the help, especially towards the unity of Canada, the unity of this country and the background of this country.

The Chairman: But, did you not hear Senator Sparrow's question, Doctor? Senator Sparrow, you might put your question to Dr. Kirschbaum. No, it's quite all right.

Senator Sparrow: I think he wanted to make a statement as far as Canadian Scene was concerned.

The Chairman: Oh, forgive me. I thought you were going to finish off with his question. Carry on, Doctor. I am sorry.

Mrs. Osler: May I ask Mr. Gellner to do that?

The Chairman: By all means—thank you, Doctor. Now, Mr. Gellner, have you a comment on that?

Mr. Gellner: It seems to me that this is purely political question. It's the same question as one which is now asked that the eight teen-year-olds should vote or not, and I don't think that Canadian Scene would be in a position to answer it.

By and large, I would answer in this way:—that in the first year, the great majority of the immigrants, of course, are only informed about the questions which the immigrant would answer as a vote from the ethnic press. He has no other way.

The life of the ethnic communities is largely overlooked in the English and French language mass media; so even if he could read English and French, he wouldn't learn very much about his own group, but by and large, the great majority would know about the political questions presented to the voters only from the ethnic press.

I would say from what I know of the ethnic press, and I read regularly my own Czech and the German and the Italian—I would say that the immigrant is adequately informed about the problems of this country, and therefore would not be in a worse position as far as knowledge is concerned than very many voters who are of the English or of the French language. He would be largely in the same position.

Now, whether he has this sense of responsibility of citizenship after a mere one year, I couldn't answer. Some will and some won't.

If I may make a further point in this connection. Just this morning, it was suggested it would be a sign of successful integration if the ethnic press went out of business, and I would like to say that just because the life of the twenty-six or twenty-eight per cent is not covered very adequately in the English language and French language mass media, there is a continued need, of course, for the ethnic press.

If I may give myself as an example. I am a writer in the English language, and since I am not, I should be able to read English papers well, but I still read the ethnic paper.

This is also connected with the strengths which we in this third group have derived from the cultural heritage which we have brought along, and which, I think, is the principal contribution which we have made to this country.

Now, a cultural heritage is not a quantity which you bring into the country and dump down and forget. It's a continuum. You get spiritual sustenance from it forever, and in the second and the third generation as well; so, let's say, for us in this third group, even if we are completely living in the English or French environment, this connection with the ethnic group is almost a spiritual necessity, and the ethnic press provides the food to satisfy this hunger which remains in us and which I hope remains forever.

Senator Sparrow: Can I ask Dr. Kirschbaum...

The Chairman: Yes, you may if I may just first of all put on the record the fact that the reference to successful integration meaning the disappearance of the ethnic press came from me, but I think it should be clear on the record that I was quoting Time Magazine. Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: Would Dr. Kirschbaum like to comment on the type of job that the ethnic press can do within a year for immigrants?

The Chairman: I think the question which Senator Sparrow has asked is:— how effective is the ethnic press in assisting an immigrant in his first year?

Dr. Kirschbaum: Now, it is quite simple. They mostly come without knowing any English or any French except for the brochures which are distributed by the Department of State, it is only the ethnic paper or ethnic press which can give them the information on Canada, on Canadian laws, which they can read, even to be to a degree happy.

Then, of course, the ethnic press on the other hand informs them where to find organizations or their own group, who assist either socially or where to find a parish. They want to go because in all of this social field, it is only the ethnic newspapers which can give enough information, let us say, to even the Italian or now recently Portuguese or any immigrant who came to Canada because he was unable to read the other press or understand information unless it was in his language, which was published before by the Canadian Government.

It is much better now from the Manpower and Immigration Department, Department of State, that there are from time to time brochures which are distributed and the immigrant can learn something, but not many read it or many put it just into a pocket and say, "We will read it later", but the ethnic papers in Toronto and in Winnipeg or Montreal are available, and it is a sort of friend and it's a link with the older settlers here, and through them to the Canadian life.

The Chairman: Thank you. Mrs. Jennings?

Mrs. Jennings: Well, Mr. Chairman, I just want to remind you that Canadian Scene is non-political and I think it is a point that we must remember, and non-sectarian and it just isn't biased in any way, and I think that this is one reason the ethnic press perhaps appreciate it. We don't take sides in any points.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier, I think I can give you the last question.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: I think the last question but one—I have one myself.

Mr. Fortier: I think we can take judicial notice of an often-repeated criticism emanating from members of the Quebec Government, to the effect that immigrants settling in the Province of Quebec, and in Montreal in particular, are marrying themselves into the English community rather than the French community.

Now, given this entrée en matière—or this introduction, I note from your brief, Mrs. Osler, that all of your articles are prepared in English, and that they are then distributed to a number of newspapers, eight of which at least, as I read the record, would be weeklies published in Quebec.

Now, my question is twofold. One:—do you have any French-Canadian writing with his or her training, experience, background as a French-Canadian on your editorial staff, and if not, have you ever attempted to hire one?

Mrs. Osler: First of all, we have no real editorial staff. Our editor is the one who does most of it. We have invited French journalists to write for us. True, they are written in English; Mr. Daigneault who is—I can't remember what paper...

Mr. Fortier: That still doesn't answer my question satisfactorily.

Mrs. Osler: And Claude Ryan, and they have both sent us material and been very pleased with the way we have handled it and sent it back to them for corrections. We have never considered French a foreign language in this country.

Mr. Fortier: I notice it's not one of the languages in which your English manuscripts are translated?

Mrs. Osler: Also, the immigrant is allowed to choose to speak either French or English, but our material is not designed for the French newspaper. It's designed for their own newspapers, to get the material about Canada into their own language or their understanding; that they are able to either read the French or English. In mentioning this, it brings up quite an interesting point because La Banque Canadienne Nationale—my accent is not good—wrote to us and said, "What are you doing on the Province of Quebec?", and we were able to send them a list of articles that we have done on French-Canada, all phases of French-Canada, historical, religious, industry and everything else, and they were so impressed that they increased their contribution.

Mr. Fortier: Very important over here would be the fact that much of this information would be directed to immigrants living in Quebec, and consequently I certainly believe that it would be most important that for those immigrants living in Quebec, to have those articles appearing in their ethnic newspapers, written by French-Canadians.

Mrs. Osler: Yes, I see what you mean.

Mr. Fortier: That's the point that I wanted to make.

Mr. Dojack: There are some individual publications that have direct contact with French journalists who write for the ethnic press in Canada.

The Chairman: My question was so similar to Mr. Fortier's that I am going to allow him to have the final question. Mrs. Osler, if I may say to you how grateful we are. As I said at the outset, it has been a most compelling presentation. If you felt in any of our questions an implied criticism or that these have been carping, I can assure you that has not been the case, but I think it's rather useful to a study like this to have your views on the record.

I might also say that this is the first presentation we have received from anybody anywhere in which we have had testimonial from Members of the House of Commons.

If I may through you express our appreciation to Mr. Gellner, Mr. Hamill and, of course, Mrs. Jennings and to Miss Gordon and if I may repeat, Dr. Kirschbaum, the expression of appreciation at the conclusion of the presentation you made earlier. If could leave just one thought with you and with the group who are here representing the ethnic press, I hope that you will not feel that in directing only these few hours to your problems, that we are not mindful or interested. We have done an extensive amount of research, as you know, into the ethnic press. We realize the formidable role that you play in the over-all media structure in Canada, and it is in that particular context that we have asked you here.

You should realize that we are not conducting a study of the ethnic press, but rather a study of the over-all media structure in which you play a vital role.

I thank you again. I thank all of you, and I say to the Senators present that we are reconvening this afternoon upstairs in Room 356-S.

This afternoon we have two briefs. We have a brief at two-thirty from the Canadian Business Press. We have one at four-o'clock from the Business Press Editors' Association, and at eight o'clock tonight we have as our witness the Honourable Eric Kierans.

Mr. Fortier: It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that if you wish to attract Members of the House of Commons more often to your hearings, we should have lady witnesses more often.

The Chairman: As a matter of personal privilege, I have no desire to attract Members of the House of Commons.

The Committee adjourned at 1.10 p.m.

—Upon resuming at 2.30 p.m.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, if I may call the session to order. This afternoon we are going to begin our study of the magazine industry, but more particularly before we turn to consumer magazines, we are going to examine the role and function of the business press.

I think the first thing I should do is apologize to our guests for the slight delay from 2.30 beginning time. The morning session in the past one o'clock so this is perhaps one of the reasons. We are sorry.

On my immediate right is the President of the Canadian Business Press, Mr. Gabriel Marchand. Mr. Marchand is also the Montreal manager of Maclean-Hunter Business Publications. On his immediate right is Mr. George Mansfield. Mr. Mansfield is the General Manager of the Business Press Association. On my immediate left is Mr. Aubrey Joel who is a Vice-President of the Business Press Association and also the President of the Southam Business Publications Ltd., which along with Maclean-Hunter's Business Publications Ltd. will be appearing quite separately tomorrow.

On the extreme left is Mr. Jack Deragon who is sitting in really as a substitute for Mr. Harry Weston who is a Vice President. Mr. Deragon is now Vice President Marketing, National Business Publications.

I understand that introductory statements are going to be made by Mr. Marchand and by Mr. Joel, and I would say to the two of you that we allow about 15 minutes for opening statements.

I would say, Mr. Marchand, that the brief you prepared has been received as requested some three weeks in advance and presumably has been studied by the Senators. You are, of course, free to expand upon it, or explain, or indeed say anything else you may wish. Following your statement the Senators may wish to question you on the contents of the brief or the statements that you make, or perhaps on other things as well.

[Translation]

Mr. Gabriel Marchand, President, Canadian Business Press: Mr. Chairman, Honourable Senators, the main purpose of this brief is to inform the Committee of the contribution of the business press in the matters essential to the cultural and economic development of Canada.

[Text]

There are 510 business publications in Canada including annuals. They cover all classifications of business and industry; they include an increasing number of specialized publications serving specific segments of industry. These 510 periodicals have a total circulation per issue of 4,400,000 with a readership representative of the total Canadian business and professional population. Advertisers invest more than $40 million in the Canadian business press; this is apart from production costs and advertising department expenditures.

[Translation]

The principal publishing centres for Canadian business publications are Toronto and Montreal; there are however substantial companies in Vancouver and Winnipeg.

[Text]

Senator Smith: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to interrupt but the translation is not coming through.

The Chairman: Is the translator available? Please carry on Mr. Marchand.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Chairman, I can turn to English.

The Chairman: No, no, just carry on in French.

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand: These publications are, for the most part, of national scope in their circulation and distribution. There is a large number whose scope is national and which are solidly established in their area. In Quebec, most of these publications are French language publications.

[Text]

Canadian Business Press, the industry association has stringent membership requirements. The 132 publications members of CBP of which there are 18 in the French language are of bona fide Canadian ownership; they are published by 25 different publishing companies across Canada from Vancouver to the Maritimes; they are required to have a circulation audit; they are required to subscribe to the standards of practice and code of ethics of CBP, which is an association set up to promote sound publishing practices.

I would like here just to make a few points. The primary role of the business publication over the years has not been changed greatly. It might be described as:

1. To provide businessmen and women with the specialized kind of business information which is not available in the popular press and which will have an important effect on their own business decisions—to assist the reader in the better performance of his or her job;
2. To collect and disseminate for Canadian business and professions the experience of those engaged in a specific industry, profession or trade;
3. To interpret the events, trends and developments as they affect the Canadian business community;
4. To lead the Canadian business or industry served in formulating sound policies and ideas.

Actually, Canada's business publications play a vital role in Canadian business—and this is a very important point—professional and industrial life; they are the principal media of adult education and training and the principal source of practical information in many fields.

The rapid industrialization and development of a complex business community in Canada has made the business executive more conscious than ever of the need for accurate information and sound interpretation. Business publications in this country have established themselves as recognized sources of reliable information and ideas—latest inventions, newest developments and technological advances, new production methods, engineering and operating practices, progressive merchandising and retailing techniques, up-to-date economic thinking and policies. They gather information and attitudes from all corners of the country and as a result many individual decisions—to buy, to invest, to build or to renovate—are influenced by the ideas and information gained in reading the business press.

It is the function of a good business publication to lead and guide industry thinking. Their importance to Canadian business and industry, indeed to Canada's general economy, cannot be overstressed.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Marchand. Mr. Joel?

Mr. Aubrey Joel (Vice President, Business Press Association and President, Southam Business Publications): Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Honourable Senators, I have very little to add to what Mr. Marchand has said but I want to take one aspect of his remarks which I think are crucial and in which we are very keenly interested and that is the role that the business press plays in Canada and the particular circumstances in which it finds itself at the present time. I think, I am sure that you are very much interested in this aspect of things, what the actual state of the nation is so far as the business press is concerned. We have a unique national asset and Mr. Marchand has detailed in that the business press performs a function that is not performed by anyone else in the media and supplies information that is not supplied any other way.

We practise what we call qualified circulation in the business press. This means, very briefly, and in perhaps one or two sentences that the recipient of our magazines are and must be qualified by their occupation, by the role they play in their own industries or professions, to receive our publications. This means in turn of course, as you will readily see, that there is a limitation to the quantities of magazines which we distribute.

It is because of this that I think it is proper to remark that the conditions of the business press in this country at the present time are anything but good. Economically, we are being taxed, taxed in the broad sense of the term, by higher postal costs, which we accepted starting last April 1 because we understand very well that the business press should not receive subsidies. I would like to make the point that we do not receive subsidies in the Canadian business press. The Canadian business press is indeed paying its own way, or at least its own way, if not more so, on the basis of the new postal rate structures which are in existence.

I believe it is important, gentlemen, to make this point now because in the interim period since last April a number of Canadian business publications have had to fall by the wayside because they have been pushed over the economic hump of non-profitability. One may say that this is not our concern. If you cannot exist on an economic basis you had better go into some other occupation. I repeat, however, that we are not asking...nor have we ever...for subsidies from the Government. We do ask for no discrimination with which nobody is probably going to argue. We feel that we are discriminated against vis-à-vis Time and Reader's Digest. They receive different postal rates than we do, statutory instead of regulatory rates. It makes a great deal of difference to us. It makes a great deal of difference to the future of the Canadian business press and to this particular national asset—and I think it is not an over-statement to use that term—whereby a Canadian reader, the Canadian businessman, the Canadian professional, and indeed the Canadian civil servant is possibly going to be deprived more and more, as he has been already, of the information which is crucial, which is valuable, which is needed in his own occupation of other magazines, as they have been, are compelled to fall by the wayside, to old.

It would be, in my judgement, gentlemen, a great service if the Government—if it were made quite clear to the Government and I think it probably has not been yet—that this national asset is a Canadian enterprise which is of quite important national consequence to this country. We don't want, and I think you don't want, any weakening of our nationality in this respect as in any others.

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Joel. I think, Senators, you could perhaps indicate whether you are putting your question to Mr. Joel or Mr. Marchand, and if either of you gentlemen wish to ask your colleagues to get into the act, please do so and we will be happy to hear from them. I would just say one word to the Senators and that is to remind them once again that these people are here in their capacity as representatives of the Canadian Business Press Association and are not here today representing their companies. The companies, notably Maclean-Hunter's and Southam's will be back before the Committee tomorrow. In your questions be mindful that these people represent the Association.

I believe, Senator Smith, that you are the first questioner this afternoon.

Senator Smith: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I think my first question should be directed to Mr. Marchand since he, in his capacity as President, takes some responsibility for the brief which we have had in our hands for some time now, and I want particularly to refer him to the list of members of the business press, indicating the scope of the memberships. The last one mentioned just happens to be The Maritime Merchant, which I have had coming across my desk for some years and I have always enjoyed seeing it. I notice that you have it designated as coming from "St. John", New Brunswick, and I am sure that that wouldn't go down well with Senator Petten or some of my colleagues from New Brunswick were they here. The Maritime Merchant I know is a Saint John, New Brunswick, publication. If I may be allowed to correct that much on the record, I think we could assume that all the rest of your brief is without error, although that does not mean without any explaining to do.

Mr. Joel: We will blame that one on Mansfield.

Senator Smith: By the way I learned when I first came to Ottawa from the nearby province of Nova Scotia that Saint John was spelled with a S-A-I-N-T and I was not very highly regarded by my New Brunswick colleagues when I started to spell it in correspondence to them as "ST." I just say that so that you don't get into trouble. Some of us Maritimers are always looking for trouble. I suppose that Mr. Marchand...

The Chairman: Senator Smith, on a point of order here which has been drawn to my attention.

Where is the reference that you were talking about?

Senator Smith: The reference is the submission on behalf of the Canadian Business Press on page 2, paragraph 6.

The Chairman: Paragraph 6, did you say?

Senator Smith: Yes.

You stated in your opening statement, Mr. Marchand, as I recall reading in the brief that there are a total of 510 business publications in Canada, of which 132 are referred to as publication members of a "bona fide Canadian ownership". Does that mean that the balance of 378 business publications are not able to qualify because they are not bona fide Canadian-owned?

Mr. Marchand: This would mean that the ones that are members are, according to our own regulations, published by totally Canadian-controlled companies, if I may say so this way. It doesn't mean that some of the others would not qualify. There are some that would not qualify, definitely, but it only means that the ones that are members are bona fide Canadian-owned because it is one of the regulations of the Association that they should be.

Mr. George Mansfield, General Manager, Business Press Association: If I may be allowed to add to that, Mr. Chairman...

The Chairman: Yes, by all means.

Mr. Mansfield: The remaining 378 essentially are Canadian-owned publications. They just are not members of the Association. Most of them would not qualify for membership in the Association principally because they wouldn't have an audit. That is a standard requirement; they must be audited.

Senator Smith: A circulation audit you are talking about?

Mr. Mansfield: That is correct. Most of them are in fact Canadian-owned publications.

Senator Smith: Well, while we are on the numbers game, I think the business press is quite impressive to those of us who don't realize the total impact of the branch of the mass media in which you are engaged. It is quite an eye opener really to learn that there are 510 that have almost a circulation of four and a half million and each one gets a share of the $40 million. It is a very important part of the whole field. It is perhaps very important for other reasons also which we will perhaps get to later on.

You make mention in paragraph 7 of your brief the role which I understand you play and you, I believe, have quoted that part in your opening statement. Just to refresh my own memory:

"To collect and disseminate for Canadian business and professions the experience of those engaged in a specific industry, profession or trade."

How do you play this role in so far as staff are concerned. You have the kind of staff who have experience in, say, petroleum engineering and who keep abreast of the latest developments in petroleum engineering and who therefore are in a position to gather and interpret the material that is available to him from the latest developments and record it in your particular publication. Do you do this or do you get free-lance people to cover a specific subject in the industry?

Mr. Marchand: Well, I don't think any one formula is the only formula. I think both are employed generally throughout the industry. It depends on the industry covered, it depends on the subject. Very often the editor himself or the publication who might have an editor-in-chief and maybe one or two assistant editors, would have sufficient knowledge in that particular field to write very well and make thorough research and interpret this to the readers. In certain and very special cases, the editors will go to a specialist and ask him to do a special article for instance, and probably work with him to eventually put it on paper. I don't think we can say it is just one formula that is used. It is a combination of formula where sometimes the editor might feel it is better to go and see that specialist; it is a very special area, a very delicate area, especially in a very vertical, technical field.

Senator Smith: Mr. Marchand, for example what field are you engaged in when you are not working for the organization, or is the organization a full time job with you?

Mr. Marchand: No, I am engaged in the General Business Publications Division of our company, so I am involved in this area.

Senator Smith: Yes.

Mr. Marchand: Particularly in one area of industry also—the industrial area. I believe, if may, following us here, will be the Business Press Editors Association and they will probably expound more fully in this area that you are now talking about.

Senator Smith: Well, it seems to me that both these papers appear to go together—maybe not for the purposes of this discussion and I may get my thinking mixed up by reading both at the same time.

Mr. Joel: I think that what Mr. Marchand says is exactly true, without wanting to anticipate the Business Press Editors Association presentation which will be made following ours, and I am sure they cover this point quite adequately.

Yours is a very interesting question, Senator, because the method of editing business papers takes various forms. In some cases it is necessary and desirable to have, as editor, a professional in the field serving the particular group of readers. Let us say it is engineering or architecture. In such cases, I speak from experience because we have such publications in our own house and the editors of both engineering and architectural publications are professionals. In one case, we have a Fellow of the Royal Architectural Institute of Canada, James A. Murray, the editor of The Canadian Architect, and in the case of Canadian Consultant Engineer, the editor is Dr. Carson Morrison who was the head of the Civil Engineering Department of the University of Toronto.

This isn't always the case. We can't always afford that kind of rich blood, but where it is necessary and desirable we do. The other number houses do exactly the same sort of thing. In other cases you will find what we might have a journalist as editor of a given publication where the technical knowledge is not so highly developed or not required. It may be, perhaps, a magazine directed to business management of a particular section of the community. This would be the case with Executive Magazine, or the Financial Post, and so forth. In these cases you will find journalists who may have their degrees in business administration so that there is no one hard and fast rule as to how editorial teams are selected or put together.

Senator Smith: Yes, I can quite understand how there wouldn't be any hard and fast rule for engineering or whatever. I wouldn't expect the smaller units of the business press to be able to afford to hire experts on their staffs because of the economics of it. Now, where do these people turn for their editorial material that goes into the smaller units? I am thinking in terms of The Maritime Merchant, for example. I know that it has some local news items that will appeal to the small merchant who wants to know how to promote Heinz Ketchup next month, or something like that. How do your publications do it?

Mr. Joel: Our publications, by and large, are national publications and they will go to Nova Scotia or Prince Edward Island just the same as they do to Ontario or British Columbia and they will serve—if it happens to be a grocer, his particular needs and the operations of his grocery store, or shoe store, or doctor, or whatever the case is.

Senator Smith: Paragraph 33, for example, of your brief seems to indicate that the business publications welcome press releases from public relations people employed by companies and in this respect the attitude of your publications seem to differ from the point of view of the Canadian daily newspapers. Can this be explained by the need for the smaller units in the business to use this kind of material as free editorial material that has some real reader interest in it, or is it because it is the general practice to receive this stream of press releases that are published, willy-nilly?

Mr. Joel: I could say that we are not of one mind ourselves on the value of public relations releases. The statement in here, and which I will adhere to for a moment, states that it is valuable. It states that public relations is valuable. In other instances other people may say that it is not so valuable. Therefore, there is nothing monolithic about the opinions in the Canadian Business Press or its individual members. You can make a good case for why public relations is a very necessary appendage to or supplier of information to the business press and I don't suppose you would get any two editors even to agree on its value because this becomes purely a judgmental question.

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Joel, you are quarrelling with the statement because it says: "On the whole, the practice of public relations is valuable and of assistance in the business publishing field". Presumably, you do not agree?

Mr. Joel: My personal viewpoint is that there is some disagreement with this particular statement.

The Chairman: With this particular statement. That is fine.

Mr. Marchand: I think basically where we say "valuable and of assistance" would be mostly in the area of new products where the business press will be happy generally to take the information coming from the industry, from business and so on, about new developments and new products being brought out because this is the type of information which the business press feels that it should disseminate to its readers. Forgetting the advertising aspect, this is strictly a service which we are giving our readers, if we feel it is an important development in an area. It comes through as public relations or as a public relations piece through the mail. It might be of great interest and I think this is the area where it has some value to us.

Mr. Joel: Well, it is a matter of degree more than anything else.

Mr. Mansfield: However, I would say they are certainly not used willy-nilly by the editors. The editor uses his judgment as to whether it is used to the degree it is.

Senator Smith: The only point that captured my attention, really, was in relation to what we had been told before that the daily newspapers are a little stand-offish when it comes to accepting public releases, even from public bodies.

Mr. Joel: Well, I think we have just as high criteria in the Magazine Field as the daily newspapers have. The criteria in the business press have grown as a matter of fact and become much sharper in the last decade or so. It has improved immensely in its editorial integrity and its editorial quality.

Senator Smith: Well, I am sure you must feel that way. The brief indicates to me that you regard the business publications as a recognized source of information and you mentioned that they contain the latest inventions and the newest technological developments, and so on and so forth. What other sources of information would you compete with—and I suppose you regard it on a par with any other source—I suppose that is the way you view your functions. Let me just give you a little better background on this. In this day and age—and particularly in the last few years—when there has been such a rapid development of innovation and invention and new technologies, I do not know how a monthly press, for example, can make the thing live so vitally and become a recognized source of information when surely the big companies involved in some of these developments must be having conventions from time to time. There is that source, but what other sources of information are there that would interest people in industry, for example?

Mr. Marchand: Well, sources basically outside the business press you are talking about.

Senator Smith: Yes.

Mr. Marchand: Well, this is a problem question because I feel that this is the only straight asset that we have as a business press. We feel that we are doing a fairly unique job. For an individual in industry, in business, in finance or commerce just to keep up to date, the alternative to reading good business papers, and publications is to go back to university or to business school two months every year, which is practically impossible for everyone to do. Consequently, the regular readership of good business publications becomes practically a necessity for this individual if he only wants to keep up to date. This is true especially when we get in very specialized fields such as engineering and many, many others. General business is very important in this area.

Mr. Joel: May I add something here?

The Chairman: Yes, certainly, Mr. Joel.

Mr. Joel: I think first of all that it should not be for a moment thought that the business press is a system of disseminating information on a monthly magazine basis. This is only one aspect of its activities. It, in fact, distributes information in various ways which ranges in a public form from daily to annual dissemination. In a daily form, for example, there are intelligent reports on the building construction industry issued daily to those people who want such data. This is done by members of the business press. There are magazines, there are newspapers, which come out weekly. There are magazines which come out monthly. There are annuals which supply data needed only annually. This is the first, I think, important factor to get across to those who are perhaps not as familiar with the business press activities as we ourselves are, which is understandable.

On the other hand, the business press is today engaged in a multitude of activities which vary quite widely from its original publishing technique. It is a communications technique in our view. The business press issues newsletters of various kinds and of varying frequency in order to do exactly the thing that you were talking about, Senator, which is to keep up with the times and to distribute technological data at a frequency which the reading public needs.

There are many different techniques that are used. Seminars for example are sponsored by the members of the business press because this is one more service that they can perform for the engineer or the architect or the businessman or whatever the case may be. All of these various techniques are embraced today by the business press and are regarded as their activity on his part, and needed activity on his part, in order to do a complete job of disseminating technological data, news data of this particular industry or profession.

Senator Smith: I was also interested in another statement which you made and I will just turn to it—it is paragraph 36 which is a very short statement but it is one that I venture to say would be very difficult and almost unbelievable for a daily newspaper to make. What is this:

“The business press is accorded 100 per cent credibility by its readers.”

Even the politicians I don't think claim 99.9 per cent purity in credibility. How do you arrive at making that conclusion? It seems to me that you would have to be very, very careful indeed of the ads which are placed in the business press. You have to be very, very careful that some new method turned out to be an old one perhaps which has proven to be a failure. Perhaps I have the kind of mind that has been trained a little more than others to be suspicious of new things. I don't know whether I have a scientific mind or not, but I was educated, perhaps, not to accept everything holus-bolus and I am sure your readers would not be as gullible generally as I would be. How do you make that claim?

Mr. Joel: Well, I think our readers, generally speaking representative, as they are, of business and the professions, have inquiring minds too and they are quite prepared to challenge and doubt what they read in the business press and this is all to the good. The letters to our editors will reflect, as a matter of fact, if there is disagreement with the point of view that a particular editor may put forward on a particular subject. I think that this is not what is actually meant by this statement. However, perhaps the syntax is subject to criticism more than the thought. The thought is that the business press is regarded by its readers as a dependable source of information and technological data because it reflects the conditions of a given industry or given profession at the time, but which is subject to correction. If we make a mistake—and we make them, as does anyone in any media—they are subject to correction in the columns of the magazine or newspapers whenever a reader dissents from our point of view. But what this means to me and what is meant is that the standards of the business press in its editorial efforts are recognized and accepted by the business and professional community in Canada as not being purchasable by advertisers and not being overwhelmed by a public relations counsel, that it is in fact independent and quite prepared to stand upon its record as an independent source of information.

Senator Smith: Thank you.

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Joel, this clause which Senator Smith has picked out that “the business press is accorded 100 per cent credibility by its readers”—would you say that we should delete credibility and put in integrity as a fairer word?

Mr. Joel: I think that would be an improvement, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Sparrow: A supplementary question, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow.

Senator Sparrow: Have you done surveys in this regard to determine this?

Mr. Joel: Oh, innumerable surveys of one kind or another. There have been a great number and there continues to be a great number of surveys of all kinds: science surveys, marketing surveys, the accumulation of statistical data. There is not a member company in this organization which has not, and I daresay at the present time, at the present moment, at least more than one survey going as a regular and routine part of its operations. These surveys are designed, as I say, to ascertain reader reaction and the reader acceptance of our editorials—the readability of the magazine, the marketing stature, the marketing importance of the readers themselves. This is at the present time a very important part of our activities to determine who are, let us say, the buyers of merchandise, of goods, and of capital equipment in this country, and I think in the brief you will find references to the stack that we have sponsored in past years, such things as the London study—“How Industry Buys” is the formal title of it. Those things are surveys. In addition to that we are doing reader surveys constantly.

The Chairman: Is yours a supplementary question, Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Yes it is, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Fine.

Mr. Fortier: These surveys are done by the individual publications. Are the results funnelled through to the Associations? Are the results given to the other members of the Associations which you represent here today?

Mr. Joel: Not always.

Mr. Marchand: Well, there are different types. I would say that most of the company members and the publication members of our Association have at this time or in the very recent past gone to outside organizations to do these surveys. Many also have very excellent research facilities in their own houses where they can do very good research. Much of this research is also validated in many cases by outside organizations again. Consequently, this constant research is very valid and is very well accepted by readers, by advertisers and people concerned.

Mr. Fortier: But it is made available?

Mr. Marchand: It is made available to the Association.

Mr. Mansfield: We do keep a library of members' research and this library is open to any other member.

Mr. Fortier: Do you insist on receiving the results of all these surveys?

Mr. Mansfield: Well, the word insist is rather strong. No, we don't insist.

The Chairman: Well, if a Maclean-Hunter publication has done a survey which you have on file, could a Southam publication go in and look at that result?

Mr. Mansfield: Yes.

The Chairman: Is that customary?

Mr. Mansfield: It happens, but it doesn't happen too often, I must admit.

The Chairman: You would think it would happen more often. It would give you a great competitive edge, wouldn't it?

Mr. Mansfield: Well, I don't think there is any secret in any research that is conducted by one member.

The Chairman: Well, I don't think the Toronto Star tells the Toronto Telegram about their research. As a matter of fact, I know they don't.

Mr. Joel: We do a great deal of research Mr. Chairman, on individual magazines which we are quite unprepared to submit to our competitors. I am sure that our competitors do exactly the same thing. This is a the nature of the system that we have and I think this is what we have to be. We do have however, common interests and have referred to it in these brief guidelines for research which are common to members and binding upon members of the Canadian Business Press.

The Chairman: We have a copy of the document which you provided us.

Mr. Joel: These are guidelines of research which we have adopted as an Association.

Mr. Fortier: I am having trouble reconciling these two answers. Maybe I could attempt to have it clarified. How competitive really is the business press in Canada?

Mr. Joel: I would say very.

Mr. Marchand: Very, very competitive.

Mr. Fortier: How is this translated in fact? Is it competitive in seeking advertising, is it competitive in seeking readers or what?

Mr. Joel: Well, it is competitive—of course. The life blood of the business press is advertising as you well know. We discussed before, briefly, qualified circulation which means that we do not necessarily have a full paid circulation on our magazines. Therefore, when we are assured that we are covering the given market that we intend to cover with a publication, advertising becomes its life blood. The competition then, of course, is in the seeking of advertising.

On the editor's side, there is quite a bit of competition to get out a better product, a better read product, a publication that the readers will want and will read for every month or every week or whatever the time is and create an acceptance as a leader in its field.

So, it is—the advertising revenue and then so the editorial side. Each is as important as the other as far as leadership is concerned.

Mr. Fortier: So the life blood of the publication is advertising?

Mr. Joel: Advertising revenues.

Mr. Fortier: My question is: Do your members of publications write for buyers of advertising or for readers?

Mr. Marchand: For readers.

Mr. Joel: We could not exist, Mr. Fortier, if we wrote for advertising buyers. We write for our readers who are the purchasers of what Canada makes or for that matter what Canada imports.

Mr. Fortier: And conversely it is your advertisers that keep you alive.

Mr. Joel: That is right. It is the advertisers who want a vehicle for their advertising messages to those people. We provide that vehicle.

Mr. Fortier: So the accent is on reaching as many readers as possible?

Mr. Joel: Of the right kind. Not quantitatively.

Mr. Marchand: The right kind of reader.

Mr. Fortier: Which will appeal to the right kind of advertiser?

Mr. Marchand: Yes.

The Chairman: I appreciate, Senator Smith, you are the questioner, but Mr. Fortier is on a supplementary question and I have two indications of further supplementary questions if you don't mind.

Senator Smith: I don't mind a bit.

The Chairman: Senator Everett and then Senator Sparrow.

Senator Everett: Mine is not a supplementary question.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow, is yours a supplementary question?

Senator Sparrow: Do you have a code of advertising standards?

Mr. Marchand: We abide by the general code of advertising standards that the I.C.A. put out.

Mr. Joel: The Institute of Canadian Advertisers.

Mr. Marchand: We also have a basic code of our own which is relatively the same.

Senator Sparrow: Have you a copy of that?

Mr. Mansfield: We subscribe to the code of advertising standards which the Canadian Advertising Advisory Board has produced. I do not have a copy with me, but I could certainly forward one to you.

Senator Sparrow: I was wondering if you produced one of your own for the benefit of your advertisers and your readers?

Mr. Mansfield: No.

The Chairman: On this question of advertising, what is the ideal rate of advertising in a business publication, Mr. Marchand? Advertising to editorial content?

Mr. Marchand: I don't think you could answer that by giving an ideal ratio. In the business press—this I think is pretty much across the board—the publisher will try to do an information job with his reader. In other words, he will make sure that the editor supplies the right quality and the right amount of information consistently every month. Many, many publications—and I would say the trend is most publications today—will try and equalize the number of pages of editorial whether or not the advertising pages are numerous or not that particular month. We are interested in doing a good editorial job without going up and down so many percentages of advertising pages.

The Chairman: Well, I appreciate that you are not here in your capacity as Montreal Manager of Maclean-Hunter Business Publications but if I could ask you a question about that. You have under your jurisdiction eight or ten publications, let us say. What would be the average ratio of editorial to advertising content? Would it be 50-50, or 60-40, or 70-30?

Mr. Marchand: Well, in the smaller publications your ratio could be sometimes 35 per cent advertising to 65 per cent editorial. As you get into the larger publications, larger in pages—you know, if you are getting a hundred and some odd pages then your ratio can change slightly. It could be closer to 50 or 55, or even 60 per cent advertising to 40 per cent editorial. What you need is a proper amount of editorial matter in every issue to do a job.

The Chairman: Well, I would like to come to that but let me ask you a second question on this. Presumably advertising in the business press perhaps has greater readership than advertising in the daily press. Would that be a fair statement? This of course is because you are appealing more to a specific...

Mr. Marchand: More of a captive audience you may mean.

The Chairman: No, I don't mean a captive audience, I mean an audience where the advertisements probably relate to a very specific need or requirement that the reader has. If I might give you an example, if I buy the Toronto papers this evening I won't look at the theatre advertisements tonight because I won't be in Toronto. It seems to me in a business paper the reader is more interested in advertising. Is that a fair statement?

Mr. Joel: Well, if Mr. Marchand doesn't want to say "yes" to that, I will.

Mr. Marchand: As interested in the advertising as they are in the other things?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Marchand: Yes.

The Chairman: Well, my third question—of the national advertising budget in Canada, the overall national budget, what percentage of it would go out to the business press?

Mr. Marchand: Approximately 4 per cent.

Mr. Mansfield: Yes, approximately 4 per cent.

The Chairman: Is this placed by advertising agencies?

Mr. Marchand: Mainly.

The Chairman: Is there not a trend toward direct placement in your business?

Mr. Marchand: I don't think so.

The Chairman: What about the enormous amount of advertising in the various trade papers? I must confess that I don't read them all but I read them fairly often. What about these subsidiaries to American companies? Much of the advertising in trade papers is advertising placed on behalf of subsidiaries of American companies. Is that not correct?

Mr. Marchand: Yes.

The Chairman: Is that advertising placed there by American agencies or Canadian agencies?

Mr. Marchand: Well, both. If it is placed by a subsidiary with operating autonomy in Canada, the general rule, today, is that subsidiary with operating autonomy will have a Canadian agency. That is a trend, I think that my colleagues would agree with in the last few years.

The Chairman: That they would have Canadian agencies?

Mr. Joel: Yes, however there are still a great number of American agencies placing business in Canadian trade publications on behalf mainly of American companies without Canadian subsidiaries.

The Chairman: Well, I have one question on advertising and a couple more I would like to put to you later on, but one which I will put to you immediately. It has been said to me and it has been said to some of our researchers that by and large the rates in the business press are unrealistically high. Would you care to comment on that, Mr. Marchand?

Mr. Marchand: Well, I must say that I don't necessarily...

The Chairman: It is a very general observation I agree and I am asking for your opinion. I can't substantiate it since it is an opinion but do you think there is any validity in it?

Mr. Marchand: No. We certainly don't think so. First of all, to have a healthy industry...

try you have to have some reasonable return on your investment. If we are going to do a job editorially and communicating better to our public, we have to have a healthy organization, member publishers and so on and publications.

The Chairman: Well, is the industry healthy at the present time?

Mr. Marchand: It is relatively healthy. We have had our problems and we are going through now some readjustments because of the postal situation. We have to live with this and this is one area for instance that has hurt us badly and henceforth in the last couple of years there have been some increases in rates.

Now, when you are talking about a small publication with a relatively low circulation of 10,000, 15,000 or 20,000 for instance, your basic requirements editorially are very similar to a publication with a circulation of 400,000. You are not varying greatly there. Your own time, your preparation, your composition costs are basically the same. The only thing you haven't got is the long run and consequently a lot of your basic costs are the same as if you had a very, very high circulation magazine. How much do you charge for an advertising page if you have to cover all the costs? I don't know but perhaps Mr. Deragon would have something to say on this.

Mr. J. Deragon, Vice-President Marketing, National Business Publications: In general, I think if you would take a look certainly in the past year at the profit picture of most of the member organizations in this Association, I think this would dispel the notion that advertising rates are unduly high.

The Chairman: Why?

Mr. Deragon: Well, if you haven't got the revenue coming in to enable you to do a job—if there is less coming in than there is going out, then you have a big problem.

The Chairman: Your point then is that there is a profit and there is a great deal of revenue, or is it the opposite?

Mr. Deragon: It is the opposite.

The Chairman: Well, why don't you then lower your rates and get more revenues?

Mr. Deragon: Well, it just does not work that way.

The Chairman: Are you sure it doesn't work that way?

Mr. Deragon: Well, we haven't seen much of a trend in any line, whether it is publishing or automobiles, or even the maps that are sold by the federal Government towards lowering prices to sell more cars or maps. Prices are going up.

The Chairman: Well, I am relating my question specifically not to maps or cars but to the cost of advertising in the business press, I wanted your opinion and I have it. Thank you.

Senator Smith: I have been glancing at a table on page 6 of your brief, Mr. Marchand, in which you refer to a number of titles of U.S. business publications that are overflowing into Canada, and it is interesting to note that from 1949 to 1959 the increase in such publications was from 510 to 1,497 in that ten year period. It is roughly three times as many but from 1959 to 1969 there was not very much of an increase from roughly 1,500 to at the present time 1,750. Is that slowdown in the rate of increase of overflow due to the tax legislation that was enacted following the O'Leary Report? Is that the only factor involved in that do you think?

Mr. Marchand: Well, we feel it is one of the main factors. As a matter of fact, I think in item number 24 we sort of answer this where it says:

"The legislation resulting from the report of the Royal Commission on Publications affecting the entry into Canada of publications carrying advertising space in which advertisements indicate a specific source of availability in Canada, has slowed down the rate of increase in overflow as shown by the figures above."

Senator Smith: Well, there are still some 1,750 overflow publications coming into Canada. Doesn't that still present a rather serious problem to the industry?

Mr. Marchand: Yes, definitely. We say further here that this invasion limits to some extent the advertising revenues that some of our Canadian publications could derive, because a lot of these U.S. subsidiary companies for instance feel that their head office is advertising in some of these U.S. publications which overflow into Canada and therefore that they don't have to spend so many dollars in the Canadian market. We are getting this overflow circulation and so it does create a problem. We are aware of that and this is one reason—

Mr. Joel: It creates an even bigger problem for our Post Office because they have to pay for distributing all those publications.

Senator Smith: I recognize of course that the postal rate problem is a real one with you. Perhaps it is one of the very important ones. I have an idea that perhaps Senator Everett or one of my other colleagues may spend a little time on that. Of those 1,750 U.S. titles coming in, is there a rather important percentage of them devoted to subjects that are not adequately covered by your own publications in Canada?

Mr. Marchand: They would be very few. Offhand I don't know any that I could name but there would be very, very few. We feel that the Canadian industry is doing an excellent job in covering the important market areas that should be covered, or industrial, or financial areas.

Senator Smith: I would expect that there would be a few but I don't want to go over every one.

Mr. Marchand: I am not saying that there aren't any, but let me say that we feel it is generally very well covered by Canadian publications.

Mr. Joel: If I may supplement that, Senator—I think it is a very interesting point. There is an increasing need of specialization in the industry and in society in general. The business press in the past has been able to meet these needs and the 510 we have in Canada and in the past have been able to serve that. I think there is a very real probability that the Canadian business press industry is going to fall short of supplying these specialized needs as industry fragments still more. As you get a certain narrow sector of a given industry requiring its own publication, we will not be able to supply it if we are in the disadvantageous position we find ourselves in in the publishing business today. I think this is a problem we are going to have to face.

Senator Smith: Yes, Mr. Joel, and you also recognized, I am sure, the postal problem in so far as the Canadian postal department is concerned. It is a pretty difficult one too to make special rules in terms of the agreement which they have made, but I don't know enough about postal rates to get into that. Is there anything else that you might suggest to us which could be done to reduce that competition which you may regard as an unfair competition?

The Chairman: You are referring to the American overflow?

Senator Smith: Yes, to the American overflow.

Mr. Joel: Well, the American overflow—no everybody recognizes, including the Post Office I trust, that they are not getting a dime back out of all the publications that are mailed from the United States. Incidentally at a slightly lower rate than our rate and which our Post Office has to carry and distribute free. There is not a penny of revenue in that. Now, it is hard to escape the thought that we are being penalized to a very great degree by this shortage that the Post Office understandably finds itself in. Not only for this reason; I understand there are many other reasons, but I am not arguing with them. But the fact still remains that the penalties that we are paying it seems to us are putting us at an unfair disadvantage.

The Chairman: In what way?

Mr. Joel: If they are carrying and distributing X number of publications in Canada and distributing them free, and then the Post Office says...

The Chairman: Do these overflow publications carry advertising which you would otherwise get, or do they compete with you for readers? We understand the Post Office problem and we get the point, but do the overflow publications cost you readers or do they cost you advertising dollars?

Mr. Joel: They don't cost us readers. I think in the main that we are providing editorial needs but there are special kinds of thinking and we do serve the purpose. Do they cost us advertising dollars? I would say not terribly significantly.

The Chairman: Well, then Mr. Joel, if you are not worried about the advertising dollars and you are not worried about the readers, why are you worried?

Mr. Joel: We are worried about the postal rates that we are being charged.

The Chairman: Well, you relate your postal rates to these postal rates. In other words you are saying your postal rates are subsidizing the carrying of these American publications. Is that the point you are making?

Mr. Joel: That and Time and Reader's Digest.

The Chairman: Just on this chart there is one interesting comment I would like to make. I am interested to note the growth of publications, the number of titles of U.S. publications has gone up about 300 from 1959 to 1969 but the circulation has only gone up about 11,000. That is 300 circulation circulating an average of 35 magazines each. You know, that is a very interesting statistic. Presumably that means more and more specialization by the American publications.

Mr. Mansfield: I think, that is the answer, the specialization.

Senator Smith: Mr. Chairman, I will pass to Senator Everett.

Senator Everett: Just following on with this overflow circulation. Have you estimated the cost in terms of deficit to the Canadian Post Office of this overflow circulation. Does your Association have any studies on that?

Mr. Mansfield: I believe we have.

Mr. Marchand: We do have figures.

Mr. Mansfield: The Post Office itself has estimated the cost as of last year and I think they put the figure at a little over $3 million. Now, that would cover not only the overflow from business magazines, but general United States consumer magazines.

Senator Everett: That is the general overflow cost?

Mr. Mansfield: That is correct.

Senator Everett: That isn't recovered.

Mr. Mansfield: That is right.

Senator Everett: But have you done any studies yourself to check and see whether the Post Office figures are correct?

Mr. Mansfield: We have very little means at our disposal to do such a check.

Senator Everett: You just have to accept it?

Mr. Mansfield: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: How much of this overflow situation from the United States is qualified circulation magazines as opposed to paid circulation?

Mr. Mansfield: About 60 per cent of these figures here would be qualified circulation, or maybe more than that.

Mr. Fortier: Does the same proportion exist in Canada within the business press?

Mr. Mansfield: No. We have a higher proportion of the publications under the qualified system.

Mr. Fortier: So the American publishers get paid subscriptions in Canada and the Canadian publishers distribute these free?

Mr. Mansfield: Some of the American publishers have paid circulation in Canada—maybe about 30 per cent. There would be about 70 per cent qualified.

The Chairman: From the United States?

Mr. Mansfield: Yes.

Senator Everett: I understand that the Japanese are either contemplating or have invoked a licensing scheme to handle overflow circulation. Would your Association be in favour of the Post Office having a licensing operation?

Mr. Marchand: In what way exactly, Senator?

Senator Everett: Well, in other words, those publications which come into Canada in order to get into Canada would have to pay a licence fee which would recognize the fact that they are getting overflow circulation. In other words, they are getting free circulation by the Post Office in Canada.

Mr. Marchand: Well, there exists a similar arrangement right now which we don't particularly like because we feel that we are being discriminated against and that some of the larger publishers will truck over some of their magazines to points like Windsor for instance, or nearby, and they will get the special lower rate from the Canadian Post Office to distribute here. That gives the Post Office a portion of the regular rate that they would get from a Canadian publisher for instance. The Post Office feels "Well, we are getting some money instead of none at all." They say "Well, you know, you shouldn't be mad at us because we are doing this." We say "Yes, but we are still paying twice as much as they are." And this is the way it is.

Mr. Fortier: Why would the American magazines do that?

Mr. Marchand: Well, the Post Office gives them a special rate so that the trucking costs and the special rates do not come to too much more than what they are paying in the States.

Mr. Mansfield: Plus...they refer to it as the "mailed in Canada rate". This is a special rate that is set for foreign publications that enter the Canadian mail.

Senator Everett: Do you happen to know what this rate is?

Mr. Mansfield: I don't have it with me.

Mr. Fortier: Well, how would it compare with second class rates presently in existence in Canada?

Mr. Mansfield: It would be less than the regulatory rate of three cents, two cents, two cents, et cetera.

Senator Everett: That is a third class rate.

Mr. Mansfield: No, that is the regulatory rate. This applies to the qualified circulation publications.

Mr. Fortier: Which is also third class mail?

Mr. Mansfield: No, the third class rate is a higher rate than that.

Mr. Joel: The second class rate.

Mr. Mansfield: To my knowledge.

Mr. Fortier: As opposed to second class statutory rates?

Mr. Mansfield: It is about four and a half cents a pound. The "mailed in Canada rate" is certainly higher than four and a half cents a pound. However, it is less than the rate that the majority of business publications pay which is the regulatory rate.

Mr. Fortier: Do you have as an association figures to show how many magazines availed themselves of this "mailed in Canada rate"? How many foreign magazines?

Mr. Mansfield: I don't have that figure. Certainly the Post Office would have it.

Senator Everett: Is that rate less than the American mail rate?

Mr. Mansfield: This is the point, Senator. The Canadian Post Office sets this "mailed in Canada rate", at a rate which is less than the equivalent United States rate, to interest the U.S. publisher in gaining some money by bringing his publications and entering them in the Canadian mail.

Senator Everett: Well, would it be true to say that the American publishers who would be interested in that rate would be close to the border?

Mr. Marchand: Yes.

Mr. Mansfield: Yes. They would save trucking costs, et cetera.

Senator Everett: And those farther away from the border couldn't take advantage of this?

Mr. Mansfield: They wouldn't avail themselves of that "mailed in Canada rate."

Mr. Fortier: Well, it seems to me that the Post Office by allowing foreign magazines to do this is really defeating to a certain extent the purpose of section 12A of the Income Tax Act?

Mr. Mansfield: This is correct.

Mr. Fortier: It is facilitating the mailing of Canada of U.S. publications.

Mr. Joel: That is correct.

Mr. Fortier: I would be very interested knowing this. Could you get that figure before eight o'clock this evening when the Honourable Eric Kierans is coming as a witness?

Mr. Mansfield: I would have to call the Department.

Mr. Fortier: I would be interested to see you get the same figure that he will give us.

Mr. Mansfield: I will do that.

Senator Beaubien: Mr. Mansfield, this overflow which is costing the Canadian Post Office $4 million—does the American Post Office in any way do anything for us which would reciprocate in any way?

Mr. Mansfield: No.

Senator Beaubien: It is just a one way street? Do they not take a loss on material they distribute for us?

Mr. Mansfield: Well, there is certainly so much more coming this way than there is going the other way.

Mr. Fortier: As an Association, do you know how many of your members actually avail themselves of this privilege in the United States?

Mr. Mansfield: I don't think we have any that do this.

Mr. Marchand: No, we do not have that figure for the business press. The Post Office has the figures for the total. Mr. Kierans might know the answer.

Senator Sparrow: But do you have...

The Chairman: Well, Senator Everett is still the questioner. Is this a supplementary question Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: Well, they are making the statement that the Canadian Post Office is subsidizing the American magazines for postal rates. Is this in fact what is happening?

Mr. Mansfield: Yes.

The Chairman: May I remind the Honourable Senators that we are seeing the Postmaster General this evening, not this afternoon.

Senator Everett: Mr. Chairman, the evidence on which we base the questions for the Postmaster General often comes from people like this.

The Chairman: Yes, I take Senator Everett's point except that it has been said twice here this afternoon that we will have to get the information from the Post Office.

Senator Everett: You say that most of our Canadian business publications are distributed under the qualified circulation system. Do you know how many are not?

Mr. Mansfield: Well, Senator, we have a membership of 132 publications and we have less than ten that are paid. We have less than ten that get the statutory rate. The remainder are on the regulatory rate.

Senator Everett: Do you have any non-profit Association belonging to your Association?

Mr. Mansfield: Yes, quite a number.

Senator Everett: Would any of the ten be non-profit?

Mr. Mansfield: Canadian Business, which is published by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce is a paid statutory publication.

Senator Everett: Well, that is a non-profit organization under the meaning of the Post Office Rules and Regulations. You say they get the special rate?

Mr. Mansfield: I beg your pardon Senator. Since the new rates came in they are third class.

Senator Everett: They are third class?

Mr. Mansfield: That is correct.

Senator Everett: Can you give me your understanding of the difference between second class statutory, second class regulatory and third class? Are you saying that the regulatory rate applies only to those magazines that distribute under the qualified circulation system?

Mr. Mansfield: The regulatory rate applies to any publication that has less than 50 per cent of its circulation paid.

Senator Everett: Which is what we call a qualified circulation.

Mr. Mansfield: That is correct.

Senator Everett: And that is the three, two, two...

Mr. Mansfield: The three, two, two—it amounts to 17 cents per pound, depending on the weight of the publication.

Senator Everett: Well, could you tell me what the third class rate is?

Mr. Mansfield: Well, I am quite sure it is five cents for the first two ounces, Senator, and I think it is three cents for each succeeding two ounces.

Senator Everett: In the case of the Canadian business press they would be five cents and...

Mr. Mansfield: And three cents for each additional two ounces. All Association publications fall in that category.

Senator Everett: That is a help. Thank you.

Mr. Fortier: Do you as a group have any members—I think the question was asked but I don't know whether the answer was given. Do you have any member magazine which now is charged third class rate?

Mr. Mansfield: Yes, we have quite a number of them.

Mr. Fortier: Those are the Association publications?

Mr. Mansfield: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: And the number is?

Mr. Mansfield: I have my list here—there are ten.

Mr. Fortier: Has any one of those publications gone out of existence since they were transferred from second class to third class rates?

Mr. Mansfield: None of these particular publications, none of these ten, but there are quite a number of Association publications which have.

Mr. Fortier: Well, we are aware of that, but I wondered if any of those which belong to your Association had been forced out of business?

Mr. Marchand: None that I can think of.

The Chairman: Senator Everett?

Senator Everett: In paragraph 14, page 5, starting with the first sentence there:

"We feel that the regulatory rate applied to these qualified circulation business publications—three cents for the first two ounces, two cents for each additional two ounces or fraction thereof, per copy—is excessive when compared with the statutory bulk rate of four and a half cents per pound."

I thought the statutory rate was five cents a pound and two cents apiece?

Mr. Mansfield: Well, Senator, it will be five cents a pound as of March of next year. They imposed the rate in three stages, four cents a pound for the first year, four and a half cents for the second year, and five cents a pound for the third year.

Senator Everett: But the two cents apiece applies?

Mr. Mansfield: That is correct. Two cents as a minimum.

The Chairman: Two cents as a minimum?

Mr. Mansfield: Yes.

Senator Everett: You stated in your verbal evidence at the beginning of this hearing that the business press should not receive subsidies. You are paying your own way. Have you any figures to support that contention that you are paying your own way?

Mr. Mansfield: Individual publishers have figures and, Mr. Chairman, are we allowed to call anyone from the audience?

The Chairman: Well, we will be dealing with the individual publishers tomorrow. In fairness to them, they are expecting to be called tomorrow rather than today.

Mr. Mansfield: Well, it will be hard for me to give you an across-the-board answer. In other words, I can't speak for individual members and give you a general answer to that, but certainly Maclean-Hunter and Southam, when they come here tomorrow, should be able to give you some answer to that question.

The Chairman: Well, if Senator Everett feels that it would be useful for him to know today and if those people wish to say something, I don't mean to limit them. Would you like them to comment on it?

Senator Everett: No, it was just a statement that Mr. Marchand made.

Mr. Marchand: Well, I could just give general consensus of opinion amongst the publishers. A couple of years ago the Post Office people gave us unofficially a figure of 4.6 cents per copy as a distribution cost. Now this was unofficial so I don't want to let this be the end-all and we, checking back through our membership, have found that the greater number of our publications are paying under the new rates upwards of five, or six, or seven, or as high as 19 cents, and in a few cases 25 cents per copy for distribution. Without going into a very detailed survey of this, we assume, fairly accurately I may say, that we are paying our own way. We assume that we are paying our own way and more. Here we are talking about the members of the CBP—the Canadian Business Press. We know that outside, some of the very small very light publications might not, but here we are talking relative to a minimum. The minimum is too low. There are all kinds of things that have to be taken into consideration.

Senator Everett: But the average weight would indicate it is too low?

Mr. Marchand: It brings us over the cost that we feel we should pay.

Senator Everett: Well, there seems to be a bit of a conflict in your submission—in your verbal submission you made the point that you should not be subsidized, but in Mr. Glassford's submission he states that the B.P.E.A. feels that all Canadian business publications should be allowed the statutory second class mailing rates which would vary from four to five cents a pound depending on the time, and you say after March it will be five cents a pound. In that case you wouldn't be paying your own way, would you?

Mr. Marchand: Well, if we were brought down to that point. But I think the point that the CBP makes is that we don't like the discrimination that some are getting subsidies and some are not. We don't like the fact that we are paying our own way and other publications are not.

Senator Everett: Well, speaking of these subsidies you singled out Time and Reader's Digest and suggested that they are getting a subsidy that you are not. Are they the only people that you are concerned about, or are there others?

Mr. Marchand: Well, all statutory rate holders are. Not all, but some are paying their own way.

Mr. Fortier: Do you consider Time and Reader's Digest competitors of yours or any of your member publications?

Mr. Marchand: Well, Time particularly would be a competitor to some of our financial and business publication members. Reader's Digest would be a competitor too, of course, in the other consumer areas.

Mr. Mansfield: Time magazine carries a fair amount of advertising which could be carried by my member publications.

Mr. Marchand: Very much so, we have a lot of proof of this.

Senator Everett: Well, I wonder if they could enlarge on that because I would have thought that while you could carry it it would be unlikely that the advertiser would use a business publication as a substitute for Time magazine.

Mr. Mansfield: Well, there is a fair amount of advertising that carried in Time magazine, but it is also carried in business publications.

The Chairman: Could you give us some examples?

Senator Everett: Well, if you use the qualified circulation presumably you are going for the most part to the dealer, or the reader, or wholesaler, whereas Time presumably would be directed more towards the consumer. It seems to me that if I were advertising I would use Time as a consumers' magazine.

Mr. Mansfield: It is also used for a general business publication. In other words, it is a publication which is read by businessmen. It also could be said that it is competitive with one of Mr. Joel's publications, The Executive.

Mr. Joel: It is competitive, Senator, with a number of publications. Most are, but we don't mind that type of competition. That is fine as long as the starting point of the race is exactly at the same point. This is the point that we would like to make. We think, as you do, that we have some special benefits to offer our readers because we zero in on readers and small groups in a specialized way and are writing just for them. There is no generality but only specialization. Time and Reader's Digest received this rate which puts them in an advantageous position vis-à-vis us. At the same time they are competing in many instances in industrial companies' advertising budgets with the business press. If you pick up any copy of Time magazine you will see exactly what I mean. If you turn the pages you will find industrial companies...

The Chairman: Would you name a few just so we know what you mean?

Mr. Joel: Companies?

The Chairman: Well, kinds of advertisers, yes, that Senator Everett is talking about who use Time and who could conceivably use Reader's Digest or others?

Mr. Joel: ...You will find, let us say, Canadian Westinghouse advertising heavy equipment in Time magazine. Now, this may not be current—you asked me to name something off hand. There may be advertising, and you will find it in Time magazine, for heavy equipment or perhaps trucks. Trucks is probably a good example. We will carry that ad in a medium which is going to people who buy trucks and use trucks but Time magazine will go to people—presumably those people, but also to Ottawa housewives. I have nothing against Ottawa housewives, but they don't buy trucks.

Senator Everett: Let me ask you this question. Presumably what you are saying is that a regulatory rate should be done away with. Is that right? As I understand it the regulatory rate applies to qualified circulation magazines.

Mr. Marchand: Well, what we are saying is that there shouldn't be any difference between a qualified or a paid circulation. We should start from there.

Mr. Joel: We are not discussing what rate should be set but we are saying there should be no discrimination between those two.

Senator Everett: What about the discrimination which exists between qualified circulation magazines published by profit-making organizations and those that are published by associations?

Mr. Mansfield: Well, we think that that is discrimination against the Association publications. We are so on record with the Postmaster-General.

Mr. Marchand: We have told the Postmaster-General that it was not up to the Post Office to discriminate against them. If they had to be put on a par with commercial establishments, profit-making organizations, income tax people should go in and tax their profit like commercial establishments. It is up to the Income Tax Department, not the Post Office, to do such a thing.

Senator Everett: So what you are suggesting is there should be one rate—a second class rate?

Mr. Mansfield: That is correct, sir.

Mr. Joel: And there should be consistency too in the handling of foreign publications.

Senator Everett: By what means?

Mr. Joel: Well, as to the American publications with overflow circulation in Canada.

Senator Everett: What means are you suggesting?

Mr. Joel: I think there should probably be some international regulation by the International Post Office Organization which deals with those things.

Senator Everett: Well, there is an international regulation that a country handles the other country's mail free.

Mr. Joel: Yes, but I think in a case like this that it is an obvious injustice and hardship, where there are publications coming into Canada from the United States, but practically none going the other way. There should be some equity established.

Mr. Mansfield: That regulation does not apply to parcel post, Senator, by the way. They do have terminal payments for fourth class mail.

Senator Everett: I see.

Mr. Mansfield: In other words, there is a measurement taken and a repayment made between the countries.

Senator Everett: You are saying that a measurement could be taken in such a case as this?

Mr. Mansfield: It could be and this, by the way, was one of the recommendations in the O'Leary Commission. This was one of Mr. O'Leary's recommendations.

Senator Everett: You say, Mr. Marchand, that a number of business publications have fallen by the wayside on account of the increase in the postal rate and the reclassification. Do you have any idea of how many or what business publications have fallen by the wayside?

Mr. Marchand: Well, we know of a number ourselves. I could provide you with a list, but I don't have one with me.

Mr. Mansfield: I have such a list.

Senator Everett: Could we have one before eight o'clock tonight?

Mr. Marchand: About 35 publications.

Mr. Mansfield: I have been providing the Post Office with such a list, by the way.

Senator Everett: Could you tell me what loss of circulation has been suffered by the business publications on account of the increase in postal rate and reclassification?

Mr. Marchand: Well, I don't think we have those figures available for the Association's publications. There have been a number you know of changes in frequency and in certain cases trimming down circulation in some areas, but we have no figures.

Senator Everett: You say on page 8 of your brief:

"Member publishers welcome the proposed improvement in the Post Office organization and procedures as they must rely completely on the Post Office for distribution of their publications."

Could you explain that?

Mr. Marchand: Well, let us say that there have been changes that have been discussed for a number of years. They are now going into the possibility of the Post Office being changed to a Crown corporation. If it can help to expedite things and make the service more cost-conscious—I wouldn't say profitable—but certainly more efficient—this is an area in which we have a particular concern. We feel that in the last couple of years, since some of the changes have come about, the service is not better. We are paying much higher rates and the service has deteriorated, particularly for second and third class rates. Publications were distributed before within five days or four days most of the time, now it takes anywhere from eight to 15 days. We are getting a service which is much worse than it ever has been.

Senator Everett: Well, this is a hope that you are expressing here, is that correct?

Mr. Marchand: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: To what extent do you do the Post Office's job?

Mr. Marchand: Well, members of our Association are working very, very closely, exceptionally closely with the Post Office. As a matter of fact, some of our publications will break down by area as small as a city area. I have been told, practically a walk in some of the publications. Generally, it is by postal zone throughout the country, throughout Canada.

Senator Beaubien: You bag them?

Mr. Marchand: Oh yes, definitely.

Senator Beaubien: This is all done by you?

Mr. Marchand: Oh yes, definitely, this is all done before it goes to the Post Office, so we do a lot of the preliminary sorting.

Mr. Fortier: Did you do that before this increase in the postal rates?

Mr. Marchand: Yes.

Senator Beaubien: You have always done

Mr. Marchand: Well, most of us have done it. Some have intensified that and some who weren't doing it are doing it now.

Mr. Fortier: With one publication which you don't need to name, would you give us the whole route from your printing shop all the way through to the final destination? All the way to the reader?

Mr. Marchand: Well, I don't know if I could give you a thorough sample.

Mr. Fortier: Well, we would like to know the service that the Post Office renders to your publications.

Mr. Marchand: Well, I believe that one of our gentlemen here from the Association might be able to give us a routine.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Joel maybe could give us this.

Mr. Joel: Well, if I understand your question, Mr. Fortier, you want to know what we do and what the Post Office does?

Mr. Fortier: Yes, please.

Mr. Joel: Well, the magazines at the printer when they come off the bindery are bundled and sorted according to the postal zone and down to—and Mr. Marchand is correct in this—down to as sharp a detail as postal walks in some cases. They are delivered in that form, in that bulk to the post office.

Mr. Fortier: To one of the registered post offices?

Mr. Joel: Yes. They are delivered in that form.

Senator Everett: Are they sometimes delivered in that form to the railway stations?

Mr. Joel: I don't know.

Mr. Marchand: I believe so.

Mr. Mansfield: Yes.

Mr. Joel: From that point on I can't answer for any other part of the process.

Mr. Fortier: Well, if they are bundled in that way to the extent that one bundle would include only those magazines which would be distributed by one postman...

Mr. Joel: Well, this isn't universally the case. I am not trying to suggest that this happens in all cases because obviously there are different needs and different requirements. However, it does go down to that fine a detail.

Mr. Fortier: This would require a fair amount of co-operation between the Post Office and the individual publications?

Mr. Joel: The Post Office, we have found, has been most co-operative, and we with them, and in the operation of our relationship there has been very little complaint about it over the years.

Mr. Fortier: Supposing we were faced with increased postal rates you would reply to the Post Office "Fine, but you bundle them now." What would be the post office's reaction do you think?

Mr. Joel: I would hate to tell you.

Mr. Fortier: In other words, what I am saying is, since when have you been bundling at the request of the Post Office?

Mr. Marchand: It would be 15 years at least.

Mr. Joel: That is a long time.

Senator Everett: The Post Office suggests that it is merely trying to cover its cost in such rates as the regulatory rates. Had the Association or any of its members estimated the actual cost to the Post Office of distributing a magazine or business publication?

Mr. Mansfield: It is rather difficult to figure that out, Senator. You actually have to be inside the Post Office to know what is happening.

Mr. Joel: It is a factor of the service. This is why it is difficult to answer. Is the particular magazine going to be handled when it is convenient to a given sub-post office as happens, or is it going to be handled on a basis of when it was received and work put into it then?

Mr. Fortier: Has the service by the Post Office improved in the last 15 years?

Mr. Joel: No.

Mr. Marchand: It has deteriorated.

Mr. Fortier: You are paying a great deal more?

Mr. Marchand: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: For this deteriorated service?

Mr. Marchand: Yes. We feel it is not the users' fault if the equipment and methods of the Post Office are not up to par and we shouldn't be made to pay for it.

Senator Everett: If a publication bundles the mail, delivers it to the railway station and so sorts it in the bundling that it is broken down to postal walks, what is the cost content to the Post Office? I assume it is the freight rate?

Mr. Joel: I am sure there are other costs there, Senator.

Senator Everett: Do you know what they are?

Mr. Joel: No, I am not in the Post Office.

The Chairman: Well, Senator, that is a question we can look into tonight.

Mr. Fortier: It is evident as one looks at these new rates that it is cheaper from a postal rate point of view to decrease the size of the magazine by so much as one ounce or one-tenth of an ounce. Given that premise, which we both understand, could we find out what number of pages are involved in one-tenth of an ounce of standard size magazine of say 8½ by 11 inches? What does that represent at one-tenth of an ounce?

Mr. Joel: How many pages?

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Joel: Again, there is an unknown factor—the weight of the paper stock that is being used and it varies quite widely. It is a difficult question and it is difficult to answer it. It might be one page if it is heavy stock.

Senator Smith: Well, you are going to use light stock now, aren't you?

Mr. Joel: We sure are. It might be two pages.

Mr. Fortier: Well, that is the range that we are talking about is it?

Mr. Joel: Yes. I suppose—I don't know if we have any answer, but it could be as much as four or five pages. This of course would be the case if it is extremely light stock.

Mr. Fortier: To your knowledge has any member of your publications attempted to do this?

Mr. Joel: Oh, yes.

Mr. Fortier: Trying to beat them at their own game?

Mr. Joel: We are trying to maintain some proper ratio in our costs. A portion of our costs has to be assessed with the postal delivery.

Mr. Fortier: You must be doing a lot of weighing these days?

Mr. Marchand: Yes.

Senator Smith: Mr. Joel, is it much more expensive to get the very fine paper?

Mr. Joel: No, it is not more expensive. It is in economy to us but there are some publications in which very lightweight stock is not acceptable. We don't use it but we have to be prepared to accept the higher postal cost that that factor produces.

The Chairman: Senator Everett?

Senator Everett: You say on page 9 of your brief, item 30:

"As it applies to the business press, the establishment of a Press Council would not be necessary."

Does that mean that you are not opposed to press council for others but not for ourselves?

Mr. Marchand: Well, I don't think we have any strong views on this. Let us say that we don't see any great advantages at this time for the business press.

Senator Everett: Well, do you have a view against the concept of a press council?

Mr. Marchand: No.

Mr. Mansfield: No.

Mr. Marchand: Well, there is no need for it in the business press area. I think that is our point, Senator.

Senator Everett: Well, if a plumber has a complaint against a plumbing magazine wouldn't a press council be useful for a place for him to lodge his complaint?

Mr. Mansfield: Well, we receive very few complaints, Senator. I think that is the main point.

Mr. Joel: There is an opportunity for the plumber to air his complaints. A plumber can always lodge his complaints with the letters to the editor, and he is always invited to do so, and you will find his letters in the business press.

Senator Everett: Well, I think that is right. I think every publisher has assured us that his particular organ everybody who wants to complain has an opportunity to complain with the letters to the editor, but the concept of a press council goes beyond that. This would be a sort of self-regulatory body that the public could complain to and where a formal hearing would be held. I just can't see why you would be opposed to it?

Mr. Marchand: We are not opposed to it. I just said we had no strong views about it. Maybe we could change our minds and say yes it would be good. We would be prepared to change. Right at the moment, we don't feel there is a great need for it so we feel that we are not very strongly in favour of it but we are not against it.

Mr. Fortier: In those countries where there are press councils in Europe, do you know whether or not they have jurisdiction over business publications?

The Chairman: Mr. Mansfield, are you familiar with that?

Mr. Mansfield: Well, I think the British do have a member of the business press on the press council board.

The Chairman: We have the business press Editors' Association present and we are going to call on them in just a few moments, but perhaps before we do could I just ask our guests a question? Mr. Marchand, how long have you been in the business press business, if you will pardon that phraseology?

Mr. Marchand: Oh, thirteen years.

The Chairman: Mr. Deragon?

Mr. Deragon: Twenty-nine years.

The Chairman: Mr. Joel?

Mr. Joel: Thirteen years.

The Chairman: Mr. Mansfield?

Mr. Mansfield: Seventeen years.

The Chairman: So you have had a lot of experience collectively.

Mr. Marchand: Yes.

The Chairman: May I ask you this: Have any of you ever been editors of a business publication?

Mr. Mansfield: I have.

Mr. Marchand: No.

The Chairman: Mr. Deragon?

Mr. Deragon: Yes.

The Chairman: And what publication if you don't mind my asking?

Mr. Deragon: Canadian Industrial Equipment News.

The Chairman: Mr. Joel?

Mr. Joel: No.

The Chairman: One thing that strikes me about your business, and I put this to you Mr. Marchand, is that it seems strange that the managers from the business side—as I understand it and please correct me if I am wrong—select or determine who the editors will be. Is that true?

Mr. Marchand: You mean on a particular publication?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Marchand: Well, management will hire, yes—publishers will hire editors.

The Chairman: Well, but on the average publication don't you have an advertising person appointing or recommending an editor?

Mr. Marchand: No, not necessarily.

The Chairman: Well, what happens then?

Mr. Marchand: Well, in many of our houses here, some of the top management people have been editors in their own right and have come up through the ranks.

The Chairman: Well, aren't those exceptions to the rule?

Mr. Marchand: Not really exceptions. Not in that sense. There may be one out of a hundred.

The Chairman: So the editors are in no sense second-class citizens then?

Mr. Marchand: Well, we like to think not.

The Chairman: Well, I am going to ask them when they come here—on the average business paper who makes the most money, the editor or the advertising manager?

Mr. Marchand: Well, sometimes the editor and sometimes the advertising manager.

The Chairman: Well, on the average?

Mr. Marchand: Well, the advertising manager very often—well, I don't know.

The Chairman: I am a former advertising salesman...

Mr. Marchand: I can't say. This is something which is difficult for me to answer but would say generally, they wouldn't be too far apart.

Mr. Joel: It is not difficult for me to answer.

The Chairman: Well, would you care to answer it then?

Mr. Joel: The editor today makes more money than the advertising representative. I would say he makes about the same or possibly less than—the editor does—than what we call, in most member companies, an advertising manager, which is a rank above.

The Chairman: Well, let us just take one of your publications. Let us take—oh, let me just choose one at random here—“Sporting Goods News. Are you familiar with that particular publication?

Mr. Marchand: No.

The Chairman: Well, all I really want to know is how many people would sell advertising for that publication?

Mr. Joel: Possibly one or two, I would guess.

The Chairman: Well, there would be an advertising manager and an advertising salesman and an editor and that would be the team, would it?

Mr. Joel: No, it wouldn't even be that. I don't think in that particular case. If it is a small company, you would probably have doubling in brass of the general manager, the company who is also either editor, director or advertising director, as the case may be. If you took one of the Maclean Hunter or Southam National Business publications, it could be different.

The Chairman: Well, take Canadian Forestry Industries—that is one of yours?

Mr. Joel: Yes.

The Chairman: With Canadian Forestry Industries, there would be an editor?

Mr. Joel: There would be an editor and an assistant editor and an editorial assistant in that case—a full time staff of three.

The Chairman: And how many on the advertising staff are there?

Mr. Joel: On the advertising side there would be an advertising manager and an advertising salesman.

The Chairman: Now, would that advertising manager sell advertising for any of the other Southam publications?

Mr. Joel: Well, he might in fact have a responsibility across the two publications, but generally I would think not.

The Chairman: The advertising salesman would though?

Mr. Joel: The advertising salesman would not. He would be only responsible for that one publication. This is of course as a general rule.

The Chairman: Well, I don't want to prolong this discussion because perhaps I am getting into areas which I will be talking about tomorrow with the other companies, and I know that the Business Press Editors Association are waiting. Mr. Fortier, do you have one final question?

Mr. Fortier: I feel compelled to ask this and I am not trying to be mean or facetious in any way, but after two hours of listening and having read the brief, I would like to know what role do you really play as an Association? In other words, would the business press publications field be less healthy if you as an Association were to disappear?

Mr. Marchand: Well, we think so.

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Fortier, that is a pretty vague question. It could take until five o'clock for the witness to answer.

Mr. Fortier: Well, I am not satisfied that there has been an answer yet, either in the written brief or the verbal presentation of a positive service which is rendered by this association to the member publications. I don't think Mr. Mansfield agrees with this, but unfortunately I don't think in the last two hours we had had any answer given by the association.

Mr. Joel: You will have that, Mr. Fortier, in the next presentation from the Business Press Editors' Association which is a component part of the Canadian Business Press.

Mr. Fortier: It is a division of the Canadian Business Press Association?

Mr. Joel: That is right.

Mr. Fortier: Well, they are only the editors, though.

Mr. Joel: Well, I am only citing one component of the industry of the Canadian Business Press which are the editors. All I am going to say is in a very restrictive way that the Business Press Editors' Association, I would suggest, has a contribution to the authority, if you like, of the Canadian Business Press.

The Chairman: Well, I think there is a very important point here for clarification. The Business Press Editors, who we are going to hear from in a moment or two, are a component part of the Canadian Business Press industry or of the Canadian Business Press Association?

Mr. Joel: Association.

The Chairman: They are?

Mr. Joel: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Not legally?

Mr. Joel: Well, they are not illegal.

Mr. Fortier: What is the association between the two Associations?

Mr. Marchand: As an answer to your question and maybe as a final answer, maybe Mr. Mansfield could give you an idea of the types or the number of committees that this Association has and the type or work that they do.

Mr. Fortier: Well, I think it is a very important question.

The Chairman: May I suggest, Mr. Mansfield, in the interest of time that you highlight that document and perhaps you could table it?

Mr. Mansfield: Yes.

The Chairman: Please go ahead.

Mr. Mansfield: We do have seven standing committees and these operate in the areas of: Advertising; Public Relations—this is a promotion of our industry as opposed to other media; Publishing costs; General Practices—by the way this question of the members subscribing to a standards of practice within the organization is to upgrade the industry and this is of course one major benefit of membership; Research; Circulation; and Circulation Policies. This is the kind of work that does go on. It is a committee working organization and the individual members benefit from the work of these committees.

Mr. Fortier: It seems to me in the Association brief that this should have been stressed because you are here as representing the Association and we are limited in our questioning although, we have perhaps gone far afield.

Mr. Joel: You are quite right.

The Chairman: Well, gentlemen, notwithstanding Mr. Fortier's comment, I think we are all grateful that you have been here—nor am I putting his comment down because it is perfectly valid. We are delighted that you have been here and I hope that you stay for the next presentation, and indeed I hope that you stay tomorrow and hear the companies.

May I say to the Senators that I am going to adjourn for exactly five minutes.

—A short recess.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, if I may call this meeting back to order.

The second brief we are going to receive this afternoon is from the Business Press Editors' Association. Perhaps without any further formality I could introduce the people who are present. Sitting on my immediate right is Mr. Bruce Glassford who is the President of the Business Press Editors' Association. He is also the editor of Modern Power and Engineering which is a Maclean-Hunter publication. Sitting on his right is Mr. George Keefe, the First Vice President of the Business Press Editors' Association and the editor of Canadian Industrial Equipment News which is a publication of National Business Publications Limited. On Mr. Keefe's right is Mr. Barry Kay who is the Chairman of the Toronto Chapter of the Business Press Editors' Association. He is also editor of Canadian Paint and Finishing, which is a Maclean-Hunter Limited publication. On Mr. Kay's right, and on my extreme right, is Mr. Alan Hewittson who is a director of the Association and a managing editor of Canadian Consulting Engineer which is a Southam business publication. On my immediate left is Mr. Gilles Verronneau who is the Immediate Past President of the Association and the editor of Genie-Construction which is a Southam business publication. On my extreme left is Mrs. Doreen Sanders, director of the Business Press Editors' Association and editor of The Business Quarterly, a publication of the School of Business Administration of the University of Western Ontario.

Now, as I understand it, instead of making any formal statement, Mr. Glassford simply wishes to give us a word of greeting and then instead of the usual formal 15 minute oral presentation, I understand there is a short slide presentation.

Mr. W. B. Glassford, President, Business Press Editors' Association and Editor, Modern Power and Engineering: That is right. What I felt we should do today by means of a slide presentation was to explain the performance, and influence an impact of the business press in Canada as editors see it. After that we would be very happy to answer questions about this brief and in our role as representatives of the B.P.E.A. And on areas not covered in the brief we would be very happy to give our views on any subjects which you would care to raise.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Glassford.

—(Slide presentation commenced at 4.53 p.m. and continued until 5 p.m.)

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Glassford. Do you wish to add anything at this point?

Mr. Glassford: No.

The Chairman: I believe Senator Petten is going to begin the questioning this afternoon.

Senator Petten: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Glassford, I am going to start off I hope on a little lighter note than my colleague did about Saint John. I won't tell you how to spell Saint John, however. It has been very noticeable among the business press editors that there is a very high proportion of journalists from Great Britain. Is there any particular reason for this?

Mr. Glassford: I think this is a cycle we went through a number of years back and I think the proportion is probably decreasing somewhat now. It was just a matter of availability of trained journalists at that time. At that point there were not the trained journalists in Canada.

Senator Petten: You say one of the objectives of B.P.E.A. is "to maintain ethical standards of conduct in the practice of business journalism." Now, how do you go about setting these standards?

Mr. Glassford: That is a very good question because we do have a little problem here on the other point. We have specified very distinctly that it is not the purpose of this organization to interfere with or in any way take away from the members editorial independence. That is in the constitution, but I would not say that we are enforcing ethical standards other than by a continuing program of education and example of achievements of what is going on in the business press.

Senator Petten: You don't police it or follow it up in any way. You just tell your members to abide by what you say in your constitution?

Mr. Glassford: This is correct.

Senator Petten: There is no check on what they do?

Mr. Glassford: No.

Senator Petten: Another one of the objectives given is to "help develop a higher standard of business leadership." Now, would you like to expand on that a little bit? Are you suggesting that the leadership is not very high at the present time?

Mr. Glassford: Not at all really. I think, basically, the examples we have just cited in the film here—the Wilson Memorial Awards contest winners—we have established this contest as an incentive really to encourage the business press editors to take leadership positions and to really lead their industry. We have cited specific cases in the film where this has taken place.

Senator Petten: In the case of pollution, you bring it to the attention of the public more than anyone else?

Mr. Glassford: Yes, to bring it to the public as well as to our own members really. As far as the editors are concerned, we try to educate and to interchange the information and achievements that we have in the business press. I think this is really our main function.

Senator Petten: Section 4 points out that the publishers' Association finances at least some of the activities of the B.P.E.A. Does B.P.E.A. charge fees to its members? Maybe you should answer the first part of that question first.

Mr. Glassford: In one way or another the publishers finance everything we do, only because of the way the Business Press Editors Association functions. The fees that are charged by B.P.E.A. to attend are ultimately reimbursed to the other employees.

Senator Petten: They cover the cost of the whole business. You don't have an annual budget as such?

Mr. Glassford: Actually we do. We operate on a $1,500 grant for overhead expenses really from CBP to cover the operating expenses of B.P.E.A., but normally the bulk of our funds come from the functions that we operate and for which we charge fees.

Senator Petten: Well, for example a registration fee. You don't charge a fee as such for your Association?

Mr. Glassford: No, not an annual fee. This is what the grant from CBP replaces, really. Otherwise, we would have to charge individual members individual membership fees.

Senator Petten: Well, the point I am trying to get at is, doesn't this put you under a bit of an obligation to the people who employ you? I am not suggesting they do, but I am just asking.

Mr. Glassford: No, I don't feel it does. Basically the way I feel as far as B.P.E.A. is concerned is that we have been set up as part of CBP to encourage and to improve the editorial function in the business press. How we do it, you know, is left strictly up to us.

The Chairman: Well, following Senator Petten's question, does it ever happen that you disagree with CBP?

Mr. Glassford: Very strongly.

The Chairman: Can you give us any specific examples?

Mr. Glassford: Well, for example, a very minor point is in the difference between the two briefs here.

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Fortier thinks that is a major point.

Mr. Glassford: Well, for example, on the postal rates. I have suggested really that we should enjoy statutory rates but my point is not necessarily in terms of dollars and cents. What I am suggesting is that the business press get a statutory rate. This of course is to say that it would not necessarily increase or decrease our postage costs, but from the editorial point of view of eliminating the possible hazards that we view as editors of having the publisher eliminate editorial pages strictly to reach a specific step in the postal scale.

The Chairman: Well, as you point out that is a difference in approach and I agree with you, but do you ever differ with them in terms of something which is more meaningful and not just about some exterior matter? Do you ever disagree with them about some matter that affects you vitally?

Mr. Glassford: Yes.

The Chairman: Well, again, could you give us an example?

Mr. Glassford: Well, for example, last year we had an election in which basically the existing executive proposed in effect to disband B.P.E.A. as it was presently constituted and to form a voluntary organization outside of C.B.P. The membership voted it down and this was a case where the executive of B.P.E.A. at that time were taking a position directly contrary obviously to the expressed intention of C.B.P.

The Chairman: Do you use a general manager to do your work.

Mr. Glassford: Right.

Senator Peitten: In section 18 you discuss the leadership role of the business editor.

Mr. Glassford: Right.

Senator Peitten: You state that many editors have played major parts in promoting industry actions that ignore short-term, advantages in favour of the public interest. Which do you consider to be the business editor's primary responsibility if the public's interest and the special interest of the industry conflict? In some particular magazine for instance?

Mr. Glassford: Well, I think we have a fairly long history of standing for the national interest. This is, of course, aside from the special interest of the industry. Primarily because I think the business press editor takes a longer term view and possibly a little broader scope than necessarily the industry he serves, as in the case of pollution. My readers—I happen to be serving an industrial audience—are interested in profits. They are interested in petroleum pollution only as far as they have to be and if it affects their profits. I have been waging very strong campaigns, as have most of the other publications over the years, urging them to increase their activities in this area. This is despite the fact that in the opinion of the industry this is not necessarily desirable or essential at this point

Senator Peitten: Have you ever had a problem with, say, one of your advertisers who happens to be in the same field? He is advertising and you disagree with this. Have you ever had any pressure brought to bear on you by the people who are paying for these ads?

Mr. Glassford: Well, I think every editor here has had a case of this nature.

Senator Peitten: The sort of thing; "We don't want you to print this"?

Mr. Glassford: Yes.

Senator Peitten: So it has happened?

Mr. Glassford: Yes.

The Chairman: Do you succumb?

Mr. Glassford: No.

The Chairman: Never?

Mr. Glassford: No, I can't think of a case where I have succumbed. I have always been given full management backing.

The Chairman: What would B.P.E.A. do if it found out a member had succumbed to this kind of pressure?

Mr. Glassford: Under the constitution we have two conflicting items and I can't think of a way that B.P.E.A. would act in this area.

The Chairman: What about the reverse kind of pressure? What do you do when you find an editor who has written an article at the request of a space salesman because an advertiser has purchased several pages?

Mr. Glassford: I don't know. I have never had that happen to me.

The Chairman: That doesn't happen either.

Mr. Glassford: No, not in my case. I don't know if any of the other members—

Mr. Barry Kay, Chairman, Toronto Chapter, Business Press Editors' Association and Editor, Canadian Paint and Finishing: I think it is fair to say that the sales staffs of certainly the larger houses are now sophisticated to the point where they not only would not do it, they do not want to do it. One of their main selling points is editorial integrity and editorial leadership which is obvious to the sales staff, and I would hope, to the large majority of the advertisers. We cannot maintain a position within our field if we succumb to blandishments from advertisers.

Mr. Glassford: I have brought along our editorial manual which points out that all editorial features should be planned expressly for the reader. No editor should be asked to provide editorial coverage for any specific product in any specific issue on a basis in which to obtain advertising. There is no place in our editorial columns for material that is intended to specifically serve advertising purposes, unless it fully serves the readers' purpose.

The Chairman: Mr. Glassford, I don't mean to be cynical, but a long, long time ago I worked for a weekly newspaper which has similar standards but they were seldom adhered to. I am particularly interested in the comment of Mr. Kay because I think it would seem to indicate that this is a change in the right direction. That is perhaps an unfair thing for me to say because I am implying that it always wasn't this way, but I can't help wondering if it wasn't always this way, and particularly in smaller publications. However, you don't have to comment on that—you have answered the question.

Senator Pettin: In section 19 you discuss the role of B.P.E.A. in developing a distinctive Canadian identity in business and industry. Now, does the Association take a position on the increasing U.S. ownership in Canadian industries?

Mr. Glassford: No, I don't think so. I don't think this has ever been discussed.

Senator Pettin: Don't you think you could?

Mr. Glassford: Again, this is one of the areas that I would not like to see B.P.E.A. tell its members what to think.

Senator Pettin: Well, can I read this section to you?

Mr. Glassford: Yes.

Senator Pettin: It reads as follows:

"Through this type of editorial leadership, the Canadian Business Press and more particularly, members of Business Press Editors' Association, play a major role in developing a distinctive Canadian identity in business and industry, and assist in the development of Canada as a nation."

Now, when you say that should you not be doing...

Mr. Glassford: Well, I think the point I am making here really is if we did adopt an Association policy on this, really it would get down to making a judgment on individual situations.

The Chairman: Well, you have adopted a policy. Senator Pettin read it. How do you implement that policy?

Mr. Glassford: Well, basically what I am saying is that the members of the Association, not B.P.E.A. are doing it because I feel that most of our members are very staunch Canadians. They are most interested in seeing the development of Canada and a stronger Canada.

The Chairman: How do they do this?

Mr. Glassford: Through their publications.

The Chairman: Could you give us some examples—specific examples?

Mr. Glassford: Well, referring to Mr. Veronneau's editorial, for example. In his case—possibly you might explain, Gilles?

The Chairman: Well, that was on public tenders in Quebec...

Mr. Glassford: Yes, but the prime purpose and the reasoning behind it was the development of private contracting capabilities in the province that would be available for export and in other areas. Do I interpret you correctly, Gilles?

Mr. Chairman: Would you care to comment on that, Mr. Veronneau?

Mr. Gilles Veronneau, Immediate Past President, Business Press Editors' Association and Editor, Génie-Construction: Well, this particular editorial applied to a regional problem, but I don't know to what extent you can relate it to the point the Senator brought up. I would say that, at large, most of the trade and paper editors get involved in the particular industry or industries that their magazine serves sufficiently to be able to crusade or promote within that particular industry a Canadian identity for a national publication or, in our case, a Quebec identity.

The Chairman: What if Mr. Glassford, as an editor, has a publication which is in an industry which is controlled by American interests. How then does he promote the Canadian identity?

Mr. George Keefe, First Vice-President, Business Press Editors' Association and Editor, Canadian Industrial Equipment News: I don't necessarily say he does. In this case, in paragraph 19, he says that members of the Association have historically been very strong advocates of policy and programs which would achieve this end.

Mr. Kay: I am an editor in an industry that is overwhelmingly controlled by the United States.

The Chairman: What was that again?

Mr. Kay: Canadian Paint and Finishing. We cover the Industrial coating industry and 12 of our 14 Canadian companies are American subsidiaries. My stock and trade has been flag raising as it has been for a great many other editors. I have worked for Maclean-Hunter Publications, none of which had competition in Canada, but all of which had fields varying in degree promoted by American magazines. American magazines sometimes gave attention to the Canadian industry, but very little in terms of what was going on and what was needed in the Canadian industry. We have devoted ourselves entirely to the Canadian industry and going to the stage where some stories emanate from the States and we make a supreme effort to apply them to Canadian situations. One case in particular was that paint and industrial research has always been funded by the Paint Research Institute, which is an American Institute with some Canadian association society members. However, the Canadian associations were providing a much larger percentage of support to this institute than the moneys coming back into Canada. We campaigned vigorously, and I might say very unpopularity as far as the Americans were concerned, to have a research program or a branch of the Research Institute set up in Canada and we were successful. It is very much a long term proposition, but it has had immediate advantages with the sponsorship of at least one more university program in coatings research, and another one coming up. This may or may not but probably not, have been sponsored by the institute had not the Canadian industry and ourselves brought the matters to the fore and made a fuss about it.

It is simply a matter that we act as Canadians, we devote ourselves to the Canadian scene, we try to establish Canadian identity right across the industry. We have found feedback from the readers that it has been very, very important to them, and this is at the highest levels, even at the top management of the American subsidiaries. They have been very, very frustrated by having to do things the American way and having no Canadian identity. We have had letters and telephone calls and personnel meetings to get this clear.

The Chairman: Thank you.
Senator Petten?

Senator Petten: The Toronto Public Library surveys summarized in section 22 and section 23 indicate that of 95 federal Government publications which were studied, they were consulted very little by the professional people they were intended to serve. Would you like to name some of these Government publications?

Mr. Glassford: Well, I don't have that information with me. I included the information it was given to me by the library.

Senator Petten: I was going to ask are they doing a poor job and what was wrong with them? However, there is not much point asking if you don't have the information.

The Chairman: You don't know any of them at all, Mr. Glassford?

Mr. Glassford: No, I don't.

The Chairman: Do any of you know any of them?

Mr. Glassford: Well, this is just information that was sent to me.

The Chairman: Well, I imagine we can get that information.

Mr. Fortier.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask Mr. Verronneau a question. I shall wait to see if simultaneous translation is being provided.

You are a Past President of the Business Press Editors Association, are you not?

Mr. Gilles Verronneau, Editor of Général Construction: Yes, that is correct.

Mr. Fortier: Do trade publications—except the expression, I realize that it is not quite exact—written in French reach a local audience other than that of the Province of Quebec?

Mr. Verronneau: Can you explain a little more fully what you mean by "a locality other..."

Mr. Fortier: I should have begun perhaps by putting the question to you in this way: as an editor, would it be correct to say that the magazines which your association represents have a nation-wide circulation?

Mr. Verronneau: No, the majority or all of these magazines have what may be called a regional circulation in the sense that they cover the French Canadian market, principally Quebec.

Mr. Fortier: I did not mean just the French Canadian or Quebec market. The English language magazines have a nation-wide market, is that not so?

Mr. Verronneau: Yes, that is correct.

Mr. Fortier: Of the English magazines, are there some which have a purely regional market?

Mr. Verronneau: I believe so, yes. To my knowledge, there are one or two English language publications edited in the west which are limited to the market in Western Canada. There is, for example, the Journal of Commerce published in B.C., and another publication which have purely regional circulation.

Mr. Fortier: On the other hand, the French language magazines circulate only in the province of Quebec?

Mr. Verronneau: For all practical purposes, yes. There may be some exceptions where some magazines do circulate in the Maritimes or in the West to a certain extent but in any event it is insignificant.

Mr. Fortier: I noticed that there were some magazines published in French in Quebec which had English-language counterparts.

Mr. Verronneau: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: In an organization such as Southam's or Maclean's, is there a certain amount of piracy or is there perhaps co-operation, let us say, between the two magazines?

Mr. Verronneau: Piracy, no; co-operation, certainly to some extent. For all practical purposes, each publication has its own team, its own editorial staff. Now this does not exclude the possibility of exchanging articles or information between magazines, so-called counterparts, insofar as the editor involved deems the material or article published in its counterpart to be of interest to his readers. This is done, I would not say regularly, but it does happen.

Mr. Fortier: You are part of the Southam group; is such co-operation within the group recognized and even encouraged? If, for Génie-Construction, you want to borrow an article which was published in the English-language counterpart do you have to request permission? What procedure do you follow?

Mr. Verronneau: As a general rule, this practice is left to the initiative of the editors who arrive at an agreement among themselves. I believe that it is simply a matter of courtesy for the editor to request permission from the editor of the magazine concerned to borrow, reproduce or translate the article he wishes to have. This is the procedure regularly followed.

Mr. Fortier: If you do so, do you pay a fee to the counterpart?

Mr. Verronneau: No, because if for example an article is written by a member of the permanent staff, as a general rule, publishing firms have a copyright on everything published in their publications. The material then becomes the property of the firm.

Mr. Fortier: This is one of the advantages of the group, obviously.

Mr. Verronneau: On the other hand, it may happen that a magazine purchased from an outsider. Someone outside the publishing firm an article that an editor of another magazine wants to use. Then an agreement may be made with the author of the article whereby he will receive some remuneration due to the fact that, rather than being published in a single magazine, his article will be used in more than one magazine. This often depends on the author. This type of consideration may be demanded.

Mr. Fortier: Earlier this afternoon we were told of surveys which had been conducted among the readers of various magazines. Has it been your experience, Mr. Verronneau, that among French Canadian readers, the business magazine has not received the same 100 per cent credibility which was mentioned this afternoon?

Mr. Verronneau: It is fairly difficult to give a definite answer to this question. To get around it, let me say that this varies from one industry to the next because it depends, to a certain extent, on the quality of the reader. In my case, my magazine is addressed to engineers, contractors, people usually with a fairly high level of education. The credibility factor plays a very important role. We have had several experiences in this line. For example, in one case, statements made in the newspapers were not taken seriously. But this would not have been so had they been reproduced in a magazine such as ours, whether ours in particular or a similar English-language magazine. I would say that, generally, the same applies for the other sectors of industry. To use a cliché, the magazine is often considered the Bible of the industry and it is continually referred to for information on the latest developments in particular fields.

Mr. Fortier: Have you conducted surveys on this aspect of credibility among your readers?

Mr. Verronneau: Not as such, no. We obtain this certainty from other types of surveys among readers which are conducted at various times but at least annually. In addition, there are the personal contacts the editorial team has in the course of its work with people from industry, contractors, engineers, etc.

Mr. Fortier: As a general rule—I am returning here to a question I raised somewhat earlier—does the editor or the French Canadian businessman read (I shall not say subscribe to, obviously) a business magazine on the same basis as the English Canadian reader?

Mr. Verronneau: You should see the telephone calls and letters we receive when we make a mistake. He certainly does read it!

Mr. Fortier: And are there proportionally as many French Canadians from industry who read a business magazine as English Canadians?

Mr. Verronneau: Yes. First of all, let me state that he reads everything. There are just as many English-language business magazines as French-language business magazines.

Mr. Fortier: Very well.

Mr. Verronneau: Inevitably he is inundated and receives magazines from everywhere, both from the United States and from Europe. He is also well served by strictly French publications.

Mr. Fortier: From the standpoint of advertising in Quebec, who do you consider to be your competitors?

Mr. Verronneau: Here again it depends.

Mr. Fortier: Are they your English Canadian counterparts?

Mr. Verronneau: No, it would be rather paradoxical if such a situation developed. There are some industries in which you will have more than one French-language magazine. This is where you run into direct competition. In other industries you have only a single French-language magazine which is in competition with English-language magazines, whether American or Canadian. At this point you encounter competition on all sides.

Mr. Fortier: Have you worked for another magazine in the Southam group?

Mr. Verronneau: No, I have been working with this magazine for eight years.

[Text]

The Chairman: Senator Petten?

Senator Petten: Section 32 says that the business press in Canada is intensely competitive. Is this true within the major publishing houses such as Maclean-Hunter and Southam? Do these magazines compete with each other?

Mr. Glassford: Both within the corporation and without.

Senator Petten: Well, how about the advertising?

Mr. Glassford: That is where they are intensely competitive.

Senator Petten: Well, let us take one. How about Maclean-Hunter? If you are advertising it is it solicited by one group?

Mr. Glassford: No, they are solicited by individual salesmen.

Senator Petten: Salesmen for individual magazines?

Mr. Glassford: Yes.

Senator Petten: This is a question I should have asked a little earlier. If two industries have different and conflicting interests, do the editors in the magazines in these fields dispute editorially with each other?

Mr. Glassford: Yes, very much so.

The Chairman: Could you give us some examples of that?

Mr. Verronneau: I could give you an example that happened a few years back. It didn't involve any of our publications but, as a matter of fact, involved a case where the editor of a Toronto publication—a Maclean-Hunter publication—took a stand on an issue pertaining to the Quebec situation. The editor of the French publication disputed this stand and you could say you had two publications coming from the same house, the individual editors could take different stands, or were free to do so.

Senator Pettit: Well, this might have happened in any event, but let us take Ontario for instance where both magazines would be in the same province and there was conflict between the two industries in the one province. Would they then take different viewpoints?

Mr. Keefe: Well, I have never heard of any encouragement to adopt a uniform or editorial stand within the company.

The Chairman: Well, before we leave that, it has been said at these hearings in another context that you wouldn't need a directive if you would sort of instinctively know, by process of osmosis, that a written directive is not necessary. You would not have to conflict with the editorial policy of a sister publication, and you presumably think that is wrong?

Mr. Glassford: Very much so.

The Chairman: Would you give us an example?

Mr. Glassford: I can't think of one offhand, as a matter of fact, where this has occurred, but certainly I have had major wars with my publications outside the house, but it is not so happens never with a publication inside the house.

Senator Pettit: In section 52—it says that the "overflow circulation from U.S. business publications into Canada is a problem to the Canadian business press." In sections 53 and 54 it would indicate that you are not particularly worried about it. The gentlemen that preceded you here appeared to be very worried about it. Do you think that there should be any limitation on this overflow?

Mr. Glassford: My personal feeling is that I agree very much with the CBP stand. I don't think it is particularly desirable that we should subsidize American publications coming in by means of our postal rate.

Senator Pettit: But your brief doesn't say that though?

Mr. Glassford: No.

Senator Pettit: Paragraphs 53 and 54 gives an indication of that, that is why I asked the question. Perhaps one of your other colleagues would like to comment on that?

Mr. Kay: I think perhaps in the brief we are concentrating on editorial ownership and editorially I don't think the Canadian publications take a back seat or worry particularly about American competition. In our brief, as far as the business side of the publications is concerned, we don't particularly worry.

The Chairman: What is the difference between business journalism and journalism?

Mr. Glassford: It is very differently analyzed.

The Chairman: And can you explain in what respect?

Mr. Glassford: It is much more technical, it is much more involved with economics and financing than you would find in a normal journalism course. Actually, I think it is significant possibly—I have noticed a trend in our recruitment in the last few years—that there seems to be a move towards broader general arts, et cetera, rather than general journalism because of the need for a broader background.

The Chairman: Mr. Glassford, surely the technical knowledge which is needed by the editor would be quite different for a publication dealing with building supplies than for a publication dealing with civic administration wouldn't it?

Mr. Glassford: Very much so.

The Chairman: Would you cover both of these things in this course?

Mr. Glassford: Basically what we would be talking about would be the methods of handling, for example, the technical information needed in journalism.

Mr. Kay: Magazine journalism.

The Chairman: Are you gentlemen second-class citizens within the industry?

Mr. Glassford: Not at all. At least, I don't think so.

The Chairman: Do you make as much money as the advertising space people?

Mr. Glassford: Well, I think the distinction made earlier is reasonably accurate.

The Chairman: And what do you mean by reasonably accurate?

Mr. Glassford: Well, as a matter of fact, I feel quite certain that I am making more than a good many publication managers.

The Chairman: Yes, but do you have a very big publication?

Mr. Glassford: Yes.

The Chairman: Do you make more than the advertising people on your publication?

Mr. Glassford: I make more than the advertising representatives.

The Chairman: Do you make more than the advertising manager?

Mr. Glassford: No.

The Chairman: Does that trouble you at all?

Mr. Glassford: Not one bit.

The Chairman: To your knowledge—and you may not be able to answer it—is this true in the daily newspaper industry?

Mr. Glassford: Well, I really don't know how to answer that.

The Chairman: That is that most daily newspaper advertising managers would make more money than the editors?

Mr. Glassford: Well, not having a journalism background...

The Chairman: Would any of the rest of you care to comment on that?

Mr. Verronneau: No.

The Chairman: You don't, in any event, feel you are second-class citizens?

Mr. Glassford: No.

The Chairman: Does it trouble you that your appointment very often is at the behest of an advertising person? Now, don't misunderstand me. It is my understanding...

Mr. Verronneau: I would say that as a rule the appointments are made on the basis of the competence of the individual involved. Whether the people appraising this competence have a sales background or editorial background I think is irrelevant.

The Chairman: Do you not think people with a journalistic background are better people to judge journalistic competence than people with an advertising sales background?

Mr. Verronneau: Well, as a rule this can be said, definitely. There are, however, a good number of people with editorial background in their various levels of management in the major publishing houses who are able to assess these candidates.

Mr. Glassford: I think there is also a false premise here really, because I just hired an assistant last week and the decision as to who was hired was strictly mine.

The Chairman: But that assistant to become an editor will presumably have to meet the approval of some advertising person?

Mr. Glassford: Yes.

Mr. Kay: Well, not necessarily. The company structure is such that we have the editorial and advertising operations working together in each publication under a manager. Now often this manager will come through the advertising ranks and will, in fact, handle part of the advertising duties. In other cases, too, there will be a manager present, who has come up through the editorial ranks and who has handled the duties of editor and manager.

The Chairman: Well, do you know, Mr. Kay—you may not be able to answer this of course—do more managers of business publications come through the advertising side or through the editorial side?

Mr. Kay: I would think the advertising side of it.

Mr. Glassford: That would depend on the house.

Mr. Keefe: I would say that more people would come through the editorial side when there are less people on the editorial side who were less journalistic and tied to their magazine than they are at the present time. I think most editors are basically journalists and prefer to remain journalists rather than move into the additional area of sales.

The Chairman: Well, I was going to ask that very question. Do editors ever move into sales and you have given me the answer.

Mr. Glassford: Well, there are a number of cases.

Mr. Keefe: Well, at our particular house I can think of two cases within the last year of an editorial man becoming an editorial director and publisher, one of our flagship publications, and more recently an editor becoming editorial director and manager.

Mr. Glassford: As a matter of fact, I think we have a prime example in the audience here today with Mr. Daly who is the Past President of the B.P.E.A. and I believe is the Chairman of the Board of Southam's.

The Chairman: I note in section 25 you did a survey of your membership.

Mr. Glassford: Right.

The Chairman: You say the average age of the editors is between 30 and 40.

Mr. Glassford: Right.

The Chairman: Where do old business press editors go?

Mr. Glassford: They just miss their deadline. Well, they either stay in their own fields or go out into other fields.

The Chairman: Well, but you fellows are all within the average age of the group here, I am sure. Do they go into public relations?

Mr. Glassford: Yes, that would be a very sizable drain, I would say.

The Chairman: Well, do they go into industry?

Mr. Glassford: Right.

The Chairman: Do they ever go into the mass media—to the consumer mass media if I can call it that.

Mr. Glassford: Very seldom.

The Chairman: Why?

Mr. Glassford: Well, that is because it is a more specialized field.

The Chairman: Why are you people all business editors instead of editors or reporters on daily newspapers? That is a pretty tough question, I appreciate, but I would like your answer.

Mr. Kay: Most of us have been.

The Chairman: You have?

Mr. Kay: Yes.

The Chairman: How many of you work or have worked on daily newspapers?

Mr. Kay: I have.

The Chairman: Well, most of you have but not all.

Mr. Kay: I did work on a newspaper until about four or four and a half years ago.

The Chairman: And why did you leave, Mr. Kay?

Mr. Kay: Why did I leave daily newspapers or why do I stay in the business publications?

The Chairman: Well, both, it is the same thing.

Mr. Kay: Well, it's not really.

The Chairman: Well, you answer them both.

Mr. Kay: The reason I left newspapers—there are many reasons. I was at the Globe and Mail —

The Chairman: Is that one of the reasons!

Mr. Kay: The reason I left the Globe and Mail was because I felt that after having learned as much as I could about the newspaper business I wanted to leave and I wanted to get into another field. I was also looking for an opportunity for advancement. I was looking for opportunities for advancement beyond what I could have had at the Globe and Mail and I received this in business publications. A few people did go back to newspapers, but I think the reason why so many people didn't go back was because business publications pay higher than newspapers.

The Chairman: Well, that is the next question I was coming to. When you were at the Globe and Mail you belonged to the Guild I imagine?

Mr. Kay: That is right.

The Chairman: And you don't belong to the Guild now?

Mr. Kay: No.

The Chairman: Has the Guild attempted to organize business press editors?

Mr. Kay: I don't think the Guild would have any major support from the business press editors. The ones that I have spoken to concerning unions feel that they don't want anything to do with it. In the business press you write your own ticket on the basis of your merit. If you are reasonably good, it is a reasonably good ticket you can write. With the Guild you don't. I remember when I was with the Globe and Mail—a large percentage of the staff there were on union rates—and as a standard practice if you did get a raise above union rates you could usually expect to miss the next raise. In other words, you didn't necessarily receive a raise because you got above grade 1, you wouldn't necessarily stay above grade 1. The Globe and Mail was a very unusual circumstance and is probably a bad example because the Globe and Mail is populated by true professional journalists. They are all good and perhaps for this reason they are all on the same rate, I don't know. What I am trying to say is that when you are on a Guild paper you don't necessarily succeed on merit. You just sort of go along with the Guild, but this seems to be the tendency to me.

I have worked with two different newspapers and this always has been the case.

The Chairman: You belonged to two different unions?

Mr. Kay: Well, I belonged to the Guild and the National Union of Journalists in Britain. I spent some time over there. It was the same there. In business publications I found that you could proceed on the basis of your merit.

The Chairman: Well, coming back to the other question I asked you: Has the Guild attempted to organize business press editors?

Mr. Kay: I just couldn't say.

The Chairman: Presumably it would work company by company, would it?

Mr. Glassford: I think there were one or two attempts quite a number of years ago. They very rapidly ran into exactly what Mr. Kay was just saying, that is, that the editors were just not interested in joining the union.

Mr. Fortier: I think the Committee would be interested in hearing from Mr. Glassford on the question which was put earlier this afternoon as to what would be to the editor the ideal ratio of news to advertising in your own publication?

Mr. Glassford: Well, answering as an editor I would say 100 per cent. Actually, I think this is a matter that depends so much on both these fields, the audience being served and the editorial approach in the magazine. You cannot draw a general view.

Mr. Fortier: Would this vary from audience to audience?

Mr. Glassford: Oh, very much so. In my case, I happen to have a fairly large publication, but I also maintain fairly high editorial to advertising ratio. I think it is running 45 to 50 per cent which is possibly a little above average for the magazines generally.

Mr. Fortier: Do you as an editor have anything at all to say to the placing in your magazine of a particular advertisement?

Mr. Glassford: Nothing other than the veto.

Mr. Fortier: Have you ever exercised your veto?

Mr. Glassford: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: For what reason?

Mr. Glassford: Well, if there is an ad that is related to the topic that would be placed adjacent to it, for example, so that there looks like an obvious tie-in I am going to ask that that be removed. I have never run into a case where there would be any other particular reason.

Mr. Kay: There is also a matter of graphics involved.

Mr. Glassford: Yes, for example, when you are using colour—you don't want to get an ad of the same colour facing the editorial colour.

Mr. Fortier: But you would generally speaking be asked for your opinion, or at least be expected to express an opinion?

Mr. Allan Hewittson, Director, Business Press Editors' Association and Managing Editor, Canadian Consulting Engineer: If I could answer that—I go over the publication's advertisements before they are set in place looking for many things. I regard them as an essential part of the publication, so you don't run an advertisement for a pup beside an article for a pup.

Mr. Fortier: Well, on that point would the editor tell the advertising manager long before going to press about the subjects which he will be editorializing about in the next publication?

Mr. Hewittson: Well, this may apply to others, but in my case it doesn't. I am new parts, new materials, new equipment; it doesn't enter into our operations.

Mr. Fortier: Could we hear from Mr. Glassford?

Mr. Glassford: It varies very, very much from publication to publication. As an example, I will, a year in advance, highlight the feature reports that I am doing. As it happens, I run 12 major reports of one kind or another during the year. They will be planned a year in advance and then published. As far as the detailed editorial content, no.

Mr. Kay: I send a memo to my advertising department about three weeks in advance, or as soon as I have my feature editorial thought out enough.

Mr. Fortier: Well, does this work in reverse also?

Mr. Kay: You mean do they tell me what advertising they have?

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Kay: I am aware of what ads are in and what ads are not in.

Mr. Fortier: But it in no way affects your decision to publish a story?

Mr. Kay: No. As I say, I memo them to tell them what I am doing and, as I say, I may know about the ads but this is a matter of business interest. This has nothing to do with my editorial approach.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow, do you have a question?

Senator Sparrow: Well, it is a new subject.

Mr. Fortier: Well, maybe just one last question.

The Chairman: Fine, go ahead, Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: On this question of advertising and editorial content. Have you ever been informed of instances where advertisers from particular magazine have complained to the publisher because of editorial content?

Mr. Glassford: Yes.

Mr. Kay: Often.

Mr. Glassford: Everyone here has.

Mr. Fortier: Are those letters, if they are submitted to you in the form of letters, to the editor, are they published?

Mr. Glassford: If they are submitted in that form, yes.

Mr. Fortier: Do you ever edit letters to the editors?

Mr. Glassford: I can't honestly answer that because I haven't had one of that nature at all.

Mr. Kay: Well, you put it into good English if they are making grammatical errors, or something.

Mr. Fortier: Well, would you refuse to publish a letter to the editor?

Mr. Glassford: I certainly wouldn't.

The Chairman: Would any of you here refuse to publish a letter to the editor?

Mr. Kay: No.

Mr. Glassford: No.

Mr. Verronneau: No.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: How do you determine then what is a letter to the editor?

Mr. Glassford: If a letter presumably comes directed to the editor complaining about a specific item that appeared in the publication or a comment on it, that I would think would be a letter to the editor. Actually, I get thousands of letters a year really, but most of them are asking for reprints and this sort of thing. Talking in this term, they would have to be referring to a specific piece of material that appeared in the publication, or a correction, or something along this line.

Mr. Fortier: Well, we have to keep our questions very general because you are here as an Association. Would it be good generalistic practice to promote editorially one product as compared to another product in the same line?

Mr. Glassford: Some different publications do exactly this. Take for example in some semi-consumer ones, but actually I haven't had any experience in that line.

Mr. Verronneau: It depends on the industry. Some readers would like to have the publication they received in the field give them this kind of comparative article where the editor will take two or three machines or pieces of equipment in a given line and make a comparison analysis.

Mr. Fortier: Like Consumers' Report magazine?

Mr. Verronneau: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Do you do that in your publication.

Mr. Verronneau: I don't know if any of the other publications do it. I know we don't do it for the simple reason that I am not sure we could do it accurately and adequately because you have to know the product very thoroughly. I know it is done in some publications in England. In Europe it is also very popular. We see that very often in different magazines.

Mr. Fortier: Well, you claim in your brief that trade publications must direct the development of industry, so with that thought in mind would you seek to test different machines one against the other and then editorialize on it, not as a consumer magazine but as a business magazine?

Mr. Verronneau: Well, if you can find someone competent enough to do it.

Mr. Fortier: Well, would you do it then?

Mr. Verronneau: Sure.

Mr. Fortier: Would that be good business press journalism?

Mr. Glassford: Yes.

Mr. Keefe: The editing process involves this very thing. You eliminate the pump item from manufacturer X and collect the one from manufacturer Y because it appears on the basis of your experience and knowledge that it is a better product. We don't have the facilities to go out and test these two different pumps, but we make judgements.

The Chairman: May I say to the Senators and to Mr. Fortier that I would be most anxious to adjourn in five minutes at six o'clock. I have one question which I think is rather important and which hasn't been put and I would like to put it actually to you, Mrs. Sanders.

I noted with some interest in your biography not only that you are a graduate of the University of Western Ontario in journalism, but also that on behalf of the B.P.E.A. you are currently conducting research into journalism courses being offered at Canadian universities. Now, it would perhaps be unfair—the question I would like to ask you is could we have the benefits of the information you find out? That is perhaps an unfair question or request, but I think the Committee would benefit from anything you could say now. We would also benefit from anything you would care to send us. Could you comment on this?

Mrs. Doreen Sanders, Director, Business Press Editors' Association and Editor, the Business Quarterly, School of Business Administration, University of Western Ontario: I would be most interested in sending you our final findings.

The Chairman: When will that be?

Mrs. Sanders: The end of April.

The Chairman: Well, that will be useful to us.

Mrs. Sanders: I have been to Carleton University and to Western and they have suggested that we might be interested as an association to offer to pay to honour journalism students, their last year's tuition. They would then go into business options. On the other hand, we could offer to honour business students their tuition for a one year diploma course in journalism.

The Chairman: Is there a scarcity of people coming into the business press?

Mrs. Sanders: I think that all these gentlemen would say yes.

The Chairman: It is a problem is it?

Mrs. Sanders: Yes.

The Chairman: Why?

Mrs. Sanders: I think that most young men that take an M.B.A., for instance, or go into business, perhaps never think of becoming journalists which is surprising to me. Then for journalists to take a business course on top of journalism is...

The Chairman: You said most young men. Are there many women business editors?

Mrs. Sanders: Yes, there are several.

Mr. Chairman: Just several?

Mrs. Sanders: Yes.

The Chairman: Just that few.

Mrs. Sanders: Yes.

The Chairman: Why would there be so few?

Mrs. Sanders: Well, it is certainly an open field for women.

The Chairman: I would think so, yes.

Mrs. Sanders: Certainly I have all kinds of encouragement from men to go on in this field, but one has to have the advantage I guess to be able to go into a business course or have some knowledge of business.

The Chairman: Yet presumably all business editors aren't graduates of journalism courses or of business schools.

Mrs. Sanders: No.

The Chairman: Mr. Verronneau, were you going to say anything?

Mr. Verronneau: Well, one of the reasons for that is pertinent to the nature of some of the fields covered by some of the magazines. You would hardly see a woman editor on a construction magazine or in the Forest Industry publications, or a construction project magazine, or something like that.

The Chairman: But wouldn't that work both ways?

Mr. Verronneau: To a certain degree. There are fields which are more suited for women than men. There are a lot of women working as associate editors on various publications but then you just don't think of a woman going on top of a 300-foot tower to write a story about it, or something.

The Chairman: Well, on that note, I am afraid I have to terminate this session. Before going so...

Mr. Kay: Well, may I just add one thing.

The Chairman: Yes, certainly.

Mr. Kay: When we were discussing reasons for staying in the field of journalism there is also the satisfaction content too. Money is probably the main reason but there is a great deal more satisfaction to be evolved from the job personally. Perhaps it is running your own show, perhaps it is having the time to do greater in-depth research on your article, so you then do a better job. You would find this in business publications and not in newspapers.

The Chairman: Mr. Glassford, back to my final question. If the information which Mrs. Sanders is able to determine could be made available we would be most grateful.

My final request perhaps I could combine with an expression of appreciation, but perhaps I will more fully express my appreciation tomorrow after we have had some of the companies here which will really, I think, flesh out the study we are trying to do on the business press. I said earlier today and I do now to you and to the other people here that we are interested in the business press not really as an entity unto itself but rather as part of the overall media spectrum. We have done part of the overall media spectrum. We have done some considerable background research on the business press—I know you are familiar with it and if not the information, the approach. So I can only say that neither the research phase of the study nor the hearing phase is an end unto itself. Each complements the other. This has been an invaluable session to us.

You are a particularly able group of people when it comes to expressing yourself in writing, and I would only say that if you feel, in view of the things you have heard here today and the different things you may hear tomorrow, that if there is additional information or comment which you would usefully like to make about the business press, we would be delighted to hear from you.

There is one other area, which is so very general and which I would have very much liked to have gone into, but we all have to rest up for Mr. Kierans tonight. That area is the mass media generally. I think you would have some very interesting views which you might think about and we would be delighted to have additional comments from you in that area.

Thank you very much.

The Committee adjourned at 6.00 p.m.

The Committee resumed at 8.00 p.m.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, I think we will call this session to order, following that rather dramatic entrance, to say the least.

I think my introduction of the Minister is almost superfluous, and in any event will be very brief.

The Minister of Communications has had, I think, by any standards, the most remarkable political career, a political career which, I would suggest, has been built on equal parts of charm, wit, integrity, and perhaps more than any of these a fearless determination.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Minister, I think one mark of your success is that there is no other name that has been mentioned more frequently before this Committee since its inception than your own. I understand that you have a statement which you would like to read. Following that, Mr. Minister, the Senators would like to put questions to you on the contents of your remarks, and I am sure you will be not surprised and delighted to know that we may have questions which are not covered in your remarks.

The Honourable Eric Kierans, Minister of Communications: I have no doubt at all.

The Chairman: Mr. Kierans.

Mr. Kierans: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I may say that I have been waiting for this day. On occasion I have run into my good friend, your Chairman, and Yves Fortier, your Counsel, and have let them know that we were avid and eager indeed to reply to what some of the people politely call "misconceptions" that have been placed before you, and to attempt to really portray the position of the Post Office; therefore, we have worked quite carefully.

All of the figures that we are going to give you today are the results of some very intensive analysis. We think that they are up-to-date, and that they can be verified and can stand up to analysis.

Mr. Chairman, I have followed, with great interest, the proceedings of your Committee. They have already proved one thing and that is the truth of the old adage that the best way to get your name in the newspapers is to talk about the newspapers. The Press has given this Committee about the Press more publicity than all the other committees, of either House, added together.

About a year ago, I discovered that there was another easy way to get your name in the newspapers. It was to increase the postal rates of the top newspapers. I doubt that I received a dozen complaints from individuals—practically none at all from the business community, but I did receive across my desk hundreds of articles, editorials and clippings, and I must add, Mr. Chairman, that they all spelled my name right and sometimes even in capitals.

I may also say that as I suggested to you, there was a startling reversion of editorial policy in a one-month period around September and October of 1968. I don't know whether it's worthwhile your Committee investigating it, but as the Honourable Senators know, the Minister has the right to change on his own authority third and fourth class rates, but has had to go to Parliament for any changes in first-class and statutory second-class rates; so early in September of 1968, about two months after I was named Minister or Post-Master General at that time, we decided that we were going to try to reduce the deficit of the Post Office, and of course the only place where I could start was with third and fourth class rates, and around about September the 13th, 14th at a press conference, I announced that we were going to increase these considerably, and that it was the intention of the Post Office to do everything possible to reduce its dependence on general government revenues; that is, by reducing its deficit.

Well, the acclaim in the editorials across the country were universal. You know, the old clichés that "Finally we have got a businessman in the Post Office", and so on, and "This is all good. It's going to reduce the deficit; therefore reduce taxes", et cetera, et cetera.

About a month later, after the Cabinet had approved—I presented a bill in the House which affected first and second-class rates and the whole editorial comment across the country with some notable exceptions—the Montreal Star—I guess they weren't affected, that much, and the 'Toronto Star'—simply reversed themselves. I mean, you know, the entire attitude was clearly, "Who? me?", you know, when it affected them.

All of this ink was being poured out over the fact that newspapers and periodicals were being asked to pay something closer to the postage costs. Not their actual postage costs—magazines and newspapers today pay about one-third of the cost to the Post Office of handling second-class mail—but a higher percentage of the costs than they have had to pay before.

Among one of the many misrepresentation or misconceptions that have been spread about second-class mail rates, was the one repeated to this Committee by a good friend of mine, incidentally, Tom Sloan. He declared that the government should assist the publishing industry, and declared that my plan to make the Post Office pay its way would ruin Canada's publishing industry.

Now, Mr. Sloan's sentiments are admirable but they are out of date. The Government is already helping the publishing industry by charging only one-third of the true mail cost. Also, I have never said that the Post Office should pay its way on all of its operations. On the contrary, I have said many times that the press in Canada needs indirect assistance from the Government, and that that assistance should and must continue.

What I have also said, however, is that the existing system is totally unsatisfactory; that is, mixing these subsidies in postal rates. At present, very few Canadians have any idea that their taxes are being used to assist the Canadian publishing industry, and almost none have any idea of the amount involved. Parliament, for practical purposes, has no say in deciding the amount of the assistance. The deficit just goes up and up and up. The publishing industry has no involvement in determining how the available assistance can be most effectively and equitably divided.

This system is in complete contrast to the one which will go into effect in the United States once the U.S. Postal Authority becomes operational. There, the Postal Authority, which will be the equivalent to a Crown Corporation in Canada, will charge its full costs for second, as for all other classes of mail. Each year, however, Congress will vote a sum of money to be used to reduce the second-class charges. In other words, the Postal Authority will do its job, which is to run the mails; and Congress will do its job, which is to decide who, among the many claimants for public money, will receive how much and in what form.

We are going to have to adopt the same system in Canada. The present system, or lack of system, is unfair to the Post Office, which should not be asked to play God to the publishing industry, and which, anyway, is incompetent to do so. It is unfair to the public and Parliament, which has no effective say in determining the scale and type of assistance. It is unfair to the publishing industry because it has no involvement in the process of apportioning the assistance between the various types of users.

Further, the present system is unsatisfactory, not only because it is at bottom undemocratic and irresponsible—irresponsible in the sense that everyone tries to dump their responsibility onto the Post Office—but it is unsatisfactory also in an operational sense.

For years, the Government has been picking up a large part of the postal tab to the Canadian publishers. For the last decade, the annual sum has been running in the order of fifteen to thirty million dollars a year. This is a very large sum. It can be contrasted with the fifteen million dollars spent this year on subsidies to the gold-mining industry, or the twenty-six million dollars spent this year on the ship-building industry.

Translation]

Can it be said that Parliament, the public and the publishing industry fully benefitted from this money? Your deliberations on the present situation of the industry may provide some answers to this question. However, allow me to outline for you some weaknesses of the present system. At present, the government assumes part of the postal costs which sometimes amount to more than one million dollars and in several cases more than $250,000 for some publications. Nevertheless, these publications may be highly profitable in themselves, or belong to enterprises whose operations as a whole are highly successful. On the other hand, some publications in dire need of financial aid can get hardly anything.

I learned the other day that a major Canadian publication will have to cease operations. If it should do so, the loss will be great, very great, for the country. And yet the publication receives almost no aid at all with regard to postal rates.

It is just a situation of this kind which leaves a great deal to be desired, a situation where those who have the least need receive the most assistance, and those whose need is greatest, and who deserve aid, receive the least.

To change the system is both extremely difficult and delicate. It is like trying to break out a vicious circle. Freedom of the press is essential to the health of our society. And yet the press needs aid from the government, if not to prosper, at least to survive, and government aid may destroy freedom of the press; it is a vicious circle.

This difficulty was described by Mr. Maurice Western in an excellent article which he wrote for the Winnipeg Free Press. He raised four points.

First of all, Mr. Western termed the recent rise in rates "draconian". I cannot accept this adjective and shall return to it in a moment.

[Text]

This difficulty was described by Mr. Maurice Western in an excellent article for the Winnipeg Free Press. He made four points.

First, Mr. Western called the recent rate increase "draconian". I don't accept the adjective and will come back to it in a moment.

The other points Mr. Western made, however, are most appropriate. Second, he said that the Post Office cannot be allowed to just declare that it incurs a deficit on second-class mail and by implication suggest that this is a subsidy. The Post Office must prove that it is, in fact, incurring a deficit as a result of an equitable apportionment of revenues and costs to this particular class of mail.

I completely agree and suggest further that this determination should be made by some third party, answerable neither to the Post Office nor to the publishing industry. In examining the figures myself, I realized that the Post Office in the past has been including in the second-class deficit the loss that we incur in Canada in handling foreign publications destined for Canadian subscribers which choose to mail in Canada, as well as the imbalance in what one might call the Canada-U.S. postal trade in magazines and newspapers. Plainly, these arrangements in no way affect the Canadian publishing industry. The sum involved is about seven points six million a year and from now on it will be entered by the Post Office as a separate item rather than being lumped into the second-class deficit.

Thirdly, Mr. Western noted, as I have done earlier, that in his words, "some newspapers might require considerable help; others none". This difficulty has to be resolved if money is not either to be in effect wasted, or else too little given to those who need it.

Finally, Mr. Western described the dangers of government financial involvement in the Press in these words:

"Whatever the understanding at the beginning, newspapers would find themselves in a spider's web on influence. They would be dependent upon government; they would feel obligated to government. They could not hope to preserve their credibility with the reading public".

And perhaps that last observation is the most important of all, because, without credibility, the press would be impotent as critics.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to shift from argument to facts.

This year, 1969-70, the Post Office will lose twenty-four million dollars by handling Canadian publications. The loss next year is forecast at twenty-five million. These figures represent the second-class deficit, less the loss incurred on handling foreign publications; in other words, we have got the other seven point six million out of there.

The publishing industry questions these figures and argues that in some magical way the Post Office could have avoided most of the recent increases and still have broken even. The argument can only be resolved by resort to an objective examination, but let me demonstrate why they are running a loss and why even the most rigorous and objective outside information, while it may change the figures in detail, is not going to change them very much.

These charts give you a bird's-eye view of our operations. I am not going to recite the figures in detail. They will be available for you. I would, however, like you to look at the category titled, "Canadian Publications".

Here in "Canadian Publications", we anticipate the loss to total Canadian second-class mail. We have here a number of figures. The pound of mail that we carry represents twenty-three point two per cent of the weight that's carried. In cubic footage, it represents fifteen point seven per cent. of this bag that a postman carries. In revenue, we get two point one per cent., and the costs are nine point two per cent; so if you want to work out the marginal figures that will get to some of the people who say that this is a marginal operation—I would like to know or where do you base your marginal analysis?

On any one of these figures, the bigger the bag that the letter carrier is carrying and that the people are sorting, twenty-three point two per cent of all that we handle, even though the number of pieces is only twelve point five—twenty-three point two per cent for two point one per cent of the revenue that the Post Office gets.

Thirteen point seven per cent. of the cubic feet that goes through our terminals and everything else, for two point one per cent. of the revenue, and look at what we charge. We don't charge thirteen point seven per cent; in other words, we don't base it on a cubic footage. We don't charge twenty-three point two per cent., based on weight. We charge some arbitrary figure which even then yields a loss. We charge an arbitrary figure of about nine point two per cent. This is the way in which we allocate the costs.

Now here, in order to get at this marginal argument, this is the kind of thing here on of these is Winnipeg. One of these is Montreal. Each of them weigh thirty-five pounds. That's what the man starts out with in the morning.

Now, twenty-nine point one per cent. in Winnipeg of that mail, the contents of that bag, yields postage of sixteen dollars and forty-four cents. That's what the bag means first-class mail and it occupies twenty-nine point one per cent. of the weight.

Second-class is fifty-one per cent of the bag, and it doesn't get us sixteen dollars and forty-four cents. It gets us a dollar, eighty-seven, any one of these bags.

Third and fourth-class, since we are discussing publications, and since you are interested in the mass media—you can see what he yields are there.

There is no class that is subsidized, as a matter of fact as I will come to it later. The other three classes are roughly in balance. Here is where your subsidy is. Half of the weight is here, and a dollar, eighty-seven as against sixteen, forty-four as against a dollar, twenty-five, as against a dollar. Now, that's the Winnipeg group, and this is the analysis of the quantity and weight of a letter carrier's bag.

First-class—the quantity is seventy-nine point two per cent. The weight is twenty-nine point one—twenty-nine point one per cent. Second-class is fifty-one point four. We have one through this. Third-class is nine, and fourth-class is ten point five.

The postage received, as we see here, is nine point one. There it is seventy-nine point one. Third and fourth-class yield six point one and four point nine, nine per cent.

We are going to table these if the Chairman permits.

The Chairman: Please do.

Mr. Kierans: And—for further examination—all right, it's roughly the same thing. We are whipping a dead horse here, I think.

First-class mail is fifteen, sixty-six, which is a Montreal illustration. The second-class mail is a dollar, twenty-nine. In the Montreal illustration, it's forty-seven point five per cent. Of this bag, second-class instead of fifty-one point four, but the other figures are roughly comparable.

Okay, the same thing:—the weight here, is seven pounds, two ounces. The second-class weight is fifteen pounds, twelve ounces, forty-seven per cent, and the third-class is twenty-nine point nine and so on.

Now, all right, we will get back to that afterwards; in other words in 1968-69, twelve and a half per cent of our total volume or second-class was yielded at two point one per cent, not twelve and a half per cent; two point one per cent of our total revenue, but it was responsible for nine point two per cent of our total costs, and I want to remind you that the volume of that mail; that is, cubic footage that was required, was well above the nine point two per cent that we charge.

Similarly, 1969-70—we foresee for this year, and these are estimates: the Canadian second-class mail volume will be ten per cent of the total. The revenues we expect to get out of that ten per cent is only three per cent of our total revenue, and the costs of seven point two per cent are what we expect our costs to be this year, and therefore even after the rate increases, about which honourable publishers have presented their figures to you, the discrepancies between cost and revenue is still glaring even after these; in other words, revenue is three per cent, compared to total costs of seven point two per cent.

Other percentages in that same horizontal column are revealing. While we apportioned in 1969-1970 seven point two per cent of our total costs for second-class, yet second-class, as I told you, accounted for ten per cent of the total volume, eleven point eight per cent of the cubic feet and twenty per cent of our total poundage. If we based the rates on either poundage, volume or space, cubic feet, the publishers would really have something to howl about. In other words, we are not, as some publishers have claimed, trying to dump on to Canadian publications costs which should be allocated to other categories.

On the contrary, the proportion of costs we allocate to Canadian publications are less than the percentage of volume, space and weight that that class occupies. You have some other charts here which I will not go into because time is passing, Mr. Chairman, but I would like permission to table these for further examination by the Honourable Senators.

[Translation]

So much for our costs-revenue breakdown. The figures are based on a study made for the Post Office by a private firm, P. S. Ross and Associates. And I repeat, before the Post Office could ask Parliament to make up this deficit, the figures had to be checked for accuracy by an outside organization to which the Post Office and the editors could express their point of view. I repeat that such a check changed practically nothing in the figures I have just given you.

And there, Mr. Chairman, is the core of the problem. The deficit is considerable now but it will increase. The Post Office is doing all it can to improve its service. We have already made important changes in every phase of our operations and we shall make others—and yet our costs will continue to increase inexorably because, of all the industries in the country, we are the one which depends most on manpower.

The size of the deficit creates two pressing problems: on the one hand, the Post Office cannot continue to increase second class rates without doing serious harm to the press in Canada. On the other hand, there is a limit to the deficit which the public and Parliament would be willing to pay. If we wish to go back and examine closely, from a different angle, the real repercussions of the recent increases in rates, we shall see that all this publicity has loudly proclaimed only one side of the issue. Here is the other.

[Text]

Mr. Kierans: My first Exhibit, Senators, is Brigadier Malone.

The Chairman: Do you wish to table Brigadier Malone?

Mr. Kierans: If I thought I could table Brigadier Malone—I would be just delighted.—He came before you the other day to declare that high postal rates are killing farm newspapers.

What Brigadier Malone did not tell you was that postal rates for newspapers have been unchanged since 1951. That year, I might say that the St. Laurent government attempted to change them—it increased them somewhat after—and so much so that in the final exercise, you hardly wondered why they began. Now, that's nineteen years, but they have been unchanged in any consequential way since 1933, and that's thirty-six years ago. Those of you Senators who want to examine the changes that took place in 1951, I think, will agree with me that they were inconsequential. As for the actual amount of the increase, Brigadier Malone did not mention to you that to recover the full cost of the increased postal rates, his farm newspaper, the Free Press Weekly would have to increase its annual subscription rate by exactly eighty-three cents a year, which worked out to one and two-thirds cents more a copy. That's the full extent of the burden we have asked the Free Press Weekly to pay, and it still amounts to only twenty-five per cent of our estimated costs of delivering the paper.

Brigadier Malone also did not tell you that while his postal bill this coming year will be in the order of five hundred and thirty thousand dollars, the cost to the Post Office of carrying the Free Press Weekly fifty-two times a year will be two million, two hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars. This represents a loss paid by the general Canadian public, since it is only a book item to the Post Office, you know, the deficit just goes up. This represents a loss of one million, seven hundred and forty-five thousand dollars, which is by far the largest for any single Canadian publication. It represents, in other words, about one-fourteenth of the Post Office deficit in handling all Canadian dailies, weeklies, magazines, journals and periodicals.

As for any difficulties that the Free Press Weekly may be having, it is quite specious to blame them on postal rates. As I said, the full cost of the increase could be absorbed by charging one and two-thirds cents more a copy. More to the point, in mid-1968, before the increases went into effect or were announced, the largest farm newspaper in the country, the Family Herald ceased operation. That's one they can't blame on me, although they do, but that publication ceased before it was even invited to run federally.

From the Floor: They knew what was coming.

Mr. Kierans: The problem, in other words, has nothing to do with the Post Office. The O'Leary Commission back in 1961 identified the problem in these words:—

"Their (that is, farm papers) very raison d'être are threatened by the decline of rural population and the urbanization of those who remain—due largely to the impact of TV, radio and other media. Their tastes, habits and desires of the rural family are coming more into line with those of the urban family and the communications media are becoming common to both."

The quotation speaks for itself. So also do the facts that Brigadier Malone omitted from his presentation to this Committee. I would like to give one other example of misrepresentation. This was an article in Weekend Magazine written by Mr. Reuben C. Baetz who is Executive Director of the Canadian Welfare Council. In it, he made the claim and I quote:

"High postal rates are killing the print word".

That statement is downright nonsense. To substantiate it, Mr. Baetz cited just a few periodicals which he said had been killed because of the rate increase, La Terre de Chez-Nous and the B.C. Union magazine, Labour Statesmen.

Honourable Senators, La Terre de Chez-Nous has not folded. To correct the harm done by Mr. Baetz' mistake, it issued an ad at its own expense which I would like to quote:

"La Terre de Chez-Nous is still alive and doing well. It is healthier than ever in its long and distinguished forty-year history."

As for the Labour Statesman, I don't know why it folded. I do know that to recover its full additional postal costs would have required an increase in the annual subscription of forty-three cents, or three and a half cents for each monthly issue.

As you know, I think Honourable Members here from the West Coast have a high regard for the advances that have been made by them, and I can applaud them for what they have gained of union members on the West Coast, B.C. I think that, you know, they have gained enough that they can afford three and a half cents per issue, if they think the Statesmen is worth it, but, that's their decision. It's not mine.

I might add that for Canadian Welfare Magazine itself to recover the full cost of the increase would require—and this was introductory within the article—an increase in its annual subscription rate of eight cents.

Mr. Baetz in his article did not, of course, mention the length of time for which postal rates had remained unchanged. He did not mention that eighty-one new publications secured second-class privileges last year, and this is exclusive of the many other new publications which fall outside the second-class category.

He did not mention that, so far as we can determine, and we are the ones who register for second class, thirteen weekly newspapers ceased publication last year, but twenty-eight new ones started operations.

As for daily newspapers, I would like to quote from a recent issue of Marketing Magazine:

"If publishers had a reason to feel reasonably satisfied last year, then in 1969, they will be crowing—1969 (that is the year of the rate increase) looks like a vintage year for the dailies, and indications are that time will see them continue to improve".

Mr. Chairman, I could pull out a great many more quotations and statistics, but I think I've given you enough, enough to put second-class rate increases into their true context, and to establish beyond doubt, I hope, three points:

1. The Government already assists the Canadian publishing industry to a considerable degree—some twenty-four million dollars accounted for by artificially low postal rates.
2. Claims that the increased postal rates are killing the printed word are either exaggeration or misrepresentation.
3. Particular publications which run into difficulties can no longer shift the blame onto the Post Office. If they make that accusation, such publications must prove their case with facts and figures instead of making just a generalized declaration.

The publishing industry, the members of this Committee and the public are well aware that there are dozens of reasons which can cause the decline of a particular publication which have nothing to do with postal rates. Postal rates are just one among hundreds of cost items and in addition have nothing to do with such factors as competition, poor editorial quality, changes in readership tastes and poor management.

Mr. Chairman, where do we go from here? I have mentioned the system that will be put into effect in the United States: the U.S. Post Office will set rates to recover its full costs and then Congress will vote an amount by which those rates are proportionately reduced. The same suggestion has been made in Canada by the Glassco Commission, and I quote:

"We recommend that an annual grant be made by Parliament in an amount sufficient to cover the costs of the Post Office in handling second-class mail, to the extent that such exceed postal revenues arising from the rates set by Parliament".

For such a programme to go into effect, it would be essential for the Post Office to justify, first, the losses it claims to incur on second-class mail. This would have to be decided as I have suggested, by some impartial body. Parliament would then vote a sum to cover that deficit, or if Parliament, because of competing claims, felt it could not afford to cover the full deficit, the Post Office would have to raise rates to make up the difference.

As for the method of apportioning the assistance, two elements are essential:

1. The Government should not give specific subsidies to specific publications. This would be quite inappropriate;
2. The publishing industry itself should make specific suggestions on how, within the financial limits set by Parliament, the assistance can be most equitably divided among different types of users.

Speaking personally, and not as Postmaster General, I think it would be only proper to set a limit on the amount that any one publication could receive by the way of artificially low postal rates. The money thus, in effect, 'saved' could be applied to providing extra assistance to those categories of publications in the greatest need of it. And as a final point, artificially low postal rates are, by no means, the most effective way of assisting the industry. Some publications of considerable merit make virtually no use of the mails and so would receive no assistance at all.

Mr. Chairman, let me sum up all I've been saying as simply as possible. The publishing industry in Canada, which faces exceptional difficulties and which plays a vital role, must be helped, and it must be helped in ways that do not harm the industry nor undermine its credibility. The extent of the indirect aid now is about twenty-four million dollars. Parliament should determine a fixed sum, a precise sum. It might be more than twenty-four million dollars, it might be less. That sum must be apportioned in ways that will truly help the industry and not either be uselessly frittered away nor go in too large amounts to publications which are profitable anyway.

To this point, I've spoken as Postmaster General. I would like to change caps and wear that, not of a politician nor of a Minister of the Crown, but simply that of an observer. In other words, and this is where I always get into trouble—the following comments are my own.

Mr. Chairman, I think your Committee is out-of-date.

The Chairman: You are in trouble.

Mr. Kierans: Out-of-date in the sense that its title is the "Committee on Mass Media", and you are studying the mass media. Yet the mass media in the form we now know them, are, I believe, a dying institution. Their economic power is great and will remain great. Their capacity to entertain is great and will remain so, and their capacity to inform, at least in a general sense, is considerable, and it will remain so. But their capacity to affect individuals, people, to mould opinions, to inspire political and social change, is disappearing.

[Translation]

All of this is because our mass society is becoming a society of individuals. The mass media reflect the society of yesterday, a society that still exists to some extent if we think in terms of the area of consumer goods. The information media have always been geared to a mass audience, in other words to the supposedly average readers, viewers and listeners. However there are fewer and fewer average people and more and more individuals with individual requirements, tastes, knowledge and interests.

I am very happy to hear that you have already heard the point of view of the so called underground press. I won't dwell upon the quality of these publications for they—along with newspapers directed at certain ethnic groups, business magazine and radio and television broadcasts directed toward particular groups—are the publications that will disseminate information in days to come. More and more individuals and groups will want to pick the kind of information that they wish to receive or have conveyed to others rather than to accept what they receive from well-intentioned owners of information services. In short, they want to participate and do for themselves the thing that others are doing for them at the present time.

The reaction to Vice-President Agnew's criticism of American television could be interpreted as simple hostility toward what is called the liberal caste of the eastern part of the country. But it could also be an indication of a real feeling of dissatisfaction on the part of millions of Americans who realized that the information media, on which they depend so much, does not belong to them, does not represent them and does not fulfill their needs.

I would like to say, in passing, that I agreed wholeheartedly with Beland Henderson's words: "We believe that freedom of the press belongs rightly to the people and not to the publishers." I would like to change this slightly and say that the press belongs to the people, not the publishers.

Too often the people are not being well served. Someone said to me that other de-that the television and radio stations are jammed with programs directed at younger people because this is the trend and because young people spend a lot of money on consumer goods. Why are there no programs directed at older people? Today when these people watch television they find themselves in another world, the world of an entirely different generation. The media don't give a damn for the rights of this minority any more than they do for the rights of the Indians and Eskimos or the underprivileged and poor people in this country. Do the media address themselves to these people or speak for them? Or are they only interested in fairly well off, well-educated English and French urban Middle Class. And I think, Mr. Chairman, that ours is a society of minorities rather than a society of the mass.

[Text]

Mr. Kierans: Any politician of even average sensitivity is today fully aware that the real danger to political parties is not that of defeat at the polls, but that of irrelevance in a society grown too mature for stale, old-fashioned political bickering and scrambles for power. The same is true for the owners of the mass media. They are as much on trial as we are. Like politicians, they are going to have to prove their relevance instead of justifying their existence by the simple fact of possessing power.

I don't know, Mr. Chairman, whether your research has covered this aspect, but I cannot help wondering how many Canadians are really watching television today rather than just using it as a background noise, an easy way to pass a lonely evening, the "structure of a day" as McLuhan has said, or how many really read the newspapers rather than just buying them for the department store ads, the want ads, the sports news and the television listings. My suspicions may be totally wrong. The point is that many other people hold them.

If the mass media are being challenged, then it is fortunate that technology is providing them at least with some of the means to respond to that challenge. Technology is making an era of individual communications possible. Satellites are important because they shrink the world to a village and because they are the only effective way of bringing the benefits of communications to all people no matter how isolated, but far more important are the developments which will give the media back to the people.

The list of what is happening and what will happen is almost endless. Co-axial cables which can provide twenty, forty, sixty, even eighty separate channels, will enable television for the first time to appeal to specific minority audiences rather than only to mass man. There will be eighty different groups of people at which to aim rather than just the one, mass consumer group of today. On-line real-time computers will eventually make an almost unimaginable store of information available to specific individuals in response to their particular specific requests. Switched cable systems will transform television from its present linear, one-way state into a two-way system within which groups and individuals can truly participate. Hot-line phones can bring members of the public into direct contact with those in authority, rather than having to go through the anonymity of letters.

I am sure that members of this Committee are familiar with some of the changes that modern communications technology is bringing to the traditional domain of newspapers. The New York Times is developing an information retrieval system of current affairs based upon the priceless store of information contained in its files. In Japan, two companies, one a newspaper and the other a large electrical concern, have joined forces in a pilot project of facsimile transmission of newspapers. If the technical and economic problems can be solved, this would be a breakthrough since it would enable newspapers to aim specific editions at specific audiences instead of, as at present, having to try to appeal to all possible readers in a single edition.

The impact that computers may have upon newspapers is virtually incalculable. Today they are used chiefly to justify type and to prepare speedily copy to be printed. Tomorrow, computers may be the instrument by which "daily" newspapers become "hourly" newspapers, up-dated at the demand of the individual readers and containing the facts on a particular situation that he wants, and so on.

I am not qualified to provide you with the technical details. All I can do is report the trend of modern communications technology, and that trend is away from the mass and toward the individual. And communications technology is changing barely fast enough to keep pace with the social changes in our society, a change away, to repeat, from the mass and towards the individual.

If it is any consolation to publishers—I am closing now, Mr. Chairman—and it probably isn't these same forces are causing equal problems for the Post Office. Even as we try to bring the institution up-to-date, we have to be prepared to meet the competition of tomorrow—facsimile, data transmissions, satellites which can reduce the effective size of this country from three thousand miles or four thousand miles from east to west to three or five hundred miles.

Earlier this week, and it is not confidential in any way, in a luncheon I had with the President of the Bell Telephone Company, we were discussing making the optimum use of the satellites that this country is going to put up, and among the discussions was using two television channels instead of using one channel for two-way conversations, using one channel one way, east-west, and another channel the other way, west-east.

The capacity would be twelve hundred lines on each channel; that is, twelve hundred lines in each direction. To make the thing work and to accelerate demand, obviously the price would have to be low, and the telephone companies are considering the possibility of changing long-distance rates in this country, because under satellites, distance is the one thing that doesn't matter.

We had another example earlier this week when the Canadian-Overseas Telecommunications reduced its rates, and we all know the problems that we are having with increasing rates and everything else. They have reduced its overseas rates to Europe and Great Britain and Ireland by seventeen to thirty-three per cent because distance doesn't matter with satellites. Canada has its own satellite. Distance doesn't matter; so how do you base a rate, the kind of thing that we are discussing? What you want to do is fill up those channels, build your traffic, transmit your data, transmission data in particular as well as voice; so you conceive of Canada in a completely different way, Canada not as being a country four thousand miles from sea to sea, but Canada as being a country maybe five hundred miles in width.

We base communications rates on the first five hundred miles, let's say, from Montreal to Toronto and somewhat beyond and the rest of it is free. The rate is the same from Montreal to London, Ontario, as it is from Montreal to Vancouver because with a satellite the distance doesn't matter, and you begin to see or you are groping towards a solution of other problems that we have.

We can communicate with Winnipeg from Montreal or Ottawa or Toronto as cheaply as we can communicate with New York, whether it's transmission information, data information or whether it's voice, and therefore there's no reason at all with these tremendous computer banks that we are worrying about—there is no economic reason why they should be located south of the border; in other words, from Vancouver down to Seattle and San Francisco, from Winnipeg down to Chicago—it makes no difference in communications. You can go as cheaply from Montreal or Toronto or Ottawa to Winnipeg or Vancouver as you can go south from Montreal to New York; so, these are the problems and this is the future.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I would like to congratulate you and the members of the Committee for the work you have been doing. You have initiated an inquiry into an area that is of great importance to Canadians, and if in your report you have any suggestions to make on this difficult and complex issue of second-class mail, particularly on how the system can best serve the real needs of the industry rather than just perpetuating the traditions of yesterday, I would be very glad to study them very carefully.

If I have, unasked, any criticisms to offer then it springs from my comments of the past few minutes, and is precisely whether you have seen your task in broad enough perspective. You have heard from the professionals, the experts, the owners, but you haven't yet heard from the people, and, in our view, until you do, you have only examined one-half of the issue and that may be the easier half.

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Minister. I should say that as far as your concluding sentence that we haven't yet heard from the people—I think I should say for your information, one of our recent projects, which is now complete, was a fairly extensive sample and a long questionnaire, a research study, which I think will give us some of this information, at least.

Well, now, you were saying a moment or two ago about the consolation for the publishers. If it is any consolation to you, you made the most dramatic entry. You are the only person we have had before the Committee to have received even a smattering of applause from my colleagues, and thirdly, you have spoken far longer than anybody else before this Committee.

So, I congratulate you for all of these things. We would like now to turn to the questioning that Senators have, and although he is not a Senator, he is from Montreal. We thought we would let Mr. Fortier ask the first question.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. After having heard the Defendant, I am tempted to say that I have no cross-examination.

From the Floor: Is he guilty?

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Minister, when you took the decision which you did take very boldly towards the end of 1968, I wonder if you took into consideration the fact that there would be some publications which would cease publishing and that there would be others which would reduce the frequency of their publications? More to the point, I wonder to what extent you considered that the ninth publication which ceased publication in Canada, and which announced it would do so in January, 1969, was the Canadian Postmaster?

Mr. Kierans: Well, I can tell you we didn't do it for postal reasons. We took a long look at the value that we were getting; whether it was the right kind of magazine. I can tell you—I think Mr. Houle is here—I don't think we particularly liked the orientation of it.

If it wasn't serving its purpose, with or without the increase of postal rates, that would have been withdrawn, let's say, for assessment. I also would like to say, Mr. Fortier, that I think that a new version of the Postmaster will be coming forward by May or June of this year.

Mr. Fortier: I will move from specifics to generalities, the generalities which are very relevant, I think, to the work of this Committee, and I will ask the question again.

Did you consider in seeking increased revenue that there would be some very important publications, both in the magazine as well as in the newspaper field which would cease publication and consequently that your department would lose some revenue from those particular organs?

Mr. Kierans: Yes, you think of that in terms of—you know, there's a given price increase—increase the absolute amount of our revenues, and it did, not by the eighty-four million that we forecast, but by something like, I suppose, fifty-five million because there was, of course, a great deal of resistance to it at the beginning, but that is coming back.

Now, the only major concern that I have had, after thinking about the problem for the past year, has been the undue burden that has fallen on those publications, and I am speaking here of the daily newspapers, that have, unduly or not unduly, relied more than normal on delivery by mail.

Now, you can make the quick brush-off answers. Is a daily newspaper really a daily newspaper if it has to rely on the mails for its system of distribution, because obviously there is going to be a twenty-four hour delay? While this was acceptable in the thirties or even in the forties, let's say, during the forties, during the war and probably up until 1950, the advent of television increased reliance on radio. The advent of Telex, T.W.X.—all of these other means of transportation of information, because that is what it is, have created tremendous pressures for the traditional daily newspaper. In other words, there is a good deal of feeling among people that the postal service was a lot better two or three decades ago than it is today. Well, this is just sheer nonsense.

Actually, we transport all first-class mail by air; so even if we are forty-eight hours instead of twenty-four, we are not five days from Halifax to Vancouver, but people accepted five days two or three decades ago as being prompt delivery.

Now, the point I want to make is that the kind of pressure—and newspapers are judging themselves by this—that's on them is not from the Post Office. It's just from other means of information distribution that are instantaneous—you know, half-hour news programmes every half hour on radio stations, television and all the rest. They kind of have a nostalgic memory for what must have been, when actually what they are comparing is the pace of thirty years ago which is not the same now. But they are special figures that you are talking about.

Mr. Fortier: No, no, my question is: in retrospect today, given what has happened since these new rates have come into effect on a progressive basis, and given the number of publications which have, in fact, gone out of business—did you anticipate that there would be such a high level of companies going out of business?

Mr. Kierans: Okay, you tell me how many there are. You know, I have seen various headlines in papers and I have heard it said at one time that there were twenty-five hundred and then in the same late show question twenty-five hundred; and then he said that there were forty and then he said that there were four, and I asked him, "Which the hell figure was right?"

Now, you know, I want to know where all these newspapers that went out of business went. We don't know where they are, and the postman that carries the damn things doesn't know where they are because, you know, there's just as many as there ever were.

Mr. Fortier: As far as magazines are concerned, there are approximately fifteen magazines which have gone out of business.

Mr. Kierans: How many have started?

Mr. Fortier: Well, you gave a figure in your oral presentation today.

Mr. Kierans: And how many go out? I think, Mr. Fortier, what you have got to compare is: how many went out last year with how many went out the year before and, you know, go back for a five-year basis. How many papers are disappearing every year?

Mr. Fortier: All right, then, I will phrase my question differently, Mr. Minister. Had the research which was done for your Department considered that aspect of the effect of the increase in postal rates; that some publications would go out of business because of the increase?

Mr. Kierans: Well, we knew that some of them would, I suppose. There is always the straw—when you have twenty-five clients, and this is roughly what we have—that's going to break a particular camel's back, but then when we analyze most of them; like, you take your B.C. Labour Statesmen—that may or may not have gone out.

You take Le Travail by the C.S.N. That went out, but that didn't go out because of postal rates because they have started up again.

[Translation]

They announced that...

Mr. Wilfrid Houle, President of the Postal Workers' Union: That had been decided...

Mr. Kierans: Long before then.

Mr. Houle: That had been decided almost a year before.

Mr. Kierans: Yes, before.

[Text]

Mr. Kierans: Mr. Saulnier, for example, of the City of Montreal, said that the demise of the publication Montréal was due to postal rates. My God, the decision was made months before the postal rates went up! They stopped taking advertising for the November issue and the rates only went up in October.

Mr. Fortier: Are you saying, in effect, that you did not anticipate, as a result of this research which was made available to you that any publication would go out of business be it magazine or newspaper—because of the sole factor of increased postal rates?

Mr. Kierans: If you had asked me that before and if you ask me that now, I would have said that we would have anticipated that a number would have gone out of business, but you see an additional cost—there again, it wouldn't be due entirely, Mr. Fortier, to the increased cost because sometime the increased cost is just the little point that makes you take a decision that you have been hesitating about for many other reasons you know, lack of staff to help you run the paper. You can no longer, you know, get cheap labour or you are unionized all of a sudden. The advertising is switching out of weekly newspapers to daily or on the radio or on the television and so this is the point that really makes you take the decision, but there are a whole host of problems.

Mr. Fortier: Another aspect of the question of course, and one which has been stressed by a number of witnesses before this Committee is that many daily newspapers have seen the subscribers cancel their subscriptions because they did not wish to pay an increased rate and I am reminded here of Mr. Gratton of Le Droit. He made the point very eloquently that Le Droit was the only French newspaper which reached "Les Franco-Canadiens", "Les Franco-Ontariens" in the Sudbury area, and that these people now, you know, are not receiving Le Droit. There was no alternative French newspaper. If they wished to have a newspaper, they had to turn to an English one. Monsieur Ryan, your friend, Claude Ryan of Le Devoir, made the point that more than fifty per cent of his postal subscribers had ceased subscribing.

Monsieur Gilbert of Le Soleil—you may have seen those figures—has not told us before the Committee, but anyway he has told me privately that their mail circulation has gone down by more than fifty per cent. Doesn't this create a vacuum right now?

Mr. Kierans: There is a problem here, but you know, you can look at the problem in two or three different ways. Now, with Le Devoir and probably not so much with Le Soleil but with Le Devoir, it is a newspaper that relies a great deal and has a great deal of out-of-town subscriptions. Therefore it relies on the mail and is hit harder than most. Therefore, this possible option or decision-making process is not as open or closed to Ryan as it would be to others, but let's work from the other side. Let's take a big daily newspaper either from Halifax or Vancouver, and I know one of them, in which about four per cent of, let's say, a hundred thousand circulation is out-of-town circulation.

Now, what some of these publishers did was charge the full increase of the postal rates on to the four thousand instead of distributing the increase across the hundred and four thousand subscribers that they had; in other words, they weren't going to take this particular group as a loss group. I don't think that's a reasonable decision to take because I don't think—and you as a corporation lawyer know this—that there is a single corporation in this country or in any country that makes a profit on each and every line that it turns out from each and every customer. I mean, the textile industry, for example, or let's take the publications, the Maclean-Hunter publications. They may or may not lose money on Maclean's, but this might be one loss leader compared to the Financial Post and all their other industry magazines, and they decide whether this is a reasonable...

Mr. Fortier: You think they should spread it—you think they should spread it?

Mr. Kierans: Right, the textile industry, maybe seventy or eighty per cent of everything it produces or of its lines are loss leaders, but it has to have it to complement a line of which a massive run pays the shot. Without these additional lines, you can't do it. You can't have a full enough range of patterns or products or materials to offer.

Mr. Fortier: How does Le Devoir deal with its specific problem?

Mr. Kierans: There are one or two exceptions like that. Three of them at least are French-speaking publications, L'Action Catholique, L'Evangeline and Le Devoir, but precisely I made the point here of the way in which the Government is actually subscribing twenty-four million dollars and it is not being given to the people that really need it or can use it, and that are fulfilling a function.

I see no reason in the world why F.P. publications, for example—you know, the Globe and Mail and all that crowd—you get a million, seven hundred and forty-five thousand dollars, you know, just for one publication. I don't know what the rest of their stable gets, but let's say that this is what is wrong when you begin to make subsidies of postal rates.

Now, I would much prefer to see a system where the Government says, "Okay", and we prove it. We come out with a figure, let's say, to satisfy everybody. We won't satisfy the publishers, but let's say it's done by Riddell, Stead or whoever you want, and they say, "Yes, the figure of twenty-four million is right".

The Government takes a look at its budget and says, "Well, look,—we'll give the Post Office twenty million. You get the other four million out of increasing the rates. Just increase it to get four million. We'll put in every year a flat sum of twenty-million dollars, and therefore this year you have to get the four million. Next year, if your costs go up by a million dollars, your rates go up correspondingly", and over a time the publishers won't mind that, because they can foresee it.

What they didn't like was, you know, all of a sudden the attempt, the draconian attempt, if you will, to recover what hadn't been done since 1933 all in one swoop, but we didn't do it. We went and put up the rates four hundred per cent, but where did that get us? It got us up to twenty-four per cent.

Mr. Fortier: A very good case can be made for the proposition that in fact these twenty-four million dollars do not constitute subsidy to the publisher but rather subsidy to the reading public. Would you care to comment on that?

Mr. Kierans: Well, all right, you tell me that, but I will go on and tell you, "Sure, or to the advertisers".

Mr. Fortier: I suppose you are right.

Mr. Kierans: Yes, the advertising rates should go up, too, but then they come crying to you that we are subsidizing the C.B.C. and all the rest of it.

My answer is that I am not responsible for the C.B.C. If somebody else wants to subsidize that, that's their problem. I am only trying to run a show here.

I have been through this so much, Senator, that I get it coming backwards and forwards.

Mr. Fortier: Is it your view on record before the Committee, Mr. Minister, that you do not consider that the subsidy is one to the reader, but rather one to the publisher?

Mr. Kierans: Yes, sir, because they are the ones that are making the profits. They are the ones that control the pricing policy. Admittedly, they won't have as many customers if they put the price up by ten per cent, or something like that to recover it, but you know, people have other forms of information and people may be satisfied with other forms, but if they made their papers better, maybe people would want to read them, and be willing to pay for them.

Mr. Fortier: Well, that's a very hypothetical case or situation.

The Chairman: Senator Everett?

Senator Everett: I just wonder if we could approach the same subject from another viewpoint.

Can you tell me what the deficit for second-class mail, was Mr. Minister, that you projected with you were bringing the Act in?

Mr. Kierans: I don't remember what figures I used. I have my Assistant Deputy Minister of Finance here. It seems to me it was something like thirty-two million, but we have already explained there that we are now refining, Senator, the manner in which we determine these deficits; we have now been able to pinpoint that a certain amount of this money is not attributable to Canadian publications as distinct from all publications.

What we forecast at the time of the Bill was thirty-nine million, but then, as most of you know because you have had certainly many submissions on this, at least seven or eight million of that went out of second-class. It would have come down to about thirty-one or thirty-two because we took...

Senator Everett: I am asking what deficit for second-class you forecast.

Mr. Kierans: At the time of the Bill?

Senator Everett: At the time of the Bill.

Mr. Kierans: Yes, thirty-nine million, but that included...

Senator Everett: No, for second-class because you say you had taken some out and made them third-class.

Mr. Kierans: Well, I am going back to the time of the Bill.

Senator Everett: But you are forecasting the second-class mail, aren't you, for the...

Mr. Kierans: The deficit.

Senator Everett: As though the Bill had been in operation. Didn't you forecast what the deficit would have been, had the Bill been in operation in the year in which you introduced the Bill for second-class mail only?

Mr. Kierans: Well, if there had been no changes, the deficit as it was defined at that time of second-class would have been fifty-four million, six hundred thousand. This was the forecast I used, but the revised rates for second-class were to reduce that to thirty-nine million. The effect of the increase in rates for the coming year, '69-'70 was thirty-nine million, but that definition of second-class, we no longer define in the same way because we took about twenty-five hundred publications that were originally defined as second-class and under the new definition no longer belong into that class, but go into third-class.

Senator Everett: Yes, I appreciate that. The figures I have here are that in '67-'68, had the increased rates been in effect, the deficit would have been twenty-one million, including a three and a half million second-class imbalance that would be on overflow circulation from the United States, and what you had predicted was an actual deficit of eighteen million, four hundred and forty-four thousand, two hundred and fifty-five dollars.

Mr. Kierans: Did I use those figures because I haven't got '67-'68 here, and this was the budget analysis on which I calculated? I didn't use '67-'68, I don't believe, at any time. Any comparisons that I would have made would have been '68-'69 or '69-'70.

Mr. Fortier: The figures come from Nicol Kendall.

The Chairman: Senator Everett?

Senator Everett: The deficit that you project here for '68-'69 is forty-one million, which is on your chart we are dealing with here. Is that correct.

Mr. Kierans: Here?

Senator Everett: Yes, the second-class total deficit forty-one million.

Mr. Kierans: Yes, that's the chart there.

Senator Everett: Forty-one million, six hundred and twenty-six.

Mr. Kierans: That includes first of all. . .

Senator Everett: That includes three million six hundred and seventeen thousand of overflow circulation.

Mr. Kierans: That's right, plus another four million—the costs of distributing mail that is trucked across the border. We would have to go back to the chart.

Senator Everett: I assume that '68-'69 figure is an actual figure.

Mr. Kierans: All right, that's the explanation for the difference. If you remember—well, during the Hearings on the Bill, we amended the Bill from our original figures, to bring it in in three stages instead of all at once. You know, we divided it into three; so for this reason you have the difference, and the figures that we are now giving you projecting a deficit for next year included the full changes. You know, all of the rates will be in effect as of next April.

Senator Everett: That's why it reduces from forty-one million to thirty-one million, is it?

Mr. Kierans: Yes, that's right. Well, yes, for '69-'70. We only got a third of that in the preceding year.

Senator Everett: The actual figures for 1968-69 would show a net deficit for second-class mail after taking out the overflow circulation of thirty-eight million dollars?

Mr. Kierans: Yes, we didn't make those adjustments for the Canadian publications until below.

Senator Everett: Well, I think we can include those. What was your projection? What did you think—when you introduced the Bill—would happen in '68?

Mr. Kierans: We figured that there would be thirty-nine million, ninety-seven thousand, and here there was forty-one, which is roughly about what it's coming out to for '69-'70. We figured thirty-nine million, ninety-seven thousand dollars, and our figures are getting better all the time, which is roughly what we estimate here of thirty-one million, six-zero-four, the estimate for '69-'70, plus the seven million, six hundred and nine thousand that we are taking out of there for that year.

Senator Everett: Which brings it down to thirty-two million.

Mr. Kierans: It brings it up to thirty-nine, if you add the seven million, six hundred and nine thousand. I am just speaking of one year here, '69-'70. Do you see your thirty-one, six-zero-four?

Senator Everett: Oh, no, I am dealing with '68-'69, and that's the year for which I was asking your projections.

Mr. Kierans: Oh, well, I doubt if we have gone back—have we gone back and measured the effect?

Senator Everett: You see, it would seem to me that when you were considering this Bill, you would have wanted to have known what effect the Bill would have had on your revenue in '68-'69.

Mr. Kierans: Well, we figured that the effect of the increase in second-class rates was going to be fifteen and a half million dollars out of a total and we were aiming for ninety-one million dollars, of which we were going to collect one-sixth in the second-class rates, which, incidentally is where our deficits are. For example, I can give you just as a general statement here, which I didn't use before—but for '68-'69—for first-class—now this is an important point I want to make. We made a profit on the new rates or would make a profit on the new rates. The revenue would have been fifty-one point seven per cent of our total revenue, but costs would have been forty-five point six per cent of our total costs; in other words, there's a profit there of about six per cent.

In the second-class rates, the revenue would have been two point six. We have used those figures in the chart—two point six per cent of our total revenue. The costs would have been eleven point one per cent. We have used that; so that this is where the great deficit is. There is a small deficit but notice this: here it is again, total second-class. Eleven point one per cent of our costs are in that class. Two point six per cent of our revenues are in that class.

In first-class, forty-five point six per cent of our costs are there. Fifty-one point seven per cent revenue, therefore, that is more than in balance.

In third-class seventeen point seven per cent of our costs are in handling that class. Sixteen point three per cent of our revenue is there; so there is a difference of about one point four per cent, and in fourth-class we make a profit. Fifteen point seven per cent of our costs are in the fourth class. Eighteen point nine per cent of our revenue is there; so the thing outside the small imbalance of third-class is quit simply a second-class problem.

Senator Everett: So, we should deal with the second-class problem. Well, to come back to my question then, I am wondering what you projected as the second-class deficit for '68-'69 year, if you have that figure. If you haven't that's fine.

Mr. Kierans: Well, no, the figures that I have are quite simply the figures that we used on introducing a Bill. You must account here for different definitions because of the way we reduced the second-class. It went down from five thousand publications to approximately twenty-five hundred. I may be out a hundred either way.

Now, without any price increases at all, I must have told the House—I haven't looked back into that—that we projected a deficit in that class of fifty-four million. With the increase in a full year's operation of the increase, the effect of the operation in the increase which at the time we thought would come at once on April the first; therefore, for the full fiscal year, we felt that we would increase our revenues by fifteen million, five hundred and forty-six; therefore reduce that deficit to thirty-nine million and ninety-seven thousand dollars.

Senator Everett: That's on the increase in revenues?

Mr. Kierans: Yes, operating in a full year.

Senator Everett: But then you took out of that twenty-five hundred publications.

Mr. Kierans: No, no, this was prior to doing that.

Senator Everett: No, but subsequent to that, what was the effect of taking out the twenty-five hundred publications?

Mr. Kierans: Well, the effect was to boost the deficit in the third-class—the part of that that was taken out of the second-class. The exact effects of that changing definition I haven't got, although they are included here in the charts.

Senator Everett: Mr. Minister, didn't you have a paper which your Department showed you?

Mr. Kierans: Look, I have got—

Senator Everett: Which would show the effect in '68-'69 of these rates.

Mr. Kierans: Well, sure, I just told you.

Senator Everett: Well, then, I don't want to press the point. Let me ask one last question: Then in order for you and I to estimate that, we would have to know the effect of taking those twenty-five hundred publications out and making them third-class publications, because we have a figure now of thirty-nine.

Mr. Kierans: Where you and I differ, you know, talking not on cross-purposes, but at cross-years is:—you are asking for figures for '68-'69 when there were no rate increases at all effective in any of these classes.

Senator Everett: All right, let's go then to '69-'70.

Mr. Kierans: Oh, now we are in business because that's when they became effective. They didn't become effective until April the first, '69.

Senator Everett: Fine. Could you tell me what your projection was for that for '69-'70. I am talking about the Departmental paper that would have been put before you as the Minister, saying what the effect of the change in rates would be as it applied to second-class deficit.

Mr. Kierans: This is the point I want to make. The statements that we made at that time, you see, were on the basis of the definitions remaining the same because we didn't know now many publications would be coming out of the class.

In other words, we didn't attribute either to the second or the third. We simply took the class the way it was, and if you moved them to another class, it would carry its deficit with it; so all that we did then was say:—the deficit foreseen for '69-'70 would be fifty-four million, six hundred and forty-three thousand dollars. The effect of the rate increases would be fifteen million, five hundred and forty-six; so that the revised deficit as a result of the rate—but again the rates coming in all at one time—would have been thirty-nine million and ninety-seven thousand dollars.

Now, two things happened during the debate because all of these figures were prepared for me in order to debate them.

Number one:—The Parliament decided that these rates in the second-class had to be staged. They couldn't all come in on April the first and therefore I couldn't get my full fifteen million dollars.

Then, secondly, during the year...it took us about six or eight months to do this...we shifted the publications around between second and third-class publications in accordance with the definition of the Act that had just been passed.

Senator Everett: Which was the twenty-five hundred publications?

Mr. Kierans: That's right.

Senator Everett: What did you estimate, once you have no figures?

Mr. Kierans: Well, the estimates that you could have seen here between the various classes and the figures that I have given you now, really, are the figures that we estimate for the coming year—the figures on the chart.

Senator Everett: No, I am saying: what would be the effect of taking those twenty-five hundred out of second-class, you see.

Mr. Kierans: Oh, I think that we probably transferred a deficit of about seven or eight million, I don't know which, from the second to the third class.

Senator Everett: So, all right, that's seven million. That would bring it down to...

Mr. Kierans: I would think we probably carried a deficit of about seven million dollars.

Senator Everett: The point that Mr. Fortier was trying to make and we don't seem to be able to get it from the figures—I think the point he was making was that:—did you take into account the fact that if you raised the rates, subscriptions would be cancelled or magazines would go out of business. and that the volume of second-class mail, carried by the Post Office would reduce?

Mr. Kierans: Oh, yes, oh, yes.

Senator Everett: And that the reduction would be a loss of revenue to the post office without a consequent reduction in overhead?

Mr. Kierans: Yes, but in the fact, it was an actual gain of revenue between fifty and sixty million dollars; so it wasn't a loss.

Senator Everett: Comparative to the figures that you had projected, though, it would be.

Mr. Kierans: Yes, but what you hope for and what you get are probably two different things.

Senator Everett: It would appear...

Mr. Kierans: I don't want to pull any punches here. I still feel that the second-class category has got to pay a greater percentage of its costs than it's presently paying.

Mr. Fortier: Why wouldn't the Post Office itself spread their losses as you suggested companies should do?

Mr. Kierans: Touché, touché All right, okay, but you know what I want then? I want Parliament to say who gets it. If they want the Free Press Weekly to get a million, seven hundred and forty-five thousand, okay. I don't want to say it. If they want to put the pressure on Le Devoir, I want Parliament to say it, or if they want to help 'Le Devoir' or 'L'Action Catholique', it's not me. I'm no God on all of this, and I am no judge of the twenty-five hundred applicants that want special treatment, but I want Parliament to say, and I want the publishers themselves, to make some contribution themselves to this problem by creating among themselves some sort of a group or a council or whatever on how to solve this problem.

Senator Everett: But didn't you suffer from diminishing returns, though?

Mr. Kierans: Well, not when you gain sixty million dollars—you don't suffer from diminishing returns.

Senator Everett: When you raised the rates and lost the volume to the Post Offices—surely you did?

Mr. Kierans: Yes. Well, you know, we didn't—you know, the law of diminishing returns means you put up the price and your total revenue in the long run is less than what it was before, and ours was up sixty million dollars; so there is no law of diminishing returns there, or, if there is, you know, I could die happy on that sort of thing.

Senator Everett: You are stating a new law.

Mr. Kierans: The point that I want to make, Senator, is this:—just how great do you think this deficit ought to be? The publishers are the people in the class we are talking about who are using the services, don't have to use them. They can form more groups of high school boys. It's an exploited class, and they can expand that particular class, but they are not going to keep on expanding the exploited group inside the Post Office because you have got guys like Willie Houle down there, and you have got other people like Roger Decarie—I don't know if he's here or not—who simply won't stand for it any more; so the costs are going up because we are a service industry.

Seventy per cent of what we pay out goes to people, forty-eight thousand people. Now, should the people who use the Post Office, pay for it or should you and I or the salaried worker on the street—who should pay for it? and if he's agreeable to paying for it, at least somebody had better tell him that this is what he is paying for because he's never known it, and somebody had better tell him that he himself in paying for his six-cent letter is not contributing to the loss of the Post Office.

Mr. Fortier: He knows it now, I think.

Senator Everett: Yes, I think it's possible.

Mr. Kierans: All right, okay, but if we dropped it to five, then he would be contributing to the loss because the difference is what—about twenty-five, twenty-seven million—one cent on the first-class rate?

Mr. Fortier: Would an information campaign along those lines have been as effective as an increase in the postal rates?

Mr. Kierans: Well, certainly not in a financial way. It wouldn't have gotten me any sixty million dollars.

Senator Everett: Well, if you carried the argument through and you raised the postal rates on second-class mail to the point that they were like first-class and other mails—don't you think there would be a qualified diminishing return?

Mr. Kierans: With the figures that we are talking about now, if we went up twenty-four million dollars in this class and hit the magazines and the publications, an awful lot of them wouldn't like it and would go out of business. Would we gain?—Well, we have had some letters in to say that I—don't know. don't know.

Senator Everett: That's what you are suggesting in your brief, isn't it?

Mr. Kierans: No, this is not what I am suggesting at all. I am suggesting that we be permitted to do this or that we should do this but then the Government itself, Parliament says, "Okay, that's what your costs are. You want another twenty-four million dollars. You can get four million out of the publisher in the second-class and we will give you the other twenty because we all know that this would be disastrous for the publishing industry."

Mr. Fortier: Do you agree, Mr. Kierans, that it would be disastrous?

Mr. Kierans: Oh, yes, twenty-four million dollars would be disastrous.

Mr. Fortier: No, but the bigger problem which you have just touched upon: Can Canada afford to lose corporations which communicate with the people or would it be disastrous?

Mr. Kierans: Well, certainly. Certainly agree with you, it would be disastrous.

Senator Everett: And you do agree that this were done and the subsidy weren't paid ahead of time so the net effect is the same—let's not talk—I don't want to fall into what would characterize as your error of blaming this all on the publishing industry. Let's talk about the people who receive the publication because that's equally as valid—that they would stop to a large extent receiving publications.

Mr. Kierans: Well, now, wait a minute. don't accept your argument because all these guys, you know, are making a profit they wouldn't be in business. I mean I don't know who came before you Lord Thomson, I guess didn't come but anyway whoever did come before you—do you think that they are in the business of publishing to inform people first and that it's irrelevant whether they make a profit or not?

Senator Everett: I suggest to you that if you are looking at the over-all costs of the corporation and I suggest to you that if the corporation continues to lose money on one arm of its business that it will eventually close it down yes. I think if there is only one single arm I think you would agree with me that it will close down by itself.

Mr. Kierans: Yes I would like you to be more precise here Senator. How much do you want us to subsidize the publishing industry and why do you think they need it? That is what I want to know.

Senator Everett: I am referring not to the publishing industry but to the people. You are referring to the publishing industry and you are saying that the publishing industry is making a barrel of money.

Mr. Kierans: I am not saying it. I am not saying it at all.

Senator Everett: All right you said the publishing industry is making money and that they can afford to pay the postal rates and I am saying to you that we have evidence of publications that are losing money, that are being carried by, admittedly, large corporations, and I am suggesting to you that they won't go on carrying these papers or these magazines. They will, in fact, close down, and I think what I am further suggesting to you is that.

Mr. Kierans: I think you have to be careful here, you know. Under Claude Ryan, Le Devoir has been a much more profitable newspaper than it ever was in its earlier years. I mean in recent years, because I have been a shareholder—I guess I still am—I don't know, but...

Mr. Fortier: He said he was looking for some certificates.

Mr. Kierans: Well, at one time, he told me I was one of two Englishmen that were shareholders of Le Devoir. Okay, but I am not talking about his profits here. What I am talking about is: you are accepting as face value that these people say that anything I give them, they will pass on to the readers. Okay, I'll tell you they will do a hell of a lot more than that, but I don't know why they do it. For example, we were discussing the Free Press Weekly. Not so long ago, it had a rate of five dollars a year, but how much did the Free Press Weekly get out of five dollars? How much do you think, Senator, it got out of that five dollars?

Senator Everett: I don't know.

Mr. Kierans: It didn't get a nickel.

Senator Everett: Is that relevant?

Mr. Kierans: Well, yes, I think it is because if they can afford to give away the newspaper to readers, why do they expect the taxpayer of Canada also to give them all their postage free, because the manner of selling subscriptions in the West was: you hired somebody to sell the subscriptions for you. They gave him ten per cent of the five dollars. He went and hired a lot of youngsters to go around from farm to farm, and he got the other ninety per cent, or it may have been seventy-five/twenty-five.

Now, if you want to keep half of it—and this is not common to one newspaper. It's common to a lot of them.

Senator Everett: Well, let's deal with the...

Mr. Kierans: So, the subscriptions really mean nothing outside of it. They enhance their subscription list in order to build up the advertising rates that they can charge. Okay, this is their business. This is the way they have been doing it traditionally. I simply suggest that I don't think that they should include in this sort of operation the taxpayer of Canada.

Senator Everett: You think they should pay their actual costs?

Mr. Kierans: As a Postmaster General, I say yes, and then as a Canadian, I say the Government has to do something because this is going to be too severe an impost.

The Chairman: Fine, Senators I have promised the reporter a break at this particular point. I think, in fairness, she must have it. Let's just take five minutes, no more.

(Recess)

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, ladies and gentlemen—if I could call the session back in order, please. I think we can proceed to the second round without any further opening statements by anyone. I think, Senator Everett, you were going to ask a question.

Senator Everett: Just dealing with your last assertion that as a Postmaster-General, you would like to see the second-class mail not show a deficit and the rates reflect that, and also you would like to see the rates reflect the actual cost—Is that correct?

Mr. Kierans: Yes, but perhaps I had better define it. Let me put it this way:—as Postmaster-General, I want that twenty-four million dollars, but I don't care from whom I get it. Whether I get it from the taxpayers of Canada or from the publishers themselves is a government decision.

I say this:—that the Post Office is a service. It's not like investment in human capital, ducation or anything else. It's a service which can reasonably try to balance off its costs through its revenue by charging those costs to the users. Therefore, I would like the twenty-four million, but I realize that this is not possible in all classes. It is possible in the third-class because these are magazines and papers and direct mail material that are used for particular purposes. It's possible in the fourth-class for us to balance, and it's possible in the first-class.

It is not possible, given the structure of the industry and the traditional aid which the people of Canada have always given the industry to do it; therefore, if only four of that twenty-four million comes out of an increase in rates and twenty million dollars comes from Parliament, from the people of Canada, I would be perfectly happy. In fact, I think that this is the only reasonable solution, but then a couple of things happen.

The people at large know that just like, as I said, the gold mining industry, there is a subsidy or there is a grant to carry out certain, specific, national objectives: to have a viable magazine and newspaper industry, and this is what it cost us, the taxpayer in general. Okay, it's clear, and it's also clear to the publishers that this is what they are getting, and then there is only a third point from then on. Who gets the twenty million dollars?

All I am arguing against is that the Postmaster-General should not be allocated his twenty million dollars in the very inefficient way in which we do it because there are very worthwhile magazines in this country that don't rely on the mails one iota and therefore don't contribute to our deficit, but they are in that second-class and they should be helped too; so it demands somebody, maybe a council of the publishers, together with people appointed by my colleagues, the Secretary of State, who will determine how this money should be allocated.

Mr. Fortier: Is the Government, sir, doing anything about this?

Mr. Kierans: Well, I think that when the debate comes forward, if it does, on whether the Post Office should be turned into a Crown Corporation—obviously this is going to be one of the key points.

Mr. Fortier: Are you considering that it is your responsibility as Postmaster-General to bring this particular question before your colleagues?

Mr. Kierans: Well, Mr. Fortier, yes, I haven't done it directly, because I know it is coming forward, because I personally feel that this is going to be the best way to resolve the problem, to create a Crown Corporation. Now, whether it turns into a Crown Corporation or not, you know, depends on the House, but in that debate, obviously the major debate is going to revolve around the solution to the second-class problem.

Mr. Fortier: Aren't you concerned that the publishers would lose some of their credibility if they had to come back again before...

Mr. Kierans: Well, you see, I don't know how to resolve it, but the point is that this exists already, and I don't want them to be hypocritical enough to say to me, "Look, your costs are stupid. You don't know." This has been the whole burden of the proof, that our costs aren't stupid, and every time that they challenge me on these costs by saying that I have a bunch of nincompoops in the Department that don't know how to allocate costs or anything else, then I come back to them and say, "Well, it happens that the last cost analysis was made, not by the Department, but by P. S. Ross and Associates and I will give you permission, if you want me to, to look at their working papers," but not one of them has ever asked to see the working papers, but they keep on repeating the same maudite nialseries.

Mr. Fortier: Would the point which you make very strongly in your brief that there is at the moment some—what could be interpreted as interference with the freedom of the press in this form of subsidy—would it not be even more so, if again, I repeat, the publishers of individual publications had to come begging for money?

Mr. Kierans: I don't think they have to come begging. That's, you know, a pejorative word, and also, I think, you know, a valuable word, but I will admit I don't know the answer to it.

Senator Everett: Well, how would the subsidy be paid then?

Mr. Kierans: Well, I don't know. I hope the Honourable Senators, as far as I am concerned, will come up with some solutions and ask the publishers also for their ideas on how you handle it in an open, direct way, instead of hiding it in postal rates.

Senator Everett: Would it be paid to the Post Office Department?

Mr. Kierans: I still don't know that either. I mean, the Government might say to us, "Look, you want to get all together". What's the total revenue—forty-five? Let's say it's forty-five million. Let's say you want forty-five million dollars, and you are going to get twenty-million. They say, "Look, if you put those rates up to forty-five million dollars, then, you know, you are going to have a nine-cent delivery rate for a newspaper or magazine and that's just too high; so we will let you go to four and a half or five cents, whatever it may be, or seven cents, and the rest we will give you."

Senator Everett: So, it would come in the end as we have today really, wouldn't it?

Mr. Kierans: No, it wouldn't because we would analyze the rates, and say that this is the rate that we have to charge, and the Government would say, "Well, no, we don't want you to charge that. We want you to charge three cents less." It wouldn't resolve all of the problems, by the way, because then again you would still have the problem. You want a viable magazine in the publishing industry, but a lot of people that don't depend on the Post Office at all, who sell it on newsstands and have other forms of distribution, who have very worthwhile magazines, would not be getting any aid at all, and we would be giving it also to newspapers that don't need it, and we would be giving not sufficient to newspapers that need a great deal of support and so on.

The Chairman: Senator Langlois has a supplementary question.

[translation]

Senator Langlois: Mr. Kierans, we have heard Mr. Claude Ryan before this Committee. He stated that if ever the print media had to be subsidized the money should come from the Provincial Treasury. Do you agree with that?

Mr. Kierans: I think that subsidies have their place. If we are planning to subsidize the press, why not Federal subsidies?

Senator Langlois: I have told you Mr. Kierans' opinion and I am asking you if you agree with him?

Mr. Kierans: That's his opinion.

Senator Langlois: You don't agree with him?

Mr. Kierans: No, for the sake of national unity I think the Federal Government would have a role to play in this.

Senator Langlois: Doesn't the press have a bit to do with education?

Mr. Kierans: Of what value is the information in some newspapers?

Senator Langlois: It has educational value at least.

Mr. Kierans: Perhaps!

[Text]

The Chairman: Senator Everett?

Senator Everett: You have been fairly hard on Mr. Malone.

Mr. Kierans: Oh, yes, I know Dick.

Senator Everett: And I am sure he knows you, and you have stated that you believe that anybody using the second-class mails—as a Postmaster you would like to see that he paid his costs. You would like him to cover his costs.

You have stated in your brief that the cost of carrying the Free Press Weekly—I am referring to page eight at the bottom—will be two million, two hundred and seventy-five thousand. Do you happen to know how much per copy that is?

Mr. Kierans: About ten cents.

Senator Everett: About ten cents per copy, based on twenty-two million?

Mr. Kierans: Well, probably a little less than ten cents. There are about four hundred and seventy thousand copies per week, which is roughly just under twenty-four million copies per annum I think it was. All right it was last year's figures. I was going by twenty-four million. He must be doing very well if he's up to twenty-six million now.

Senator Everett: I think your figures are probably more correct. I have their brief here, filed with the Committee. There were "twenty-two million, six hundred and seventy-six thousand copies of the Free Press Weekly 'going through' the Winnipeg post office" so that would be roughly a cost of ten cents per copy.

Now, they say in their brief that:

(a) "a hundred thousand copies are put in bundles and sorted by the Winnipeg postal staff and transported to area rural post offices.

(b) eight and a half million copies [are put] in mail bags, handled twice on the loading dock at the Winnipeg post office by postal staff, and transported to other central post offices or to area rural post offices.

(c) Fourteen million copies in mail bags are delivered by the publisher directly on to railway cars destined for other central post offices.

They say that:

"Railway express companies will carry newspapers for one and a half cents a pound; bus companies for two and a half cents a pound. It cannot be expected that the post office cost could be more than three cents per pound or one cent per copy for postal department transportation.

"The cost of rail transportation from Winnipeg in freight cars under contract to the post office varies from two dollars and two cents to three-twenty-eight per hundred pounds. An average cost of one cent per copy would therefore appear reasonable.

"The cost of handling in Winnipeg on a per-copy basis is negligible.

"At the post office destination, the handling and sorting would be liberally be assessed at one cent per copy. In many cases sorting into the subscriber's post office box is all that is required..."

Mr. Kierans: That's negligible?

Senator Everett: I am reading from their brief. It says:

...With the exception of the eleven per cent delivered by letter carriers, the remainder are asked for at the general wicket by the subscriber.

"The approximate cost per copy of handling the Free Press Weekly can be summarized thus:

Transportation by rail—one cent;

Transportation by Post Office truck—one cent;

Handling at destination post office—one cent;

Total—three cents."

Mr. Kierans: That's the way he figures that out?

Senator Everett: That's what I have from the brief here, yes.

The Chairman: Would you comment on that, Mr. Kierans?

Mr. Fortier: That was made the object of an editorial, a series of them.

Mr. Kierans: Oh, yes, you know, as one of my friends in Winnipeg said to me, "You know, next to the Prime Minister, you are the most famous national figure in Winnipeg" just in Winnipeg.

Mr. Fortier: That's not a compliment for your friend, Mr. Richardson.

Mr. Kierans: Yes, but Mr. Richardson doesn't get three editorials a day written by Brigadier Malone.

Senator Everett: He sure doesn't.

Mr. Fortier: Like you.

Mr. Kierans: And I guess Mr. Richardson is quite happy that he doesn't either.

Now, there are two or three different way in which I could handle this. I could throw you to the wolf, and he's right sitting at the back here, the Head of the Union of the Sorters, who must have appreciated a lot of the remarks that the sorting costs here are negligible.

I mean, the problem with the Canadian public and a great many publishers is that they have thought for generations that the sorting costs were a lot less.

[Translation]

Mr. Kierans: Willie, isn't it true the owners of newspapers have considered the cost negligible for years and years.

Mr. Houle: They got used to producing "cartoons", that's another "joke".

[Text]

Mr. Kierans: Now, look...

Senator Everett: Before we go any further, though, I think the reason they say it's negligible is that, according to the way I read this—is that a hundred thousand copies are sorted out of twenty-two million, six hundred and seventy-six thousand. The rest are delivered in mail bags broken down as to rural routes and so and so forth.

Mr. Kierans: They still have to be divided up when they get to the rural routes, and sorted.

Senator Everett: Apparently not—I am given to understand that that dividing is done when they put them in the mail bag.

Mr. Kierans: Well, let's start off with the figure that you started with. You know, the figures of one million, seven hundred and forty-five thousand dollars deficit there depends on our estimate of the cost of sorting and the cost of carrying and roughly about ten cents per copy.

Now, the good general was one of those who questioned my figures at an earlier time when I said he was only costing us a million and a half, which was over a year ago, and I invited him to go and look at the working papers because, you know, if the figures are wrong, I mean, I don't care. I don't make more or less on the thing. I want to know, and I want to find out if Sinclair here is not doing his job properly, or others in the department, but he never did.

Now, it's all very well for people who are completely outside of the Post Office—I mean I can tell DuPont, you know, any day or tomorrow what their costs are providing me, with whatever they are providing me with. I don't think they are going to accept this as being reasonable, and I don't accept the analysis of Brigadier Malone until he comes and we can send any firm of auditors he wants to the Post Office to check it out.

Senator Sparrow: Pardon me. Can I just...

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow, yes?

Senator Sparrow: His figures are on the basis of sorting it once. Are your figures on sorting it twice, initially when it goes in to the Post Office in Winnipeg and then again when it is distributed out to the rural routes of the post office district that it's going to? Is that what your figures are based on?

Mr. Kierans: Our figures are based on a time/cost analysis of every operation that we undertake handling his.

Senator Sparrow: Exactly as he has stated there?

Mr. Kierans: I don't know. I mean, obviously there is some difference.

Senator Everett: Well, since there is such a difference of opinion between the two of you, would it be wise to investigate this particular situation?

Mr. Kierans: I invited him over a year ago when he 'phoned me the first time, when we tabled the Bill. It was the day after we tabled the Bill or maybe two days after. It didn't take long for the mail to get out to Winnipeg that day, I will tell you.

Senator Everett: I am talking about his specific situation.

Mr. Kierans: I invited him then. If he wants to be invited again, I will be quite glad to.

Senator Everett: I think what you said was that you invited them to look at your figures, your over-all figures of costs, but their point, as I read this, is that their costs are lower or that the Post Office Department costs of handling their particular mail are considerably lower, and they have given the costs here as being a total of some three cents.

Mr. Kierans: Well, look, yes, if Brigadier Malone wants a rebate because of the work that he does, you know, in bundling and trucking himself, I mean, I would be quite glad to give Brigadier Malone a rebate, but I will be glad to do it when I get something—when I recover my million, seven hundred and forty-five thousand dollars, and then ask him to do various things, and be glad to give him a rebate.

First of all, right now, I can't do it, because it's against the law, but when we are recovering approximately two cents out of what we estimate would be ten cents, I am not willing to give him a rebate on two cents, Senator. I would be willing to give him a rebate on ten cents or take a look at it then, but not at the moment, no.

Senator Everett: Well, then, that's a change in your philosophy from the fact on what you stated earlier, that a user of the second-class mail should pay his appropriate costs.

Mr. Kierans: Yes, sure, and if he paid his costs of ten cents—no, the Government...

Senator Everett: His appropriate costs.

Mr. Kierans: If the Government then decides, "Well, now F. P. Publications need a lot of help, and, you know, we are going to subsidize half of this", or something like that, that's quite all right. I don't care, but if we assume that this straight business relationship between the Free Press Weekly and ourselves as a supplier of a service and a user of a service is paying the costs to the supplier of that service, and then he volunteers or then he points out, "Now, look, I am bundling this for you and I am trucking it to Brandon and I am taking it from Brandon and over to another place, and I think that for the work that I am doing that I should get some sort of credit", I am quite willing to think of that, but at the moment, I think it's in the realm of a dreamworld or a hypothetical question. Let us put it that way.

Senator Everett: No, I only said it, Mr. Minister, because you stated that Mr. Malone had misrepresented his costs.

Mr. Kierans: I didn't say that. I never said at any time that he misrepresented his costs. I said I questioned how a person can say what our costs are. He is telling us what our costs are without ever having come in to the Post Office to find out what the operations are.

Senator Everett: He is trying to estimate what your costs are of handling his particular mail.

Mr. Kierans: Right, but why doesn't he come and take a look? You see, there's another thing. You can take a very simplistic view of what the operations of the Post Office are, but if you mailed a letter to your wife, whether she lives in Ottawa or whether she lives in Winnipeg, do you know how many handlings on the average—now it may be only ten more or ten less in your specific case, but how many times that letter is handled—and I don't say this with pride—from the moment you drop it into the box until somebody picks it up on their porch—about sixty-two or sixty-three, which is it—something like that?

So, you have somebody with a very heavy thing, and you think we handle it about three times, and that this is the way he estimates it?

Senator Everett: No, I don't think he said that at all. I think he says that in his case, you handle it in a certain, specific way, and you are suggesting that a person should pay their appropriate costs.

Mr. Kierans: I said that the class should pay its appropriate costs.

Senator Everett: Ah-hh-hh!

Mr. Kierans: That's how I said it, and I have never said anything different. There is no reason for any at all. You know, I said the second-class should pay its appropriate costs.

Senator Everett: Well, I am not the only one. I just wanted to be enlightened. That was all. I was enlightened.

Mr. Fortier: We had this afternoon the representatives of Canadian Business Press Association and they told us that many of their member publications did exactly this at the request of the Post Office, as a matter of fact, pre-sorting. As a matter of fact, one went so far as to state that they bundled their magazines all the way down to a particular postal route. "Walk" was the word that they used.

Now, given this pre-sorting, this bundling this trucking to the railway sidings and where it reaches its destination, this relatively speaking, minimal amount of work by you employees of the Post Office Department would you accept the proposition that for the same price that is being paid today, the Post Office will now do what some publishers are doing?

Mr. Kierans: Well, I think, if I understand your question correctly, there is something that should be done here.

All right, first of all, I want to say that we are operating in a framework where there is very little that can be done for two reasons. We are operating in a framework where we have roughly twenty-five per cent of our costs; therefore whatever rebates we give them, you know, really increase the deficit, but there is also the problem of an inequity here.

The inequity exists between the people doing what you describe that they are doing and you or me who don't do that but pay exactly the same price.

Well, Mr. Fortier, there my hands are tied, because there is nothing I can do because according to the Act, Mr. Sinclair and nobody else in the Department can take therefore give them appropriate recommendations in terms of a credit. This is according to the Act.

Now, this is one of the things that we are going to try to straighten out, but the assumption would be that, you know, you are covering roughly your costs anyway.

Now, I can see, and I am not quarrelling with the Act the way it is, because the minute we introduce some sort of measure like this, obviously, you know, Opposition Parties are going to say, "Ah, ah, just like the old railway debate or freight car rates in the United States at the time of Roosevelt, the trust—you know, the link between the big coal companies and so on. They get preferential rates. You are driving the poor man out of business and the little man out of business and so on."

Okay, well, we are going to have to face up to this because the Post Office wants people to do this more and more. You will improve the productivity of the Post Office. It will help us when we go to enact a coding system, and we will derive very much more advantage doing what the Senator has said from people who had their mail addressed to the walk. You eliminate a lot of steps.

There is one point I want to say. Some of you may believe—so you are right. The point is I can't do anything about it now.

Mr. Fortier: Because the Post Office Department does not ask, say, the Free Press Weekly today to do this.

Mr. Kierans: Oh, yes, we have another, you know, argument. We have another argument. I don't know what Gordon's saying here, but we have another argument. The argument is: if you help us to do this, we can provide you with quicker and faster service and more dependable service.

Mr. Fortier: And some accept and do it?

Mr. Kierans: And this is why they do it at the present time. You know, we now for the first time in our lives have a marketing division in which we go into about three hundred major users. You can, you know, think of them. They are telephone companies, the hydro companies. There's newspapers, Eaton's, Simpson's, Reader's Digest. About fifty of those companies, and you have got half of the volume that is provided by the Post Office; so we are going into them now for the first time in our lives, and we are looking at their mail rooms and asking—you know, trying to work it out in order to increase our own productivity, but there isn't a nickel I can give them. The only thing I can give them is, say, "Lookit, if you do it this way or can you help us to do it this way? We will get it there a day earlier than it ordinarily would have gone."

I may say that this problem is common too, Senator Everett, for people all over the world. You know, when I said that we have sixty-two to sixty-three steps, that is not criticizing the Canada Post Office.

Senator Evertett: No, I appreciate that.

Mr. Kierans: In any way because some people—I guess it was in Time Magazine—from their transportation systems, who were real experts, estimated that the average in the U.S. is—or was at that time—about ninety-nine steps, but this is the result of the way we, the people of Canada, have looked at Post Offices. You know, we never give them the capital equipment, the mechanization or the advanced mechanization to handle these tremendous problems, and we are at the stage now where the provinces were fifteen or twenty years ago if they hadn't built the great auto-routes and so, the interchanges outside of Montreal and Toronto. Can you imagine the old Cote de Liesse Road trying to handle the traffic that goes over the Metropolitan, but we are still at the old Cote de Liesse state?

Senator Evertett: Mr. Kierans, if you believe that the Government should subsidize second-class mail rates, but the method you prefer is that the Post Office be run as a Crown Corporation charging whatever rates it needs to cover the steps, and that Parliament or the Government should grant subsidies to the users of second-class mail, why didn't you suggest this at the outset, when you originally contemplated the raising of second-class rates?

Mr. Kierans: Well, look, you know, if I started that kind of, you know, theoretical or philosophical approach, first of all, I didn't know enough about the Post Office in order to engage in it, because it was only about four months after I was named Postmaster-General, and all I knew was, "Look, this is ridiculous for you to recover eight per cent of your costs in a given application. You know, let's put it up a hundred per cent and maybe we will get sixteen per cent of our costs back and so on." I mean this is the kind of relative...

The Chairman: Did you not make something along the lines of this as a suggestion before the Senate Committee?

Mr. Kierans: This is right, yes. This is right, Senator, but this was no time for me to put this forward as a proposal.

The Chairman: In other words, you threw it out as an idea?

Mr. Kierans: Oh, yes, as an idea, as the ultimate solution of the problem. It's the only way. You see, people think of the Post Office as being in the communications business.

Well, you are in the sense that you are a carrier, but you are really a transportation system more than anything else. As some of you here pointed out, we no longer even have our own Canadian postal magazine for our own employees at the moment; so we are not really in the business of communications ourselves, as people.

We are individuals transporting other people's communications, and that's the way we have to look at it. You know, the Post Office has no business making judgments on what it is that is being transported or the value or the virtue of this or that magazine as against another. It is in the business of recovering the cost of transporting what other people write or communicate.

Some other Department of Government should be in charge of this kind of allocations or should be in charge of assessing. You know, we divide up our classifications in second-class—within second-class: newspapers; metropolitan newspapers are different from rural newspapers. Weeklies are different from dailies. Some kinds of magazines are more valuable than others, but my God, you know, it's not for a mechanic like a Postmaster-General to make that kind of judgment.

Somebody has to decide what is it that this country wants and, you know, what are its cultural objectives.

Senator Everett: And yet on the other hand, you did make that judgment. Is it not a fact that certain magazines if published by profit-making concerns in the publishing business enjoy a second-class rate, but the same magazines if published by an association or non-profit organizations suffer a third-class rate?

Mr. Kierans: No, if a magazine is of particular interest to a particular group, and published by a group, a particular group, we feel that that group, whether you are Methodist or Catholic or Presbyterian or interested in welfare or interested in health or interested in education or the boy scouts as against the paraplegics—that the people in this group should have the responsibility of publications that are not of general interest, and therefore the people who are supporting a particular effort, like, you, Senator, may support the Red Cross. I may think that the War Amputees or the Boy Scouts, but these are particular objectives, and that these should not be a burden on the general, taxpaying public. They have no claim as such; whereas papers that are of general interest for the general public, according to the definition adopted by the House, fall into the pure second-class category, because everybody was getting into the second-class.

Mr. Fortier: Oh, but, sir, I would say that this evening in your brief you made a very strong plea in the second part of your brief for exactly that category of magazine, the special interest magazine. We are moving from the general media to the special media, and as a result of those revised postal rates now, those special interest magazines unless they qualify under the regulations, are taxed more than their colleagues who still benefit from second-class rates.

Mr. Kierans: What I cited here were the young as a classification, the ethnic groups, and all of these people are in the second-class. What is not in the second-class is the magazine Canadian Welfare, for example, because it is of interest to people who are interested in welfare. For example, we recognize the Red Cross as being of general interest, but we do not recognize particular branches of the Red Cross. You know, the Ottawa branch of the Red Cross goes into third-class; whereas the Red Cross as a whole is of general interest to the general public.

Now, look, I am not happy with the classification, and this is why we say that, you know, the publishing industry itself, which knows this business inside-out—that there is so much that we carry in these bags here and so much that you sort.—Maybe if I wear another hat, I would be glad to take part, you know, but not if I am Postmaster-General, you know, because there is a conflict of interest there, but I would be glad to take part, but it's a tremendous problem, but this is not our problem in the Post Office.

Mr. Fortier: You were not making a case for the special interest magazines?

Mr. Kierans: No, no.

Mr. Fortier: No, like The Medical Post, for example—you know, that's a special class of people that has to be kept abreast of developments within their profession.

Mr. Kierans: Sure, and they have a very good medical magazine.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, published by Maclean Hunter.

Mr. Kierans: But I am not a doctor and never read the medical magazine and why the hell should I pay for it?

Mr. Fortier: Exactly.

Mr. Kierans: I mean, the doctors themselves, I think, are rich enough to pay for it.

Senator Everett: I don't know if I am right on this, but it seems to me, looking at your rate schedule here that the magazine that is published by Maclean-Hunter, the medical magazine, goes at a second-class rate.

Mr. Kierans: It is a commercial proposition.

Senator Everett: That's right.

Mr. Kierans: Fred, do you want to dilate on this?

Senator Everett: And the same magazine or a similar magazine produced by the Canadian Medical Association goes at a third-class rate.

Mr. Kierans: Because they are a particular group, you know, with particular subjects of interest to particular people.

Senator Everett: But with roughly the same circulation, I suspect.

The Chairman: Would you like your associate to say something on this?

Mr. Kierans: Yes, Fred, do you want to say something? You can take Maclean-Hunter's.

Mr. Fred Pageau, Director, Postal Rates and Classification Branch, Post Office Department: Yes, I think that the point that you made on the medical paper—the Minister has made the point, for instance—I am going to use his own words. At the time, he received The Economist which is a specialized publication because he belonged to that association, and he feels that he should support it because it is published in the interest by the association. This publication is ancillary to the association itself, and this is definite; whereas Maclean-Hunter gets into the venture of publishing as a private industry. This is where the difference has been made, and the same difference has been made for all association publications.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, but who say that they are in direct competition with the business publications, and now they are put at a disadvantage.

Mr. Kierans: This is quite right. You are quite right.

Senator Everett: But as you say, you are not happy with that situation anyway.

Mr. Kierans: We are not happy with that distinction, and we are not happy with the distinction because it's not refined enough made the second-class itself. If you leave out the people that we put into the third class, which is quite a group to leave out, but there is a case that can be made for papers.

A valid distinction, you know, can be for those that have a tremendous rural population, and they are hit unduly, and there is all of these sorts of refinements in there.

Senator Everett: But what about the distinction that I believe exists between a weekly and a semi-weekly? As I understand it, a weekly is entitled to the under ten thousand circulation and under certain circumstances is entitled to the twenty-five hundred free zone, and I think it pays the magazine rate, five cents and two cents apiece when the new rates go into force.

On the other hand, the same semi-weekly, under the same conditions with the same under ten thousand circulation is classified as a daily.

Mr. Kierans: That's right. We have to draw the line somewhere. You have tri-weeklies, you know. You have four-weeklies and so on. We make the distinction between the weeklies. Again, you know, it's a bludgeon. I admit it.

Senator Everett: Well, I was just thinking that prior to the amendments or the rate increase, I believe that all daily newspapers that were under ten thousand circulation and fitted these requirements had the twenty-five hundred free zone. It seems to me that you have made all sorts of judgments.

Mr. Pageau: Excuse me, not the dailies, Senator.

Senator Everett: Not the dailies?

Mr. Pageau: No, not the dailies, the rural weeklies—we call them weeklies and this is as a result of tradition set by Parliament. Free zone or free mailing of twenty-five hundred copies in a radius of forty miles has always been granted by Parliament, and this goes back to about 1875, and this has been routine; so now what has been done throughout the years is that you have removed the copies going to the letter carrier because you had too many weekly publications which were not actually rural weeklies, which the House has always paid peculiar attention to the farm weekly, and they were publishing outside a large city; so they did send their copies to the cities. A large metropolitan area is free, and this is one reason, but they continue to enjoy the same free zone privileges that they had before, but the tri-weekly never had these privileges.

Senator Everett: And the daily did not?

Mr. Pageau: The daily did not, nor the three-weekly.

Senator Everett: They had a preferential rate, though, did they?

Mr. Pageau: Yes, they had a rate. Now, they pay the same ratio under ten thousand, yes.

Mr. Fortier: Those bi-weeklies are now considered as dailies?

Mr. Pageau: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: I think I have to ask the question:—I realize that you have to make value judgments which in the end may be arbitrary, but on what basis did you eventually decide?

Mr. Kierans: Arbitrary.

Mr. Fortier: That's a value judgment.

The Chairman: Mr. Kierans, what consultation did you have with the media before imposing the new rates?

Mr. Kierans: Well, you know, we did what we normally do. If we had gone to the media—we had three classic examples; so let's say that the media themselves had three warnings. One was in 1951 the Government of the day wasn't happy, and it proposed some rather generous increases or large increases in the second-class rates.

I guess we learned everything that we really wanted to learn about the views of the publishing industry in 1951 because despite the fact that the St. Laurent Government had a very large majority at the time, it, you know, withdrew and so watered down the legislation that in fact, as I have said in here, it meant virtually nothing. The Pearson Government made an attempt in 1964. Mr. Pearson didn't have the large majority that Mr. St. Laurent had enjoyed. He had a minority government, and again we had the benefit, shall we say, if you want to look into it, of the views of the publishing industry, which were roughly a repetition of what they had been in 1951. Similarly, Senator, you will remember as recently as 1967, they gave the publishing industry an opportunity to express their views about such a disastrous thing as even saying fifteen or twenty per cent of the cost of carrying their publications; so that I think that it wasn't really that necessary to invite them to come and say, "This is what we propose to do, boys. What do you think?" because we already had it.

The Chairman: Is the story apocryphal that you saw them the day that you introduced the Bill; that you asked a group of publishers to go down and make a speech, and then they discovered that the speech was, in fact, a speech?

Mr. Kierans: Oh, yes, I would think that's apocryphal, Mr. Chairman. I don't think I saw them until days afterwards. I mean, I had a 'phone call, I guess, the next day. As I say, the mail must have been very good. The first 'phone call came from Winnipeg.

From the Floor: Perhaps they heard it on the radio.

Mr. Kierans: Well, they knew all the details of the Bill for some reason or another.

The Chairman: Senator Everett.

Senator Everett: Well, as I read you then Mr. Minister, you are not happy with these arbitrary rate break-downs.

Mr. Kierans: That's right.

Senator Everett: And that you are suggesting that the situation that confronts the reader of these magazines be rectified. Would it be rectified by a subsidy to the Post Office from Parliament?

Mr. Kierans: Yes, in return for which the Post Office would agree to keep its rates less than the full cost.

Senator Everett: Yes.

Mr. Kierans: Yes, that's right, but the again that doesn't really solve the major problem, about which I am unhappy. It is the problem that nobody here in the Post Office enjoys making these judgments and playing God or we don't think it's sufficient for Parliament to award a grant of x-millions of dollars to the publishing industry. We think that Parliament and parliamentary committees better go, you know, "au fond de la chose" and be much more precise in how to direct the distribution of that money.

Senator Everett: Yes, and what you are suggesting is that the whole shift and change that took place during the rate increase be overhauled in this particular way, so the publishers, presumably, would have a new opportunity to make representations and the whole thing would be gone into all over again.

Mr. Kierans: That's right. It can be refined a great deal. A great deal can be refined.

[Translation]

Senator Langlois: Mr. Minister, you have just said that this subsidy—if such a subsidy were to be paid—should first be given to the Post Office which would in turn allow rate reductions. Would this not be unfair to newspapers which used your postal services to a lesser extent than others?

Mr. Kierans: Yes, that's right, and I would prefer, that someone other than myself make such judgments.

Senator Langlois: But what if the subsidies were not paid by the Department, what if they were paid directly to the newspapers?

Mr. Kierans: If the government were to decide on such a policy, so much the better. We would charge the exact rates, and at a given time the government, or a government committee, a council, commission or what have you could decide that such an amount should be paid to such a newspaper. Now that would be a bind.

[Text]

The Chairman: Are there other questions? Mr. Fortier?

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Minister, I come back to a question that the Chairman asked you a little while ago. It concerned the way this rate increase was handled. One of the complaints that we have heard today, and which I am sure you have heard many times, concerns the fact that the rates were not raised gradually as is being done in the United States. Would you comment on this question?

Mr. Kierans: Yes, but I have already given the reasons. There had been no significant increase since 1961. A fairly large increase was necessary—and what good will that do us? If around 8 percent of cost is taken as income, the percentage is going to be increased by half, and that means 12 percent of our costs. That's why the increases were so large.

Mr. Fortier: As you know, several newspaper owners have answered that by saying: "We have 3, 4, 5 and ten year subscriptions." So they say that it is impossible for them to recover from these subscription holders the increased costs created by these higher rates.

Mr. Kierans: Yes, but my answer at the time was that this had been expected since 1951, at least since 1964 when the Pearson Government tried to do it.

Mr. Fortier: Expected since June, 1968 when you came in with a majority.

[Text]

The Chairman: Senator Macdonald?

Senator Macdonald: There is one question I would like to ask about first-class. As I take it from your remarks, first-class mail now pays its own way?

Mr. Kierans: Yes, there is a slight surplus there. We don't use the nasty word "profit".

Senator Macdonald: Is the Post Office Department paid for the mail sent out by the various departments of Government and by members of the Senate and the House of Commons under their frankage?

Mr. Kierans: The charge is in there. The charge is in there.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: This afternoon, the Canadian Business Press, as I mentioned earlier, came before the Committee, and I would like to read you one paragraph in their brief, Mr. Minister, and ask for your comments, because we consider that it is topical and requires an explanation.

They said in paragraph sixteen:

"Canadian Business Press considers that the extreme importance of Canada's business publications for the Canadian business community warrants their inclusion under statutory rates, the same rate as that granted to publications such as Time, Reader's Digest, as well as other Canadian general magazines."

Would you care to comment on that?

Mr. Kierans: Oh, yes, you see, again, you know, there are national interests there. There are extreme nationalists. There are people against foreign investment. There are people that are for it and so on.

The Chairman: What's your position on these things?

Mr. Kierans: I have got enough to handle with you now. Look, as far as we are concerned, you know, it weighs so much. For us, it's a transportation business. We have put that class, 'Reader's Digest' and Time—they are in the class of magazines like Maclean's and like hundreds of others. But as a class, we have said, "Well, look, all that we can recover right now is about one-third"—I think it comes out to that exactly—to just about a third of our costs. And again I don't know which is which here as between Time Magazine and Reader's Digest; but we recover 32.7 per cent from one of them and 34.3 per cent from the other one. It comes out between the two and this is with the change to shape and weight and so on—and these are the things to be taken into consideration. They are dead on the line in the class, and that's the only judgment we make.

Whether there are a million Canadians that hate the guts of these newspapers, that's not our affair. That's what it cost to carry the magazines in that class.

Now, if somebody wants me as Postmaster-General to discriminate against Maclean's or 'Reader's Digest' or against 'Time Magazine', okay, Parliament can direct me to do it, but until they direct me to do it, I am not going to do it. I am treating it as something that weighs so much, and I am in the transportation business of getting it from one point to another.

Mr. Fortier: Are you influenced in reaching that decision by the decision which Parliament took back in 1961 and which brought about the exclusion of 'Time' and 'Reader's Digest' from the provisions of Section 12 (a) of The Income Tax Act? Did you take that into consideration; that Parliament had once spoken?

Mr. Kierans: Well, as I said, during the discussions, I took a stand because I said, "Look, if the Cabinet wants to make a clear decision, and wants to change the definition, in this particular field as to how these two magazines should be treated, that's up to you to decide".

As far as I am concerned, the way the Bill was drafted, this was the definition that I wanted. I would have accepted whatever definition my colleagues set, and I didn't press my own nationalistic or non-nationalistic views at that time.

The Chairman: Would you be interested Mr. Minister—yes, you said at page thirteen in your brief—you talked about changing caps and not speaking as a politician or as a Minister of the Crown, but simply as an observer. Would you care to answer that question as an observer, not as a Minister of the Crown?

Mr. Kierans: No comment. No, there are general discussions going on, obviously about Canada's attitudes towards foreign investment, foreign ownership of all these things. I don't want to get involved in another NATO debate right now.

The Chairman: All right, there are some Senators' questions remaining, but I think if I sense this session, that we are coming perhaps to the time when we can usefully terminate; however, Mr. Fortier, you have a question. Senator Everett has a question and if other Senators have questions, I am really not trying to limit the discussion and they can prepare themselves, but let's have Senator Everett first.

Senator Everett: Yes, this will be my last question. In our research, I read you a paragraph, which goes as follows:

"Only distribution in the rural districts and mail handling for the rural districts occurs on Saturday. Publishers must mail through registered post offices. First-class mail precedes second for sorting. Newspapers often are overlooked on Friday and so do not reach their destination until Monday or Tuesday."

Could you tell me, Mr. Minister, whether (a) this true; (b) what your comments on it are; and (c) whether you believe this Parliamentary subsidy should include an amount of money for the improvement of this sort of service?

Mr. Kierans: Well, actually, the reason why we kept—which I think will answer all three aspects of the question—the six-day week in the rural areas was this, you know, this psychological phenomenon. On the basis of looking at it as a first-class proposition, there is no more reason to have or not much more reason to have a six-day week in the country than there is in the city because the Aunt Sadie letters and so on do not bulk that large in the psychology of people these days.

There are all sorts of other means of communication—telephones and all the rest of it but what is extremely important in the rural areas is the reception of the weekend newspaper—of the Saturday and Friday newspaper.

because it's a sociological problem. This is what they want to read and this is what they read at the weekend.

Senator Everett: And this statement makes the point that they are not getting that.

Mr. Kierans: Well, to the extent that they are not getting it, and I don't know—this is your research and I would certainly say that it's probable—there is a lot of judgment and justification and substance behind this, but if I may say, it's really a complaint against the efficiency of the service at the moment.

Now, what we normally do in cases like this—if we find out that in Temiskaming or in far-off rural points, that there are complaints that they don't get their mail and their newspapers on Saturday afternoon, well then we in that case find out and rectify it, but we don't know until we know the precise point whether it's Bear Point in Nova Scotia or any other point or Amqui in Quebec, and we rectify it because the objective, certainly, Senator, is to see that they get those papers on a Saturday afternoon. That's the whole purpose of the process, and as a matter of fact, I can even go more than that and say this—that if the mail truck started out on a rural route and delivered only the first-class mail and left behind the second-class mail; that is to say, the newspaper, we would have an awful lot more trouble with the drivers on that route because they are not really interested in their hydro or telephone bills. They are much more interested in the newspaper, and actually as a practice, the first-class mail, which is relatively light in rural areas, is often sorted and ready long before the newspaper arrives, but the truck doesn't go out until the newspaper, 'Le Soleil' or whatever the newspaper is, comes in. As I say, that's the objective, and this is the way it works in the vast majority of municipalities and rural routes. In other words, that fellow goes out, and he has on his two or three hundred calls, sixty or eighty calls or whatever it may be in that rural route, when that particular regional paper comes in. He doesn't go out when the first-class mail is ready at nine o'clock in the morning.

Senator Everett: Thank you very much.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: One last point—Mr. Minister, it has to do with the imbalance of U.S.-Canadian publications flowing across the border which result in a deficit in excess of three and a half million dollars.

Have you considered the imposition of an annual license fee to U.S. publications, similar to that which is being considered in Japan at the moment?

Mr. Kierans: Is Japan considering that?

Mr. Fortier: I know you cannot at the moment, but have you considered discussing it at the international level?

Mr. Kierans: No, the only thing that we are working and Fred was in Japan—I don't know. How long were you there?

Mr. Fortier: That's what they call slow mail.

Mr. Kierans: And he can tell you exactly what happened, but what Canada did get—how many are there—a hundred and sixty-seven countries? No? A hundred and forty-three—all right. The only way we could do what you suggest and I would dearly love to do it, but we would be out of the business—there would be a hundred and forty-two other countries, and we would no longer be members of the International Postal Union. A hundred and forty-two other countries would be at perfect liberty to put whatever terminal charges on whatever Canadians sent anywhere in the world; so that's the answer to it.

What Pageau and others with him did—Pageau was the continuing delegate there—accomplish is that the imbalance between the States and ourselves, is we finally got through to the other hundred and forty-three nations, that this was a particular Canadian-U.S. problem, and they gave us permission to try to work out some sort of bilateral arrangements.

Mr. Fortier: Actually it would be throughout the world now. We will get some compensation for the mail which we receive in surplus of what we dispatch?

Mr. Kierans: In certain instances of first-class, yes. We accept mail that comes in to Canada over what is dispatched to a given country.

Prior to these past meetings in Tokyo, the other nations of the world really weren't interested in the problem. There is a peculiar relationship here. It does exist in Europe between Holland and some of the other European countries, because Holland is really the known world publishing centre, and it does an awful lot of printing and publishing in Holland that it sends back into Belgium, Germany and France and so on, but by and large the other nations couldn't care less.

The Chairman: Mr. Minister, you may be interested to know that while we were discussing this tonight, the Maple Leafs tied the Canadiens, 3-3 in Montreal, and you will have to use your own judgment whether or not this is a draw.

You know, one of the questions I have been asked most frequently by the press, recently, outside of this room is:—"What have you learned so far?", and I really take that question under advisement, and I don't answer it. But one thing I have learned so far is to sense the interest and the attention of my colleagues, and I can assure you that I am able to sense them well enough to know that interest this evening has been intense. I only add, in closing, that we may well take you up on the offer contained in your brief. It's just possible that this Committee will ultimately have either recommendations and/or ideas to present to you, and we will welcome the opportunity of doing so. I know I speak on behalf of the full Committee when I say how grateful we are. We know that Wednesday is a night off for you. We are grateful for your coming and giving the time to prepare the brief and I am sure, that—if I may put words in your mouth—if we wish perhaps not to see you again, but to talk to you again, before our ultimate report—I am sure that you would be available.

Mr. Kierans: I would be delighted, Mr. Senator. May I add just one last word? I think I said a couple of minutes ago or perhaps half an hour ago—one of my colleagues here had handed me a paper, and I said, "I think this is what he is saying here", and then didn't proceed to read the paper.

I am going to read what he said simply so that all of you here, you know, might get some idea of the spirit that animates the post office. I will just read what he said, relevant to a question that Senator Everett had raised:—

"In our cost assessment, pre-sorting and handling is taken into account. The regulations require publications to do a certain amount of handling. This is normal procedure", and this is the spirit of the Post Office that I leave with you. If Malone considers that he can deliver his paper for a few cents, let him do it himself.

The Chairman: Before we adjourn, may I say to the Senators that tomorrow all the meetings are in this room. Tomorrow evening at 8.00 p.m., Maclean-Hunter Business Publications; tomorrow afternoon at 2.30 p.m. Maclean-Hunter Limited; tomorrow morning at 10.30 a.m., Southam Business Publications Limited. I was working backwards for a purpose. The first meeting tomorrow, because we are not sitting on Friday, is 9.30 a.m. when our witness will be Mr. Louis Martin, a freelance journalist and broadcaster from Montreal. Thank you.

The Committee adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

Second Session—Twenty-eighth Parliament

1969-70

THE SENATE OF CANADA

PROCEEDINGS

OF THE
SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE

ON

MASS MEDIA

The Honourable KEITH DAVEY, Chairman

No. 19

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1970

WITNESSES:

Southam Business Publications Limited: Mr. James A. Daly, Director and Vice-Chairman of the Board; Mr. Aubrey Joel, President and Managing Director; Mr. Don Quick, Editor, Engineering and Contract Record; Mr. Tom Davey, Editor, Water and Pollution Control.

Maclean-Hunter Limited: Mr. Donald G. Campbell, Executive Vice-President, Broadcasting and Finance; Mr. J. Lindley Craig, Executive Vice-President, Business Publications; Mr. Ronald A. McEachern, Executive Vice-President, Consumer Magazines; Mr. Gordon J. Rungay, Magazine Circulation Division; Mr. Lloyd M. Hodgkinson, Director.

Business Publications Division, Maclean-Hunter Limited: Mr. J. Lindley Craig, Executive Vice-President, Business Publications Division; Mr. George W. Gilmour, Vice-President, Business Publications Division; Mr. John Downey, Manager and Editor of Home Goods Retailing; Mr. C. Frank Turner, Manager of the Editorial and Arts Services.

MEMBERS OF THE
SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA

The Honourable Keith Davey, Chairman

The Honourable L. P. Beaubien, Deputy Chairman

Beaubien
Bourque
Davey
Everett
Hays

Langlois
Macdonald (Cape Breton)
McElman
Petten
Phillips (Prince)

Prowse
Quart
Smith
Sparrow
Welch

(15 members)

Quorum 5

ORDERS OF REFERENCE

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Wednesday, October 29th, 1969.

With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator Davey moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lang:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to consider and report upon the ownership and control of the major means of mass public communication in Canada, in particular, and without restricting the generality of the foregoing, to examine and report upon the extent and nature of their impact and influence on the Canadian public, to be known as the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media;

That the Committee have power to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry;

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have power to sit during adjournments of the Senate and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation to this Special Committee from 9th to 18th December, 1969, both inclusive, and the Committee have power to sit during sittings of the Senate for that period;

That the papers and evidence received and taken on the subject in the preceding session be referred to the Committee; and

That the Committee be composed of the Honourable Senators Beaubien, Davey, Everett, Giguère, Hays, Irvine, Langlois, Macdonald (Cape Breton), McElman, Petten, Prowse, Sparrow, Urquhart, White and Willis.

After debate, and—

The question being put on the motion, it was—
Resolved in the affirmative.

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Thursday, November 6th, 1969.

With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Smith:

That the names of the Honourable Senators Giguère and Urquhart be removed from the list of Senators serving on the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media; and

That the names of the Honourable Senators Bourque, Smith and Welch be added to the list of Senators serving on the said Special Committee.

The question being put on the motion, it was—

Resolved in the affirmative.

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Friday, December 19th, 1969.

With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Langlois:

That the names of the Honourable Senators Bélisle and Phillips (Prince) be substituted for those of the Honourable Senators Welch and White on the list of Senators serving on the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media.

The question being put on the motion, it was—

Resolved in the affirmative.

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Tuesday, February 3, 1970.

With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Langlois:

That Rule 76 (4) be suspended in relation to the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media from 10th to 19th February, 1970, both inclusive, and that the Committee have power to sit during sittings of the Senate for that period.

After debate, and—

The question being put on the motion, it was—

Resolved in the affirmative.

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Thursday, February 5, 1970.

With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Haig:

That the names of the Honourable Senators Quart and Welch be substituted for those of the Honourable Senators Bélisle and Willis on the list of Senators serving on the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media.

The question being put on the motion, it was—

Resolved in the affirmative.

ROBERT FORTIER,
Clerk of the Senate.

MINUTES OF PROCEEDINGS

THURSDAY, February 12, 1970
(19)

Pursuant to adjournment and notice the Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 10.30 a.m.

Present: The Honourable Senators: Davey (Chairman), Beaubien, Everett, Langlois, Macdonald (Cape Breton), Petten, Smith and Sparrow. (8)

In attendance: Miss Marianne Barrie, Director and Administrator; Mr. Borden Spears, Executive Consultant; Mr. Yves Fortier, Counsel.

The following witnesses were heard:

Mr. James A. Daly, Director and Vice-Chairman of the Board, Southam Business Publications Limited;

Mr. Aubrey Joel, President and Managing Director, Southam Business Publications Limited;

Mr. Don Quick, Editor, Engineering and Contract Record;

Mr. Tom Davey, Editor, Water and Pollution Control.

At 12.45 p.m. the Committee adjourned to 2.30 p.m.

At 2.30 p.m. the Committee resumed.

Present: The Honourable Senators: Davey (Chairman), Everett, Langlois, Petten, Smith and Sparrow. (6)

In attendance: Miss Marianne Barrie, Director and Administrator; Mr. Borden Spears, Executive Consultant; Mr. Yves Fortier, Counsel.

The following witnesses, representing Maclean-Hunter Limited, were heard:

Mr. Donald G. Campbell, Executive Vice-President, Broadcasting and Finance;

Mr. J. Lindley Craig, Executive Vice-President, Business Publications;

Mr. Ronald A. McEachern, Executive Vice-President, Consumer Magazines;

Mr. Gordon J. Rumgay, Manager, Magazine Circulation Division;

Mr. Lloyd M. Hodgkinson, Director.

At 5.15 p.m. the Committee adjourned to 8.00 p.m.

At 8.00 p.m. the Committee resumed.

Present: The Honourable Senators: Davey (Chairman), Langlois, Macnold (Cape Breton), Petten and Sparrow. (5)

In attendance: Miss Marianne Barrie, Director and Administrator; Mr. Borden Spears, Executive Consultant; Mr. Yves Fortier, Counsel.

The following witnesses, representing Business Publications Division, Maclean-Hunter Limited, were heard:

Mr. J. Lindley Craig, Executive Vice-President, Business Publications Division;

Mr. George W. Gilmour, Vice-President, Business Publications Division;

Mr. John Downey, Manager and Editor of Home Goods Retailing;

Mr. C. Frank Turner, Manager of the Editorial and Arts Services.

At 10.10 p.m. the Committee adjourned to Tuesday, February 17, 1970, at 10.00 a.m.

ATTEST.

Denis Bouffard,
Clerk of the Committee.

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Thursday, February 12, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 10.30 a.m.

Senator Keith Davey (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, if I may call this meeting to order.

I perhaps first of all should put on the record, before introducing the witnesses for this morning, a telegram which Mr. Spears received, although he may not have seen it yet. It is from Louis Martin:

"Dear Sirs,

Sorry cannot be present this morning. Could not leave Montreal because of storm."

So on behalf of Mr. Martin I apologize to the Senators and others who have been here.

Now, we continue our study today of the business press. We will be hearing this evening from Maclean-Hunter Business Publications Limited. This afternoon we will be hearing from Maclean-Hunter Limited and now from Southam Business Publications Limited.

Perhaps I could introduce the people who are with me.

On my immediate right is Mr. James Daly, who is Chairman of the Board for Southam Business Publications Limited.

On my immediate left is Mr. Aubrey Joel, whom I am sure some Senators will remember from yesterday. Mr. Joel is the president and managing director of Southam Business Publications Limited.

Mr. Joel has also brought with him, in case Senators wish to direct questions, two representative editors. On the extreme left is Mr. Don Quick who is the editor of Southam Business Publication's Engineering & Construction Record.

On my extreme right is Mr. Tom Davey, whose name is spelled as is mine. To his relief, I am sure, we are no relation.

Mr. Davey, your publication is...

Mr. Tom Davey, Editor, Southam Business Publications Limited: Water & Pollution Control.

The Chairman: So we are very grateful to you, Mr. Daly, for bringing editors as well.

Now, in compliance with our request, we did receive the brief you were kind enough to prepare. We received it as requested three weeks in advance. It has been circulated to the Senators. It has been presumably studied by them and I am now able to offer you as much as 15 minutes—you need not feel you must use all of that time, but certainly it is available—to expand upon your brief, explain it, amplify it or say anything else which may be on your mind. Then we will turn to the Senators whose questions will deal with the written brief and your oral statement and perhaps other things which may be on their minds.

Mr. James A. Daly, Vice-Chairman of the Board, Southam Business Publications Limited: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Honourable Senators, we are happy to have the opportunity to appear before your Committee and we intend to deal very briefly with the problems that we have discussed in the brief, amplify one or two points and to answer your questions as fully and as frankly as possible.

In discussions with your Chairman, he has indicated to me that one of your prime interests is in our relation with our parent company and we shall go into that on whatever detail you wish.

I think I am particularly qualified to speak in that area since I was with Hugh C. MacLean Publications and I was president of the company at the time the company was acquired by Southam Press and up until last September, I served in that capacity and know quite well what our relationship has been as a wholly-owned subsidiary of the parent company.

Also I noted yesterday that you were particularly interested in the question of editorial background. I started with the company as an editor and know what the situation is from the editorial side of the desk as well as from the management side.

With respect to present day editorial conditions, we have two of our senior editors with us who will be happy to answer any questions and Mr. Joel can speak on present day operating conditions and speak with full qualification.

We do publish business magazines as our primary job but we have gone into many other areas of communications, some of which may not be of concern to your Committee and some of which may be. These include services such as daily building reports published in French and English from Montreal; they are published daily also in Winnipeg, Calgary and Edmonton; statistical surveys such as Canada Data, based upon those reports; direct mail services; and English-French technical translation services. Trade shows are also an increasingly important aspect of our operations.

We publish—and this question was directed yesterday to the Association—not upon a monthly basis only. Some of our publications, the Daily Oil Bulletin in Calgary, are daily. Our building reports are daily. Some of our publications are weekly, such as the Journal of Commerce in Vancouver. Some are semi-monthly, some are monthly or bi-monthly. We publish a number of annuals, 15 of those to be precise; so frequency of communication in the business press depends upon the area to be served.

Now, the history of our company, as I say, goes back to the very beginning. We were coming up the steps here this morning and I was reminded that there was a picture of a delegate to the first convention of the Canadian Electrical Association held on the steps of this building in 1901, and that association was organized in the offices of our publication, Electrical News and Engineering.

Several of our publications in the lumber and construction field go back 20 and 30 years before that. Then many of our publications have been established since World War II, a greater specialization occurred in the Canadian industries and professions.

We have acquired publications by purchase. We have started them from scratch. Many avenues have been pursued. The publications have one thing in common that really describes all business publications.

While we are specialist publications, that is also true of photographic and boating publications and so on. Our specialized publications have in fact the common factor that they concern the reader's ways and means of earning a livelihood whether he is a grocer, an architect, a professional engineer or what-not.

I have outlined in the brief—I will not go into it in detail here—our relationship as a wholly-owned subsidiary of Southam Press. We have our own Board of Directors and named them for you as well as our own group of officers. I think you will be interested to know the majority of those officers, considering your questions of yesterday, come from the editorial side of the business to management rather than from the advertising side.

I would comment briefly on our degree of operating autonomy. We have had, from an editorial point of view, complete operating autonomy.

When we have dealt with controversial issues such as the Come-By-Chance refinery in Newfoundland or the Columbia River Treaty—in both instances, our publication published the first articles which led to a great deal of discussion on those two subjects in the general press and in Parliament—and when complaints about our attitude have been directed to the head office of Southam Press, they have invariably been referred to us as operating management for what action we see fit.

In the period we have been associated with Southam Press, first of all as a majority-owned subsidiary and then subsequently as a wholly-owned subsidiary, we have never received any indication from Southam that we should treat a matter in any one way editorially, pro or con.

From an operating point of view our position is relatively simple. We extend the same editorial independence to our editors, trying to choose competent people, well-versed in their field and then give them the right to speak.

Obviously we cannot speak in 40 different areas from a central point of view; we give them the right to speak on the controversial subjects in their fields, encourage them to secure authoritative opinions and when there is a difference of opinion, encourage them to publish both opinions.

When we pull a blooper, we publish a retraction. When an advertiser tries to exert pressure though and we feel we are in the right, we do not publish any retractions for that reason. There have been occasions when an advertisement has been threatened to be withdrawn or has been withdrawn for these reasons. But these are becoming fewer as the years go by. More advertisers are becoming more sophisticated. They have a higher regard for the quality of business press and they are becoming sophisticated to the point they know what they are buying is not a puff in the editorial pages but readership of people who may buy their goods or services.

There is one area I would like to touch on particularly which I touched on briefly in my brief. This will only take a couple of minutes and that is the postal situation, especially in view of Mr. Kierans' remarks of last night.

The Chairman: Were you here for those remarks?

Mr. Daly: No. I read them this morning. I read the report of the question period also but I am going from his written remarks.

The Chairman: By all means.

Mr. Daly: We quite sympathize with Mr. Kierans' problem and his desires, which are in accord with the recommendations of the Massco Commission, to make the Post Office self-sufficient body.

However, it has inequities which disturb us in the business publication field. Some of them date before Mr. Kierans' time and some are the result of his change of regulations.

First of all, the total increase, which cost our company in excess of $300,000 last year in increased postal costs, was assessed on the business publications in one fell swoop. The newspapers had a three stage introduction to

Secondly, we are paying at the regulatory rate whereas Time, Reader's Digest, Daily Commercial News, all types of U.S. owned publications, not bona fide Canadian publications, are paying at the lower second-class statutory rate.

Now, it costs no more for Mr. Kierans to transport a copy of the Canadian Metal Working Production than it does for a copy of Time Magazine. It should be no concern of the Post Office whether a publication is paid for by a subscriber or whether it is qualified circulation.

The paid-for publications, many of them, without being specific in this regard, have dubious methods to maintain paid circulation in some cases.

In our case, and in the case of other business publication companies, you cannot subscribe to one of our publications, such as the Canadian Architect—and I am sure the same is true of other companies who appeared before you—unless you are qualified to receive it, unless you are an architect, interior designer, draughtsman or student of architecture and so on.

The other inequity Mr. Kierans has taken steps to correct—we have been pressing him for a couple of years on this now—is the $7½ million which he has been dumping into the accounts for second-class mail for the carriage of U.S. publications and the so-called mail in Canada, publications such as Life and so on.

In his statement last night he said he was taking that out of the second-class accounts and that is all to the good.

The next stage there, of course, is to get a balance with the United States and I understand from a senior official in the Post Office that they have reached an agreement with the United States and other countries that will come about in the next 12 months and there will be applied to second-class mail of that nature some balance such as is now done with 4th class parcel post mail. So that will be all to the good. That will clear that much out of the way.

Other than that, sir, I really have not anything else to add. I made notes yesterday of things to discuss like advertising, editorial ratios and so on, compensation of the business press and this, no doubt, will come up in the questions.

The Chairman: It may come up in the questions. I thank you very much. The only thing I would like to add to what I have said earlier, Mr. Daly, is if you wish to direct any of the questions that are put to you to any of your colleagues, by all means feel free to do so.

Mr. Daly: I will do that, sir, and one word I would add. You asked the question yesterday. I was going to say I would explain my own editorial background.

My counterpart at Maclean-Hunter for many years, when I was president of Southam Business Publications, was Mr. Floyd Chalmers, who is now chairman of their board, and that is what happens to two old editors anyway.

The Chairman: No comment at all! I think Senator Smith was going to begin the questioning this morning.

Senator Smith: Mr. Chairman, I think it is easily understood that there will likely be somewhat of an overlap of the areas of questioning because we have had a couple of cracks at this subject yesterday and another one today. There are some general questions that I would like to have your comments on.

Perhaps the first subject I might touch on is the apparent difference of opinion, the conflict of opinion, there is between your views, the views of Southam Business Publications, with the views in the brief which were given to us yesterday on the subject of the acceptance, and in fact perhaps the welcoming, of material sent to the business publications, in general, by public relations people.

Your brief this morning indicates that your opinion of it is that it is "superficial"—that is a quote. Can you satisfy the conflict that there may be between the organization of editors and your views on that particular matter, because I might say your views coincide pretty well with the views I have heard expressed by the daily newspaper industry.

Mr. Daly: Well, what I am saying, of course, is the opinion of our house and particularly my own opinion, and experience as an editor. Much of what is ground out by the public relations organizations is superficial, particularly for our highly technical publications. They obviously have not got qualified people on staff that can talk in the same language as an electrical engineer or architect or whatever. Some of it is useful. Most of it requires editing, re-writing and follow-up to get sufficient information to be of interest to the reader.

Our organization, the Canadian Business Press and Business Press, Editors' Association to which we belong, and support their general objectives, contain many conflicting points of view.

We often differ on things and there may be in some cases, in such a brief as yesterday, a tendency to express the lowest common denominator; but that is my individual opinion of much of the press released which we receive.

Senator Smith: That is good enough, Mr. Daly.

I would like to ask you perhaps more than one question on the subject of the threat—I think that was the word that was used by one of the witnesses yesterday—of the data retrieval systems which are now being organized on this continent.

Do you feel that is a rather important threat to your own company?

Mr. Daly: Yes. It is an important threat to the business magazine publishers and so is the effect of copying machines.

Senator Smith: Yes.

Mr. Daly: These electronic and more sophisticated devices are causing a large company to take material from a magazine and photostat it, circulate it around and so on and the information retrieval things can conceivably be done the same way.

Take our Canada Data series for example—the construction volume costs and so on. We sell the information and we sell it computerized. You can either have it on punched cards or magnetic tape or whatever you wish.

There is nothing to stop someone from taking our information and feeding it through several of their sub-agencies, libraries or whatever, under the present laws.

Now, there is an investigation, I believe with a commission looking into this question in the printing industry and publishing industry and so on. It is a question of copy-right and what can be done to offset some of these things.

Senator Smith: That is, insofar as the copy right part is concerned?

Mr. Daly: Yes.

Senator Smith: That is one area. The other area is the threat of direct competition for information which you may have to face when this new technology becomes more generally used.

Mr. Daly: Personally, I do not see it in the next generation because the cost of programming that information in specialized areas, such as highway engineering or something else, would be much higher, in my opinion, than the cost of running an adequate, useful, editorial programme.

Senator Smith: What about this—I suppose it is more than proposed, it is now being organized—Construction Data Services under the auspices of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Is that going to be embarrassing to your volume of business? I was thinking about the daily reports which you have been putting out for some years.

Mr. Daly: Well, we think it is an area that here is no need for government to go into. If industry wants it, private industry can provide it, and if industry wants it, they are willing to pay for it.

However, for many years the Dominion Government—if that is still the correct expression—carried on a service similar to ours, but our service was available at the end of each month. Theirs was always a year late, so if they operate the same way as they have done in the past, it would not be a threat to us.

In fact, government departments subscribe to our service, federal departments and provincial departments.

Senator Smith: Has the business press made representations to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce on this particular subject?

Mr. Daly: I do not know whether there has been direct representation or not.

Mr. Aubrey Joel, President and Managing Director of Southam Business Publications Ltd.: Yes, there has, Senator. I have visited the Department of Commerce on this subject in connection with their announcement of their projected BEAM programme—"Beam" standing for building, equipment, accessories and materials—which has several different facets to it. Naturally, we are very keenly interested in whether it is going to be developed in that respect and to offer the Department our co-operation with the knowledge and know-how that we have and that we have accumulated over the years in dissemination of data in the construction industry and in the methods by which the various components in the construction industry require data to be transmitted to them; that is architects, contractors, and building material manufacturers and so forth.

There is, I believe, in Edmonton, the first announcement of the kick-off, if you can call it that, of the BEAM programme being made yesterday or today. Our representatives are in attendance at that Conference and are staying in very close liaison with the Department on the development of the BEAM programme.

I suppose none of us can say, including the Department, just what the success may be of that.

The Chairman: Senator Beaubien had a supplemental question.

Senator Beaubien: No, this is on one thing Mr. Daly said.

Mr. Daly, you said that the change in the postal rates is costing you at the rate of $300,000 a year.

Mr. Daly: Extra.

Senator Beaubien: Now, if you could enjoy the same rate as Time Magazine, what difference would that make to your extra costs? Would it reduce it immensely?

Mr. Daly: I think it would cut it in half because you would have to take the cost of the weight of each publication because they are enjoying a poundage rate. There is a minimum two cent rate in any event, so I think, just as a rough estimate, it would cut it in half, but I would have to ask our accounting people to get an estimate.

But the other thing that we think is this, the post office people have told us in numerous visits to Ottawa over the past years, that the cost of handling a publication is 4.6 cents. That was 18 to 24 months ago, so let us say it is 5 cents now with the increases in wages and so on.

Our average publication, at least in our House—the others will speak for themselves—pays more than 5 cents in any event because they are thick enough to pay above that rate. So therefore we feel that we are paying our own way.

If there is this deficit with second-class mail, then it must be occurring from other sources, thin publications or the carrying of U.S. publications and so on, and that figure was quoted in the P.S. Ross study which Mr. Kierans quoted last night.

Senator Smith: The ordinary layman, Mr. Daly, does not understand—at least I certainly do not understand. Time is printed here. Why is there a difference at all in the cost? Is it because it weighs less? Is it a different rate or a different classification you are under?

Mr. Daly: A different classification because they give the so-called paid publications and the so-called Canadian editions of Time a rate lower than the rate of the qualified circulation publications.

This has been a traditional decision in the Post Office for which we see no reason to continue.

Senator Everett: You are not suggesting that you are qualified circulation in many of your magazines, are you?

Mr. Daly: Yes. We are qualified.

Senator Everett: In every case?

Mr. Daly: Not in every case but in most cases. We also have a proportion of paid circulation.

Senator Everett: I would have thought that you have been put into the regulatory rate more because you are not a general interest magazine.

Mr. Daly: No. If you are specialized and paid, you still get the low rate.

Mr. Fortier: If you go over 50 per cent?

Mr. Daly: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Of the market?

Mr. Daly: Right.

Senator Everett: You don't go over the 50 per cent mark?

Mr. Daly: Well, we do in some, like the Journal of Commerce.

Mr. Fortier: Very few of them?

Mr. Daly: Yes, very few.

Mr. Fortier: Is this the only discriminatory aspect of that particular side of the postal increase—that is qualified versus paid—that you are complaining of today?

Mr. Daly: Yes. We think we are paying our way though.

Senator Smith: Maybe I can get back.

The Chairman: We will return to postal rates.

Senator Smith: There is another small area on this data retrieval that occurred to me when I was listening to the discussion on postal rates. From what I have learned from various sources, the medical profession and the legal profession, to give you two examples, have pretty well agreed that their future ability to practice with a full knowledge of all the information there is, information which is growing so rapidly from day to day, depends on a large amount of help from some kind of data retrieval system and that leads me to this question.

Do you think the time will come when the Southam Business Publications might have to think pretty seriously about getting into that kind of business, in order to have the data retrieval available for subscribers who are in the contracting business or in engineering or architect we or whatever these branches may be, that form a large part of your business?

Mr. Daly: Yes sir, I do and we are. We are already into it up to our ears with the contracting field.

Major companies, like cement companies and so on, subscribe and take our material either on punch cards or magnetic tape in exactly that way and they retrieve last year's volume against this year's volume; last year's costs and this sort of thing.

In the medical and legal field, I can't answer for those, but obviously they would be among the first fields that such a retrieval bank would be most useful for.

In some areas when you get down to shop retailing and so on, I doubt if they are going to be able to afford this sort of luxury but we do agree this will come and is coming and is here now in some areas, and will become increasingly important. Because Southam are interested in the total communication field they are interested in this and will be increasingly interested in it, I am sure.

Senator Smith: Well, you are such a large and very progressive company, that is the kind of answer I actually expected.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to turn to something else. It was the subject of some discussion yesterday and at various times and that is with regard to the overflow of American business publications into this country. I suppose it is natural for me to assume that that has a rather substantial effect on your business in general, does it?

Mr. Daly: It does. It is a unique situation where you have two countries speaking almost the same language, side by side, and one is the greatest industrial giant in the world.

Senator Smith: As was pointed out, the growth of the overflow has been slowed down dramatically since the adoption of one of the recommendations of the O'Leary Commission with regard to the income tax technique. Is there anything else that your company might like to see done to reduce the unfair competition from the imported business magazines?

Mr. Daly: Well, I would like to see them paying their own freight, of course.

Senator Smith: Apart from the postal question, because we are familiar with that...

Mr. Daly: The other suggestion that was made yesterday, of considering a licence for magazines coming into Canada, I do not agree with that at first thought. That seems to me a restriction on the freedom of the press.

It is a difficult question to answer. I would not want to restrict the Canadian architect from getting the Italian Magazine domus or whatever, or the medical man from getting the best medical magazines he can get, whether they came from the USSR or whether they came from the United States.

I think this is something we have to live with. Our basic answer is to give our magazines a unique Canadian quality and editorial excellence so that they will at least be the first magazines that the Canadian professional will read.

Mr. Fortier: I have a supplementary, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Well then, what do you complain about when we are talking of the overflow of the U.S. business magazines?

Mr. Daly: Well, Mr. Fortier, I complain mainly of the fact that they are getting a free ride from the postal point of view and that was being assessed against us as if we were causing this deficit.

Mr. Fortier: Once we leave that aside, because that is in the process of being remedied—at least to a certain extent it is—what else do you complain about?

Mr. Daly: Well, I cannot complain about anything with respect to the freer exchange of information and the technical significance of that. I think that is a world wide necessity.

Mr. Fortier: If the Canadian reader did not have access to any of the Canadian business publications, would he get all the information which he requires from the United States counterparts which overflow into Canada?

Mr. Daly: No, he would get very little of it. For example, I have mentioned two or three specific examples. There is very little Canadian news in the American publications. It has to be something that is really big or extraordinary as most of the American technical publications do not have correspondents or bureaux here at all.

I refer to the winter concrete being poured on a dam in northern Quebec. Now, that would not be referred to in the American Concrete Engineering magazines but it could very well be of use to a contractor in the Yukon who gets it in the Canadian magazines.

These examples can be multiplied 100 per cent.

Mr. Fortier: At what level do you consider that there is the most acute competition between your magazines and the American ones.

Mr. Daly: Well, it varies from industry to industry. In the oil industry or the petroleum industry the competition is acute. Maclean-Hunter has a magazine and we have a magazine but the overflow circulation of the great thick American magazines is extreme.

In some industries it is not so important. In the electrical-engineering industry it is not so important because we have different standards and so on.

Mr. Fortier: Would you agree that where there is acute competition from U.S. magazines, it forces the Canadian companies to publish better magazines?

Mr. Daly: Well, we try to achieve excellence in each magazine but competition is always a stimulant.

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Daly: ... whether it comes from the United States or from Maclean-Hunter.

Mr. Fortier: Right. We will be talking about competition with Maclean-Hunter later on but right now I am interested in competition from the U.S. magazines. You do agree it is a factor, where there is this acute competition—where you strive for more excellence.

Mr. Daly: Right.

Mr. Fortier: More excellent excellence, so to speak?

Mr. Daly: And we strive in other ways. The question of advertising, for example. There is a tendency on the part of some of the American advertising agencies to believe that—in fact the people who are selling advertising for some of these magazines in the States tell everybody that—the overflow in Canada will look after that. You do not have to bother advertising in Canada.

Well, we have tried to dispel that.

Mr. Fortier: How successful have you been?

Mr. Daly: With readership service, I think we are reasonably successful. This is one thing that we have in common, that we do co-operate with other publishers either through the Canadian Business Press or its parallel programmes and so on and I think we are reasonably successful.

However, it is a constant fight.

Mr. Joel: May I add something?

The Chairman: Yes, Mr. Joel?

Mr. Joel: If I may, Mr. chairman, that question of Mr. Fortier's has not yet produced, except in a passing way, the fact that Canadian publications do not really compete with United States publications or any other form of publications in the sense of each trying for excellence, but compete in quite a different way and that is that they represent a purely Canadian point of view and there are some very outstanding examples of this.

In our company there was an occasion on the Columbia River Treaty, for example, to which Mr. Daly did refer in passing, in which the editorial position taken was very largely anti-United States. Obviously this was not going to be covered editorially or represented in the United States magazines but it was important—our editors felt—for that magazine to put this point of view forward for their readers and for Parliament and for the profession in general.

It was an important contribution and this I cite as an example because it is the sort of thing that is happening constantly in Canadian business publications. So it is not merely a matter of competition per se, but of representing the Canadian point of view.

Mr. Fortier: The question comes to mind on that point—

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Fortier, I do not want you to open up an entire line of questioning. We are still trespassing on Senator Smith's time.

Senator Smith: Let him finish this phase.

The Chairman: All right.

Mr. Fortier: I am still trying to establish the effect of the overflow. Would it be possible for a U.S. trade business publication to do what Time Magazine has done, to present news about Canadian business or Canadian industry from the Canadian point of view that is written by Canadian editors?

Have they ever attempted to do that in any one of the publications, with which you are familiar?

Mr. Daly: Well, it would not be possible, as I understand the present legislation. The present ones have been exempted from it—Time, Reader's Digest, Daily Commercial News and Modern Medicine of Canada—because they were in existence before.

Mr. Fortier: I am not assuming they are trying to avail themselves of the tax provision of the Income Tax Act. I am just asking whether or not this has ever been attempted. In other words have they attempted to compete with you along the lines that Mr. Joel had suggested—Canadian news written by Canadians?

Mr. Daly: There have been specific attempts in various small fields over the years to wrap four pages of Canadian news around the bulk of the American editorial of it and call it a Canadian edition but they have died out in the business magazine field. There have been half a dozen or so I can recall over 20 years.

Mr. Fortier: There are none in existence today?

Mr. Daly: Not to my knowledge at the moment, at least none that are competitive with us. We are keeping our sights on that more than anything else. There may be some in other fields.

Senator Smith: Mr. Chairman...

Mr. Daly: Excuse me. I guess MD of Canada is another one that does it. It is still publishing, I think.

Our friends from Maclean-Hunter can tell you more about that because they are competitive with The Medical Post, but I think here is one that is still going.

Senator Smith: If we are through with the verflow...

The Chairman: I have one question myself.

Senator Smith: I thought that was the time to ask a question on overflow.

The Chairman: May I ask a supplementary question?

Senator Smith: Yes.

The Chairman: I put it to you, Mr. Daly, whether you want to answer this in the capacity in which you are here or whether you wish to simply answer it as a private individual, or a Canadian citizen, do you think—I am going to use your own words, the so-called Canadian edition of Time is a healthy thing for the Canadian consumer magazine industry?

Mr. Daly: I know there is concern in this regard among Canadian magazine publishers, that if the edition of Time were to be removed from the scene, Canadian magazines might be harmed because the advertisers and agencies would not be as inclined to the total magazine picture. Some who have been vociferous opponents of Time and Reader's Digest have now learned to live with them to a certain degree.

I believe they have a magazine promotion bureau which embraces both Canadian and United States owned magazines but I am not the specialist in the consumer magazine field.

Insofar as I am concerned, I would like to see Time removed from the Canadian scene because I would guess that up to a quarter of its advertising revenue should be in the business press.

Time has corporate campaigns, even campaigns for water treatment in the pulp and paper industry which maybe 35 readers of Time would be interested in, whereas there are good papers, not only in our house but others, that can carry these advertisements.

The Chairman: Do those advertisers not use the business press as well?

Mr. Daly: Some use both. Some succumb to the blandishments of Time.

Mr. Fortier: Supplementary?

The Chairman: How much of this Time-captured advertising, Mr. Daly, do you really believe would be channelled to Canadian business publications if Time was removed from the scene, as it presently exists?

Mr. Daly: That is a very difficult question to answer because it is based on surmise of the future, but if Time were removed from the scene, there would be approximately $1,000,000 of advertising space that we might secure, if we could persuade the advertisers that we had the right vehicle for it.

I do not know though. Some of it will be dissipated into other media.

Mr. Fortier: This hypothetical question was enquired into early in the 1960's. As you probably know, by and large, it was found that a very small portion of the advertising now going to Time and Reader's Digest would find its way to Canadian magazines.

Mr. Daly: At least we would have a chance. I think Senator O'Leary went into this and I have not got the Commission report before me, but you would have to up-date his estimates by the difference in the advertising rates that have taken place since.

Mr. Fortier: Your company has never made a study of the flow of advertising, if any, that they eventually erode.

Mr. Daly: Not statistically, but we keep tear sheets and lists of their advertisers and look at the sort of thing we might hope to get. In fact we do hope to get some of it in the Executive Magazine or Financial Times and so on by going and persuading the advertisers that we have got a better medium.

It is a continuing competitive struggle and if they were not here, we may have a better chance.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier, I have just one more question, and then perhaps we can return to you.

Is this problem of Time capturing advertising which might otherwise go into the business press, more of a problem in 1970 than it was in 1965 or is it an on-going problem?

Mr. Daly: It is an on-going problem and I think that it is just as bad as it was and it is a problem in Canada particularly. It does not happen in the United States very much because they cannot offer the same specialized audience that they can here.

Senator Smith: Mr. Chairman, my attention was directed to paragraph 30 in the brief in which it was stated:

"We welcome conflicting opinions, seek them out and publish them."

In which way do you try to seek them out? Do you have that many of your staff that you can try to stir up and direct questions and see whether that viewpoint should be balanced in your particular publication?

Mr. Daly: I think this is a question, sir, that might be directed to Mr. Quick. He is right on the firing line with this sort of thing all the time.

Mr. Donald Quick, Editor, Engineering and Contract Records: I do not think it is necessarily a matter of numbers as to how you obtain differing opinions but it is an essential part of an editor's job to present both points of view.

He cannot possibly put a situation to a readership in an industry unless he knows a great number of points of view. I am not sure I am answering your question specifically.

Senator Smith: Just let me ask you a question before you go any further. What do you mean by "points of view"—engineering points of view or public policy points of view? In which area?

Mr. Quick: Well, it could be either. It could be in management techniques; it could be in management policies; it could be a question concerning the economy of the industry vis-à-vis the economy of the nation.

It is essential to interview, by various means, a great number of people to obtain a true understanding of the situation.

Senator Smith: This leads me to another question. There was mention made in paragraph 28 about the better publications participating in leadership of their industry and it was pointed out that two of the publications featured articles on the Come-By-Chance refinery situation.

Was there no conflicting opinion on that particular thing? It seems to me by the very nature of it, it had a lot of conflict involved.

Mr. Quick: I am not sure how to answer your question, Senator, specifically. I was not personally involved in that particular story.

With regard to the leadership of an editor or his magazine within a field, it is my experience that most editors endeavour to bury themselves within their field to understand the various functions of people in the industry and in many cases participate in industry committees and boards in order to be thoroughly familiar with the methods.

Mr. Daly: May I add something to that?

The Chairman: By all means.

Mr. Daly: The Come-By-Chance thing happened to come to my desk because the people involved, particularly Mr. Shaheen, were quite indignant about the article that we had written.

Senator Smith: What was the man's name again?

Mr. Daly: Mr. Shaheen. Even as a fellow Irishman, I could not agree with him, so the opposite point of view was brought out by publishing his letters in our Canadian Petroleum magazine.

Now, he threatened us with various other penalties. We have not yet had a libel suit actually launched against us.

In the 30 years I have been with the company nobody has yet successfully launched a libel suit against us so we are keeping our fingers crossed.

Senator Smith: Do any of Mr. Shaheen's industries advertise in some of your magazines?

Mr. Daly: It could be, but would not make any difference.

Senator Smith: You have said in your brief that you are under pressures of various kinds. If he happened to be a big advertiser, would you have given him the same answer that you gave him before you wrote it? "We will certainly publish your views but we think our article was right and unless we are proven wrong—". Is that the same answer you would give any advertiser?

Mr. Daly: That's the same answer we would give.

Senator Smith: Do you know of any instances in which any of the business publications have yielded to pressure? If there have been examples, it would be interesting to know.

Mr. Daly: Well, there are no recent examples that I know of, in our house at any rate. There is a grey area where an individual publishing manager or an editor may—his judgment may be swayed either way. The business publication industry has matured tremendously in the past quarter-century.

There was a time when business publications struggling for existence—even in some of the larger houses—would have been accused of this sort of thing. But today, the record of business publication—I will not go along with one hundred per cent credibility, the association brief stated yesterday, but think it is pretty high.

Certainly their standards are higher than even some of the top metropolitan newspapers, where you will see travel advertisements for Barbados with an editorial item beside it very blatantly and so on. They are higher than any other media or as high as any media, as far as I am concerned.

The Chairman: Do you have a travel publication?

Mr. Daly: No, we don't.

The Chairman: Does Maclean-Hunter, do you know?

Mr. Daly: Yes.

The Chairman: That is a good question for this afternoon.

Senator Smith: One of the statements that so interests me is the fact that your editorial people have opportunities to travel quite freely and examine situations on the spot. Do they always pay your expenses or are they the guests of some industries or some other associations?

Mr. Daly: It is Southam policy throughout the organization and the policy that we inherited from Southam Press, that they pay their own expenses and that they do not have to be obliged therefore to write up something from someone who is paying their expenses and so on. There are some classic instances of this but I will not take up your time.

Senator Smith: I think we have had the same sort of statement from the Southam newspaper group. We have also had some indication that some of the daily newspapers, one in particular in Toronto, I think it was the Toronto Star, said they would never have their travelling editors' expenses paid on a trip to Expo 70 and back.

The Chairman: Were you thinking of any specific daily paper when you made that statement?

Mr. Daly: No, I think it is common daily paper practice. I don't want to name anything. I should not really be saying it as a director of Southam Press but I am only pointing out that it is only recently, for example, in the Globe and Mail that they have put "An Advertising Feature" under Mary Walpole's column. A lot of people thought that it was editorial. They are still carrying ads and adjacent editorial material in the travel section, more or less in proportion to the amount of advertising.

Now, I am not trying to say anything against the daily papers and their practices. I am only saying the trade press standards are as high or higher than any other media in this regard, I think.

Senator Smith: If you or one of your editors was invited to go to the official opening of the Come-By-Chance Refinery, would you pay your own expenses?

Mr. Daly: Yes, definitely.

The Chairman: That was a hypothetical question.

Mr. Daly: That was facetious.

Senator Smith: I would like to ask a couple of questions from the sources of journalistic recruits. I think there has been some indication that the United Kingdom, as it is in other journalistic fields, is a rather important source of recruits. Is that particularly so in your group of business magazines?

Mr. Daly: Yes, it is. I think paragraph 36 deals with this briefly.

It is and it has been—it may be tapering off at the present time but there are a combination of factors—I guess the general desire to emigrate after World War II and the fact that wages were higher in Canada. A considerable number of our editors, I think including the two gentlemen sitting at this table, are both graduates of the United Kingdom trade papers or newspapers.

Senator Smith: Are the people that you can recruit, who would be university graduates, business administration, engineering, chemical or whatever that particular field may be, are they hard to come by in view of the competition there must be from business sources?

Mr. Daly: Very hard to come by because of competition from business and government sources.

A friend of mine in the office of a publishing company was crying yesterday because the Ontario Government had taken two of his editors at $18,500 a year to edit their new Hansard. It's a six-month job. They can write or paint or do whatever they like for the other six months of the year.

Certainly they are hard to come by with those qualifications, especially, when I say thirty or forty of our editorial staff enjoy postgraduate qualifications, engineering, architectural qualifications and so on. The faculties of universities take them away from us. Government takes them away. Industry, public relations take them away. It is a continual battle.

Senator Smith: Would you mind explaining what value this class of people would have to the public relations field? I do not quite get the point of that.

Mr. Daly: Well, not all our editors are very technical people. Some are journalists with daily paper experience and these people can handle public relations assignments. Also in public relations for a specific industry—in our field they may learn a great deal about the forest industry, for example—and someone like Domtar may want a man as a specialist in this field and they will come along and hire him.

Senator Smith: It is not because of a lack of editorial staff that you have had to fold up some of the magazines which you have listed in the appendix here?

Mr. Daly: No.

Senator Smith: What are the main reasons for that? Are you going to blame the Postmaster-General for some of that or not? I notice some of them folded up in 1967 or 1968 so perhaps they would be excluded from that.

Are there others that are folding now since the postal rates have become a little more onerous?

Mr. Daly: The basic reason for folding a magazine is, it is not economically viable and it does not look as if it will be in the next three to five years.

It would be nice to blame Mr. Kierans for everything but it is not true. In some cases his increases were the straw that just pushed it over the edge on the question of whether you continue or not, and another $10,000 or so in postage was the answer you would not.

There have been two or three instances of those, I think, in that list but others—either a mistake in judgment that they could not make the field go or a lack of good management to make the field go but not a lack of editorial personnel.

Senator Smith: Mr. Chairman, I just have one final question then, referring more to my natural-born curiosity. You use an expression which I have not read before let alone heard before.

I ask you what is meant by a "master photographer." You say, "We have one of the few master photographers in Canada." What is one? What does he do for you?

Mr. Daly: He takes photographs. He is a working master photographer but there is a Society of Master Photographers. I believe it is international and I believe there are either eleven or thirteen in Canada and they are elevated to this as they are to a Fellow of the Royal Architectural Institute for outstanding photographic achievement.

The Chairman: Are they commercial people?

Mr. Daly: He is a full-time employee of ours.

The Chairman: Are master photographers commercial?

Mr. Daly: They could be.

The Chairman: They are not necessarily commercial.

Mr. Daly: Karsh is one, I believe, and so on but they can be employees. The point I was trying to make there, a multi-unit house could afford to employ such a man and have him on hand.

He has had several prize-winning photographs in newspapers and so on; that was the point I was trying to make.

The Chairman: Senator Smith, has your picture never been taken by a master photographer?

Senator Smith: That was my final question, but there was one I had in the back of my mind a while ago, and that is this statement in your brief somewhere (I have not got the reference to it) that you have been much more successful due to your financial capacity to take over more magazines and to publish more business press magazines. How far would you go before you would say to yourself, "Enough is enough," before you would get accused of getting into a monopoly situation?

Mr. Daly: Well, I don't know. I think that that is unlikely to happen because in any field that is large enough to support two good business magazines, you will find our friends from University Avenue are in there with both feet and we will try to be in there, too, but monopoly is not on the horizon. But where there is an ailing magazine or an estate problem or something like that and it is a good magazine, we are still interested in purchasing it.

No one has suggested to us yet that we have reached the stage where we are a monopoly.

The Chairman: You said "monopoly is not on the horizon." Would you be concerned if it was?

Mr. Daly: I think it would be a bad thing if there was a monopoly in fields that would support two magazines but I think it is unlikely to happen because someone will start the other magazine.

The Chairman: I will go to Senator Everett and then Senator Sparrow.

Senator Everett: You were talking about, I think, a water treatment campaign.

Mr. Daly: Which, sir?

Senator Everett: A water treatment campaign, did you say?

Mr. Daly: Which might appear in Time magazine.

Senator Everett: Which might appear in Time magazine and would only be read by 35 Time readers.

Mr. Daly: Well, it would be of interest, yes, to the, say, Pulp and Paper Plant.

Senator Everett: The market would be 35 people.

Mr. Daly: To a Canadian Pulp and Paper Plant or something like that.

Senator Everett: Can you tell me why an advertiser would pay Time magazine rates when you say Maclean's can give him a journal that would get at those 35 readers almost assuredly, and I would expect your rates are lower than Time's rates.

Mr. Daly: Our rates are lower. In this case I use an example in an area where we do not have a publication but where National Business and Maclean-Hunter do.

I happen to remember this particular advertisement but our rates are lower and certainly would be a fraction of the Time rate and when you relate the rate to the number of possible buyers, our rates would be even less again.

The Chairman: It might be interesting on this question for the Senators to know—in your answer to Senator Everett's question, you said a "fraction." I appreciate it would vary from publication to publication but what would be the average?

Mr. Daly: Twenty to twenty-five per cent.

The Chairman: Yours would be about a quarter of the Time rates.

Mr. Daly: Yes; and less in the smaller publications.

The cost of producing that would be the same, of course. To be frank with you there are many reasons. One reason is that the agent gets fifteen and two on the Time invoice which is $2,000. They get fifteen and two on ours which is $400.

That is not the primary reason. The primary reason is that they are successful in selling the concept that Time gives them a corporate image also as well as the actual sale of the product.

Possibly the fault is with the advertiser and the agency in the content of the ad they put in there rather than the actual fact of placing the ad in there.

The Chairman: Do you want to say anything Mr. Joel?

Mr. Joel: No, I don't think I do, Mr. Chairman. I think the point is well covered.

The Chairman: Does that satisfy you, Senator Everett?

Senator Everett: Yes, I think so.

Senator Petten: May I have a supplementary?

The Chairman: Yes, Senator Petten.

Senator Petten: When they run these ads in Time, say on water treatment, pollution, or whatever, would not the public interest be served by making the general public aware of this and through this awareness bring pressure on the people that are causing this and maybe rectify it?

Mr. Daly: Yes. That was my point, sir, previously, when I said maybe the fact of the placing of the ad there is not a bad thing in itself. It is the content of the ad.

If they had one on being against pollution, it is like being for motherhood today and so that might serve a public service but when they advertise heavy construction dump trucks in Time, for example, when you have two or three good heavy construction magazines in the country, then I think they are doing the advertiser a disservice when they place their ad there, the same as when they put it in a newspaper or on TV.

Senator Everett: I think you said earlier that you are now reasonably happy with the overflow situation in the light of the fact that the Postmaster General had removed the deficit from the calculation of the deficit under second-class rates.

However, on page 14 of your brief, item 39, you state:

"It is to be hoped that Canadian representatives at the next international postal convention in Tokyo will press for some equalizational procedure (similar to 4th class mail) so that Canada may receive compensation for the flood of heavy U.S. business magazines being carried free in the Canadian mails. The many millions of dollars involved will materially assist in delaying further increases to Canadian business magazines."

I wonder if you could enlarge on that?

Mr. Daly: Yes. I would like to, and also correct that, to a certain extent.

The International Postal Union is having a meeting, I understand, in 1971 but it did have a meeting in the fall of 1969. One of the officials of the Post Office Department told me this morning that they have reached agreement. They were able to persuade the United States and other countries that there should be some such equalization procedure. It has not been publicly announced yet but I am told that it will take effect within the next 12 months and this should mean that Mr. Kierans should get about 7½ million dollars from the United States as compensation—maybe eight million dollars by the time it takes effect.

Mr. Fortier: He did mention that last night in the question period.

Mr. Daly: We have been pressing him to try to take some action but the Americans have opposed it previously; but with the number of independent French companies in Africa now siding with Canada and a few others, the number was sufficient to carry the principle.

Senator Everett: So you are in favour of this action?

Mr. Daly: Yes, by all means.

Senator Everett: In item 40 of your brief you state that Association publications should not be classed as third-class ratepayers, and you consider this as an inequity.

You would in that case be pleading on behalf of a situation in which you yourself are not involved; is that correct?

Mr. Daly: That is correct. In fact, in many cases we compete with Association publications in the hospital field, architectural and engineering fields, and so on, but they are members of our Association and we do feel it is an inequity because they are using the post office here, or Mr. Kierans is, for a punitive exercise.

What should be done—I believe there is some legislation before Congress in the United States to do this—is to charge them the same rates as other publications. We apply the same principle that we did when we talk about Time and Canadian Metalworking Production. It costs the post office the same to carry a publication whether it is published by an Association or Maclean Hunter or Southam or whatever if it is the same weight and size. They should take the Association and make them separate really their profit-making enterprises such as publications—for example, the Canadian Medical Journal, must be a very profitable publication, at least it would be in any private publisher's hands anyway,—their trade shows and so on and tax them as a corporation, the twenty-one or fifty per cent rate, whatever it is.

Mr. Fortier: So they would not really be assisted in the end?

Mr. Daly: They might be penalized in the end, but the equity...

Mr. Fortier: Then you have reduced your generous offer.

The Chairman: I think Mr. Joel wants to add something.

Mr. Joel: It is just a small correction. It is not too important. But Mr. Daly's remark conveys the idea that the Association publications—these Associations are all members of the Canadian Business Press as an association. This, in fact, is not so. I know he did not mean it that way.

He cited the Hospital Association publication and the Architectural Association publication. Both are not members of the Canadian Business Press but we have tried to represent their interest, too, in respect of this discriminatory action.

You might be interested to know, Senator, that the architectural journal of the Royal Architectural Institute of Canada is right now undergoing a traumatic experience in trying to stay alive.

They are one of the publications that has been pushed over the edge by the higher postal rates affecting them, and we have, in spite of the fact they are competitive to us, considered it enlightened self-interest, if you wish, that they stay in business and operating.

This is a magazine that has served the architectural profession for many, many years and is at a severe disadvantage now. They are, in fact, at this moment out of operation. We have offered our offices to help to try to keep them afloat and they have now got a new plan on a new frequency to republish. They are one of the magazines who are not members of the Canadian Business Press but whose interest we identify with.

Senator Everett: That leads me then to this question for perhaps both of you. Mr. Kierans last night stated he was not really happy with the present arbitrary division between the various classes of mails; that he was also cognizant of the fact, dealing with second-class mail, if he raised the rates to a point that the second-class showed no deficit, that he would seriously affect the economics of the industry.

I think that he suggested that while the Post Office would run as a transportation operation, he would like Parliament or the government to determine some sort of second-class mail subsidy and in order to effect this, the government would get together with the publishers to discuss what that subsidy should be and how it should be divided.

As a publisher and the chairman of a large publishing organization, can you tell me if you would be happy with this approach that Mr. Kierans has suggested?

Mr. Daly: Well, I would find a government subsidy to the publishing business distasteful in any form because of the possible effect. Once you get a gift from someone you are obligated to them and to some degree your freedom or independence is impeded.

In actual practice, if Mr. Kierans' figures are all correct, that is what Parliament has been doing by paying him sums of money to pay his deficit each year.

I do not know whether there is a Cabinet decision that the Post Office must become self-supporting, Parliament has been doing this since Confederation.

Our basic contention, however, is that the amount we are paying to transport our magazines—I referred earlier to the fact it is approximately five cents a copy, which is what the Post Office said it would cost them to transport them, is in effect less than what we are paying the Post Office. In other words, we are paying six or seven and as much as nineteen and twenty-three cents a copy and so on.

I think in our own particular case, and I think in the case of Maclean-Hunter—they can speak for themselves on this subject later, I am sure—I think we are paying our own way now and may be paying a little more than our own way. I think this deficit is occurring from small, thin publications from the publication costs he cited, the Winnipeg farm paper and so on.

So our argument is that we are paying our own way. Personally I would not like to see us accept a subsidy. We would like to continue to pay our own way.

Mr. Fortier: How would you deal with the other ones who may be in need of a subsidy?

Mr. Daly: Well, if they are willing to accept a subsidy, I guess that would be their decision.

The Chairman: You said in answer to Senator Everett's question that you found Mr. Kierans' proposal distasteful. Then a sentence later you said that what Mr. Kierans is proposing is what has been done for years anyway. So presumably you find the existing situation distasteful.

Mr. Daly: Yes, because of the inequities.

The Chairman: Yes, but I think you said you found it distasteful, in answer to Senator Everett, not because of the inequities but because some form of subsidies would be distasteful to the press in terms of freedom, presumably.

I think that is the sense in which you said it was distasteful.

Mr. Daly: Yes.

The Chairman: Then you said in the next sentence—I do not want to cross-examine you—that what he proposed to do is what has been happening all these years anyway.

Mr. Daly: Right.

The Chairman: So you must find that distasteful.

Mr. Daly: We do not find it distasteful because we believe we are carrying our own freight right now. Under the present system, the subsidy is actually going to other people.

When he analyzed our magazines individually in many cases he had to admit—at least P.S. Ross analyzed it for the post office—and they had to admit in most cases that we were carrying our own weight.

Senator Everett: Carrying your own weight. At what rate?

Mr. Daly: At the present rate that we are paying.

Senator Everett: That is the regulatory rate.

Mr. Daly: Yes.

Senator Everett: Yet you say that you do not feel you should be on the regulatory rate.

Mr. Daly: No. I think we should have one rate for everybody.

Even if you correct it by bringing Time and Reader's Digest up to the regulatory rate, we have learned to live with this present rate. We do not want to see a further rate increase while other people are being given an actual subsidy.

To go back to what I was saying, under the system which has been in effect, we believe that we are paying our own way or a little more than paying our own way to therefore we do not feel we are receiving a subsidy. But there has been a subsidy for many publications, as he pointed out. He has examples to prove it.

Senator Everett: If I understand you correctly, what you are saying is that you are caught by a statutory second-class rate.

Mr. Daly: So there should be one second-class rate applying to all.

I think I have no illusions. Once a price is increased it stays that way so I have no illusions that we are going to get a lower postage rate but the deficit could be corrected by bringing the so-called paid publications up to the same rate, rather than further penalizing the qualified circulation publications.

What I hope to avoid is a further increase which Mr. Kierans has been making noise about ever since he put the last one in.

Senator Everett: So you are saying everybody ought to be on the regulatory rate?

Mr. Daly: Or one rate.

Mr. Fortier: Be it regulatory or statutory.

Mr. Daly: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: One rate.

Senator Everett: But that one rate should pay the total cost of the class.

Mr. Daly: Well, I do not know about that because I think that in accordance with the recommendations of the O'Leary Commission there is something to be said for giving even free postage to certain types of magazines such as art, literature, and so on.

Senator Everett: And that is what Mr. Kierans is suggesting.

Mr. Daly: Giving free postage?

Senator Everett: No; giving a subsidy.

Mr. Daly: Yes.

Senator Everett: Which you say you find distasteful to certain business magazines.

effect he was saying, I am dissatisfied with the arbitrary divisions that we have created. I would like to fix that up and I would like, if there is going to be a deficit in order to support certain magazines, to have Parliament examine the matter and make a grant and the division of that grant would be discussed with the publishers.

Mr. Daly: Well, as far as our own company is concerned, I think we are paying our way at the present time, more than paying our way, and I do not think we would require a part of the grant. But of the publications which are enjoying second-class mailing privileges, there are many that obviously are not paying their own way.

It would be up to them if they wanted to accept a postal subsidy.

Senator Everett: Thank you.

The Chairman: Is your question a supplementary question, Mr. Fortier? Senator Sparow was waiting patiently.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I think at issue here is the qualified circulation or controlled circulation versus the paid circulation. I would like to hear you on this particular point and that is, the view that has often been expressed, if you pay for something you value it more than if you do not.

In 1967, as you probably well know, the Canadian Circulations Audit Board sent out a questionnaire to its member advertisers, agencies and publication managers to stimulate comments on the paid versus the controlled circulation question.

It was structured, we are informed, in such way that existing prejudices towards qualified circulation could be measured. Now, the participants would be aware of that and felt at paid publication was indeed valued more highly. So my question is this, if paid circulation is valued more highly by the reader, should it not benefit from lower postal rates than one which seeks to blanket a particular area or a particular segment of the population within a particular area?

Mr. Daly: I knew that question would come back to haunt us. I think Mr. Joel had a hand in drafting it.

Mr. Joel: I did, indeed.

The Chairman: Well, why do you not express your opinion, Mr. Daly, and then we will turn to Mr. Joel?

Mr. Daly: My opinion is this simply that, be it as it may, these answers were impressions from advertisers and agencies, their impressions rather than fact.

There are hundreds of surveys of paid and qualified circulation magazines existing in Canada and the United States on readership and they show no significant difference in readership between the magazines except that based on editorial quality.

McGraw-Hill in the United States, a famous advocate of paid circulation for many years, has been swiftly changing over to qualified circulation in the past few years.

Surveys that we have done among Ontario Hydro engineers, for example, showed they did not know whether the Hydro was paying for the magazine or whether they were not paying for it, so I do not think there is any difference. But basically, that is not really a concern of the Post Office, that is a concern of the advertiser. If he wants to prefer a paid magazine let him put his ads in it.

The Post Office pays exactly the same to the letter carrier who is carrying a copy of Time, ostensibly paid, even though it might have been sold by a high-pressure deal, as it does for the Canadian Architect.

Mr. Fortier: Surely it is of concern to the Post Office. If there is a controlled circulation, there are a number of copies that are being carried by the postman which are never read because they are thrown into the wastepaper basket.

Mr. Daly: Well, we are willing to stand up to readership surveys with anyone on the number of copies which are read.

Mr. Fortier: But you would agree this would be of concern to the Post Office?

Mr. Daly: Yes, but if there was such a situation, certainly that would call for postal intervention. I think the quality of the magazines can be determined by other methods than whether they are paid or qualified.

There are readership surveys. There are other companies who are publishing them. We also have an interest in keeping the number of copies down. We keep our postal bills down and our printing bills down and so on.

Mr. Fortier: If you feel as strongly as you do about the inequity of the postal rates as they exist now, why would you not attempt to charge 50 cents to your readers who now receive your publications for free?

Mr. Daly: We do solicit subscriptions within our qualified circulation lists and some of our magazines might be 15 per cent, some might be 25 per cent or 30 per cent paid and so on, but it is not practical in a country as extensive as Canada and with our specialized magazines—maybe with one architect in Orillia and maybe two architects or three architects in another town and so on—to send subscription salesmen around to get them.

Also when you get around to the consumer magazine and so on, you may find that the cost of getting paid circulations to a publisher is as great or greater than his actual revenue from it and that the advertiser is supporting the so-called paid publication just to the same extent as is the qualified publication.

Mr. Fortier: Are you suggesting that your readership would diminish in the event that you sought to make all your qualified circulation magazines paid magazines?

Mr. Daly: No, I am not suggesting the readership would diminish. There might be a 5 per cent or 10 per cent drop in circulation but the cost of securing that circulation in this country would be prohibitive for the average magazine of five or ten thousand copies.

Mr. Fortier: Surely you have a list of those readers to whom the controlled magazines are directed. Would you need to send someone to his door in order to enlist his paid subscription or could you not merely write him a letter and say: "For the following reasons now you will have to pay 50 cents a month or 50 cents every second month"?

Mr. Daly: Mail solicitations result in a certain percentage—this is what we are using now, as a matter of fact—but there is always a percentage that does not reply or they are working for the government department or something like that, perhaps a water control plant. They think that the municipality should buy it, so you have got to go and persuade the purchasing agent and so on.

I do not think by mail alone, you would get sufficient solicitation. As I say, the big American publishing houses now have qualified circulation. Maclean-Hunter can give you something on this because they have publications in both areas. They can tell you more about it than I can, but we, at one time, had several publications that were paid and we gradually converted them to qualified because of the increasing cost of getting the subscriptions, and the same is true of other business publishers in Canada.

With the exception of the Financial Post and a handful of others, now all the publications are qualified.

Mr. Fortier: That has been the trend, of course, from paid to qualified.

Mr. Daly: Right.

Mr. Fortier: You say mainly because of the increased costs of soliciting subscriptions.

Mr. Daly: Yes. And also because of the higher quality of qualified lists.

Our lists are under daily scrutiny. As an architect dies or his office is moved—there are all sorts of sources (directories, newspaper clippings)—we correct our lists daily.

The old-fashioned subscription salesman who went out and sold for us didn't care whether the man was an architect or not. If he sold a subscription, he made a commission on it and this happened.

Mr. Fortier: How can you be certain of your reader's interest in the magazine when he just receives it automatically whether or not he pays for it?

Mr. Daly: There are many ways. We mail out questionnaires on readership at least once a year on each magazine and ask them which features are good and which ones are bad which should be expanded and so on.

We get very high results from this, probably 25 per cent or 30 per cent in some cases. Is that right, Mr. Joel?

Mr. Joel: Yes, as high as that.

Mr. Daly: And then there are product inquiries.

Mr. Fortier: You say it is as high as 25 per cent or 30 per cent, which was proof 25 per cent or 30 per cent of the people on your mailing list read the magazine.

Mr. Daly: No. That means they are willing to take the time to reply to a detailed questionnaire.

There may be another 30 per cent or 40 per cent who do not bother. Do you reply to every questionnaire that you receive?

Mr. Fortier: No. If I receive a questionnaire or if I receive an enquiry as to whether or not I would like to continue to be on a mailing list for a publication that comes free, I will say, "Yes," if I am the least bit interested; but that does not mean I would go out to the newsstand and purchase a publication.

In other words, the point I am coming to is, is it a more effective way of reaching a potential reader, to use the qualified circulation publication?

Mr. Daly: It is for an advertiser.

Mr. Fortier: And also for the publisher?

Mr. Daly: Yes. That is why it has been accepted so widely.

Mr. Fortier: What are the disadvantages now? We know about the postal disadvantages. What are the other disadvantages, if there are any, to qualified versus paid circulation?

Mr. Daly: Well, I cannot think of any major disadvantages as long as you are willing to spend money, as a publisher, to keep your lists in the very best possible shape.

There might be a slight margin of extra circulation in the qualified that you do not catch up with right away or is not right, as you say, but that is true also of the paid publications, oddly enough.

When you see readership surveys on a paid publication, you will see 5 per cent or 10 per cent of the people do not really even know they paid for it.

Mr. Fortier: How does that compare with qualified circulation?

Mr. Daly: About the same.

Mr. Fortier: About the same.

Mr. Joel: May I add this, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: Yes, by all means.

Mr. Joel: The central philosophy in qualified circulation is that the readership of the magazines is determined by the editorial calibre of the magazine and not by any other factor, and certainly not by the factor of whether the recipient has, in fact, dug into his own pocket to pay for it; but only on the basis—exclusively on the basis—I emphasize—of the editorial calibre of the magazine. So we have hinged everything on the readability and readership quality in the magazine upon the editorial calibre of our magazine.

I would like—just before I refer to one or two of the editors present—to perhaps expand on that. Referring to the remarks about the questionnaire, that you made Mr. Fortier, in which we tried to ascertain the attitudes on paid versus controlled or qualified circulation, did indeed take a hand in structuring that questionnaire, even though I was quite aware at the time in doing so that we were going to get a lot of static, a lot of contrary opinion even within the publishing industry and it really did not surprise us. My reason for doing so—Mr. Daly and I had some differences of opinion at the time on this and I thought it was better to know—he used the term “It came back to haunt us,”—but I would rather know the size and shape of the ghost than not to know anything about it.

So when we discovered that there was still in existence in 1969 or 1968 or whenever it was it occurred, a lot of old, outdated beliefs in the so-called alleged virtues of paid circulation versus qualified, we were able to undertake an educational program with which as a matter of fact, the Canadian Controlled Circulation Board is going forward at the present time, to correct misconceptions that occurred.

The Chairman: I think before we do hear from the editors I do want to say to Mr. Fortier he has now been about 35 minutes with supplementary questions.

I know he has some questions which are not supplementary. I am anxious that they be asked this morning. I think therefore—I do not mean to be rude to you, Mr. Fortier, but we have really exhausted this point for the moment and I would like therefore to turn to Senator Sparrow, if you do not mind.

Senator Sparrow: I wonder if you could give me the total circulation of the business press?

The Chairman: Of their own papers or all papers?

Senator Sparrow: All papers; and then their circulation.

Mr. Daly: I think it was quoted yesterday in the Canadian Business Press brief, about 4.4 million.

Senator Sparrow: That is per issue.

Mr. Daly: I think that is the annual circulation.

Mr. Joel: Per issue.

Mr. Daly: Per issue.

Senator Sparrow: So would you say that is approximately 52 million; would that be right? Or would it be higher than that?

Mr. Joel: No, it would be less than that I suppose, because they are not all on 12-issue frequency.

Mr. Daly: There are some monthly and some weekly.

Mr. Joel: Some are weeklies.

The Chairman: Could you estimate for Senator Sparrow, the total annual circulation?

Senator Sparrow: Would you estimate forty million to be correct?

Mr. Joel: I think that would be high but I would be safer if I said approximately 35 million.

Mr. Daly: We can get this figure for the Senator from our association. There are some of our members in the back of the room. The manager is here.

The Chairman: Do you have that information offhand?

Mr. George Mansfield, Manager, Canadian Business Press: I wonder if I could have the question repeated?

The Chairman: I think Senator Sparrow's question is, what is the total annual circulation of all business publications in Canada.

Mr. Mansfield: 4.4 million.

The Chairman: That is per issue?

Mr. Mansfield: Per issue. I couldn't estimate the annual circulation.

Mr. Joel: There is no factor of twelve, obviously.

Mr. Mansfield: Some would run more than that because some are weeklies.

Mr. Joel: Some are annuals.

Senator Sparrow: What is Southam's circulation in all their publications per year?

Mr. Daly: Five hundred thousand.

Mr. Joel: Per issue, 360,000, as I recall the exact figure.

Mr. Daly: Does that include both issues of Good Farming.

Mr. Joel: I think so.

Mr. Daly: And the Journal of Commerce?

Mr. Joel: No, it does not. It does not include the Journal of Commerce. It would be something in excess of 360,000. It would be close to 400,000.

Senator Sparrow: Per year then?

Mr. Daly: Per issue.

Senator Sparrow: And per year; would it be ten times that?

Mr. Joel: I would be safer with suggesting a factor of eight, eight times. In other words...

Senator Sparrow: Three million.

Mr. Joel: Three million, two hundred thousand; somewhere in that area.

Senator Sparrow: Can you give me the total advertising revenue spent per year or received by the business press? I think you used the figure of forty million dollars.

Mr. Joel: Forty million dollars I believe annually.

Senator Sparrow: That is an annual figure.

Mr. Joel: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: Can you tell me what the Southam Press advertising revenue is per year for its publications? Are you prepared to do that?

Mr. Joel: I am not sure if we are prepared to do that. Mr. Daly?

Mr. Daly: Well, we have furnished you with financial information, depending on where you are heading. It is Southam's policy that we do not reveal divisional results for competitive reasons.

The Chairman: I think we have the information.

Mr. Daly: If we are only talking advertising volume that is in the public domain because it is published in the quarterly reports of Southam Press.

The revenue from trade paper advertisements and trade shows is consolidated.

The Chairman: If it is in the public domain why do you not answer it?

Mr. Daly: Well, I think it was about eight million dollars last year. I have not got it in front of me.

Mr. Joel: It was a little higher. It was something over nine million.

Mr. Daly: We have a 12-month statement Southam's here somewhere. It has that.

The Chairman: We had that as well.

Senator Sparrow: You referred to Time magazine and the money that may be channelled into the business press. First of all, do you know the figure of the advertising revenue of Time magazine? You are using percentage figures now. Do you know that figure?

Mr. Daly: I believe that their revenues during the past year would have been approximately—I have not seen the last magazine report—between four million dollars and five million dollars, possibly closer to four million dollars.

I think they suffered a small drop in line-age but I imagine they had a rate increase.

I would estimate for the business press that only about 20 per cent or 25 per cent of that would be available.

Senator Sparrow: So you are suggesting one million dollars?

Mr. Daly: Yes, because there is both cigarette advertising and liquor advertising that we would not get.

Senator Sparrow: In the brief by the Business Press Editors Association they say, and I quote:

"The business press is the one media of communications which can be entered with relatively little capital."

I am sorry we did not ask them this question, but relative to what? How much are we talking about in dollars; can you tell me?

Mr. Daly: I think they are talking relative to an automobile manufacturer or a steel furnace or something like that, because our experience has been that it requires a considerable amount of capital to produce a good business publication.

There was a time when a chap could be his own editor and his own advertising salesman and get some credit with a printer and for a very small amount of money he might get going; but our experience has been that under today's conditions of costs, to produce a quality publication, an investment of maybe 200,000 or $250,000 for a monthly magazine might be made over three or four years before he reached the break-even point and not every one works.

There are errors in judgment or the field does not spell out in the way you hoped it would.

Now, some have been established for less than that and some have cost considerably more before they reached the break-even point.

Senator Sparrow: So that if a new magazine started out, competition-wise it is not very easy to compete?

Mr. Daly: No. I think you need that kind of money to produce a good magazine.

There are people starting them still and the odd one succeeds. Maybe one in one hundred, which is not financially well supported, succeeds.

It is more difficult for an individual than it is for a house such as ours because if we decide to enter a new magazine field, then in effect, it is subsidized by the existing profitable magazines for the period of its incubation.

The Chairman: Excuse me. I have the answer to the question you asked originally. Our research figures indicate that the annual circulation of the business press in Canada is 54 million, 25 million of which is paid and 33 million of which is controlled or qualified.

Mr. Spears: May I point out, Mr. Chairman, this includes circulation for the Financial Post. That is why it is high.

Senator Sparrow: You said you would look up the advertising revenue figure.

On page 2 you say: "We own and operate several trade and consumer shows, and we offer several auxiliary services. . ." Are these trade shows profitable business operations or are they only complementary to the magazines as such? Are they operated separately?

Mr. Daly: Well, we operate them. They are separate divisions of what we call our Southex Division and the majority are profitable. We treat them the same as the magazines.

We have some trade shows which have not yet reached the stage of profitability but if they do not reach it within three or four years and we feel they have no future, we probably would discontinue them the same as we would with a magazine on the same basis; but they all operate independently, autonomously, from the magazine for a profit.

Mr. Fortier: Such shows as the Canadian Restaurant Association and that type of thing is operated by that association?

Mr. Daly: That happens to be an association show and profitable, but a full list of our shows is appended to my brief at appendix B and it covers that page and the following page.

The Chairman: May I ask if one of the auxiliary services to which you referred is the sale of your qualified mailing lists to people who would be interested in buying them?

Mr. Daly: Yes.

The Chairman: How does that work?

Mr. Daly: Well, it is more or less a service to advertisers and in fact, at one time, was restricted to the use of advertisers so they could supplement their advertising message with pieces of direct mail or a sample of sandpaper or whatever they wanted to do, and it is not a highly profitable division.

Mr. Joel may have the figure in his mind but it is operated more or less as a service division.

I was talking this over with some of our editors the other day and they had the same experience. It was not a very profitable division.

Mr. Fortier: The Water & Pollution Control magazine, Mr. Daly...

The Chairman: Before you begin, Mr. Fortier, may I say for the information of the Senators and our guests and others that today only, I am hoping we can adjourn at 12:45 rather than one o'clock. That is just so you will know and the Senators will know.

We usually go through until one o'clock but by reason of certain Senators having appointments over the lunch-hour. I promised to adjourn at 12:45. I only make that point so that people will be mindful of that in their question.

Mr. Fortier: The Water & Pollution Control which you edit, Mr. Davey, when did it come into the picture?

Mr. Thomas Davey, Editor, Water & Pollution Control, Southam Business Publications Limited: In 1893 it started as the Canadian Engineer. It has existed in a continuous form ever since. At one time, you may be interested to know, when I started out I had an assistant with the same name as yours, Mr. Fortier. I had an assistant whose name was Fortier and who lasted with me four weeks.

Mr. Fortier: I have half an hour.

The Chairman: I do not think you should ask any more questions, Mr. Fortier!

Mr. Fortier: I thought that was one publication which has recently come into being.

Mr. Daly: In all fairness we should say the name of Water & Pollution Control has gone through several changes in names.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Daly, which of your business publications is, in point of time, the latest to have entered the field.

Mr. Daly: I will have to look at the list. I guess the French language forestry paper Opérations Forestières would be about the latest, would it not?

Mr. Joel: L'Agriculteur Progressif, if you will excuse my French pronunciation, Mr. Fortier, I think is even later than that.

Mr. Fortier: How do you decide that there is a market for a new publication in a particular field?

Mr. Daly: Well, there are many ways. First of all, we keep a pretty close eye on the U.K. and U.S. markets as they develop more and more specialist publications, say, in electronics or in the nuclear energy field or whatever you want.

We try to find out if the name development is taking place in Canada and there is room for a parallel publication. We have an English-language publication like Good Farming and we decide that there is room for a French parallel publication like L'Agriculteur Progressif. We see that there is a deterioration in the field, or if it is ill-served in the field, and that it looks as if it could stand a good publication and has had a good publication in the past or is a growing field.

Mr. Fortier: Do you have anyone at head office doing exclusively this sort of work?

Mr. Daly: Well, we refer to Bloor Street as the head office of Southam Press but in our company we do not have anyone exclusively doing it. It has been more or less done in the president's office over the years. The idea for Canadian Architect, Canadian Consulting Engineer, Executive, and some others, were developed there but there is an interplay between the publisher and various officers of the company. Ideas are kicked around or one of the employees presents a brief on an idea for a new publication. This happens fairly frequently and it is an interplay of senior employees, editors, who get ideas and so on.

Mr. Fortier: When was the last time you decided to start the publication of a magazine in a field where Maclean-Hunter was already publishing one?

Mr. Joel: Just before the new postal increase came in.

Mr. Fortier: Which one was that?

Mr. Joel: There was something—I was being partly facetious, Mr. Fortier; but we are...

Mr. Fortier: That is why I took you up on it.

Mr. Joel: If I may, in answering your question, expand on something Mr. Daly said.

Mr. Fortier: You go back to my question.

Mr. Joel: All right. The experience in recent years has been that the need for new publications has been derived from an already existing publication either in our own house or in another company.

That is to say, as an industry or part of society specializes, it creates needs for special publications to serve, and this perhaps has been the process by which new publications have been conceived, so that mainly in effect...

Mr. Fortier: You get the feel.

Mr. Joel: Yes. The department in an existing publication may want the establishment of an independent publication.

The Chairman: Now, Mr. Joel, you are not answering the question which Mr. Fortier put. I asked it of either Mr. Daly or yourself.

Mr. Fortier: Either one of them.

The Chairman: You may put the question again, Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: I think Mr. Daly is looking for an answer.

Mr. Daly: I was looking down the list trying to figure it out. I guess the petroleum field was the last time. I do not remember who started theirs first. We bought an existing publication there and so on.

Mr. Fortier: You have Canadian Petroleum and they have Oil Week.

Mr. Daly: Yes; Oil Week.

Mr. Fortier: When did yours come into being?

Mr. Daly: We bought an existing publication but our ownership of it dates back around four years or five years.

Mr. Joel: Five years.

The Chairman: After the postal rate increase, Southam and Maclean-Hunter mutually agreed to each cease publication of certain of their magazines. Maclean-Hunter dropped Mechanical Contracting and Engineering and Climatisation, Chauffage and Plomberie and Southam closed School Administration and Product Design & Value Engineering. An article in Marketing, which I am sure you know is a Maclean-Hunter publication, stated and I quote:

"The companies said that, despite substantial investment in the publications against strong U.S. competition, there was room for only one Canadian publication in each field."

The same article begins—and again quoting:

"Severe postal rates increases plus other rising costs..."

So, there were really three factors: the severe postal rates; number two, the rising costs; and three, the strong U.S. competition.

For the record, which of these three factors was the most important?

Mr. Daly: The postal rates, as I mentioned before, were the straw that broke the camel's back.

The Chairman: Well, without the postal increase would it have happened?

Mr. Daly: I think they might have struggled along for another year or two.

The Chairman: Well, then the postal rates weren't the straw that broke the camel's back?

Mr. Daly: Well, they were the straw that made the decision, yes.

The Chairman: Without the postal rates, these publications would all still be going?

Mr. Daly: Well, they probably would have struggled on—I would say another year or two, but probably the same decision would have been reached. I think they would have been discontinued. It is purely a matter of judgment.

Mr. Fortier: How did Southam and Maclean-Hunter come to this arrangement? It was in 1968 wasn't it?

Mr. Daly: Yes, in 1968. It started with an informal telephone discussion.

Mr. Fortier: Who made the phone call?

Mr. Daly: I really don't remember. There are many phone calls back and forth, and they cover a great many subjects.

Mr. Fortier: You said that you would carry an unprofitable publication—well, you said if it was not economically viable today and you felt that it would not be for the next three to five years—that is your rule of thumb?

Mr. Daly: That is my rule of thumb but I have to submit my recommendations to my board and they may disagree with me.

Mr. Fortier: Have there been instances, Mr. Daly, where your company has carried a publication at a loss for a period in excess of five years?

Mr. Daly: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: And that would have been the reasons then, without naming the publication if you don't wish to, which made your decision?

Mr. Daly: Well, stupidity maybe, or stubbornness. There are two reasons.

Mr. Joel: We go on with certain things I guess in retrospect—sometimes they may turn out to be bad business decisions but sometimes they turn out very well. Three to five years is just a general rule of thumb. We look at each one each year and say now, what is going to happen next year and prepare budgets, and so on.

Mr. Fortier: Have you ever considered that you had sort of a duty to your readers to continue publication?

Mr. Daly: In certain fields I think we have taken that position, yes.

Mr. Fortier: Have you also been influenced by the fact that if Maclean-Hunter was in competition, as may have happened with that particular publication, that you were damned if you were going to keel over?

Mr. Daly: Yes. We have both made unwise business decisions and things of that nature.

The Chairman: Well, I have one other question. Do you have another question Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: I have one question for each one of the editors.

The Chairman: Fine. I would like to adjourn in seven minutes, but go ahead.

Mr. Fortier: I feel that we should hear from Messrs. Davey and Quick and I would like to put this question to them. Since it was mentioned that they were senior editors in the organization, in the Southam group, why are you editing business magazines rather than being in the daily newspaper field?

Mr. Davey: Well, it is a matter of choice I think, really, and opportunity. I personally have been a business press editor for some years. About ten years ago I worked for radio and television in Australia...

Mr. Fortier: I wondered where you worked.

Mr. Davey: I personally like to work for a business magazine. The reason is you get a large degree of freedom. I have a budget, I have a field to cover, and I am not really overlooked on the point because no one gets to know the field as well as myself at our company. Within the bounds of budgetary considerations, I have always had total freedom and I go to places like Montreal and Windsor and no one questions my decision on this. I am only judged by the results at the end of each month. In other words, you are task oriented—it is not a nine to five job and it is the working arrangement that seems to suit my working temperament.

Mr. Fortier: Do you feel you have more editorial freedom that you would have working for one of the Southam newspapers?

Mr. Davey: I have never worked for the Southam newspapers, but I have discussed this problem with people who work there—yes, I think I have more freedom particularly in the selection of assignments. For instance if you work on a newspaper you are sent overseas to go and cover Yves Fortier to hear what he has to say on a topic whereas if you were an editor, you make this decision yourself.

The Chairman: You don't have to go and see Yves Fortier!

Mr. Davey: That is right.

Mr. Fortier: Well, what about advertising in your magazine—advertising from companies which pollute the air?

Mr. Daly: Do we have any?

Mr. Fortier: Advertising from sawmills for example?

Mr. Davey: As a matter of fact in our current issue we have one advertiser. I don't know if it is right to name him but we have one who has just been convinced—and this is a court case—brought forward by the Ontario Water Resources Commission.

Mr. Fortier: You covered it?

Mr. Davey: Yes, we covered it and we wrote it up as a news item. I particularly remember this because George Kerr, who is the Resources Minister in Ontario, said that there would be no interference in this case. He was replying to suggestions that they drop the case in view of the fact that the company had plans for substantial anti-pollution measures. Mr. George Keer said there was going to be no interference here and the prosecution was to go ahead; and this particular company happens to be an advertiser we normally have.

Mr. Fortier: Have you said that you are in favour of water pollution over the years?

Mr. Davey: As a matter of fact, I have a letter here from the University of Toronto dated February 10 and it relates to a letter written on February 7, 1970, from the Director of the Laboratory of the Milwaukee Sewage Commission. Briefly it states views on the story we did on eutrophication before the word came into common usage. And in fact when it first appeared on our cover we had a phone call saying: "What do you mean by putting a word there that isn't in the dictionary?" Dr. Jones has got a thing about detergents and phosphates and I published his views on this. We also published two articles which countered Dr. Jones' views by the Canadian Manufacturers of Chemical Specialties Association.

This letter which I would like to file or let you have if you like...

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Davey: It says:

"I read with great interest"...

Mr. Fortier: Well, Mr. Davey, we don't have the time. Would you please table it?

Mr. Davey: Yes. This man states that a great deal of the legislative activity was a direct result of this one article which was published in our magazine.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Chairman, could we hear from Mr. Quick? Would you rather be working for a newspaper in the Southam group than where you are working now?

Mr. Quick: No, I am quite happy to be where I am now.

Mr. Fortier: Well, could you give your reasons?

Mr. Quick: Yes—they are varied. I think the nature of man changes as he gets older and the pace in monthly publishing is much slower than daily, which is certainly one factor but the main factor, at least as far as I am concerned, is the ability to get to the bottom of a particular problem that concerns a great number of people. To pursue it and to provide for them, hopefully, some solutions. A reporter on a daily paper, as Mr. Davey says, is assigned to a task and has to report on the facts within a time limit but when you are dealing with industry problems and concerns, it is very necessary to deal in depth with it.

In one particular case, as far as I am concerned, it also developed into a personal private hobby.

Mr. Fortier: Do you have the last say as to whether or not a news story or editorial is going to be published in your magazine?

Mr. Quick: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: You never have to submit it above?

Mr. Quick: No.

Mr. Fortier: So, would I be right in saying that no article has ever been killed by the publisher?

Mr. Quick: Not on my magazine. I would certainly take every step to avoid that.

Mr. Fortier: There is no interference?

Mr. Quick: No. If I permit to be published something which is derogatory, or embarrasses the company, it is quite possible that they may have something to say to me about it, but that has never happened.

Mr. Fortier: It has never happened?

Mr. Quick: No.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: Please correct me on these figures if they are wrong—and they are estimates. It seems to me that Southam owns approximately 90 per cent of the business press in total number...

The Chairman: You are talking about circulation?

Senator Sparrow: No, in total numbers.

The Chairman: The number of publications?

Senator Sparrow: Yes. It appears that you have 6 per cent of the total circulation, it appears that you receive 22 per cent of the advertising revenue. With your main competitor it would appear that with about 20 per cent of the ownership—the total advertising revenue would be approximately 50 per cent between the two. Does this leave the balance of the 400 and some odd business press publications in a healthy condition? I am assuming that this firm and your main competitor are healthy. Does this leave the balance—the majority of them—in a healthy situation?

Mr. Joel: I don't know. I know of many healthy business publications that are not owned by either company, but I don't know of that total—I imagine some of them are very small regional magazines and some are subsidized by associations, although I really couldn't tell you.

Senator Sparrow: I was just wondering if they were going out of business gradually...

Mr. Joel: Well, I think Mr. Mansfield mentioned ten that have gone out of business since the postal situation changed. This is a business where new magazines are born and others go out of business from year to year, but I think in general, it is healthy. National Business Publications Ltd., and Secombe House publish business magazines, and they seem to be doing well and surviving and their individual business magazines such as Canadian Medical Journal must be very healthy.

The Chairman: I note with some interest, and I am delighted of course, that Mr. Balfour and Mr. Fisher are here and they are most welcome and of course, as I said earlier, we are delighted that they have returned. Did you read the brief submitted to this committee by Southam Press?

Mr. Daly: Yes.

The Chairman: Well, this is a very general question, but did you agree with everything that was in it?

Mr. Daly: Not everything.

The Chairman: Well, you are saved by the bell.

May I just say on behalf of the committee...

Mr. Daly: May I just have one last word?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Daly: You asked for examples of publications within the same house arguing with each other on behalf of their readers' groups and I can give you at least two examples—our forestry publication believes that pollution controls shouldn't be expedited quite as fast and that the forest industry should have a longer period and Water and Pollution Control just feels the opposite. When I was editor under a period when we had wartime price controls in the period after the war on lumber we were fighting for lower lumber prices and the Canada Lumberman were fighting for the opposite—for higher lumber prices, so we have many examples of that sort of thing. No one could think of any yesterday, so I thought I would just mention it.

The Chairman: Mr. Daly I hope you accept my appreciation on behalf of the members of the committee that you will share that appreciation with your colleagues who are here this morning. As you know and as I am about to inform the Senators, Maclean-Hunter Limited is on deck at 2.30 with Maclean-Hunter Business Publications at 8 o'clock and you will be most welcome at those sessions.

Thank you very much for coming this morning.

Mr. Daly: Thank you.

The Committee adjourned.

ON RESUMING AT 2 P.M.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, may begin by reminding Senators of the session this evening at eight o'clock with Maclean-Hunter Business Publications, and may I also inform the Senators in case anyone is not aware, that the Senate, I understand, is sitting tomorrow morning at eleven o'clock.

Senator Smith: Yes, the sitting will be at eleven o'clock, and may be a very short sitting.

The Chairman: Thank you. Honourable Senators, this afternoon we are going to interrupt our study of the business press temporarily. As I said, tonight we turn to a discussion of Maclean-Hunter Business Publications, but perhaps to make that discussion more meaningful and certainly to enhance our entire discussion of the mass media, we now turn to a brief we requested and have of course received from Maclean-Hunter Limited.

If I could introduce our guests, sitting at my immediate right is Mr. Donald Campbell. Mr. Campbell is Executive Vice-President for broadcasting and finance. Then we have Mr.

Ronald McEachern who is Executive Vice-President in charge of the Financial Post and consumer magazines. On my immediate left is Mr. J. L. Craig, Executive Vice-President, responsible for the Business Publications Division, trade shows and the company's activities outside of Canada.

Mr. Campbell, I think that perhaps in the initial stages at least, you are going to be the spokesman. I will simply say that the brief which you prepared has been circulated to the Senators and it has been studied by them. I know that you have heard several of these opening statements and I will simply say that you have about fifteen minutes at your disposal. You are free to explain your brief, expand it or add to it or say anything else which may be on your mind.

The questions which the Senators will want to ask will not be based just on the contents of the brief or your remarks. I am sure there will be other questions.

Mr. Donald G. Campbell; Executive Vice-President, Maclean-Hunter Limited: Thank you, Mr. Chairman and Honourable Senators. We appreciate the opportunity to come before you, but we must warn you, however, that we are going to be here five times; so you are going to see a lot of us.

First of all, may I express to the Chairman the sincere regrets of Mr. Donald Hunter that he is not personally present at this particular hearing. Mr. Hunter recently suffered a heart attack and is convalescing.

I would like to also officially put on the record that we have no complaints. We ask for nothing. We just want to carry on doing the best possible job that we can.

With me today is Mr. Lin Craig who is Executive Vice-President of the Business Publications Division and also responsible, as you have outlined, for many of our other operations, and Mr. Ronald McEachern, Executive Vice-President of our Consumer Magazines and the Financial Post. My own responsibilities are those of broadcasting and finance, TV and radio. It is interesting to note that you have before you today an editor, an advertising person, and I started in the area of administration. Although I am a chartered accountant, I like to refer to myself as a broadcaster.

I raise this point for the Committee's benefit for several reasons:— first in the absence of Mr. Hunter, as Chairman of the Board and President, each of us is responsible for those areas which I have outlined and prepared to answer any questions concerning them. Secondly, this hearing is for Maclean-Hunter Limited, but the Committee is also aware that separate briefs have been requested from Maclean's magazine and the Chatelaine group of women's magazines, including Miss Chatelaine, from the Business Publications Division of our company, and from our subsidiary operation, Maclean-Hunter Cable TV Ltd. Each of us will be appearing at the hearings scheduled for those briefs as members of the appropriate group. We are here today as members of the corporate group that is now being considered.

Because our major divisions are presenting their own briefs, we have not gone into details in those areas in the Company's brief. There may be some questions asked by the Committee which will be answered in our other briefs or which could best be answered in the context of those other briefs. I would assure you we will do our best to answer your questions.

Maclean-Hunter has been in existence for eighty years. It is a Canadian company. It is a public company. It has a staff of just under three thousand plus hundreds of contributors. It is not one large company, but rather one hundred and ten relatively small businesses. We are not a conglomerate—every facet of business that we deal with is in the communications field.

We have no daily newspapers. We operate from coast to coast. Those areas of advertising that we seek are quite small when related to the total media mix; for example, business papers are 3.3 per cent and magazines 2.6 per cent of the total advertising dollars that is spent in Canada as compared to 33.4 per cent for newspapers.

I would like to draw to your attention that the per capital advertising expenditure in Canada is about one-half that of the United States:— $50.12 for Canada as against $94.85 in the United States. Canada is unique in that we produce eighty million copies of Canadian magazines annually; whereas the circulation in Canada for non-Canadian magazines is one hundred and sixty million.

Maclean-Hunter is also basically different from some other media in that our sales are to national accounts rather than the mix of national, local and classified that exists in some media.

I would now like Mr. Craig to make a few comments on our trade shows which I am sure would be of interest to you.

Mr. J. L. Craig, Executive Vice-President, Business Publications Division, Maclean-Hunter Limited: Mr. Chairman, Honourable Senators, I would like to take a couple of minutes to talk about a communications medium which perhaps you haven't considered as being in the mass media field. I am going to have a chance to talk about it now, this being somewhat new to the Business Publications Division of this company.

I would like to say why we think trade shows are an important area of communication. There are in Canada, about one hundred specialized trade and industry shows and Maclean-Hunter produces seventeen of these as well as three shows which are open to the general public.

We are involved in trade and industry shows mostly because they are an important medium of communication and because they are a logical extension of our publications. Most of our trade shows are related to the specialized area of business and industry served by the business publications.

I think last year we had about five hundred thousand people attend various trade shows and product shows where they had the opportunity of fully examining and testing and where applicable see, smell or taste, products that were exhibited by manufacturers from all over the world. The trade show is unique, in that it is a three-dimensional medium involving all of the senses. Purchasing people are aided in their buying decisions because they can appraise a wide range of products from different manufacturers, all under one roof. The buyer comes to the seller; thus reducing selling cost.

Products on view come not only from Canada, but from around the world. These shows are increasing the import-export trade and improving communication between the governments and those overseas and between Canadian businessmen and their counterparts in other lands.

There are shows for the suppliers and buyers of machine tools, hospital equipment and many others as listed in our own brief.

The shows play an important role, not only in effective communications, but in the Canadian economy. Our largest show, the National Industrial Production and Machine Tool Show, provides an interesting sidelight to illustrate this point. This show is really an outgrowth of Canadian International Trade Fairs which were operated for some years by the federal government at very great cost to the Canadian taxpayer. When the government withdrew, our predecessor picked up the idea of producing a similar industrial show as a private venture. Under Maclean-Hunter direction, it has grown into a very successful show.

Trade shows, bring people into the area where the show is, and frequently as a result of a successful show, new companies will be established to either sell, warehouse, distribute or ultimately manufacture products that have been exhibited; so that we think it is a very significant area in the business communication field.

Mr. Ronald A. McEachern, Executive Vice-President, Maclean-Hunter Limited: Mr. Chairman, honourable gentlemen:—the question is frequently raised about the relevance of consumer magazines in the decade of the seventies.

Let me say it is most definitely Maclean-Hunter's belief and decision that given the kind of climate we now have, it is our intention to continue in this operation, because we are convinced that such publications have a very real value. There can be doubt that there is a role for the printed word created for a national audience.

CBC and CTV networks do their own kind of job with their own particular qualities, but the printed word is the way that most people can really comprehend and appraise important questions of public and social policy and nourish a sense of national identity.

For a long time to come, people will be getting their basic information out of the printed word. On CBC or CTV and other electronic media, you have got to be there when they give it to you. The magazine can give it to you when you want it. The magazine is produced in an attractive format. It doesn't get thrown out of the house with the daily garbage, you read it when you are in the mood, when you have the time to be interested.

When television was originally introduced in Canada, advertisers and certainly advertising agencies became entranced with television as the magic answer to all advertising and sales problems. Many of them threw millions and millions of dollars in that direction.

Several things are now happening. There is a serious reappraisal of television. It is now obvious to all that vast amounts of money have been wasted in television. Out of this reappraisal is recognition that magazines have a continuing and essential role in advertising.

Another factor making giant investments in television advertising unattractive in many advertising situations is the constantly increasing fragmentation of television audiences mainly because cable television now gives viewers such a greatly increased freedom of choice. This means an advertiser has a greatly increased chance of his message not reaching the kind of people and the number of people he expects.

Our general magazines do not and may not produce what might be called a satisfactory return on investment. This is probably going to continue to be true for some time. However, Maclean-Hunter believes it has been performing a worthwhile national service and the company's financial capacity to continue services of this kind is now better than it was in the past.

In 1970, about 20 per cent of total Maclean-Hunter revenues will come from our electronic operations; i.e., from radio, television and cable television. By 1975, five years from now, probably 40 per cent of the total Maclean-Hunter revenues will come from its electronic operations.

Nobody feels happy with publications which don't have good economic health. Nobody likes race horses that don't win races. But Maclean-Hunter has with strong idealism, carried on the general magazines and we hope to do so in the future.

They have weathered the storm in the advertising world produced by the advent of television. Unless the competitive situation changes for the worse and unless production costs, postal rates and so forth go very strongly against us, I believe our general magazines will continue and we want them to have positive value in intensifying the spirit of Canadianism and enriching the lives of all our readers.

May I bring to your attention one fact about our consumer magazines which it is easy to overlook.

Maclean's and Chatelaine both go into a bigger percentage of Canadian homes than nearly all the very familiar American magazines go into American homes. For instance: Chatelaine has over one million circulation in our country of 20 millions. Life magazine at 1 million circulation, Playboy with 4.5 million and Newsweek with 2.4 million all have smaller penetration of the U.S. audience. That is all I am going to say at the moment.

The Chairman: Thank you very much gentlemen. We will turn to the questions of the Senators shortly. Before we do, I should underline something that Mr. Campbell pointed out and that is that there is a series of other Maclean-Hunter presentations beginning, as you know, this evening, with the Business Publications Division; so I would hope that Senators, in framing their questions, could be mindful of the fact that we are dealing with the corporate entity here. Hopefully, I won't rule any questions out of order. Having said that, not unnaturally some of our questions will tend to be rather specific, but we will try to keep the questioning in some kind of perspective.

Although Mr. Fortier was going to ask the first question, I am going to precede him. I have a statement which has been prepared by the staff which is a summary of the important announcement which Pierre Juneau made this morning. I don't know how familiar you are with this announcement, and perhaps you could deal with this in some way and comment on it.

The summary reads:

"The CRTC will hear representations at its public hearing April 14th on the following proposals for amendments to the Broadcasting Regulations."

So I think the first thing to understand is that these are proposals only, at least until the fourteenth of April. First...

"Television.

1. During each period of four weeks, the average of broadcasting by any station or network of non-Canadian programmes shall not exceed: (a) 40 per cent between 6:00 a.m. and midnight; (b) 40 per cent between 6:30 p.m. and 11:30 p.m.; (c) 30 per cent in programmes produced in any one country outside of Canada.

2. Sponsorship of news programmes shall be permitted subject to certain regulations.

3. Advertising material (including non-commercial promotions) shall not exceed 12 minutes per hour.

Radio.

1. Musical programming in radio prime time must be 30 per cent Canadian.

2. A station will be required to have oral or written consent to a telephone interview or conversation being broadcast prior to the broadcast. A person who telephones the station shall be deemed to have given this consent."

I know you have only just seen these. You saw them late this morning.

Mr. Campbell: I got these in this room at 11:10 this morning. They are proposed new regulations. There will be public hearings on them, and I am sure a great deal is going to be said about these two particular proposals. I think it is very clear what the objectives of the CRTC are, and it appears that there are many ways that this is going to affect the day-to-day operation, not only of the television stations, but also of the radio stations. My only general comment without getting into specifics is that we tend to look upon radio and television possibly as some form of entertainment, and when we get into 70 per cent Canadian content, the U.K. and Commonwealth shows which have been up to this point allowed as Canadian content, and now are wiped out, I think really we have a whole new ball game if in fact, these regulations come into force.

The Chairman: Yes, they are all proposals. I think we should understand that.

Mr. Campbell: As to the 30 per cent Canadian music rule, this is going to be quite easy for many stations to do. I don't think we are going to have much problem with 30 per cent in country and western or with rock. Where we run quality music, I don't know, because we just don't have it. We are running now only about 6 per cent Canadian records; so we are going to have some problem there, but you can very readily appreciate what the objective of the Commission is, and what they are trying to do.

The Chairman: Thank you so much for putting yourself on the record in this way. I should say that you have just seen this a few hours ago, as we have ourselves, of course, and we are grateful for your comments.

Mr. Fortier: I wonder if Mr. Campbell would like to enlarge on what he meant when he said, "This is a new ball game."

Mr. Campbell: Well, yes, I would be glad to. I just jotted down at lunch-hour, a few of the things that this will mean. Having looked at the positive—what the Commission is trying to do—let's look at some of the negative aspects as well and then you will realize why I say, "We have a new ball game."

First of all, the advertising time is going to be cut down and consequently our costs to the advertisers, I think, are going to increase. We are now going to have four breaks in an hour. The advertiser isn't going to like that change on the commercials; so with all of these things, automatically our costs are going to increase from a production and programming point of view. It is much easier to programme something out than to create something to put in.

A programme such as "Laugh-In" costs $6,500 for an hour, and it costs $17,000 to produce "W-5". It is a lot more, of course, when you don't have as many commercials.

We promoted our own programmes on the networks, but this did not qualify as advertising when you were adding up the commercial breaks; so that promotion in effect is going to go out, and as I mentioned, the Commonwealth, and then of course we can co-produce. We are doing a great deal to get into co-production. Now, I think—if these regulations are in fact accepted—you are going to hear an awful lot about co-production.

Mr. Fortier: Senator Everett whispered a question. What is co-production?

Mr. Campbell: Well, what it means is that we will get together with perhaps an American star or someone from the U.K.

Mr. Fortier: Barbra Streisand?

Mr. Campbell: Yes, that's a good one. We will bring her to Toronto. We will put a Canadian producer on and a Canadian writer who will use the CTV facilities to produce the show or it will be produced co-operatively with the CBS or ITV in England. We share the front money, as they call it in the trade, and we are able to do that kind of show and count it as Canadian and hopefully show it in several countries. Whether that will qualify if these regulations are accepted—they have dropped Commonwealth programming now, but I don't know what their feeling is or co-production.

Mr. Fortier: I think the Prime Minister's approach would be sort of eased if she could be considered as Canadian content.

Mr. Campbell: Perhaps—we will do our best.

The Chairman: I think, perhaps, Mr. Fortier should confine his remarks to the questions at hand.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Campbell, as I read your brief on behalf of the company, I noted in paragraph 17 that you established the fact that your company's basic interest is in the printed word, and my first question to you is have you ever considered going into the newspaper publishing business?

Mr. Campbell: Yes, sir, we have. We have made one or two attempts down through the years bidding on certain papers that were up for sale. We looked quite strenuously and spent a great deal of time on appraising the recent Peterborough situation when it came up for sale. We are interested in daily newspapers.

Mr. Fortier: You still are as a Company?

Mr. Campbell: Oh, yes; on the other hand, I wouldn't want to mislead you that the Company is going to start a fourth Toronto newspaper. We don't think that it is practical.

Mr. Fortier: What would be the ideal market that you would look for from the point of view of publishing a newspaper by Maclean-Hunter—the Toronto Star for example?

Mr. Campbell: The Star, the Telegram—to start a paper?

Mr. Fortier: Yes, would you ideally go into a market where you already have, say, a radio and television station?

Mr. Campbell: No, we wouldn't necessarily.

Mr. Fortier: What are your views on mixed media ownership by one company?

Mr. Campbell: Well, personally, and I guess it's our company's view as well—I am sure my friends here will correct me if they have different views on this—my view is that there's nothing wrong with mixed media ownership providing it isn't concentrated in a particular market, and we have one or two markets in which there is extreme concentration. On the other hand, there are certain people who have tried, and successfully gone into, one of those markets. But in my opinion, with a newspaper in Vancouver and Maclean's magazine in Toronto and a radio station in Calgary, I really don't see anything wrong with it. In fact, I can see a lot of good things about it.

Mr. Fortier: Have you any plans to form a network or in any way to integrate your television and cable holdings?

Mr. Campbell: No, where we have cable, we don't have television and vice versa.

Mr. Fortier: And that is Company policy?

Mr. Campbell: Not quite—yes, it is company policy in that we will not go after a controlling or majority position in a cable system where in fact, we are already in that market with radio or television. However, we have made application for a minority interest, 24 or 23 per cent, in the Calgary market as and when Calgary gets heard, but we would not consider going and making application for 100 per cent of the licence.

Mr. Fortier: This increasing concentration, since 1962, in the broadcasting media by Maclean-Hunter—does that indicate that you consider print to be a waning medium?

Mr. Campbell: Not at all. I would think that while our investment possibly hasn't been quite as high in the last five to ten years in print, there are not necessarily the same opportunities say for daily newspapers. But we have made substantial investments in the print media during the past five or ten years.

Mr. Fortier: I think I should direct this question also to you, Mr. Campbell. You were here this morning?

Mr. Campbell: Yes, I was.

Mr. Fortier: ...for the presentation of the Southam Business Division. You probably heard Mr. Daly refer to the dubious methods of certain consumer magazines in soliciting subscriptions.

Mr. Campbell: Yes, I heard those comments.

Mr. Fortier: Would you care to comment on them?

Mr. Campbell: As the magazines are part of Mr. McEachern's operations, may I ask him to comment on that.

Mr. McEachern: Yes, I am glad to.

Mr. Fortier: You heard about the lady eighty-five years of age who was induced into buying a thirty-year subscription to Maclean's?

Mr. McEachern: May I tell you a few things about our regulations on magazine selling. Our director of circulation is here, and after I say a few things, I am going to ask him to speak.

Now, anybody, and I repeat "anybody", who has signed up for a subscription and then changed his mind can always get his money back.

Mr. Fortier: Would you give him his money back if you went out of business?

Mr. McEachern: You know ABC Regulations.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, what would you do?

Mr. McEachern: You have answered your own question. Salesmen are specifically warned about doing business with any person over seventy. Any complaint by an elderly person or their relative or their friend puts the salesman immediately into trouble, and he gets fined for the first offence. By the second offence, he is fired.

It is the employers of registered salesmen who must pay the fine. This means salesmen with a record of rule breaking become expensive to the employer; they become too hot to handle; and rather promptly get pushed out of the business.

Senator Everett: What is the amount of the fine, fifty dollars?

Mr. Rumgay: Fifty dollars for the first and then a hundred and up.

The Chairman: I wonder if you could introduce the speaker.

Mr. McEachern: Mr. Gordon Rumgay.

The Chairman: And he is the circulation manager?

Mr. McEachern: Of consumer magazines.

The Chairman: He is going to talk in just a minute.

Senator Everett: This fifty dollars is levied by ABC, is it?

Mr. Rumgay: Canadian Central Registry was set up by the Canadian publishers who are the main contributors to this thing. It licenses all salesmen. They are photographed, and CCR clears them as to their record. If they get into trouble, they will lose their licence, and this is quite an effective policing organization.

Senator Everett: You say that if on this first offence, the salesman is fined fifty dollars, it has to be paid by the publisher?

Mr. Rumgay: His employer.

Senator Everett: His employer has to pay this. The second offence is one hundred dollars. Is that right?

Mr. Rumgay: Yes.

Senator Everett: Who demands that the salesman be fired after one offence?

Mr. Rumgay: It is likely to be his employer.

Senator Everett: I just want to clear that point. It isn't the CCR?

Mr. Rumgay: No.

Senator Everett: What you are talking about is Maclean-Hunter policy?

Mr. Rumgay: Yes, it is Maclean-Hunter policy.

Senator Everett: What you are saying is that Maclean-Hunter policy is that if a salesman has one offence for which the company is fined by CCR, you pay the fine. On the second offence, you terminate the employee's employment. Is that right?

Mr. Rumgay: Yes.

Senator Everett: I am just asking if it is the policy of the company.

Mr. Rumgay: Policy, yes.

The Chairman: Is that a policy in the industry?

Mr. Rumgay: May I come on to my next paragraph? In Canada, Maclean-Hunter is the biggest and most visible of the magazine publishers, but Canada also has a lot of other magazine selling operators who deal mainly in American publications—Time, Life, Look and dozens of others.

In many cases, these other sales organizations wish to sell some Maclean-Hunter publications as well as their own. So there is some magazine selling activity in Canada sometimes involving our publications over which we at Maclean-Hunter do not have direct control.

One American operator who got the U.S. Senate extremely steamed up about sale practice is also extremely active in Canada.

The Chairman: I don't want to interrupt the thing you are going to read, but how can these American companies sell your magazine without your permission?

Mr. Rumgay: With our permission.

The Chairman: Fine.

Mr. Rumgay: There is a difference. We have more control over the people working for us than over the people working for some body else.

Let me point out that in one year, there are about twenty-five million contacts between somebody trying to sell a magazine and somebody who is supposed to be a customer. Everybody in this room knows that with twenty-five million contacts, something is going to go wrong sometimes. I am in the position in our company to know, especially when things do go wrong. I can assure you it is amazingly seldom. For twenty-five million—I suppose half of these involve our magazines in some way or the other—the number of real complaints is surprisingly small.

The Chairman: Any more questions?

Senator Sparrow: So, in fact the question of selling—was it an eighty-year subscription to a thirty-year-old woman or a thirty-year subscription to an eighty-year-old woman?—the subscription that was referred to in this particular case, in fact, happened with Maclean's magazine?

Mr. Rumgay: I don't know. If the Senator said it did, we accept it. But I have no recollection of that particular case.

The Chairman: It wasn't a Senator who said it. It was Mr. Fortier; so it may not be true.

Mr. Fortier: It was told to me by a Senator.

The Chairman: It was a suggestion perhaps.

Mr. Rumgay: Refunds are made upon request on any magazine sold by any of our own operators. Subscriptions sold to our magazines by operators over which we have no control, we cannot refund because we do not get that money. We get a very small percentage of the subscription price. Refunds are made by all bona fide or practically all bona fide agencies, both Canadian and American. They have agreed to certain ethics, standards of practice, and they have agreed that salesmen who in any way break the law of CCR, be fined as has been outlined.

Certain operators coming in from the United States are not members of CCR and are not allowed into CCR because their work practices in the States are known to us, and therefore we will not have them in the registry.

Each salesman is given a sixty-day licence. It is good only for sixty days. It is issued to him on the basis that he will perform according to the rules and regulations of the Registry. Failure to do so will result in a non-issuance of his licence when the time comes.

Mr. Fortier: Let's take a given year, 1969 or 1968. How many of your new subscriptions are obtained by people over whom you exercise some form of control, and what percentage by the others?

Mr. Rumgay: At the present time, somewhere in the area of 75 per cent of all subscriptions, for all magazines are sold through our own operations.

Senator Everett: These are people directly employed at Maclean's?

Mr. Rumgay: Or through direct mail.

Mr. Fortier: Do you use Trans Canada Readers Service?

Mr. Rumgay: Trans Canada Readers Service, we do. That is a Canadian operation and a subsidiary of Maclean-Hunter.

Mr. Fortier: That is a wholly-owned subsidiary, is it?

Mr. Rumgay: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Is it available also as a vehicle to other magazines in Canada?

Mr. Rumgay: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Is it available as a subscription vehicle to American magazines?

Mr. Rumgay: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: I am sorry. Does that 75 per cent represent renewals or everything?

Mr. Rumgay: Everything—of our total circulation of any given year, 75 per cent of those people are people who subscribe through one of our own operations.

Senator Sparrow: What about new subscriptions then?

Mr. Rumgay: I am sure the same percentage would be true. It might even be higher.

Mr. Fortier: How many of your employees would have been censured by CCR in the last two years?

Mr. Rumgay: We have probably lost twenty-five or thirty.

Mr. Fortier: Out of?

Mr. Rumgay: Our average is about two hundred door-to-door salesmen. They change over quite rapidly. The door-to-door salesman doesn't work as a door-to-door salesman for many years.

The Chairman: Do these representatives sell American magazines as well?

Mr. Rumgay: Yes, some of them do and some of them don't.

The Chairman: But they are able to?

Mr. Rumgay: Some are and some are not able to.

Mr. Fortier: So, sort of the only tribunal for a complaint is the CCR. Is that correct?

Mr. Rumgay: There are also Consumer Protection Bureaus set up in various provinces, very active in this field, with whom we cooperate one hundred per cent.

Mr. Fortier: Do you have any of your representatives on the CCR Board?

Mr. Rumgay: Yes, the assistant circulation director is the Chairman of the CCR Board.

The Chairman: Would it be possible for us to have a set of the by-laws and regulations of CCR? Could you send those to us, Mr. Rumgay, at your convenience please?

Mr. McEachern: I presume everybody here is aware that in about five of the provinces there are 48-hour or 72-hour or 5-day rules that with anything bought from door-to-door, people can be protected. So that in addition to Maclean-Hunter's decision to give your money back, under the CCR rule, where there is no argument about it, they have to give the money back. As a result, the door-to-door people are behaving themselves a lot better than they were ten or twenty years ago.

Senator Everett: The 25 per cent that are not now controlled by Maclean-Hunter, are they particular organizations, and are there many of them?

Mr. Rumgay: There are some fairly active organizations in Canada. There is a very large mailing house in the United States, Publishers Clearing House. I am sure you have heard of this. There is the school plan which is where the children sell magazines and the school receives the profits. There are several of the Cowles' operations in Canada. Civic is here. Mutual is here. I might say, however, that many of the Americans are leaving Canada, partially because of the O'Leary Report. American publishers are not as interested in getting huge circulations in Canada.

The Chairman: Is the Home Readers Service here?

Mr. Rumgay: Yes.

The Chairman: What about Home Reference Library?

Mr. Rumgay: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: I think we would like to have on record your views. Mr. McEachern has said there has been a substantial improvement in the last ten years. Is it your evidence that the high-pressure methods by magazine salesmen are very few and far between in Canada today?

Mr. Rumgay: Yes, because high-pressure methods don't work any more. The public is too sophisticated, and there are too many provincial laws that allow them to rescind the contract anyway; so you may pressure them into the sale, but twenty-four hours later when they have the time to think about it they will say "no".

The Chairman: On this same subject, Mr. Rumgay, you stated that Trans Canada Readers Service, and please correct me if I am wrong, makes twenty-five million contacts a year.

Mr. Rumgay: What I mean is that twenty-five million contacts a year are made by all subscription sales people in Canada.

The Chairman: And how many adults are there in Canada?

Mr. Rumgay: There's probably then, twelve million.

The Chairman: So, it may not be high-pressure selling, but it is certainly very aggressive. Would you agree with that?

Mr. Rumgay: Yes, we would like to feel that we contact every one at least twice each year.

The Chairman: So that means I can look forward to several approaches in the future. Perhaps one of the key questions we have to put here is, is it that tough to get subscriptions?

Mr. Rumgay: The subscription business is like any other. It is competitive. When we allow American magazines to take orders for American subscriptions, then Canadian magazines are going to suffer accordingly; so we have to be just as aggressive as they are and more aggressive in terms of making contact.

Senator Everett: I am very interested in this 25 per cent not part of the CCR.

Mr. Rumgay: I said 25 per cent aren't Maclean-Hunter operations.

Senator Everett: Yes, you are right. You did say that.

Mr. Rumgay: 95 per cent of all subscription and publisher's agencies are members of CCR.

Senator Everett: In your judgment, they do not indulge in continuing questionable tactics?

Mr. Rumgay: Not continuing, no. I think from time to time somebody gets out of line, of course. When you have large numbers of people selling from door-to-door there's got to be a few who are going to get out of line.

Senator Everett: That leaves 5 per cent not members of CCR, and I gather, for the most part, from American operations?

Mr. Rumgay: Yes.

Senator Everett: For the most part, they are questionable in their tactics?

Mr. Rumgay: Let me say that we don't let them sell our magazines and that they are not members of the CCR.

Senator Everett: You say that you don't let them sell your magazines?

Mr. Rumgay: Right.

Senator Everett: You won't let them handle them at all?

Mr. Rumgay: That's right.

Senator Everett: In fact, they do not sell our magazines?

Mr. Rumgay: That's right.

Senator Everett: I have here a direct mailing from the Publishers Clearing House from which you could win a seventy-thousand-dollar home and numerous cars, a trip to Paris, a Cadillac Eldorado. The list just goes on and on and on.

Mr. Fortier: Could you win a magazine subscription?

Senator Everett: Could you tell me, if I pass this over to you, how many of your publications are depicted in that?

Mr. Rumgay: Three of them, or to include the French publications as separate units, there would be five: Chatelaine French and Maclean's French. The French is very insignificant because they do not mail into French Canada.

Senator Everett: What do they say there about Maclean's?

Mr. Rumgay: If I could find it, I would be glad to tell you. It says

"Bearer is entitled to 36 issues of Maclean's (3 yrs)

regularly by subscription $5.00
by single copy $12.60
Our Price Only $3.98"

Senator Everett: Their price is $3.98. In your direct mail subscription, what would you sell it for?

Mr. Rumgay: Well, the prices vary. You might sell twenty issues for two dollars.

Senator Everett: Let's talk about a comparable term of three years.

Mr. Rumgay: For three years, if you are talking about a regular price, it is five dollars, and we would sometimes sell it for five dollars to regular subscribers. We might on other occasions sell it for about that price.

We are members of ABC and under ABC, you must receive 50 per cent of the basic annual subscription price in order for the circulation to qualify; so you can only go to a certain level, and this is about it. This is about as far as you can go.

Senator Everett: The Publishers Clearing House would buy that from you?

Mr. Rumgay: It would send a subscription to us and remit some money to us for it.

Senator Everett: How much would they remit to you for the same subscription?

Mr. Rumgay: Their arrangement with us is, I believe, 15 per cent.

Senator Everett: 15 per cent?

Mr. Rumgay: Right.

Senator Everett: They send you 15 per cent?

Mr. Rumgay: That is correct.

Senator Everett: Let's try and work that out in dollars. That's sixty cents; so the Maclean's magazine which has a regular subscription price of $5.00, that you would sell for in excess of $2.50 because of the ABC regulations, is sold to the Publishers Clearing House for sixty cents?

Mr. Rumgay: Well, I think the term "sold" is not the best term. The commission arrangement is such that they keep 85 per cent, and send us 15 per cent.

Senator Everett: Maclean-Hunter's income on that subscription is sixty cents?

Mr. Rumgay: Yes.

Senator Everett: And ABC accept that as having been sold, for their regulations?

Mr. Rumgay: The only thing that matters to ABC is what the customer pays.

Mr. Fortier: If there is such a thing as a typical subscription, let's say, on a five-dollar subscription, how do your costs of securing that subscription average out?

Mr. Rumgay: Well, I would have to know what you meant by "costs". If you are talking now about the commission arrangement, I can give you that easily. If we are talking about sales costs and that sort of thing, it is difficult. Generally in the magazine business, door-to-door salesmen, the key people in the door-to-door sales operation, remit to their clearing house about 20 to 25 per cent. The clearing house in turn sends about 10 per cent to the publisher.

Mr. Fortier: Do your consumer magazines show a profit on circulation?

Mr. Rumgay: Yes, they do.

Mr. Fortier: Not on an accrual basis, but on a year-to-year basis?

Mr. Rumgay: Yes, they do.

Senator Everett: What does a door-to-door salesman generally sell a three-year subscription to Maclean's for?

Mr. Rumgay: For five dollars or sometimes a special rate which we sometimes have. We must never sell at more than our published price.

Senator Everett: And you say Maclean's return on that is 10 per cent?

Mr. Rumgay: That's right.

Senator Everett: And that is fifty cents for the three-year subscription.

Mr. Rumgay: Yes.

Senator Everett: Do you have volume requirements in making an arrangement with people like the Publishers Clearing House?

Mr. Rumgay: We do not.

Senator Everett: How do you determine that? Can anybody come to you if they are prepared to abide by CCR rules?

Mr. Rumgay: And put up a bond.

Senator Everett: How much?

Mr. Rumgay: Five hundred dollars.

Senator Everett: I am talking about a distribution house here, not an individual salesman.

Mr. Rumgay: Yes.

The Chairman: I am sorry. I was going to ask:- does the Trans Canada Readers Service sell in the United States?

Mr. Rumgay: No.

The Chairman: Not at all.

Senator Everett: I wonder if I could have that circular back. I may want a trip to Hawaii.

Mr. Fortier: Given Mr. Daly's statement this morning, that qualified circulation is as effective as paid circulation, have you ever considered going into controlled circulation with your consumer magazines?

Mr. McEachern: Sure, we thought about it but despite what you may think about what you heard in the last few minutes...

Mr. Fortier: What am I thinking?

Mr. McEachern: You are confused by some...

Senator Everett: If we are confused, I think the confusion should be straightened out.

The Chairman: I think Mr. McEachern was using that word in a different sense, I think in a specific sense.

Mr. McEachern: Our sales operation operates at a surplus, which for a general magazine is a very satisfactory operation. Some who are in the same kind of business think we are doing very well, and I mean that. We didn't always operate at a surplus. This is a development of rather recent years; so that for a general kind of magazine, the controlled circulation basis is not attractive at the present time.

Mr. Fortier: Do you envisage it at any time becoming attractive, and if so, what could change to make it attractive for the market?

Mr. McEachern: If a situation developed where for some reason, somebody wanted, say, twice the circulation, wanted Maclean's to get into every house in Canada, no matter what kind of a house, well, then we would have to rethink all this.

If an advertising situation developed where instead of, say, about a million circulation, we decided these kinds of magazines would be better at forty thousand of a certain kind of house, this again would be rethought; but, here, in all publishing decisions, you think of all these things, but at the present time, at a million, that is the way it works.

Mr. Fortier: Given the broader appeal of general interest magazines, would you not seek to have it reach as many homes as possible?

Mr. McEachern: Theoretically, perhaps, you might say the perfect general magazine might end into every home in Canada. That would create quite a few problems for us. We wouldn't possibly break even on our circulation.

Secondly, what advertiser wants to pay a great deal to get his message into every home in Canada? We are riding at a balance. Our present formula works.

Mr. Fortier: And you don't believe that in the foreseeable future, consumer magazines such as Maclean's, Chatelaine and their French counterparts will go from paid to qualified circulation?

Mr. McEachern: No, not in the foreseeable future.

The Chairman: Mr. McEachern, are you concerned about American overflow magazines?

Mr. McEachern: Oh, yes, always.

The Chairman: How do you react to Trans Canada Readers Service selling subscriptions to American magazines?

Mr. McEachern: The American overflow is going to continue regardless of what Trans Canada does.

The Chairman: Trans Canada makes some money on it.

Senator Everett:

Senator Everett: I think you said that Maclean-Hunter handles 75 per cent of the subscriptions to their own periodicals. Is that correct?

Mr. Rumgay: That is correct.

Senator Everett: And that you will refund the subscription price if there is a valid complaint against the salesman?

Mr. Rumgay: On those sold by our own organization, that is correct.

Senator Everett: But you will not refund on those sold by other organizations such as Publishers Clearing House?

Mr. Rumgay: No.

Senator Everett: Because you don't make enough money out of it?

Mr. Rumgay: We don't have their money to refund.

Senator Everett: Do you take any interest in whether or not they made a refund in the case of a valid complaint?

Mr. Rumgay: Of course.

Senator Everett: What do you do?

Mr. Rumgay: If the complaint came to us instead of to Publishers Clearing House, Maclean-Hunter would, in almost every case, make the necessary adjustment.

Senator Everett: If they didn't, there must be cases where one of these organizations just doesn't as a consistent policy make refunds at your direction?

Mr. Rumgay: I don't think we could do an awful lot. The type of operation that you are thinking about would not be one like Publishers Clearing House, which sells by direct mail. For example, on the Cowles operations, they might sell a large contract of which our magazines might be a part. There is not much we can do. We are not in a position every time to say to Cowles, "You may not handle our magazines."

Senator Everett: What do you mean by a "large contract"?

Mr. Rumgay: One hundred dollars, a hundred and ten dollars perhaps.

Senator Everett: To one person?

Mr. Rumgay: Yes, but for several magazines because there are seven or eight magazines on that contract.

Senator Everett: But if Cowles consistently got you into that situation...

Mr. Rumgay: But they don't.

Senator Everett: There must be cases, and I understand there are cases where it does happen that you have continuing problems with certain distributors and that you continue to supply them.

Mr. Rumgay: Our contract arrangements would be that we would continue to service the magazine unless we were instructed by Cowles not to.

The Chairman: Could I just ask one other question perhaps? We don't want to spend all afternoon on magazine subscriptions, gentlemen.

The Cowles company—I have a list of five of their subsidiaries in front of me, and you have recorded, Mr. Rumgay, that all of these subsidiaries are actively selling magazine subscription in Canada. Are they competitive with each other?

Mr. Rumgay: Yes.

The Chairman: Couldn't we all presumably buy a subscription to Maclean's from any one of them?

Mr. Rumgay: Each one sets up franchised outlets, on somewhat the same arrangement you might have from Frostee-Freez. The person in that particular city owns the company. He is competing with other franchisers set up under a different name by the parent operation.

The Chairman: Would you say that again? If you would speak a little more loudly...

Mr. Rumgay: Cowles Incorporated gives a franchise in Toronto to Civic Reading Club; he is a businessman in his own right. He owns the franchise. At the same time, they could give a franchise to Mutual Readers, to some other person in Toronto. Those two persons have no connection whatsoever. They are competing with each other.

The Chairman: Even that's a questionable practice, isn't it?

Mr. Rumgay: General Motors licenses a lot of General Motors dealers in Toronto.

The Chairman: That's a good point. Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Campbell: Mr. Chairman, if we are going to leave this subject, I don't want to leave this on a negative note. We are not out to gouge anyone. We are out to deliver a quality product for a proper price, and I get the impression that perhaps, as we go the other way and do everything possible to make refunds and so on, there can be the attitude that we are in fact gouging the public, and nothing could be further from the truth.

Senator Everett: Surely, but is it right that in the relatively small percentage of cases that you have no control over, where questionable practices are indulged in, that you do not take the ultimate step of refusing to supply those people with magazines?

Mr. Campbell: Yes, I think we must think of our image, and certainly if there was a bad case, I am sure that Mr. Rumgay would cut them off fairly promptly; in fact, immediately. His point is that this is not happening, and our people are reputable, and we will make every effort to see that Canadians get fairly treated.

The Chairman: Without leaving it on a negative note, and perhaps I could put the question which should leave it on a positive note. The Executive Vice-Presidents here must be concerned about this whole area. It must be a worrisome problem.

Mr. McEachern: We are very concerned because Maclean-Hunter is the most visible magazine publisher. We are probably hurt more than anybody else when these complaints are made. I might point out that the complaints are extremely popular with the daily newspapers because, you know, the appearance of a story about gouging a little old lady in Truro makes a good daily newspaper story. We get a great deal of bad publicity and it is extremely painful, I can assure you. I think we have told you all the things we do to try and avoid these messes. If you could tell us anything else we can do I shall be grateful.

Senator Everett: I don't think there was any suggestion in the line of questioning, but one thing that bothered me was the statement that I thought Mr. Rumgay made, that you wouldn't cut them off. Any criticism I might have...

Mr. Rumgay: Senator, we might get twenty complaints out of two million calls. I am responsible for the subscription department that handles the mechanics of putting these through. There is the odd letter that goes to the President. There is the odd letter that goes to the Editor or Mr. McEachern, the publishers, but they are totally in the proportion of twenty complaints out of two million calls.

The Chairman: May I put a final question and relay it to you, Mr. McEachern? There is in fact, as I am sure everyone knows, in the United States, a Federal Grand Jury inquiry as well as a study by the United States Federal Trade Commission, two separate studies, examining magazine subscription selling in the United States. I would feel reassured if you could tell me that the situation in Canada is better than it is in the United States.

Mr. McEachern: First of all, the intensity of competition in the United States is really worse than it is in Canada. Secondly, Look and the Cowles operation is fighting like mad for its financial health. They are really in trouble with Look, with their daily newspaper and their other affairs; so it is, "Push!, Push!, Push!" There is none of this "think it over" legislation such as we have in five provinces in Canada, so that in the United States, a person who does buy something at the door and an hour later or the next day finds it was stupid, is stuck with it. This doesn't prevail in Canada.

The Chairman: I do want to leave it.

Senator Smith: How important are newsstand sales to your company?

Mr. Rumgay: They make some money and secondly they are an instant gauge to the popularity of the magazine. If the newsstands start to fall away, we think we are not editing properly.

The Chairman: You can make a judgment from issue to issue?

Mr. Rumgay: Right.

Senator Smith: Why do you put a high price on the newsstand edition? Now, you are willing to accept a very small amount of money for a three-year subscription.

Mr. Rumgay: Let me answer that in two statements. The first thing is that we put a high price on the magazine because we want to make as much on it as we can, and secondly, the amount of money that the agency commits to us is only half of the story. We then have an opportunity to get this subscriber, who bought through the various field organizations, to renew directly with us at the full rate. More than half of our circulation revenue comes from renewals.

Senator Sparrow: Trans Canada Readers Service—do you own or have any interest in it?

Mr. Rumgay: Yes, it is a small operation that we started about five or six years ago.

Senator Sparrow: Do you own it?

Mr. Rumgay: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: Totally?

Mr. Rumgay: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: It is an incorporated subsidiary?

Mr. Rumgay: It is a registered trade name, not a subsidiary. It is a name under which we operate.

The Chairman: Gentlemen, I think we have perhaps dealt with magazine subscriptions. I am going to suggest, Senators, that we give the reporter a five-minute break. We will reconvene at 3:55. The only thing I can assure the witness is that the first question will not be on magazine subscriptions. (Upon resuming)

The Chairman: If I might call the session back in order. Mr. Fortier, any question that you want, except on magazine subscription selling, will be in order.

Mr. Fortier: My question is again directed to Mr. McEachern. In your brief oral presentation this afternoon, you spoke in very positive terms about general interest consumer magazines. I think we could take judicial notice of the fact that in the United States, that industry has been having some difficulties in recent years. Saturday Evening Post has gone out of circulation; in Canada the Star Weekly has gone out of circulation; and I think you alluded today earlier to the fact that Look and Life magazines are having problems. Would you make a few comments as Executive Vice-President of Maclean-Hunter, which publishes very substantial general interest consumer magazines, on the question: is there a future in Canada for those magazines?

Mr. McEachern: I will repeat what I said earlier. I believe there is a very valid national interest in us continuing to do this. I previously pointed out that our company sincerely believes that publishing these general interest national magazines in Canada has a bigger purpose than simply generating profit. With our growing electronic and other diverse operations, Maclean-Hunter, more than ever, is able to take, shall we say, a generous view of our position on the magazines, with their "very inadequate profit performance."

Now, when you come to the American situation, may I point out that Saturday Evening Post got into an awful mess because of the mismanagement of that company. They got into a great mess not because Saturday Evening Post was a good or a poor or an anachronistic magazine but because the management made a total mess of things. Life magazine is having serious trouble. Its management has been trying to work out a new formula for Life. The point I make, Mr. Fortier, is that in the instances of trouble in what we call "general magazines" in the United States, the trouble is not just because they are general magazines. There are other factors too.

Mr. Fortier: Do you still make the point that in Canada, Maclean-Hunter considers that its consumer magazines have a special role to play?

Mr. McEachern: We believe so, and we believe that we can continue to do this at an acceptable financial position.

Mr. Fortier: All right, let me ask you this then. Bearing in mind the generality of that expression "an acceptable financial position,"...

Mr. McEachern: You have the figures.

Mr. Fortier: ...how many years—for how long would you as a company expect to carry a general interest consumer magazine at a loss?

Mr. McEachern: Sorry. How can I answer that question?

Mr. Fortier: Well, I put the question to you. I think it is a valid one. How long would you?

Mr. McEachern: All right, all right, we have had ten, twenty years of a great deal of misery with these magazines. We are now in far less misery than during the last twenty years; so now is not the time to ask me about going out of business.

Mr. Fortier: Well, Hostess went out of business.

Mr. McEachern: Well, that is a special situation.

Mr. Fortier: I suppose there are always special situations. Why did it go out of business?

Mr. McEachern: Postal rates.

Mr. Fortier: Only, or was that the last straw?

Mr. McEachern: Hostess was a little idea for a controlled circulation publication of eight hundred thousand circulation, which was going to be given away to selected households. On that basis, at the previous postal rates, the idea might have worked out. For certain advertisers, this might have been attractive. It went to the higher income homes, the homes with young people. However the new postal rates raised our mailing costs on Hostess from one cent to four cents a copy. Hostess couldn't exist.

The Chairman: Was that magazine a response to Homemaker's Digest?

Mr. McEachern: In a way, yes. Is Homemaker's Digest still publishing?

The Chairman: I realize that's not one of your publications.

Mr. McEachern: The last I heard they were struggling. Are they still publishing?

The Chairman: Homemaker's Digest reorganized and recovered a million and a half dollars of indebtedness and are forming a new company and they are issuing the publication.

Mr. Rumgay: McLean's magazine has not been published for sixty-five years. Chatelaine has been going for forty-two years. That's part of the answer.

The Chairman: Except the Saturday Evening Post had been going for how many hundred years?

Mr. McEachern: If we start running more than it now is being run, your prediction might come true.

The Chairman: In fairness to Mr. Fortier, don't think it was a prediction.

Senator Langlois: What was the total increase in cost due to postal rates for Hostess?

Mr. McEachern: On all the magazines?

Senator Langlois: Hostess.

Mr. McEachern: Only on Hostess, oh, from one cent to four cents on eight hundred thousand.

Senator Langlois: But the total was eight hundred thousand?

Mr. McEachern: Eight hundred thousand.

The Chairman: Mr. Hodgkinson, who is the publisher of Chatelaine will be here next week, but you can give us this information; so please do.

Mr. Lloyd M. Hodgkinson; Director of Maclean-Hunter Limited and Publisher, Chatelaine Group: Yes, I introduced Hostess. The initial postage—we actually had eight hundred and ninety-five thousand circulation; so we paid $8,950.00 postage per issue. That increased to approximately $35,000.00 per issue. So the increase represented two hundred thousand postal increase.

Mr. Fortier: What is the main factor in Canada which in certain quarters is putting in doubt the viability of general interest consumer magazines?

The Chairman: Well, in fairness to the witness, I don't think Mr. McEachern has suggested that the viability is in doubt.

Mr. Fortier: I said in some quarters, it has been expressed.

The Chairman: In fairness, the view has not been expressed by Mr. McEachern...

Mr. Fortier: I didn't attribute that to Mr. McEachern.

The Chairman: Fine, as long as that is clear.

Mr. McEachern: Well, a lot of people are saying the things you have said about the Saturday Evening Post going out of business; hence that means our kind of magazines in Canada will go out of business. The points I made earlier were these: more people with a higher level of education, with more leisure and more discretionary income. More people are reading more books than anybody 25 years ago would have dared to predict. Television gets enormous attention. But the general magazine has the lasting advantage that it stays around the house so you can pick it up, look and read when you want to, when you want to, when you are in the mood. The TV schedule makes you the slave. Not so the magazine.

The Chairman: It will soon be "when you want it" for TV. Technological changes are changing that...

Mr. McEachern: Well, you could record our own.

The Chairman: I could go home tonight and watch last night's hockey game.

May I ask a question which relates to Mr. Fortier's? I made a note. I think you said that the circulation of the Canadian consumer magazines—and you used the example of Maclean's and Chatelaine—is proportionately much larger than the circulation of the magazines, Newsweek, Life and Playboy and so on. You did say that, and then you also said—perhaps you didn't say it, I believe Mr. Campbell said, that the per capita advertising expenditure in Canada is half of what it is in the United States. How do those two statements relate? I would imagine, given Mr. Campbell's statement, that we might expect the exact opposite in terms of Canadian consumer magazines themselves. Is there any explanation?

Mr. McEachern: In Canada there are only five or six magazines of any size circulation. In the United States, you have dozens and scores of consumer magazines.

The Chairman: There is no American magazine which comes close to dominating the American magazine market, but we have Maclean's?

Mr. McEachern: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: In answer to one of my earlier questions, Mr. McEachern, you said that I was depicting the situation which prevailed some ten years ago, but since then, things have gotten better. Before the O'Leary Commission some ten years ago, MacLean-Hunter represented that Canadian magazines were "threatened with extinction because of inequitable competition in circulation, as well as in advertising." The reference, of course, as we all recall, was to Time and Reader's Digest.

The Chairman: That quotation is from...

Mr. Fortier: Page thirty-one of the O'Leary Report. Since that time—we all know what has happened with the O'Leary recommendations as it affected Time and Reader's Digest. Since that time also, Time's share of magazine advertising revenue has increased steadily. It is now in fact, thirty-six cents out of every dollar spent in Canada. Since that time, the Magazine Advertising Bureau has been formed, and you are now in effect in bed with Time magazine and Reader's Digest. My question to you is: do you feel that they were wrong now in representing to the O'Leary Commission that there was inequitable competition?

Mr. McEachern: We retract nothing we said to the O'Leary Commission.

Mr. Fortier: Would you like to qualify it then?

Mr. McEachern: A great many things have happened since then. Now, the theoretical answer to a question about Time and Reader's Digest is, "Yes, like all the other American magazines, they should have left the country". However, they didn't. They are now well entrenched; so it is one of the facts of life that Time and Reader's Digest are here.

Mr. Fortier: Is that why you did not mention them at all in the Company's brief?

Mr. McEachern: Well, I didn't do the brief, but I wouldn't think so.

Mr. Fortier: There is a collective personality here before us?

Mr. Campbell: Yes, but the brief was about Maclean-Hunter and not about our competitors.

The Chairman: Let's say in fairness to Mr. Fortier, that the Committee—perhaps I should only speak for myself as Chairman—found it strange that a document like this brief relating your vitality to the magazine industry in Canada, particularly since it contained a short history of the situation, made absolutely no reference, not only to Reader's Digest and Time, but didn't make any reference at all to Senator O'Leary and his recommendations.

Mr. Campbell: After pointing out that Donald Hunter couldn't be here, my second point was that we ask for nothing.

The Chairman: We found it strange that there was no reference to the O'Leary Report, and I appreciate the point that you are not asking for anything. The one asking the question was Mr. Fortier, and perhaps I...

Mr. McEachern: I think the next thing that is important to point out here is that we didn't create the legislation. The Government created the legislation and so created a situation we had to live with. So we have gone on living with it.

Remember this, there are various kinds of competition. There is competition between television, radio, newspapers and magazines. Some buyers of advertising still say, "Well, give me 50 per cent television; 50 per cent magazine". Well, there is considerable importance in Canada having what might be recognized as a magazine industry with status. And that, Senator, was the situation which the Government of Canada created, not us; and it is one which we have gone on living with. So now there is Time, Reader's Digest, our publications and a few others. We live with it and make the best of it. Now, the status quo is something the Government created. We are going to make the best of it.

Mr. Fortier: Do you accept today that the existence of Time magazine and Reader's Digest is helping to create a total magazine vehicle for advertisers?

Mr. McEachern: At the present time, yes.

Mr. Fortier: Why was this not so prior to 1960?

Mr. McEachern: Prior to 1960, we were confronted with the prospect of 50 or 100 or 200 American magazines, using the gimmick of a Canadian edition, ready to swarm into this country and take over the industry. That would have been devastation as far as we and other Canadian publications were concerned. We found we could live with the situation the Government created, by giving special exemption to two U.S. publishers. An influx of 100 or 200 U.S. operators would have been quite a different matter.

The Chairman: Would you be unhappy if the Government now removed the exemption which Time and Reader's Digest presently enjoy?

Mr. McEachern: The immediate effect on magazine revenues would be formidable.

The Chairman: You would be unhappy?

Mr. McEachern: For this reason. In view of the enormous American economic penetration of Canada, a great many of the big advertising decisions are not made in Canada, but at Head Offices in the United States. If the Government of Canada were to go ahead and make a move against the two publications named, this would set off a typhoon of criticism. We would be charged with anti-Americanism and all sorts of things; so certainly for a time we would suffer.

Now, may I clear up another angle.

In television, Canada is now putting Famous Players and CBS out of the country because they are foreign companies. In that respect, Canada is simply applying the same rule as America applies to us. Maclean-Hunter cannot possibly get a broadcasting licence in the United States. We are foreigners. Canada's requirement that broadcast licences be held only by Canadian citizens simply applies to Americans the rule they have applied to us and other foreigners for many years.

The Chairman: Then the Government did the right thing in granting the exemption, did they, to Time and Reader's Digest in your opinion?

Mr. McEachern: I am, at the moment, talking about radio and television.

The Chairman: Yes, but you are the Executive Vice-President of Magazines. That's fine. Finish, please, I am sorry.

Mr. McEachern: The second point I wish to emphasize is the difference between publishing and television: Time and Reader's Digest of Canada have really no assets whatsoever other than their connection with Time offices; so if you send them home, they literally lose their entire Canadian business. They have nothing to sell. But broadcasters do have something to sell. Famous Players and other foreigners with broadcast licences can sell. They will make a big capital gain. Apart from the fact that these foreign licensees will not participate in the benefits of further Canadian development, they lose nothing. No hardship is visited upon them.

Mr. Fortier: I could argue with you that that becomes a forced sale before September, 1970.

Mr. McEachern: They are going to do pretty well, but Time in Canada has really nothing to sell.

Mr. Fortier: I appreciate that. Are you still competing with Time (Canada) for advertising?

Mr. McEachern: Oh, fiercely.

The Chairman: You then think the Government did the right thing in granting the exemption?

Mr. McEachern: I am not saying that. What suggest is that the Government then did that for them at that time was the only politically possible thing. You know what happened in Washington when eviction was threatened. It was going to be very rough to send Time and Reader's Digest home. I live with reality.

Senator Langlois: You have turned a bad situation into an acceptable one?

The Chairman: Would you then be in favour of extending the exemption to News- week and allow them to have a Canadian edition?

Mr. McEachern: I think the Government of Canada has had enough of this kind of problem for the present.

The Chairman: I am asking about you. It would certainly add competition to Time.

Mr. McEachern: That would be no encouragement. I notice that Mr. Honderich of the Toronto Star said, "Sure, send them home". I am in the magazine business and the status quo is something we have found a way we can sort of live with.

Mr. Fortier: This is a hypothetical question. I will go to another one. This trend in an increased and ever-increasing portion of the advertising revenue going to Time magazine is a fact. Do you agree with me on that? I mean, we have the figures in our research material, and also I have seen it in the MAB figures.

Mr. McEachern: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Now, if this trend continues, where will it lead? Is this trend going to stop?

Mr. McEachern: I would like to say "yes", but here is one special problem we have with both Time and Reader's Digest. They not only have the very great advantage of their artificially low cost structure. They have extremely attractive advertising rates for international advertisers. Exposure in international editions is something we can't compete with. And because of the growth of multi-national companies, I watch this development in magazine advertising with apprehension. But I repeat what I said earlier: The status quo we believe we can live with.

Mr. Fortier: I personally believe that if Maclean's and Le Magazine Maclean went out of circulation, it would be a national disaster, but if you foresaw that eventuality, would you go back to the Government today as a company and say, "Please help us"?

Mr. McEachern: That kind of direct subsidy is pretty alarming. We would be pretty worried before we would make that move.

Mr. Fortier: Rather than ask for a direct subsidy, would you be prepared to ask that Section 12A of the Income Tax Act apply to Time magazine and Reader's Digest in order to improve your competitive position?

Mr. McEachern: You mean Time (Canada)?

Mr. Fortier: Yes, of course.

Mr. McEachern: Is that 12A about the tax?

Mr. Fortier: Because you would have a choice at that point either of asking for subsidy or asking for the removal of the preferential treatment which Time magazine and Reader's Digest enjoy.

Mr. McEachern: Let me turn this around the other way.

Far more important to us than asking for the kind of things you are just talking about, is the maintenance of the present legislation. The present legislation is very poorly understood even in Government. Not many people have ever bothered to look at it. Not many people realize the numerous and extreme hazards in which the Canadian publishing industry stood, say, ten years ago.

The great peril now so far as all Canadian publishers are concerned,—and I would say a peril so far as the Canadian government is concerned—is that one of these days somebody in Canadian publishing wants to sell out. They find a buyer in the United States who will pay them more than any Canadian; or they can't find any Canadian buyer so they will come to the Canadian government and say, "let's change this legislation. Let's let the Americans in". So there is the real hazard, which one of these days will come with great pressure on Ottawa. They'll say "Nobody ever liked that legislation. It didn't achieve anything." That, gentlemen, is the danger. Maintaining the present legislation is all I ask for.

The Chairman: Could I just ask a related question on this? It is clear—at least I think it is clear, and if I am wrong, correct me—that although you are not retreating from the position you took prior to the O'Leary Report, and I find that a difficult rationale to follow, but I accept it at face value—it is clear now that as Senator Langlois said, you have learned to live with the situation, and indeed, to make the best of it. You have made a reference several times in the course of the afternoon to Maclean-Hunter's—if I may use the word you didn't say—"Canadianism". I share Mr. Fortier's opinion that Maclean's magazine is a Canadian national institution; we have too few national institutions in my opinion. Setting aside your interest in advertising sales, do you think that Time and Reader's Digest contribute to a growing Canadian identity?

Mr. McEachern: In their introductory eight pages, I think Time is working pretty hard to look Canadian. I give them first-rate marks.

Mr. Fortier: For what they are doing?

Mr. McEachern: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: The Digest—well, there are no good marks on that one?

The Chairman: I would like to ask one other question on this thing. You specifically identified the reference Mr. Honderich made when he was here. As I recall, he was quite upset about this situation. Would you care to expand upon the comments you were making in connection with Mr. Honderich's opposition to the present situation?

Mr. McEachern: I referred to Mr. Honderich's declaration that Time and Digest should be put out of the country forthwith. He is a newspaper publisher. His business is not directly involved in this issue.

The Chairman: Was he thinking of advertising sales or Canadian identity or both?

Mr. McEachern: I would think both.

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. McEachern: I think his position is idealistic but very unrealistic because I just don't think Time and Digest are going to be evicted from this country.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Craig was here last night when Mr. Kierans appeared before the Committee. Would you care to comment, Mr. Craig, on the increase in postal rates?

The Chairman: He just happens to have his notes.

Mr. Fortier: He told me to ask him the question—which is not true!!

The Chairman: For the record, that is not true.

Mr. Fortier: Now, would you care to comment, Mr. Craig, on the effect of the increase in postal rates on your publications?

Mr. Campbell: Mr. Craig will deal with the business paper end. As far as consumer magazines, it is a different ball game altogether.

Mr. Fortier: Fine, I agree.

Mr. Craig: The chairman warned me might be asked a question on this, so I have some notes on it. In the first place, I would like to go on record that we think that Mr. Kierans is to be commended for what he is trying to do with the Post Office.

Now, we don't agree with some of the methods. They have got lots of problems in the Post Office. We give him full marks for his but we feel that whether a publication is on a paid or controlled basis is not an appropriate concern of the Post Office. It is just the delivery of the item at an appropriate cost to the Post Office and a tolerable cost to the customer.

Mr. Kierans referred to the U.S.'s new proposals for making reforms in their postal service by the use of what we would call a Crown Corporation, but he didn't tell us that in the United States, in considering the adoption of this new plan, was also considering adopting a different accounting policy. It is pretty important. This is what I would call the "piggy-back" philosophy, where it is assumed that the Post Office was set up for the handling of all first-class mail, and the other services like second-class, fourth-class, third-class and so on, were going to absorb the incremental cost of handling that class of mail. This is a very important category so far as our business publications are concerned.

We, of course, got a very substantial rate hike, and we have had to adjust to live with those rates. We are concerned with what could happen if there are any future raises. I've kept talking about future rate increases and he keeps talking about the subsidy. It is a fallacy that Maclean-Hunter is being subsidized by these present postal rates. Taking the Post Office figures—and they have got many sets of figures—we are certain that our publications are paying their own way with the Post Office.

Mr. Fortier: This is what was said by the Latham Business Publications.

Mr. McEachern: Post Office figures indicate that it costs them 4.6 cents to handle a piece of second class mail including sorting costs of 2 cents. On the 1970 postage rate we are paying on Maclean's and Chatelaine, the price we pay the Post Office is three cents. But with our magazines, there are no sorting costs to the Post Office because as these things come off the press, packages of magazines are made up to fit precisely the needs of the postal delivery man as he walks his route.

Mr. Fortier: You do all that work?

Mr. McEachern: We do all that work; so that this 2.6 cent sorting cost is totally eliminated.

Mr. Fortier: Do you do that work at the request of the Post Office; the bundling and sorting?

Mr. McEachern: It started with our initiative in order to get better service out of the Post Office.

Mr. Fortier: How do your postal rates compare with the statutory rates which Time and Reader's Digest are charged? Are they competitive?

Mr. Campbell: Mr. Craig has pointed out that Time is lower because of the frequency.

Mr. Fortier: Your magazines are being afforded second-class treatment?

Mr. Craig: By and large.

Mr. Fortier: But your qualified circulation magazines are afforded third-class treatment. Do you suggest that this in effect puts it at a disadvantage for time of delivery?

Mr. Craig: I don't know whether you would think that paying more money, we should get a faster service, but we don't. I don't know of any difference between the statutory rate...

Mr. McEachern: Let me just make one point. Speed of delivery is not the primary factor in most business mail, including publishing. It is predictability of delivery that is of prime importance.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you for making that point because it has been suggested that speed of delivery was an important factor. I would agree with you that in very few instances is it that important.

Mr. McEachern: The Financial Post has a time factor which is important; getting it across the country by train is getting pretty slow; so we also print in Calgary. But under present Post Office regulations we must pay as though all 150,000 copies were mailed from Toronto. We do not get credit for the fact that 30,000 of those copies are printed in Calgary and some of them go by truck to Vancouver at our expense. So our effort to speed distribution involves us in very considerable expense and at the same time it relieves the Post Office of very considerable expense. We think we should pay only for Post Office services received.

Mr. Fortier: You did say, Mr. Campbell, that you were not asking for anything?

Mr. Campbell: We are not. Maclean-Hunter is making an observation.

Mr. Fortier: I think I would still ask this question of Mr. Craig. How should your qualified circulation magazines be treated by the Post Office?

Mr. Craig: Are you talking about service?

Mr. Fortier: Rates, rate-wise—we won't determine it as being a request.

Mr. Craig: I don't think we are going to get any reduction in the rates, but we still don't want any increases.

Mr. Fortier: You could live with the rates at the moment as they are?

Mr. Craig: Actually there is one anomaly that we don't think is proper, because we compete with American magazines, who are paying 15 cents a pound. This compromises us because we are paying a per-copy price, i.e., on the first two ounces, and so on. If we get to 2.1 ounces per copy, we have to pay an extra penny. So we have actually worked it out; we took every copy on these new rates and it averages about 25 cents a pound because of this per-copy price. In the United States, our kind of publication pays 15 cents a pound. The question of overflow circulation was referred to yesterday, and I regard overflow circulation as a fairly important competitor for our advertising dollars. I don't know how much we lose to American overflow circulation. It is very hard to pin-point.

Mr. Fortier: You have made no study of that?

Mr. Craig: No. The sort of thing that happens—the advertiser will use maybe twelve or twenty-four pages of advertising in the leading national U.S. publications. They may do the same in the leading Canadian publications, but many of them still only put six pages in. They have what we call a "Blist" or "b-schedule." It is hard to say how much of that there is. We see it in the individual examples, but to try and put a finger on it is difficult.

Mr. Fortier: Maybe we could pursue that this evening.

Mr. Campbell: Could I indicate again that we do not wish any subsidies on this. On the other hand, we are asking that the Post Office look at the incremental cost, which is one of the recommendations made in the United States and which we think has a great deal of merit for Canada as well. It is done for industry every day. I ask that the Post Office adopt the same procedures.

Mr. Fortier: Have you ever accepted Mr. Kierans' offer to have a look at his figures?

Mr. Campbell: Yes, we would very much like to sit down with him, but I don't think it is a matter of looking at costs. It is an accounting philosophy or approach to the problem and what does the Post Office want to do?

Mr. Fortier: Mr. McEachern mentioned The Financial Post a few minutes ago. We have noted that The Financial Post now publishes a mens year magazine and one on world travel, which I presume must compete for advertising with Maclean's and Chatelaine.

Mr. McEachern: Correct.

Mr. Fortier: Why?

Mr. McEachern: There is a good deal of competition between publications within Maclean-Hunter.

Mr. Fortier: Is there competition also at the editorial level in any of the Maclean-Hunter publications?

Mr. McEachern: I don't understand.

Mr. Fortier: Well, is it accepted that there may be different editorial viewpoints expressed in the different Maclean-Hunter publications?

Mr. Campbell: Yes, certainly, there are.

Mr. Fortier: On that point, I have read the "Maclean-Hunter Editorial Manual and Style Guide" and I would like to refer you to page 46. We read in the third paragraph from the bottom: "Views expressed on such matters should not be in conflict with opinions voiced in other publications of the company." How would you reconcile this with what you have just said?

Mr. Campbell: What page were you quoting from, please?

Mr. Fortier: 46.

The Chairman: As a matter of fact, Mr. McEachern, you sent it to us.

Mr. McEachern: May I reply?

The Chairman: Would you like to see the quotation?

Mr. McEachern: That quotation vastly oversimplifies the editorial facts of life in Maclean-Hunter. It will not, I think, surprise you that there are some things about which we feel deeply and on which we expect editorial conformity. We believe in Canada's form of government, for instance. We would not want one of our publications preaching communism. But there is another level of subject material where we respect diversity of opinions among our publications. For instance. Should a crude oil pipeline be built eastward to Montreal so that Western Canada crude can supply all eastern Canada. That is a complex problem in economics and forecasting and a subject where difference of opinion among very well-informed people is widespread.

What we do ask of editors is that they be very well informed. We don't want them talking through their hats. On the pipeline subject—and this is typical of a hundred other issues constantly coming into the news—editors of intelligence and real knowledge of the subject may have quite different views.

Mr. Fortier: I don't want to belabour the point, but still it would appear that your publications must be guided by this manual. In it we are told that if you have any views to express on matters, they must not be in conflict with views voiced in other publications of the company.

Mr. Craig: I would just hope that all of our editors read that as Mr. Fortier read it.

Mr. Fortier: We are doing our homework.

Mr. Campbell: We have to do ours and write the manual.

Mr. Fortier: On page 47: "Any editorials could be discussed with the president's office—they are unusually provocative, critical or likely to arouse controversy."

Mr. Campbell: I apologize for the manual, let me point out to you that I was just talking to Mr. Hunter on Monday, and he said the brief that had come in and pointed it to me that he was designated there in our representation as the final authority. He wanted me to draw to your attention that in the last six years, while he has accepted and naturally accepts that final responsibility, he can recall that there were only three times when somebody had presented a particular editorial problem, and in each one of those cases, it was a matter dealing with good taste. That is three times in six years.

Senator Everett: There is a method provided here which is pretty successful. It says: "Editors will often find it valuable to follow The Financial Post and Maclean's Magazine editorial pages as a guide, because the frequency of issue of these publications often enables them to present the general viewpoint of the company first."

Mr. Campbell: Since that time, of course, the frequency of Maclean's is different. In fact, there is not a published editorial comment at all.

Senator Langlois: How long has it been around?

Mr. Campbell: It was brought out in 1959.

Mr. Fortier: It was offered, you know, as a kind of bible "according to St. Maclean".

Mr. Campbell: Like many bibles, it is not followed.

Mr. Fortier: On page 5—I am afraid I have to read this into the record and ask for your comments. At the bottom of the page. "All articles that are potentially libelous or in contempt of court should be submitted to the president's office. This also applies to articles dealing with particularly controversial subjects, where taking a stand one way or the other might have a bearing on company policy, prestige or interests."

Senator Everett: I think you should go on.

Mr. Fortier: "The company's senior officers may know angles of which the writer or editor is not aware and which might lead to quite a different conclusion than the one that has been reached by the writer."

The Chairman: Well, I think that we have dealt with the manual at sufficient length.

Mr. McEachern: I don't think the Executive Vice-Presidents have read it.

The Chairman: I was going to ask who wrote it. May I change places for just a moment and ask a couple of questions? In the brief on page 10, No. 11, "The Printing Division of Maclean-Hunter operates the company's modern printing plant in North Toronto, where most of the company's Canadian publications are produced. The Plant, which occupies 200,000 sq. ft. was built in 1948 and has 700 employees. The Commercial Printing Division sells and services printing for outside customers." Are these printers members of a trade union?

Mr. Campbell: No, they are not.

The Chairman: Have the various unions tried to organize Maclean-Hunter?

Mr. Campbell: Back in the 1930's there was an attempt, but there is no union organization within Maclean-Hunter.

The Chairman: And that includes the American Newspaper Guild?

Mr. Campbell: That is correct.

The Chairman: May I ask one other question about this Printing Division? It says the Commercial Printing Division sells and services printing for outside customers. Are there any competing magazines or books printed at that division?

Mr. Campbell: From a publishing point of view?

The Chairman: Well, competing—both, really.

Mr. Campbell: For example, we print the Boy Scout magazine, which has a Coca-Cola ad on the back page. We don't took upon it as a competitor.

The Chairman: Are there any competitive general consumer magazines, for example?

Mr. Campbell: Yes; Saturday Night is printed by the plant. There are one or two trade association papers, and papers for the business field that are printed at the plant.

The Chairman: Mr. Campbell, I wonder if I could ask you something else. First of all, page 18 of your brief at the top: "Maclean-Hunter editors are guided by a general manual covering general procedure and policy." That is the one we have been talking about, is it not?

Mr. Campbell: Yes, it is.

The Chairman: On page 14, section 19: "All stations owned or controlled by Maclean-Hunter have local editorial direction." There is no similar manual for broadcasters?

Mr. Campbell: There is not, and I think we have probably got our point across that this manual should be turned inside out. On page 1, where it says "Published in 1959", it also says, "Fear not when doing right".

The Chairman: Well, I have no comment on that at all. There is no editorial direction at all in broadcasting?

Mr. Campbell: No, there isn't.

The Chairman: The question I am going to ask could keep us here for a great deal of time, and I am not going to put the question as specifically as I might, because you yourselves will be returning. At least, I hope you are still coming.

In terms of the corporate structure and your responsibilities, for example, how often do you visit the broadcasting properties yourselves? In other words, how direct is your activity in broadcasting at the station?

Mr. Campbell: Very direct, and very informal. I spend 90 per cent of my time in broadcasting. I would be in Toronto for a minimum of two to three days to see that everything is all right at CKEY. Hopefully once a week—sometimes I don't get up there weekly—in Chatham, and in Kitchener, at least once a month for a management meeting with those people. Primarily at those meetings we are looking at what the programming is because again that is the name of the game. We concentrate the majority of our time on the programming side, of course, and naturally, looking at annual budgets as well. Also, we have a set-up, with the exception of Toronto, for Kitchener and Chatham; or where there is an outside company such as Calgary, we have outside directors on the board. Therefore there are six, seven or eight Calgary director locally.

Secondly, we have set up in all these communities now, an advisory programming group who do nothing but programme on an advisory basis. We certainly sit down with them anywhere from two to four times a year to listen to their ideas, to see what better things, or what contributions we could make to the community.

We have what we call "listen-ins" or "watch-ins", and they are very educational but very tedious, because you listen and you have to take the people out of the station so that they are not interrupted, and you listen to the radio, let's say, or you watch television from when you go on the air to find out what it is we are doing and how we can improve the product.

The Chairman: Are you interested in bringing in advertising sales, presumably for revenue?

Mr. Campbell: Yes.

The Chairman: I have just two other questions on broadcasting, at least until later on in the hearings. Do you have a representative company selling advertising?

Mr. Campbell: Well, indeed, on the broadcasting operations, we have a local sales operation right in that particular community which usually has five or six people in each of the vicinities; but over and above that, they are represented nationally. We have two Canadian national representatives. We have one firm, for our two stations in Kitchener and Chatham, and we have another representative organization representing us for CKEY and Calgary.

The Chairman: They have other stations on their list besides yours?

Mr. Campbell: Yes, and we have a minor interest in one of the sales organizations and no interest in the other.

The Chairman: Yes, and the programming at your stations varies greatly; in other words, you have so-called rock-and-roll stations; you have good-music stations. Am I wrong in that?

Mr. Campbell: We do not have a rock-and-roll station but for say such a community as Chatham, we try to be all things to all people. So there is rock music played in the evening and then we are back with the farm broadcasting in the morning.

The Chairman: Do you have a consistent concept?

Mr. Campbell: No, we don't. Every station is completely different and unique.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. McEachern, in recent years you have had a very well-publicized problems with the publication of Maclean's magazine. As recently as last fall, Mr. Charles Templeton when he resigned, complained that here were intolerable interferences from management in editorial matters. Now, in Time magazine, after Mr. Templeton's resignation, you were quoted as saying that you, Mr. McEachern, carried the ultimate editorial responsibility, and I quote: "I am, in effect, on the day-to-day operation, editor-in-chief." Would you care to comment on that? I think we should have your comments on the record.

Mr. McEachern: That is roughly the fact. In publishing a serious, far-reaching publication, the company management is ultimately responsible as to what kind of use is being made of the vehicle. It has the legal responsibility. It has financial responsibility to shareholders, and it has moral responsibility to subscribers.

Mr. Fortier: How do you reconcile these three responsibilities of which you have spoken with what has been referred to as editorial freedom of the editor?

Mr. McEachern: Editors of Maclean's and Chatelaine and all other Maclean-Hunter publications have far more editorial freedom than is the case, in the Time-Life organization, or Look, or any of the big American magazine operations. Our editors have a lot more freedom than they would have running newspapers.

I think it should be pointed out that in connection with these changes of editors on Maclean's magazine which you refer to, those weren't just my decisions. They were the unanimous decisions of the Maclean-Hunter executive committee. I had those decisions carried out.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Templeton, when he resigned last fall, did not do it as a result of being fired. In other words, he resigned because of what he termed editorial unfairness. Would you care to answer that point?

Mr. McEachern: No comment.

Mr. Fortier: Your present editor of Maclean's, Mr. Peter Gzowski, writing in the Canadian Forum in 1964, said, and I quote:

"No Canadians were luckier to have Maclean's exist than the people who worked there. For as long as most journalists can remember it's been the best place in Canadian journalism to work. Probably it still is. And probably our six resignations will help to make it a little better for a while than it might have been. But it can't be as good as when they let the editors do the editing."

Do you let Peter Gzowski, the editor of Maclean's magazine, do the editing?

Mr. McEachern: What I said stands. The editor in our operation has more liberty than he would have on any major Canadian daily newspaper, but there are limits. Let's face the fact that there is an awful lot of double-talk about this phrase "editorial freedom".

Mr. Fortier: Would you care to give us your interpretation of editorial freedom as applied to a magazine?

Mr. McEachern: I have said the publishers have the moral responsibility for the kind of publication that goes out, the financial responsibility and the legal responsibility. For instance, Maclean's has been going for, what, sixty, seventy years. Its two language editions have a million circulation. In a country of twenty million people, that fact alone tells you a great deal about the kind of magazine it has to be and about the kind of magazine a million subscribers have contracted to buy. Any one accepting the editorship of Maclean's must realize and accept the basic fact that it is the subscribers for whom he must edit. If an editor wants to edit a magazine solely to please and entertain himself and impress his close companions, then he is quite probably perpetrating fraud on his subscribers.

If he wants to turn Maclean's into Playboy we say no, let people buy Playboy. If an editor wants to produce a fancy little magazine for an audience of 5,000, we would say, No. That isn't what you undertook to do, nor the kind of magazine a million people subscribed to. In being an editor in commercial publishing, you try to please your audience first, yourself second.

Mr. Fortier: But when you retain the services of a man to fill the position of editor, don't you know the sort of man you are hiring?

Mr. McEachern: We hope so.

Mr. Fortier: Do they change?

Mr. McEachern: You have been quoting some of my more unfavourable publicity.

Mr. Fortier: I was looking for the other kind.

Mr. McEachern: Every time you appoint a new editor you hope to heaven it is going to be the most wonderful thing that ever happened to the publication. But sometimes there are terrible disappointments.

Mr. Fortier: I thought we should have your answers on the record.

The Chairman: I would like to ask one more question. I was going to ask quite a few questions on this. I am glad that Mr. Fortier made the point he did because this may very well be a problem, we will see. So I can't promise you that it won't be something that comes up in the next week.

At that time, Mr. Gzowski will be here—at least, hopefully he will be here. I will ask you a question about him. He also left the magazine as editor at one time, didn't he. Am correct?

Mr. Fortier: I think he was managing editor.

The Chairman: Well, a writer or managing editor. Let's say he was a writer, but in an event when he left, there was a minor storm of controversy—I suppose not as much as for Charles Templeton—but Gzowski also said some things which were very critical of the company in terms of editorial unfairness.

Now, who changed their mind? Did Gzowski change his mind about you or did you change your mind about Gzowski? What was the central process which let you to bring Gzowski back?

Mr. McEachern: He asked for the job.

The Chairman: Well, had Mr. Fortier asked for the job, would you have hired him?

Mr. McEachern: I don't know. He looked very good.

Mr. Fortier: I made a note of that. Thank you.

The Chairman: Mr. McEachern, I am sure there are considerations other than that he simply asked for the job. To be even more specific, I recall Templeton's departure, and happened to hear a radio programme the very night, or the night after, on CBC, in which the questions were put by Peter Gzowski. It was a telephone programme. One of the people who discussed Templeton's resignation was yourself.

Now, I listened to that programme with great interest, and it was a fascinating piece of radio work. Having listened to that programme, I must say I was astounded a number of weeks later to learn that you had hired Peter Gzowski. There must have been something more than that he simply asked for the job.

Mr. McEachern: Well, plus the fact that at the time he asked for the job, we were looking for a new editor at that moment. We hoped it would work out.

The Chairman: May I ask you this, and then perhaps we could leave it? This has nothing to do at all with his salary; I am not referring to that at all. Are his terms of reference, in terms of editorial freedom, any different than those which Mr. Templeton had?

Mr. McEachern: No.

The Chairman: All right. Are there other questions that the Senators have? Senator Everett, do you have something?

Senator Everett: I would like to go to the financial statement of Maclean-Hunter. You have an Unearned Revenue of $7,681,000, being the portion of paid subscriptions incurred. Can you tell me how that is taken into income?

Mr. Campbell: Yes. We sell a five-dollar subscription, Senator, and we set it up as a liability on the books at five dollars. Perhaps this was a three-year subscription, so we are going to deliver 36 issues; therefore, each month we take in one-thirty-sixth of the five dollars into income on an "as-delivered" basis.

Senator Everett: On an "as-delivered" basis?

Mr. Campbell: Yes.

Senator Everett: You went public in what year?

Mr. Campbell: In 1965, I believe it was.

Senator Everett: What percentage of the equity shares are held by the general public itself?

Mr. Campbell: When we went public in 1965, there was 15 per cent of the stock which was made public. There is one major holding by Mr. Hunter, which is just under 50 per cent. If you consider all of us in this room as the public, plus eleven hundred shareholders, maybe one hundred or two hundred of those are corporate, nine hundred are general public. It is all in the hands of the public.

Senator Everett: What proportion is in the hands of the employees?

Mr. Campbell: Well, I don't know whether Mr. Hunter is an employee or not. Mr. Hunter owns just about 50 per cent.

Senator Everett: The other employees?

Mr. Campbell: I would hazard a guess at 10 per cent.

Senator Everett: Are there any other large shareholders outside of that?

Mr. Campbell: There is no one in excess of 2½ per cent, no.

Senator Everett: Does Maclean-Hunter hold shares in any other media?

Mr. Campbell: One share of some companies.

Senator Everett: That's all?

Mr. Campbell: That's all.

Senator Everett: Mr. Campbell, I gather your company is preparing to make an assault into the cable TV field?

Mr. Campbell: I don't know that I like the word "assault", but, yes, we are very interested in cable TV.

Senator Everett: How far do you propose to go with cable TV?

Mr. Campbell: I suppose the best answer is, just as far as we possibly can.

Senator Everett: So you would buy them wherever they are?

Mr. Campbell: Yes, yes.

Senator Everett: On whatever basis you can?

Mr. Campbell: Now, you know money is pretty tight right now, and there are financial limitations of the company who the Executive Committee of the board must approve it. We have been in cable now for several years, and we like what we see.

Senator Everett: How many cable systems do you own or have a substantial interest in?

Mr. Campbell: Sixteen.

Senator Everett: Sixteen?

Mr. Campbell: Yes. Now, some of those are, like, in the Town of Huntsville, Ontario, that has all of 900 subscribers. In the City of St. Catharines, which has a population of 125,000, we have a potential of 25,000 subscribers, but it's a new system so there are only a few subscribers. Most of them are in small towns north of Toronto.

Senator Everett: Are cable TV systems, at this stage, generally profitable at this point in time?

Mr. Campbell: Well, those that have been in operation for some period of years, yes. The systems that we have started in the last two years are not. Cable is not a gold mine, as many people think. It is a good business, but it is a typical 12 to 15 per cent return on investment.

Senator Everett: That is up to a certain point, or is that at a fully developed stage?

Mr. Campbell: That is at a fully developed stage, assuming that you have a good saturation level; 60 per cent to 70 per cent saturation.

Senator Everett: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Are there any other questions, or may I perhaps, on behalf of the Senators, express...

Mr. Fortier: I am very curious. Maclean-Hunter Limited owns Maclean-Hunter Publishing Corporation, which is based in the State of Illinois.

Mr. Campbell: Yes, sir.

Mr. Fortier: Which in turn owns 100 per cent of National Market Reports Inc., also of Illinois.

Mr. Campbell: Right.

Mr. Fortier: It in turn owns 100 per cent of National Automotive Publishers Ltd. of Toronto.

Mr. Campbell: Right.

Mr. Fortier: My question is: is advertising placed in the Canadian Red Book, which is published by National Market Reports Inc. in the United States, subject to the provisions of Section 12A of The Income Tax Act?

Mr. Craig: We don't carry any advertising, no.

The Chairman: That answers the question.

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

The Chairman: Well, Honourable Senators, ladies and gentlemen...

Senator Everett: What is Hunco Limited?

Mr. Craig: That is a private, personal company of the Hunter family.

Senator Everett: They own it completely, do they?

Mr. Craig: I believe so. Well, they control it.

Mr. Fortier: In Maclean-Hunter Cable TV Limited, I believe you own 60-odd per cent?

Mr. Campbell: It is 60.3 per cent.

Mr. Fortier: Who owns the remaining 39.7 per cent?

Mr. Campbell: It just went public in January. The president owns 7 per cent. The balance is in the hands of the public.

The Chairman: May I, on behalf of the Committee, thank you, gentlemen. You know that by any standards, Maclean-Hunter occupies a major and national position in the Canadian mass media spectrum, and I assure there are many attendant problems coming before us on five separate occasions for which we apologize. There are problems, perhaps, each time you have to submit yourself to long, extensive questioning. May I say on behalf of the Committee that we are happy you are so patient, and I think I would be remiss if I didn't ask you to take our good wishes to Mr. Hunter for a continuing speed recovery.

May I also say to the Senators that this evening Maclean-Hunter will be back with us when we hear from the Business Publications Division at eight o'clock.

Thank you.

The Committee adjourned.

UPON RESUMING AT 8:00 P.M.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, this evening we resume our study of both Maclean-Hunter Limited and the business press by receiving a brief from Maclean-Hunter Business Publications Division.

To introduce the witnesses, the chief spokesman on my immediate right is Mr. George Gilmour, who is Vice-President of Maclean-Hunter Business Publications Division. On Mr. Gilmour's right is Mr. Frank Turner, who is Manager of the Editorial Services Department. Perhaps Mr. Gilmour will describe that function in a moment or two. On my immediate left, in his familiar seat, might say, is Mr. J. L. Craig, Executive Vice-President of Maclean-Hunter Business Publications Division and British Operations. On his left is Mr. John Downey, who is Manager and Editor of the Maclean-Hunter Publication Home Goods Retailing.

I think Mr. Gilmour has been here for several of the sessions and perhaps it is not necessary for me to say all the things I usually say. We are going to ask you to make a oral statement, Mr. Gilmour, and following that we would like to ask you questions.

the brief and on the statement and on other matters.

I hope I am not displaying a conflict of interest when I say to the Honourable Senators that Mr. Gilmour is a personal friend of mine of some years standing. However, I hope you will all disregard that fact.

Senator Langlois: We will keep our eyes open!

Mr. George Gilmour, Vice-President of Maclean-Hunter: Honourable Senators and Senator Davey, first of all I would like to ask you to make two corrections to the brief that you have in front of you. The first one is on page twelve where I have made an inexcusable omission in not mentioning that the Business Publications division of Maclean-Hunter maintains an Ottawa bureau where Maurice Cutler and Stephan Duncan have been in operation for some years and which has been in business for some twelve years.

The second correction is on page sixteen and I would ask you to change the figure at the bottom of the page which says $196.80 to $380.00.

I heard somebody say, "you are ahead of me", that is why I wanted to make the change.

Now, I have with me tonight three of my associates who will attempt to help me in answering some of the questions that you may direct at us. I would like to introduce them perhaps a little more fully than some of the people have been introduced and I do this with a purpose. I want you to know something about their background because I think it might have an effect on the questions and their answers.

Mr. J. L. Craig is Executive Vice-President responsible for the Business Publications Division Maclean-Hunter Limited, London, England; Design Craft Limited; Industrial and Trade Shows of Canada; and Maclean-Hunter Publishing Corporation, Chicago. He is also a director of Maclean-Hunter Limited.

Mr. John Downey is manager and editor of Home Goods Retailing, a tabloid format business publication serving furniture, floor covering, housewares, appliances and home entertainment retailers in Canada. His background is journalistic. He was employed by the British United Press first in Toronto, where he spent some time before being appointed by BUP to the press gallery in Ottawa where he spent two years. In 1952 he joined United Press of America as editor of their European service in London, England. In 1954 he returned to Canada and in 1955 he joined Maclean-Hunter as Montreal news bureau chief for Style and Home Goods Retailing and in 1964 became both manager and editor.

Mr. Frank Turner, manager of Editorial Services and Editorial Art departments for the Business Publications Division. His responsibilities include the recruitment and training of editorial people in addition to the managing of his two departments. His background is also journalistic. He was a former night city editor and Ontario editor for the Toronto Globe & Mail, chief copy editor of the Toronto Telegram; columnist, city editor and news editor for the Guelph Daily Mercury, news editor for the St. Thomas-Times-Journal; editor of the Kamloops Daily Sentinel and prior to that had a period on London's Fleet Street as sub-editor with the News Chronicle. He joined Maclean-Hunter in 1960 as New Editor for Marketing and in 1961 was appointed senior copy editor of a new "copy desk service" which was started in Maclean-Hunter. In 1963 he was appointed "Manager, Editorial Services" and in 1964 these responsibilities were enlarged to include our Editorial Art Services Department.

I am a Vice-President of the company and both Mr. Craig and I are directors of Maclean-Hunter.

We have endeavored to incorporate the answers to most of the questions that you have raised into our official brief. There are, however, three items which haven't been covered in great detail in the brief and I want to ask these three people who are with me to give about a five minute point-of-view on the three areas I have in mind.

First I would like to ask Mr. Frank Turner to speak to the questions which were numbered 18 and 19 in your Guidelines to us and which deal with the recruitment of journalists and the opportunity which our company offers to them.

Mr. Frank Turner, Manager of Editorial Services and Editorial Art Department for the business Publications Division: Honourable Senators and Senator Davey. As a working journalist I feel it a great privilege to be here tonight. I will let you know about the pleasurable aspects of this after the session. I am a great believer in very terse and short editorials so I will confine my comments here to about five minutes on a topic incidentally which is all-embracing and could take quite a time.

As Mr. Gilmour has explained, I got my start in journalism in newspapers. Like other newspapermen who are now with the business press, I switched, quite frankly, because of the desire to become more involved in direct and responsible journalism, and I am glad to report that in so doing I have found an unsurpassed degree of editorial autonomy.

The thoughts I am expressing tonight are my own. I have been concerned in recent years with a deterioration in standards of journalism whereby quantity, that is, almost uncontrolled verbiage or trivia is overcoming quality. The newspaper, and particularly the small-town newspaper, although not exclusively, is no longer turning out the kind of journalists that modern journalism needs.

I can say with all honesty that the reverse holds true with the specialized business press, i.e. the progressive segment of the business press. This is not just some accidental phenomenon; it is the result of very selective recruiting, it is the result of a realistic management philosophy of investing in talent, and it is the result of a continuing, if sometimes unheralded and comparatively subdued pride on the part of creative people in business journalism.

The business press, the part of it that I work for anyway, is certainly not resting on any laurels. I don't know of any other print medium in this land that is so introspective in its endeavors to upgrade standards. Financially backed by management, a core of dedicated editors is continually undertaking a program of training and seminars to make sure all editors have the opportunity to be exposed to the latest trends and thoughts in journalism, business, and yes, in government too.

Right now, at Maclean-Hunter, we have a series of give-and-take training sessions with new editors to the business. And this is part of my responsibility—recruitment and training.

Our main quest is to get the best talent that we can. Invariably we promote from within and therefore we are particularly keen to get talent at the junior level so that we can prepare them to take on responsible roles on our business publications.

The readers of our publications are leaders in industry, businessmen, skilled tradesmen, in other words a large segment of the people who are providing the impetus for the future of this country. Our editors, in other words, have a big-ticket responsibility. A good business publication is not just a bystander of the scene; it is in a real sense a participant, and therefore to fulfill our function to communicate with our readers, it is essential we have the people who have the journalistic skills, the sometimes specialized background certainly, the intellectual capacity, and the potential to be able to provide leadership for Canadian industry and command its respect. In other words, we are not in the business of detached and aloof journalism, or irresponsible journalism.

Therefore we are always searching for the best young men and women, and we are willing to pay to get them. Our starting pay rates for example, are better than those of the Toronto dailies. I certainly feel our working conditions are quite a lot better.

At the relatively junior level, we are particularly interested in university graduates and not necessarily graduates of schools of journalism. I can think of graduates of engineering, scientific and of political science courses whom we have trained to combine their special aptitude with their natural affinity with the written word.

On a personal level, I am very pleased to be able to mention one of our two permanent business press editors in our Ottawa bureau which incidentally we overlooked mentioning in our brief. We have a young man who came to us straight from Carleton with a political science degree. We trained him in journalism; he worked on one of our publications, and is now doing a first-rate job here for many of our business publications in the capital.

The Chairman: Who is that?

Mr. Frank Turner: Mr. Steve Duncan, who is with us tonight.

I have to admit, however, that our search for talent is far from easy. As I have mentioned, we are looking for a special kind of person, and I hasten to add, this does not imply a stereotype. The young men we hire now, and women too, hopefully have the potential to adapt to our selective journalistic and to have the creative journalistic and business acumen to lead our publishing business in the years ahead.

We have a series of writing tests, psychological tests, and interviews, whereby at least we feel we are making the right choice—for both parties. I am a great believer in ethical hiring practices, and when young people come to work for us they are given a real opportunity to develop their talents.

As you probably know, there are now more schools of journalism than ever before and yet, as of this time, we can ascertain no ready-made benefits at Maclean-Hunter, with the possible exception of Carleton, to be fair. One reason for this, I think, is an overwhelming news-newspaper-oriented approach to teaching journalism which is still very strong. Although we have attempted to communicate with some universities, it still takes two to tango or it used to in my day.

The Chairman: Does it still, Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: In my book it does!

Mr. Frank Turner: Then, of course, there are the changing attitudes of young people we have to understand and this is very important in this day and age. I repeat, we have to have people who can communicate with our specialized audience. Many of the young people we are interested in, are probably radical by perception and this can be a good thing providing we feel they can meet us half way.

Journalism, particularly business journalism, is changing by involvement and even the "veterans" realize this is a healthy and viable development. We must explore how we can help these young people we select to become more aware of what is realistic and what is unrealistic, and from our standpoint to encourage them so that they can help take us into the rapidly changing future.

We go to great pains (and I think I have chosen the right word there) to provide our aspirants with basic journalism techniques. We stress the value of good writing and graphics, and above all responsibility and accuracy.

We are now, more than ever, attempting to introduce the new breed to the actual business end of business journalism, and I mean administration and profit and loss aspects. For the sake of our business we have to have more journalists who will perceive greater frontiers and bring to the business side the sensitivity, the understanding, the ambition, the objectivity, the determination and the perception that the good journalist harbors in his soul, and we have to do this for the continuation of responsible and balanced communications for the Canadian business community.

Thank you very much and I would be pleased to answer any questions.

The Chairman: Thank you very much.

Mr. George Gilmour: Mr. Chairman, may I ask Mr. Downey to speak to the question in your Guidelines, which was number eight and which deals with the question of what is the prime function of our medium and then goes on to ask some questions about the effect of commercial considerations. I am sure you will want to ask further questions about this. Mr. Downey is particularly qualified to speak to this and I would ask him to make a brief statement on it.

Mr. John Downey, Manager and Editor of Home Goods Retailing: Mr. Chairman, Honourable Senators. As Frank Turner said, I am speaking for myself. Mr. Craig and Mr. Gilmour, I am sure, will be interested in what I have to say. They don't know.

In talking about the function of the business press, our function is the same as any other medium of communication and that is to inform the reader. The big difference in our type of publishing is our specialized knowledge of the industries we serve, knowledge of the reader.

We are in the fortunate position of knowing the reader, knowing perhaps several hundred of our readers across the country personally and knowing what it is that they want from a trade publication; what it is they need to know. From this knowledge that we gain from talking to our own readers on a regular basis, we evolve our prime function which is to provide in the case of most business publication, as distinct from perhaps technical publications, to provide them with factual information they can use in their own business.

We start with the assumption that our readers are knowledgeable people in their own field and, therefore, we as editors have to be particularly careful to be experts ourselves in those fields because we are writing for the experts. As a result of this I think there is a trend in business publications, that we might see more of in all media, to shorter, more factual reporting. As a result of that there is a trend to my type of publication, the tabloid newspaper. You see it also with the growth of news page technique in magazines and I think we are going to see a great growth of news letters in this country, all forms of communicating with specialists in various fields.

Our concern as editors now is to give the readers the information he needs as quickly as possible and leave room for what is becoming a new field for the business press and that is really interpretative journalism, primarily interpretative stories about government and its activities.

Ottawa is everybody's partner now in business and I don't know what the cause is—whether it is the business press' fault or business' fault, or government's fault, but the business press sees for itself, now that it must take on the job of interpreting what is happening in Ottawa, the legislation and what it means to an individual in a particular business. This is becoming more important to us.

Maclean-Hunter realized this some years ago and opened the bureau in Ottawa and we were the first business publisher, I think, to do so. We now have two highly qualified people here that we as editors in Toronto depend on to a very great extent and our readers depend on them. I think I am going to tell management this too—I think we are going to have to add people in Ottawa, we are going to have to have a very substantial bureau in Ottawa in the very near future of specialists of all sorts. I think specialized communication in Canada is going to be absolutely vital for all forms of business and it is our function to supply that information.

Now I am editor first, last and always, but I am also, as Manager of my publication, involved with all other aspects of the business—circulation, promotion and advertising. I am responsible for the revenue of the publication. I think that is why Mr. Gilmour asked me here.

Is there a problem between advertising and editorial in the business publications? In my view there is not; not today. There may have been before my time, I don't know, but today the business editor, the good editor, is a man of some stature in his industry. He is dealing at the very senior level with major companies of this country. He is on committees of all sorts in industry. He is not the sort of man that would have problems on the day-to-day commercial considerations of perhaps undue pressure from advertising. I don't think that exists any more for good editors in business publishing.

The other thing I think is very important is that we have companies the size of Maclean-Hunter in publishing. The editors in this company know that they have the support of the company when they want to do something that might be controversial or might cause some upset with an advertiser. They know, with the size of the company and the financial strength, there is no need to consider implications of one unhappy advertiser or half a dozen unhappy advertisers. I personally have been through this on several occasions and the question of advertiser reaction is never raised when we go into something in the nature of a controversy.

I think also that companies the size of Maclean-Hunter are good for smaller publishers in Canada because we set a standard of this kind now that allows the newer companies, the smaller companies, to follow along. They know they don't have to knuckle under to an advertiser any more because the leading firms in the industry do not have to do so and neither do they.

I want to echo something Mr. Turner said. I am very proud to be a business journalist. I started in the daily newspaper field quite some years ago and because I was interested in business and economic subjects I wound up in this field. I worked in Europe; I was a Canadian working for an American company in England—kind of a no-man's land. I quit and came back to Canada because I wanted to work in this country for a good strong Canadian company and I think I do so. Thank you.

The Chairman: Thank you. Mr. Gilmour?

Mr. Gilmour: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask Mr. Craig to speak on Guideline question number two which deals with the extent of concentration of ownership of media and perhaps to also touch on some of the advantages that we think do accrue to multiple ownership.

Mr. J. L. Craig: Mr. Chairman, Honourable Senators. I hope, George, to be able to speak on this question but I expect there will be more talk about it before we are through. During the hearings, which have been so very well reported in the newspapers, the question of the dangers of monopolies acquiring control of communications has arisen and I have prepared a short statement really on our position in the business press.

So far as the business press is concerned, it would be very difficult indeed for any one company to acquire a monopoly of the field of business communication. In addition to the competition which we have from other publishing houses and associations, we have competition of direct mail, catalogues, general magazines and the financial pages of daily newspapers. Even the government is competing with us in the distribution of information and in many cases using reprints of the material which we publish and which they then reprint for further distribution.

Speaking for Maclean-Hunter, we would not want to be the only publisher of business publications in Canada and we find that generally speaking our best publications are in fields where there is one or more direct competitor. Three out of four of all the business publications and annuals that Maclean-Hunter published were started by us.

The others were acquired from publishers who wished to get out of the business or may have been forced to get out of the business for economic reasons.

We have discovered that our creative editors and managers enjoy the challenge of competition and motivate themselves to put their publications in the lead. We want to be the first publication in each field. This is our ambition and we will never be satisfied until we reach that position. However, we see no danger of competition ever being eliminated in this field. It is certainly not our policy to buy up competing publications and merge them with our own. Where we have a sole competitor in the field, we would prefer that competitor to stay healthy and competitive.

The extent of the present degree of concentration in Canadian media is, to a large extent, the result of prevailing economic forces. I mentioned earlier that most of the publications we have bought have been bought to us by publishers who had need of cash for pending liquidation of estates and/or because of the high cost of providing necessary services was making it difficult for them to be profitable. A large publishing house has certain in-built advantages in that it is presently easier to attract good people. In addition, we can, by combining revenues of many publications, provide superior facilities such as art departments, training departments, research, etc.

I have a briefcase full of some of the recent research studies that Maclean-Hunter have done which are both useful to business publications and to Canadian business generally. The fact is most of our business publications do use them but they would probably be too expensive for any single business publication to provide.

However, it is not inevitable that these forces will lead to further concentration of ownership. There is still room in the business paper field for the small entrepreneur with a good idea and outstanding ability to carve a niche for himself in the field. Two years ago two or three of our young men left to establish their own business in the business publications field and are apparently being quite successful at it. While we hated to lose these valuable people, we were certainly pleased to see them attain success.

Mr. Gilmour: Honourable senators, in my naivety, sitting down in my Toronto office, I then put down the words, "now that has got us warmed up" . . . after being here two and a half days, Senator Davey, I realize none of us need to get warmed up, least of all you.

Before opening ourselves for questions I would like to say that the business press, of which my division is a part, is not nearly as well known a medium as the other media that you people are being confronted with in this study. There are good reasons for this. Our particular medium appeals to a very specialized group of business men and women and does not have the general exposure that the mass media has. It is my earnest belief that the business press has a value to Canada that takes second place to no other medium in this country.

It has been said, you know, "what would you like this Committee to do for you?" as Mr. Campbell said today, "we really are not coming here asking for anything."

If I could accomplish anything out of having this meeting with you Senators tonight, it would be the hope that perhaps some people in Ottawa would have a greater realization of the vital part that business publications play in this country and that all over Canada, good things are indeed happening because business magazines are at work in Canada.

The only other thing I would like to say, Mr. Chairman, is that while we are open to any of your questions, I feel that if you can zero in on anything that would help us relate to the value of this medium, I would be most grateful.

We have discussed in the last few days the question of circulation, postal rates to some great length and I and my associates will be glad to discuss this with you. We have made quite a bit of it in our brief and we would be glad to try and answer any questions you have with regard to that. Most of the things that have been said about the Post Office that I have heard, I am in agreement with. I would like to make sure we don't get a further rate increase, if we can avoid it.

We are open, sir, for your questions.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Gilmour, I will accept your invitation. For this medium of yours which you represent to be as effective as you have just described, must it have recourse so heavily on the qualified circulation method?

Mr. Gilmour: I would question whether I would say it must have such recourse. I know whatever I am going to say is going to open up the whole question of qualified versus paid, etc.

The Chairman: You think the worst of us, Mr. Gilmour.

Mr. Fortier: He has been here two days.

Mr. Gilmour: I am not that smart. I don't learn that quickly. When you are going to start a magazine in the business publishing field, you endeavour to define a market and to cover it adequately. Now, that can be done by simply having paid circulation or by having qualified circulation. I recall a situation where we had a magazine which had, in fact, all paid circulation and we did quite well with it. We got constant complaints from readers and people in the field that we really were not covering the market properly. The market was a market made up of about four thousand units and we had about two thousand copies. We were an ABC publication. We resigned from ABC, eventually and went on a qualified basis. I don't think our publication has ever been more valuable to Canada since we did this.

Mr. Fortier: Is it, in fact, reaching more than two thousand of your market now?

Mr. Gilmour: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: I am sorry, that was a very badly phrased question. It is obviously reaching, from a penetration point, your total market but is it being read any more than it was when it was on an all-paid circulation basis?

Mr. Gilmour: Well, to be honest with you, in those days we were not as effective in research into readership as we are today. We know from our readership studies being done today this publication in effect is one of the best read business magazines in Canada. It is going to the graphic arts field and its readership is very high. I don't know quite what it was ten or fifteen years ago when it was an ABC paper.

Mr. Fortier: Can you attempt to explain to the Committee why you must give most of your publications away for them to be truly appreciated?

Mr. Gilmour: I don't think you must give them away to be truly appreciated. I feel this way about business magazines. I think Will Rogers once said, "numbers don't mean nothing. It's people that count." It is capturing it is defining the audience and then producing an editorial product good enough that people will read it and not know nor care whether they are getting it free or not. This puts a tremendous amount of responsibility on the integrity of the publisher, I admit.

Mr. Fortier: Why surely you would have to apply that statement also to good consumer magazines?

Mr. Gilmour: I am not an experienced person in the consumer magazine field.

Mr. Fortier: Do you read them?

Mr. Gilmour: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Would you read them if you didn't have to pay for them?

Mr. Gilmour: I read them when I didn't have to pay for them and I read them when I do pay for them, if they are good magazines.

Mr. Fortier: Who makes that value judgment? You as the reader. Not the publisher?

Mr. Gilmour: That is right.

Mr. Fortier: So if a good business magazine was being offered to the reader for a fifty cent consideration rather than being mailed to him for free, he would apply your reasoning and he would go out and buy it?

Mr. Gilmour: Now, of course, you are getting me into the economics of the problem. Really, of course, it costs more than fifty cents to get a fellow to pay fifty cents for a magazine. It becomes a question of whether that is a good way to do business; when you are not really convinced in your heart after thirty years in the publishing business that it makes a difference.

Mr. Fortier: You are convinced in your heart—as Mr. Barry Goldwater used to say...

Mr. Gilmour: Oh Lord!

Mr. Fortier: "In your heart you know he is right"...you are convinced in your heart this is the best and most effective way of reaching your individual markets?

Mr. Gilmour: Absolutely.

Mr. Craig: In connection with the American publications, which happen to be my responsibility, we found ourselves in a competitive situation several years ago where we had an ABC publication with, I think, fifteen thousand circulation and the lion's share of the advertising market. A competitive publication came along and got twenty thousand with controlled circulation and we had one devil of a job trying to sell this publication to the advertisers because of the difference in circulation. Everybody knew ours was ABC and theirs was unpaid. The advertisers didn't care. Now these advertisers are pretty hard-boiled businessmen; they are spending a lot of their money on these publications and I suspect if they thought they were not being read, they would not spend their money there.

Mr. Fortier: That is a very telling point, yes.

Mr. Craig: In a sense I couldn't really blame them. You get in a competitive situation; it was extremely expensive for us to develop a paid circulation in a business publication field. This is a field where you have small units or large units but spread across three thousand miles of geography and you are only going to get a few subscriptions in each place. It is not unusual in the American business publications, in a competitive situation, to pay as much as twenty to twenty-five dollars more than the revenue they get for each subscription in this field. In this particular publication that I telling you about we were spending something like thirty thousand dollars more than our revenue for circulation. We changed that. We spent that thirty thousand dollars on improving editorial quality and we have a better circulation and did not have to go out and reach for the lower echelons of readership. We could pick the best and even the control to the advertisers, which they wanted. There was no waste.

Mr. Fortier: The comment I would make: I suppose you could do the same with a consumer magazine. Instead of having Maclean's with a million circulation, you could have a smaller circulation but the advertiser could know that the magazine is being circulated in those homes where he likes to penetrate.

Mr. Craig: I am inclined to agree with you. We have looked at this as was mentioned this afternoon. In the consumer field there seems to be a difference.

Mr. Fortier: Have you any publications in Canada which have control circulation and which are competing with a magazine that is offered for money?

Mr. Craig: I don't think so.

Mr. Gilmour: I am trying to think of some. My mind immediately goes to Association Publications which do get money in a sense for their publications, but I don't think we have any that we are competing with them. From their point of view, by the way, there are few business magazines in the world any more that are operating on anything but qualified circulation.

Mr. Fortier: Where did that originate in the world—qualified distribution?

Mr. Gilmour: Mr. Craig could perhaps answer that. I think it was in the United States.

Mr. Craig: That is right.

Senator Langlois: You talked about Associations. Would you elaborate on that?

Mr. Gilmour: What I meant by that is there are publications produced by Associations and the publication is paid a subscription amount out of the membership that the company or the person takes in the Association.

Senator Langlois: Included in the membership?

Mr. Gilmour: Yes. You pay thirty dollars and you get a five dollar subscription to a magazine included. That is the answer, sir.

The Chairman: The question I asked Mr. Craig was, "about what year in the United States did this commence?" His answer was, "1930 approximately".

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Turner, you spoke in your verbal presentation earlier about the deterioration of standards in journalism. I presume you are referring to daily newspapers?

Mr. Turner: A special segment of daily newspapers. This is not an all-embracing statement. It is an opinion of mine. I think it would particularly apply to what could be called in this country the small-town newspaper.

Mr. Fortier: Would you explain what you mean by "deterioration of the standards in journalism"?

Mr. Turner: Mind you this is a topic that one could talk about for a long time. As I look back in my own experience, the character, to a certain degree, has been taken out of small-town newspapers. We have a considerable difficulty in our recruiting when we look for people from small-town newspapers, to get any quality whatsoever. I would say in a sense that one reason for this would be certainly more mechanization than there used to be. Another reason would be the disappearance—I think this is the right word—of the old-time editor, the task master.

The small daily newspaper is, from a journalist's standpoint, a very cheaply-run operation, that by and large will attract only third or fourth-rate quality, certainly with no training undertaken. In that sense, what is written in these publications is quite frankly, sometimes complete and utter trash. I can very briefly give you an example. Two weeks ago I was invited to talk—I won't mention any names—to a community college and the local daily newspaper was cited as an example, not only by the instructor but by the pupils, as an example of what a newspaper should not be.

The Chairman: What was the daily newspaper, Mr. Turner? There is no reason why you should not say so. It would be helpful to us.

Mr. Turner: The college was in Oshawa.

The Chairman: That narrows it down.

Mr. Turner: I have seen this in my own experience. It is very difficult to define, except one can see it, if one reads newspapers from the point of view of being a journalist. You can see the complete lack of editing; you can see very bad headlines; you can see what I call a "composing room newspaper". I have actually worked on a newspaper where the editors were not even allowed in the composing room and where, in fact, the paper was made up by the compositor. The door was shut. I worked on another daily newspaper where the news editor—believe it or not—I am not that old so it is not that long ago—where the news editor's job was to take the copy around off the machine and give it to the compositors to set.

Senator Langlois: How many such small town dailies do we have in Canada?

Mr. Turner: I can only relate to my own experience in these specific instances. I feel in my search for talent, in the people that we interview, the difficulty that we have because quite often we would love to get people who have some experience, that would be in effect ready-made to put on one of our publications but we are having great difficulty. I have to admit that we try to be very selective. I mentioned that we try to go after the best people. There is no shortage of people, there is a shortage of quality, and, therefore, in recent years we have turned, almost by compulsion to the universities. This is not the only reason.

Mr. Fortier: It seems to me the faults which you have listed are not due entirely to increased mechanism within the newspaper.

Mr. Turner: No, not entirely. Let us put it this way. Many daily newspapers are served now by the teletype, that is copy coming in straight from the Canadian Press from Toronto and it comes in in typed form. Now you have instructions essentially not to touch this. You really can't edit it because if you start fooling around it is going to cost so much. In this sense there is no editing as such. The editing has been taken away from the local level.

Mr. Fortier: What about the big-town newspapers? How are the standards in journalism? How have they held up there?

Mr. Turner: Once again there is a great variance in my personal opinion. I think that certainly in Toronto I have personal opinion as to one, two, three.

The Chairman: Could we have those please? We have even had that from Mr. Basset!

Mr. Turner: I have worked with Mr. Basset yes. My choice would be the Toronto Star, Telegram, and Globe and Mail.

The Chairman: In that order?

Mr. Turner: Yes.

The Chairman: Why would you put the Globe and Mail behind the Star and Telegram?

Mr. Turner: I have worked for a time at the Globe and Mail and these are all personal opinions, of course, but it seems to me to be a paper that relies to a very great degree on foreign news service. It is a paper that I feel is without sensitivity and without feeling of excitement. I believe in exciting journalism and when I pick up a paper, I like to feel that by doing this I am not going through a ritual but that there is something there to read, that I like, that is written with a certain character and verve. I don't detect this, you see, in the Globe and Mail.

The Chairman: Do you attempt to apply that principle to business books?

Mr. Turner: Yes, we do. I am not going to say it is always successful. Every journalistic business is suffering to a certain degree from a shortage of talent. At Maclean-Hunter nobody is going to claim—there is no heaven on earth—nobody is going to claim that all our editors are first rate, but at least we are trying to do so. It is our belief that the business press, just because it is the business press, certainly does not have to be dull or without a sense of life or without any sensitivity. It has to appeal to people just the same, except that it is a specialized audience.

The Chairman: Mr. Turner, we asked you to rate the Toronto newspapers in descending order. I could ask you to—but I hasten to add that I am not going to—I am going to ask a question but I am not going to follow it up with the question you might expect. Would it be possible for you to list the business publications at Maclean-Hunter in descending order? I am not going to ask you to do it, but could that be done?

Mr. Turner: As a matter of fact we have in-company competition that gives us a pretty fair idea on an annual basis in various categories.

The Chairman: Let me throw a bit of a curve at you—then the standard is not uniformly high?

Mr. Turner: Well, I think it is uniformly high.

The Chairman: I am a little unfair to you here. There is a variance in standards?

Mr. Turner: Absolutely. Of course, this would apply to any segment of society. It would apply to radio, to television. It applies to sports, there are some better than others. This is very true. We have a very high ratio.

The Chairman: It even applies to the Senate, Mr. Craig says!

Mr. Turner: Yes, let him say it! Yes, this is true. We have absolutely first-class journalists, unsurpassed journalists, I am proud to say, in our business. On the other hand, we have journalists who still have a lot to learn.

The Chairman: I am trespassing on your period, Mr. Fortier, but could I ask Mr. Gilmour perhaps a somewhat related question. I would like to quote from the statement you make, which was referred to me, in the May 19th, 1969, issue of Marketing. George Gilmour, Vice-President, Maclean-Hunter Business Publications is quoted as follows:

"This question, 'Are there [editors] underpaid second-class people?' is a very worrisome one to me. I am inclined to feel that rather than stemming from our public, our advertisers, or our market-places, it stems internally from the editors themselves."

Would you comment on this Mr. Gilmour?

Mr. Gilmour: I would not like to look at it. I am rather ashamed the way it was worded after all that talk about journalism.

The Chairman: I was going to say it might be the publication, but I realize that it is one of your publications, so I can't say it is one of the publications.

Mr. Gilmour: I think what I am trying to say there, Senator Davey, is I was not sure that the outside world necessarily had the impression that our editorial people were—I think it was said here—"second-class citizens"; and I hate to say that.

The Chairman: I was the one who raised the question yesterday and I raised it because of this particular reference.

Mr. Gilmour: I think I am trying to say it is not necessarily so, that the outside world has this impression at all. It was something that tended to come from within the editorial group of people themselves. What I suppose I was saying, in a terrible way, is that people had to lift themselves up by their own boot straps—we become about as good as we try to become. I suppose I was making the fatal mistake of trying to preach between the lines. I am not sure.

The Chairman: Well, perhaps I could read something else that you said in the same quotation. It related to underpayment: "As far as Senator Langlois: Mr. Gilmour, what is your experience regarding French language journalists or editors?

Mr. Gilmour: Do you mean are we able to...

Senator Langlois: Are you having difficulty as compared to English speaking?

Mr. Gilmour: No. I would think actually, no. It is a little more simple, a little easier than hiring in the English language field. I am not sure I know why. We don't have much turn-over at all in our French language publications. I would like to think it is because we have a good atmosphere and a good publication for those people to work on. The turnover is not high and we do not have a great deal of trouble getting good people.

Senator Langlois: Do you feel you have as much of a choice of talent as you do with your English speaking editors?

Mr. Gilmour: Yes, sir.

Mr. Fortier: Do they respond to the aptitude tests as well as the English speaking Canadians?

Mr. Gilmour: If you use the words, "as well", Mr. Fortier, lots of editorial people, being independent people, have not responded—yes.

Mr. Fortier: I am curious about the aptitude tests. What is the nature of it?

Mr. Gilmour: Really, it is just a series of psychological tests which tend to point up the fact that the person has the peculiar qualities of succeeding in our business. It is not an intelligence test. These are very helpful things in helping us to develop people. It shows where you can give people aid, where they will take encouragement. Some people need a couple of pats on the head instead of one.

Mr. Fortier: Do your top executives take them also to find out if they have been in the right division all along?

Mr. Gilmour: I think we have at one time or another.

Mr. Fortier: Your ten French publications, if my memory serves me right, all have English sister magazines with one exception which is...

Mr. Gilmour: Québec Industriel.

Mr. Fortier: Can you tell us the degree of co-operation which there is between the English and French sister publications?

Mr. Gilmour: Yes. Each of our French language magazines has its own French language editor. The publications have a very loose working arrangement, that they will point up areas of editorial coverage they come across that might be helpful to the other. I brought along with me four copies I would be glad to leave on record. One is the magazine Bâtiment and Canadian Building which would be its parallel. The others are the Canadian Automotive Trade and Revue-Moteur, which again fall into that category.

An examination of those, and they are typical, will show you in effect there is very little in each one that is similar. The editors have gone their own particular path that particular month. That is the month of January. We try and encourage, as a matter of fact, co-operation where it pays off; but we realize there is a great need to produce a magazine in the province of Quebec which is truly for Quebecois.

Mr. Fortier: I am reminded of the statement by one of your colleagues on the Maclean-Hunter board recently which was given much publicity which had to do with Le Magazine Maclean, which according to the gentleman who was before us this afternoon was to become a mere translation of the English magazine.

Have you ever sought to enforce a similar policy within your division?

Mr. Gilmour: No, sir.

The Chairman: I am confused at the cryptic question. I am not sure of the reference you were making.

Mr. Fortier: Well, when Mr. Cardinal—not the Minister, but the other Cardinal—Marie Cardinal, who was the editor of Le Magazine Maclean, when he left, one of his publicized complaints was that he was told by Mr. McEachern that from thereon in, in order to save on the cost of the publication, the French magazine would use translations of the English articles published in Maclean. Right?

Mr. Gilmour: That is what was reported.

The Chairman: I don't think Mr. Gilmour can...

Mr. Gilmour: The question was whether I have taken that same position and the answer is, "no, sir".

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Downey, you stated that a good business editor is a man of some stature in his industry. Does that make him a prime candidate for a job within the industry?

Mr. Downey: Often.

Mr. Fortier: How often has that happened? How many offers have you had?

Mr. Downey: A number.

Mr. Fortier: Maybe I should direct the question to Mr. Gilmour. Have you lost many good editors to industry? Can you really be competitive, when it comes to salary, with industry?

Mr. Gilmour: I can't think of any we have lost to industry. I can think of some we have lost to the province of Ontario.

Mr. Craig: To Associations, for example.

Mr. Gilmour: It is not the type of thing that happens frequently enough. I am not conscious of it. Really I think, perhaps as you do, that anybody who is good in their business is going to be offered jobs.

The Chairman: I would like to ask Mr. Downey a question. This applies a little indirectly to Mr. Fortier's question. I don't mean to be unkind, Mr. Downey, in asking this question so I hope you will accept it in the spirit in which it is meant. You said at the beginning that neither Mr. Craig nor Mr. Gilmour know what you are going to say. I am sure they didn't, but surely they must have had a somewhat relaxed feeling. I am sure they didn't expect you to say anything out-andish or anything that was going to embarrass Maclean-Hunter.

Mr. Downey: I don't know, Senator, what they expect. I suppose they don't. They know me; they know I like working there; they know my attitude to the company.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Gilmour, most of your publications, or many of your publications, are in competition with Southam Business Publications. Will you please tell us in a few words how keen the competition is between Maclean-Hunter and Southam.

Mr. Gilmour: Well, the competition on all our publications, whether it is really with Southam or National Business or other publication houses is keen, because I think we are reasonably progressive and aggressive people. That is bias I have perhaps but I don't quite know how to say to you how keen it is. How do you describe it...

Mr. Fortier: I didn't want to ask the question in a negative sense.

Mr. Gilmour: I suppose I should be wise and say, "yes, keen as hell".

Mr. Craig: He could tell you how many pages of advertising they all carry every month.

Mr. Fortier: When was the last time you set up a publication in competition with one of Southam's?

Mr. Gilmour: The one that was mentioned this morning, Heavy Construction News, is perhaps a reasonably good example of what I think you are driving at anyway. Pardon me for begging the question. Southam company has had a traditional position in the construction field—that has been the flag ship or something of this sort. We felt there was a need for a publication such as we conceived in the heavy construction field and we moved in that field in competition to them.

Senator Langlois: Would you say you sank a flag ship?

Mr. Gilmour: No, sir, I would not go so far as to say that.

Mr. Fortier: How long would you carry a publication which was in competition with a good Southam periodical, but which was losing money? How long would you carry it before you decided that you had to eat humble pie and close it?

Mr. Gilmour: I don't honestly think that we have a publication where Southam have a good publication and we don't have as equally a good one—so the situation does not arise.

Mr. Fortier: Let us assume two good publications but one which is being better received by the reader in that particular market or industry. How long would you carry it before you decided you had to fold? How long would you carry at a loss?

Mr. Gilmour: Probably too long. We have carried publications at losses for ten years.

The Chairman: Are you carrying on there?

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

The Chairman: Well, you go ahead.

Mr. Fortier: No, you go ahead.

The Chairman: This is uncharacteristically generous, Mr. Fortier!

Mr. Fortier: I am tired tonight!!

The Chairman: You were here this morning, George, when we talked about the closing of the four publications by Maclean-Hunter and Southam:

An article in Marketing reads in part:

"Southam's Heating, Plumbing, Air Conditioning and the French language counterpart, L'Entrepreneur en Plomberie Chauffage, will service subscribers and take over the advertising contracts of the Maclean-Hunter publications. "In the same way, Maclean-Hunter's School Progress will take over from School Administration and its related mail services. Another M-H publication, Design Engineering, will take over from Product Design & Value Engineering."

That was a very satisfactory arrangement for both Maclean-Hunter and Southam. We put this question this morning to Mr. Daly: who made the phone call to initiate the arrangement?

Do you remember?

Mr. Gilmour: I don't.

The Chairman: I find it rather amazing...

Mr. Gilmour: I honestly don't.

The Chairman: I am sure you honestly don't.

Mr. Craig: Mr. Gilmour doesn't know who called because I received the phone call.

Senator Sparrow: I am glad we got that clear.

The Chairman: Would you agree that upon reading this particular article, which is from Marketing, can you understand why some person, who like me is naive—and I say that advisedly in terms of many things, but particularly in terms of the business press, would genuinely and sincerely question the degree of competition in the industry?

Mr. Gilmour: Yes, I can understand that.

The Chairman: Well, that same sentiment which I am trying to express no doubt motivated Mr. Fortier's question in asking about the degree of competition. Do you believe the competition with Southam in the area of the business press is as keen as it could be?

Mr. Gilmour: Oh, yes. I would hate it to get too much keener. Again, Senator Davey, "as keen as it could be"... I don't know how keen it could get. It gets back to the question I am saying it is keen. If you are trying to find out whether there is any sort of lack of competition, because we are regarded as two major companies in the field, then I think the answer is categorically, "no".

The Business Publications Division of Maclean-Hunter, without sounding pompous as is not generally recognized, is not one of two large publishing houses in Canada. Our company is larger and they are trying to get all our business away as hard as they can.

The Chairman: It might be useful at this point to put the business press in perspective. There are five hundred and ten publications.

Mr. Gilmour: Yes.

The Chairman: How many are Maclean-Hunter's?

Mr. Gilmour: Sixty-eight Maclean-Hunter; forty-eight Southam; eighteen National Business Publications; thirteen Secombe House; sixty-six other Canadian publishers produce one or more for a total of one hundred and ten. The additional ones are one man, one publication houses.

The Chairman: So Maclean-Hunter has a rather commanding position in the industry. For example, we talked yesterday to the Business Press Association and the Business Press Editors' Association. If for some reason—and this is a hypothetical question—if Maclean-Hunter decided it was going to withdraw support, presumably those organizations would collapse?

Mr. Gilmour: I would not say they would necessarily, but I think they might miss us.

The Chairman: It might be like the postal rates, the last straw?

Mr. Gilmour: Might be.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier, do you have a question?

Mr. Fortier: Would the Canadian reading public be less well served if there was no competition between publications?

Mr. Gilmour: I don't think so.

The Chairman: I was going to ask Mr. Craig the same question. You say, "a monopoly in the business press would be difficult to imagine". Would you think it desirable?

Mr. Craig: As a matter of fact my principle joy in life is to beat my competition. This is almost a joke amongst the people at Maclean-Hunter. We are really extremely competitive and in this area here I can remember that we started Electrical Contractor—we purchased Electrical Contractor and Maintenance Supervisor which is going into their field again and we took great delight in making our publication the biggest paper in the electrical field in a few years' time. They started a paper in competition with us a few weeks after we went into the field.

The Chairman: Implicit in this question is not that there is anything collusive but why did you not bid for Hugh C. MacLean Publications? That was a good old company, a substantial company in the industry.

Mr. Craig: I think I commented on this: we don't buy up competition. If there were individual publications of theirs that were for sale that didn't compete with our own, we would be interested in buying them, but we would not be interested in buying their Furniture & Furnishings, for example. We would prefer to be competitive. We feel we do a better job in fields with one or more competition.

Mr. Gilmour: I was not in my present position at the time and I am not sure of the validity, but what I heard at that time, I recall hearing our Chairman of the Board make the comment that it would not be a healthy thing for Canada if we purchased the Hugh C. Maclean publications.

Mr. Craig: There is another example: some time ago the Wallace Publishing Company was for sale and Wallace approached me and asked me if we wanted to buy it. I said, "no. I will buy certain publications", which I outlined, which would not be competitive publications to our own. He first of all didn't want to have any part of this and then eventually came back and asked, "if you are interested, would you make a deal?" We eventually resolved the problem by buying the company jointly. Southam bought the office equipment publication. We had an office equipment paper and we didn't want that. Southam went into competition with us. We don't believe in buying competition.

Mr. Turner: Could I just say that from the editor's standpoint, the competition is the spice of life.

The Chairman: I am sure it is. It causes me to ask—perhaps you are not in the position to do so, Mr. Turner—but why would you not open up in competition to all Southam publications? Why give them a free run in some?

Mr. Turner: I don't know that we do.

The Chairman: I think you do. I think we have a list somewhere. I am sure there are some areas.

Mr. Fortier: Why don't you have farm publications, for example?

Mr. Craig: We did have one and decided it was not for us.

Mr. Fortier: Why?

Mr. Craig: We had a bad experience with it. It was before my time.

Mr. Fortier: Why don't you have any labor publications?

Mr. Craig: If you can give us a viable suggestion on one... I don't know why we haven't got one.

The Chairman: The point is, Mr. Turner has suggested competition is good for editors. Why not start one in competition?

Mr. Gilmour: In most cases Southam or ourselves have competition in fields.

The Chairman: Do you have a Southam list of publications, please? Thank you. Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Craig has just explained how you had one farm publication but dropped it. I see that in 1964 you ceased publishing Hardware Merchandising?

Mr. Gilmour: No.

Mr. Fortier: You did not?

Mr. Gilmour: No.

Mr. Fortier: I am sorry, my information is wrong. Did you cease publishing Canadian Market Data in 1964?

Mr. Gilmour: Well, yes, you can say we did.

Mr. Fortier: I wanted to pick one and ask for your reasons why you ceased publication.

Mr. Gilmour: I would be glad to give you another example, too. In the case of Canadian Market Data, because of the nature of the editorial material being produced in that publication, it was felt the publication would be best merged with the Financial Post Survey of Markets. There was a duplication of information.

Mr. Fortier: And Stationery and Office Products?

Mr. Gilmour: We stopped because it was an impossible field to make a profit at after many years of losses.

Mr. Fortier: Purely a question of economics?

Mr. Gilmour: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Climatisation, Chauffage et Plomberie.

Mr. Gilmour: The same thing.

Mr. Fortier: Electrotech.

Mr. Gilmour: Electrotech. I don't believe we ever published really. It was one of the publications which we purchased from Gabriel Marchand along with Québec Industriel. We may have published one issue. We didn't feel that the field was large enough.

Mr. Fortier: Without expanding much more on this question, when you ceased publication it was always for an economic reason?

Mr. Gilmour: Yes; or perhaps after looking at a field as intimately as you do when you get involved, you begin to realize you made a poor decision so you cease publishing.

Mr. Fortier: What about the reverse side of the medal, a new publication? How are you motivated into starting a new publication? Do you have people in your division who do this sort of market survey?

Mr. Gilmour: I am glad you asked this question. To answer the last question first, I think that senior people in the division—Mr. Craig has been involved in the conception of many publications and I have been involved in the conception of quite a number and so have others who are in our company. We have just started a magazine called Canadian Datasystems. I believe it is now in its third or fourth issue and this is a publication serving those people in Canada who have need to apply data processing machinery to their businesses.

You go about finding out about a field like this from clues you pick up as you go around the marketplace. Of course, you keep your eyes open to what is happening in other countries, the United States and Britain. You get to the point where people say to you, "why don't you bring out a magazine in the data processing field?" We probably turned down more magazines that are suggested than we start. A lot of people come to us and want us to start a magazine—the ceramic field is one that I can remember turning down. You go out and do an investigation in the marketplace to find out if it is a viable idea and you budget an amount and get people together and go to work.

Mr. Fortier: When you make an investigation you must consider the advertising angle?

Mr. Gilmour: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Of course.

Mr. Gilmour: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Does that weigh very heavily in the decision you eventually take?

Mr. Gilmour: Yes. If the publication is not going to be a profitable publication, it is not going to be a very necessary publication.

Mr. Fortier: Do you seek a definite assurance of a certain level of advertising before you decide to start publishing?

Mr. Gilmour: If we can get any such assurance, we are glad to have it. We have started publications with a very little assurance, or with some assurance.

Mr. Fortier: Within your existing publications, what is the ratio of advertising to new or editorial content?

Mr. Gilmour: The way we look at it, as explained today, is that in almost any field there is a minimum requirement in terms of editorial space and when you start a magazine you have to commit yourself to that kind of editorial requirement or not. Now this varies from publication to publication but broadly and large I would say that our ratio runs between forty-five to fifty-five per cent either way.

However, I am not one of those that necessarily feels that the ratio of editorial material should go up just because more advertising lineage comes in. In the business press advertising lineage, itself, can be an important reader-interest area. You can get magazines where there is material produced just t fill editorial pages, where you get an excess of material. The writing has not been tight enough. I don't think I am saying this very well.

Mr. Fortier: Is this what you call news hole in the daily newspapers?

Mr. Gilmour: I don't know.

Mr. Turner: You mean filler material.

Mr. Fortier: This is what Mr Gilmour is talking about. Would you tell us, Mr. Downey, what your experience is in your own magazine. Do you feel there is an excessive weight of advertising material in Home Goods Retailing?

Mr. Downey: No, sir, I don't think an excessive rate. We are a tabloid newspaper which has problems a little different than on a magazine. We run fifty per cent editorial every issue and sometimes, in the small issues, a good deal more than fifty per cent. I want more advertising, not only from the revenue point of view but for the reader. Good business advertising, remember, is going to businessmen who read that advertising and is as important as the editorial content. In my field, the merchandising field, the product is being advertised to retailers who will look at the advertising from their own interests, can they make a profit on it? So the ads are very, very important to us.

Mr. Fortier: Is that a valid statement in all business publications that advertising is just as important to the reader as the editorial content?

Mr. Downey: Yes, I think on most of them.

Senator Langlois: Have you ever conducted surveys which were read most—editorial or advertising?

Mr. Gilmour: Yes, we have conducted, I suppose in the last ten years, readership studies on both readership of advertising and readership of editorial and the relative difference of readership in the beginning, in the end, or in the middle of the magazine; and the editorial usually rates a little higher, but very close to the advertising.

The Chairman: If I may, before you put the next question—I am aware that Senator Sparrow is waiting to ask some questions—but at about this time we normally break for a few minutes. I am not going to break now, but I would like to try and adjourn at ten o'clock.

If the reporter can go through, I would like to carry on with that adjournment in mind.

I will pass to Senator Sparrow and return to you, Mr. Fortier.

Senator Petten: Could I ask just one question?

The Chairman: Is it a supplementary?

Senator Petten: Yes. Mr. Gilmour, you have been asked about the competition between yourself and Southam. Do you not have competition from the other people in the field?

Mr. Gilmour: Other media?

Senator Petten: Other business publications?

Mr. Gilmour: Other business publications—there are other publishing houses, yes. Of course, we do. We have some good competitors here tonight who are not from Southam. Yes, there are other competitors.

The Chairman: I think Mr. Craig wants to add something on the question of competition.

Mr. Craig: Mr. Fortier asked the question, why don't we compete with Southam Publications where we are not competing? I looked over the list and there are about four publications in fields that we would like to be in. We are not in them basically because there is more than one publication serving that field and we feel that two publications is probably as much as that field can justify. We have a public relations angle. If we move into the field with all our research and the weight of our organization, the chances are somebody is going to get put out of business. It will be expensive in the first place and not desirable. We would far rather wait and find the opportunity of buying a publication in that field. As a matter of fact, in at least one of the fields, the situation is changing and we will be probably announcing a new publication to compete with one of the Southam publications.

The Chairman: Do you want to make the announcement now?

I apologize to Senator Sparrow. It is a long time he has been waiting.

Senator Sparrow: How many of your publications belong to the Canadian Business Press Association?

Mr. Gilmour: All of them.

Senator Sparrow: That is sixty-eight?

Mr. Gilmour: All the business publications are members, yes.

Senator Sparrow: Southam and yourselves have ninety out of a total of one hundred and thirty-two memberships?

Mr. Gilmour: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: I think if you did drop out, it would be quite a shock to the Association, as the Chairman suggested. What is the circulation per year of your magazines?

Mr. Gilmour: We have it in the brief here.

Senator Sparrow: You have the "per issue" in the brief.

Mr. Gilmour: That's right, we do have. I am afraid I am in the same position as were the people this afternoon.

The Chairman: Mr. Mansfield?

Mr. George Mansfield, Manager, Canadian Business Press: It worked out to twelve times the circulation per issue so it probably applies to your group.

Mr. Gilmour: Our circulation is in the neighbourhood of five hundred and twelve thousand per issue. You would have to find out how many weeklys and monthlys.

Senator Sparrow: You figure five hundred and seventy-six thousand in your brief.

Mr. Gilmour: Right.

Senator Sparrow: So it would be ten or twelve times.

Mr. Gilmour: I guess you are looking at about seven million. Does that make sense?

Senator Sparrow: Your advertising revenue, would you be prepared to give us that figure?

Mr. Gilmour: I think you have that in the confidential information.

Senator Sparrow: You are not prepared to give that tonight?

Mr. Gilmour: No, sir.

Senator Sparrow: Your principals were here today and said they would like to see the retention of the status quo as far as the publication is concerned of Time and Reader's Digest.

In the Southam presentation it appeared, to me at least, that they were not quite as happy with Time and Reader's Digest, particularly

Time, still publishing in Canada. They suggested at least a million dollars would go into the business press without Time being in competition. Would you agree with this? Do you have a different stand on this issue than the parent company which were here this afternoon?

Mr. Gilmour: Well, of course, I am part of the parent company as a director of the company. I support the position that there has been a great deal of discussion about this position. I understand it and I think it is probably one I would support.

The Chairman: I think perhaps the question that Senator Sparrow is driving at is—let us take Time—does Time cost you advertising in the business press?

Mr. Gilmour: I think there is money in Time advertising that we might have a better chance than many of getting.

The Chairman: Over the dinner hour, our research staff got several recent issues of Time. How many do we have?

Mr. Fortier: The last month, four.

The Chairman: Could you go over these and tell me if these might be legitimate. Here is a full page for Clark Equipment Company. Here is a double page spread of Atlas Copco Canada Ltd.

Mr. Gilmour: Yes.

The Chairman: Smith-Corona.

Mr. Gilmour: Yes.

The Chairman: Another double page for Consolidated Computer Services Limited.

Mr. Gilmour: Right.

The Chairman: Sony—The World's Best. Cominco Ltd. a full page.

Mr. Gilmour: Right.

The Chairman: Burroughs Business Machines Ltd. a full page. A full page 3 M Company.

Mr. Gilmour: Yes.

The Chairman: Two-thirds of a page, Canadian National.

Mr. Gilmour: I think perhaps this one doesn't apply.

The Chairman: Singer, the particular division (Friden) of Singer, a full page.

Mr. Gilmour: Right.

The Chairman: Remington Rand Office Machines, a full page.

Mr. Gilmour: Right.

The Chairman: A double page spread for IBM.

Mr. Gilmour: Right.

The Chairman: A full page Xerox.

Mr. Gilmour: Yes.

The Chairman: A full page Air Canada Jet-Air Freight. A full page Consolidated-Bathurst.

Just several issues. Now, perhaps some of these advertisers use the business press as well, but that surely must represent a problem.

Mr. Gilmour: You mean it represents a problem because we assume all that money would go into the business press and why are we not getting it?

The Chairman: I think these might be normally described as potential business press advertisers.

Mr. Gilmour: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: Is there any conflict between your company in the consumer field and the business press field?

Mr. Gilmour: There might be some differences of opinion.

Senator Sparrow: Really a conflict?

Mr. Gilmour: I would not put it in those words, sir. It is a fact that a lot of the advertising that goes into Time could possibly be placed in some of our business magazines. I don't know how much. I also, however, concur with the approach that the consumer magazines have taken, as they stated this afternoon.

The Chairman: Do you have anything further on that question?

Senator Langlois: Some of this advertising would be going to the American advertisers.

Mr. Gilmour: The American publications?

Senator Langlois: No; the advertising carried out now in Time.

Mr. Gilmour: I don't think so. I believe most of those advertisements I looked at quickly were Canadian based advertisements. You were thinking they might be in the American edition of Time?

Senator Langlois: Other American magazines, for that matter.

Mr. Gilmour: These carry Canadian addresses, which, of course, could be changed. It looked to me as though the ads were addressed solely at the Canadian market.

Senator Langlois: They come from American advertisers.

Mr. Gilmour: Quite a number of them.

Senator Langlois: Which might be inclined to put ads in an American magazine instead of using a Canadian competitor.

Mr. Gilmour: These companies are in American magazines too. Clark Equipment is a well-known lift truck company. They may advertise in the American issue of Time for all I know. This particular one I can't see the address on that. Atlas Copco. is a Canadian advertisement.

The Chairman: You say in your brief, at paragraph 48, relating to the O'Leary Commission:

"It seems apparent that although the total overflow circulation has risen to one million, two hundred and thirty-three thousand and forty-seven in the decade 1959-1969, the effects of the O'Leary Commission recommendations made during that decade have decreased the rate of growth to the point where it has almost stopped."

Do you stand on that statement?

Mr. Gilmour: Yes.

The Chairman: Has legislation evolving out of the O'Leary report assisted you in getting more advertising dollars?

Mr. Gilmour: I would think so.

Mr. Fortier: I have a supplementary, if I may. Since the O'Leary report and the legislation which followed it, have there been instances of what was called in the O'Leary report, "the second house technique"? Are you aware of that?

Mr. Gilmour: I think I understand. There have been no new instances of that as far as I know.

Mr. Craig: I have heard that one or two tried to get started and found they couldn't do so.

Mr. Fortier: Because of the Income Tax Act, section 12 (a); so to that extent that has been good for the industry?

Mr. Gilmour: Right.

Senator Sparrow: In paragraph 58 you say:

"Since we compete with U.S. publications and since these U.S. publications are a real threat to us, the Post Office should get our rate as close to that of the United States as possible."

Are they that much of a threat, if in 1959, the figures were 1,120,000, circulation and in 1969, 1,233,000, which is only 112,000 increase in ten years. Does that really mean there is a threat? I appreciate that you make reference in here that you do a good editorial job in magazines, which I am sure you will say again now but it really doesn't appear that much of a threat, if they are not increasing the share of the market.

Mr. Gilmour: The threat the U.S. publications hold towards us is partly because so much of our advertising either originates out of the United States or is based on behalf of companies which operate in Canada which are American companies with Canadian subsidiaries and were the advertising decisions are often made in the United States.

Now, it is a fact that in the United States, the opinion is abroad in some quarters that you don't need to advertise in the Canadian publications in order to really get coverage of the Canadian market. Now, as those American publications become more viable commercially, that story can be made more strongly. In saying that we should have an equitable position in this case, I feel we should have it with the United States publications. We are paying a higher rate than the United States publications are and we feel in a sense it should be equalized.

The Chairman: Yes. I think Mr. Craig wants to make a comment.

Mr. Craig: In the Canadian Business Press presentation, we referred to the total circulation of Canadian business publications as being 4.4 million per issue. This is almost more than one-quarter of that and that is a pretty substantial chunk of the competition.

Senator Sparrow: That is early though. You are using issue per year; are you not?

Mr. Craig: These are comparable figures, yes.

Mr. Mansfield: I can testify the figures are per issue in both cases, circulation per issue.

Senator Sparrow: Yes, that is correct.

The Chairman: Could we use your rule of thumb on the American flow of multiplying by twelve to get the annual dimension?

Mr. Mansfield: Yes, I think so.

The Chairman: So there would be thirteen million!

Mr. Mansfield: Yes.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow.

Senator Sparrow: Beginning at page three you talk about the social service you have given to Canada through editorial stands in your magazine. I checked the list of the Canadian Business Press membership and—I counted them yesterday—I think I received myself sixteen of those publications, but I don't ever remember reading a pro-labor article or editorial in any of them; nor, in fact, anything pertaining to labor. Can you give me any instances in your magazine where you have taken a pro-labor stand which may be at variance with the business community?

Mr. Gilmour: I can't think of any case. Mr. Downey?

Mr. Downey: In my area of merchandising one continuing controversy for the last fifteen years, has been store hours. We have been involved on several occasions from the employees' side, which has not made us any friends from the mass merchandisers.

Senator Sparrow: Have you taken a stand for example, on minimum wages?

Mr. Downey: In our field, my own field minimum wages—I am in the big ticket business and our people are top paid people in retailing. This is not an issue in my area; but store hours, hours worked and night hours as a regular thing, three or four nights a week working nights regularly, that kind of thing, we have been involved in on a number of occasions.

The Chairman: Mr. Craig, could you comment on Senator Sparrow's question?

Mr. Craig: I have been trying to think of examples. We have had many articles on safety and dangerous practices and criticized management where they have caused these and also criticized labour where they have been responsible for bad practice. I can't think of anything specific along that point of Senator Sparrow's.

Mr. Gilmour: Mr. Craig reminded me of something that happened. There was a campaign of advertising running in some industrial magazines for steel strapping. This steel strapping caused a lot of accidents; people cut their hands and it snapped and would cut them and that sort of thing. We got some advertising from the plastic strapping people who were trying to put the steel strapping people out of business. The steel strapping brought pressure on us to stop running this advertising and in an editorial we had been talking about the merits of the plastic strapping.

The only connection is—you raised the point about labour unions and in this particular case—please don't ask me for the details but I can get them if you want—the labour unions were vigorously fighting for the abolition of the steel strapping. The steel strapping people were saying to us, "if you don't stop running this plastic strapping in the editorials, we will take the advertising out of your magazines"; which they did.

Senator Sparrow: In reference to competition, we covered the subject a little bit previously and you say in paragraph 46:

"The primary competition for Maclean-Hunter business publications comes from the major multiple publication houses (see paragraph three); from publications which are produced by non-profit associations..."

You proceed from those two groups and you lump them in together. I used the figure this afternoon and I will re-calculate it again now. Between the two main firms you receive—I used the figure fifty per cent this afternoon and would say between forty and fifty per cent of the advertising revenue between the two firms; that is without National Business and Secombe House. The other two hundred and fifty-three you refer to are not really competition, are they, as you stated in paragraph forty-six?

Mr. Gilmour: Well, you mean competition for the business publishing dollar?

Senator Sparrow: You said the primary competition are these people, these two hundred and fifty-three.

Mr. Gilmour: I think I really stand by this statement, Senator: the primary competition are the major multiple publishing houses and the direct mail and other forms of media.

Senator Sparrow: You didn't say that.

Mr. Gilmour: Didn't we?

We lose business, as you have drawn to my attention, by advertising such as that in Time and also some to our own consumer magazines. Some industrial companies spend money in magazines like Maclean's and we lose a lot of competition within our own house.

The Chairman: Does the Business Press Association have an over-all business press sales presentation?

Mr. Gilmour: Yes, sir.

The Chairman: Which it makes to the advertising agencies on behalf of the business press?

Mr. Gilmour: On behalf of the business publications, yes.

Senator Sparrow: I have one final question. You refer to aptitude tests for your employees and so on. It came to us that you have your employees submit to a psychiatrist for examination. Is that a correct statement?

Mr. Gilmour: No. I would not say that is a correct statement. We have our people take aptitude tests, written tests, similar to what the universities and colleges are doing today.

Senator Sparrow: You don't have to be crazy to be in the business, but it does help!

The Chairman: Mr. Craig is making the point that there is a difference between psychologists and psychiatrists.

Senator Sparrow: Yes. Our information was psychiatrists.

The Chairman: Once again, Mr. Fortier, I am going to give you the last question.

Mr. Fortier: On this aspect of competition which you dealt with in answer to Senator Sparrow's questions, I would like to read to you a passage from the O'Leary report which, as you know, was written in 1961. Writing about business papers on page fifty-seven, he had this to say:

"While consumer magazines face their strongest competition from television, overflow circulation, weekend newspapers and Canadian editions (probably in that order), business papers are most affected by direct mail (which is actually controlled-circulation type of distribution of advertising without editorial content) Time magazine, overflow circulation of United States business papers and a specialized form of 'Canadian' edition to which we shall refer in detail later."

That is the second house technique which we dealt with earlier.

These other competitive areas listed here by Senator O'Leary, are they still prevalent today in the industry ten years later?

Mr. Craig: We have talked about Time, and the direct mail...

Mr. Fortier: Is that a serious competitor?

Mr. Craig: Yes; I would say there is a good volume of dollars go into direct mail.

Mr. Fortier: Overflow circulation of United States business papers...

Mr. Craig: As we have said in the brief, I think that has been declerated because of O'Leary.

Mr. Fortier: So I would say P.O.—"post-O'Leary".

Senator Langlois: Has that direct mailing been severely hit by the increase of postal rates?

Mr. Craig: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: The "P.O. legislation" dealt effectively with the second house technique. Did it also deal with what Senator O'Leary referred to as the "distribution-franchise system"?

Mr. Gilmour: Yes. I think this is a system where the publication is created in the United States and the back cover, or something of this sort, is sold to the distributor in Canada and he distributes it. As far as I know there are none of those around anymore.

Mr. Fortier: Again dealt effectively with by the legislation?

Mr. Gilmour: I would think so, yes.

Mr. Fortier: Would you say in very general terms the business publication division of Maclean-Hunter is a profitable one? I don't want the details.

Mr. Gilmour: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: I will ask you if this statement here is still valid today nine years later. Page sixty:

"There is little, if any, doubt that but for the profitable existence of business papers, there would be no Canadian general consumer magazines today. Almost without exception they have been heavily subsidized from the business paper profits of their publishers. Even where they managed to break even over the years, as has been the case with Maclean's, this has been achieved only through the pouring in of money made possible by the existence of substantial flow of profits from the business paper operation."

Is that still valid today, Mr. Gilmour?

Mr. Gilmour: Aided and abetted by Mr. Campbell's interest in television and radio fields which are hopefully going to be very good businesses to be in—it may be still true.

The Chairman: If there are no further questions then, I might on behalf of the Committee express our appreciation to Mr. Gilmour and to his colleagues. We know it has been a long day for you. I am sure it must be easier to sit up here in the front and be able to speak than to sit at the back and want to speak.

You made a statement earlier on in your introductory statement that if the Committee accomplished nothing else, you would be grateful if it accentuated or emphasized or was able to bring home to some people the importance and significance of the business press. Some people, not on the Committee, have questioned me about the fact that this Committee has dealt with the business press at greater length than it did, for example, with the ethnic press. As I said to them yesterday, and I say to you, the hearings phase is but a phase of our study and our ultimate deliberations upon the business press cross-section of the media spectrum is certainly by no means complete although as far as the business press is concerned we have completed our public examination.

I would say to you, that if you have additional information, which you think we might find useful, we would be delighted to receive it. If we have additional information we need from you, I can assure you we will be in touch.

Before adjourning, may I remind the Honourable Senators that the next session of the Committee is on Tuesday morning at ten o'clock in this room when we will be receiving the brief from The Agricultural Institute of Canada. Later in the morning the Free Press Weekly. Tuesday afternoon—Saturday Night. And then I think a particularly interesting witness, at four thirty next Tuesday, Senator O'Leary himself.

The Committee stands adjourned until ten o'clock next Tuesday.

The Committee adjourned at ten fifteen p.m.

Second Session—Twenty-eighth Parliament
1969-70

THE SENATE OF CANADA

PROCEEDINGS

OF THE

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE

ON

MASS MEDIA

The Honourable KEITH DAVEY, Chairman

No. 20

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1970

WITNESSES:

Agricultural Institute of Canada: Mr. W. E. Henderson, General Manager, Agricultural Institute of Canada; Mr. Keith Bradley, Member, Agricultural Institute of Canada; Mr. R. E. Forbes, Principal, Agricultural Extension Centre, Brandon, Manitoba.

Free Press Weekly: Mr. R. H. Shelford, General Manager.

Saturday Night: Mr. William Nobleman, Saturday Night Publications Limited; Mr. Robert Fulford, Editor, Saturday Night; Mr. David Fry, Secretary, Saturday Night Publications Limited.

Senator M. Grattan O'Leary.

MEMBERS OF THE
SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA

The Honourable Keith Davey, Chairman

The Honourable L. P. Beaubien, Deputy Chairman

Beaubien,
Bourque,
Davey,
Everett,
Hays,
Kinnear,
Langlois,
Macdonald (Cape Breton),

McElman,
Petten,
Phillips (Prince),
Prowse,
Quart,
Smith,
Sparrow,
Welch.

(16 members)

ORDERS OF REFERENCE

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Wednesday, October 29th, 1969.

With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator Davey moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lang:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to consider and report upon the ownership and control of the major means of mass public communication in Canada, in particular, and without restricting the generality of the foregoing, to examine and report upon the extent and nature of their impact and influence on the Canadian public, to be known as the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media;

That the Committee have power to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry;

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have power to sit during adjournments of the Senate and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation to this Special Committee from 9th to 18th December, 1969, both inclusive, and the Committee have power to sit during sittings of the Senate for that period;

That the papers and evidence received and taken on the subject in the preceding session be referred to the Committee; and

That the Committee be composed of the Honourable Senators Beaubien, Davey, Everett, Giguère, Hays, Irvine, Langlois, Macdonald (Cape Breton), McElman, Petten, Prowse, Sparrow, Urquhart, White and Willis.

After debate, and—

The question being put on the motion, it was—

Resolved in the affirmative.

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Thursday, November 6th, 1969.

With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Smith:

That the names of the Honourable Senators Giguère and Urquhart be removed from the list of Senators serving on the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media; and

That the names of the Honourable Senators Bourque, Smith and Welch be added to the list of Senators serving on the said Special Committee.

The question being put on the motion, it was—
Resolved in the affirmative.

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Friday, December 19th, 1969.

With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Langlois:

That the names of the Honourable Senators Bélisle and Phillips (Prince) be substituted for those of the Honourable Senators Welch and White on the list of Senators serving on the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media.

The question being put on the motion, it was—
Resolved in the affirmative.

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Tuesday, February 3, 1970.

With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Langlois:

That Rule 76 (4) be suspended in relation to the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media from 10th to 19th February, 1970, both inclusive, and that the Committee have power to sit during sittings of the Senate for that period.

After debate, and—

The question being put on the motion, it was—
Resolved in the affirmative.

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Thursday, February 5, 1970.

With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Haig:

That the names of the Honourable Senators Quart and Welch be substituted for those of the Honourable Senators Bélisle and Willis on the list of Senators serving on the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media.

The question being put on the motion, it was—
Resolved in the affirmative.

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Tuesday, February 17, 1970.

With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Connolly (Halifax North):

That the name of the Honourable Senator Kinnear be added to the list of Senators serving on the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media.

The question being put on the motion, it was—
Resolved in the affirmative.

ROBERT FORTIER,
Clerk of the Senate.

MINUTES OF PROCEEDINGS

TUESDAY, February 17, 1970.
(20)

Pursuant to adjournment and notice the Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 10.00 a.m.

Present: The Honourable Senators: Davey, (Chairman); Macdonald (Cape Breton), McElman, Petten, Smith and Sparrow. (6)

In attendance: Miss Marianne Barrie, Director and Administrator; Mr. Borden Spears, Executive Consultant; Miss Nicola Kendall, Research Director.

The following witnesses were heard:

Mr. W. T. Henderson, General Manager, Agricultural Institute of Canada;

Mr. R. E. Forbes, Principal, Agricultural Extension Centre, Brandon, Manitoba;

Mr. Keith Bradley, Member of the Agricultural Institute of Canada;

Mr. R. H. Shelford, General Manager, Free Press Weekly.

At 1.25 p.m. the Committee adjourned to 2.30 p.m.

At 2.30 p.m. the Committee resumed.

Present: The Honourable Senators: Davey, (Chairman); Everett, Macdonald (Cape Breton), McElman, Petten, Quart, Smith and Sparrow. (8)

In attendance: Miss Marianne Barrie, Director and Administrator; Mr. Borden Spears, Executive Consultant; Mr. Yves Fortier, Counsel.

The following witnesses were heard:

Mr. William Nobleman, President, Saturday Night Publications, Limited;

Mr. Robert Fulford, Editor, Saturday Night;

Mr. David Fry, Secretary, Saturday Night Publications Limited;

The Honourable Senator M. Grattan O'Leary.

At 6.05 p.m. the Committee adjourned to Wednesday, February 18, 1970, at 9.30 a.m.

ATTEST:

Denis Bouffard,
Clerk of the Committee.

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Tuesday, February 17, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 10 a.m.

Senator Keith Davey (Chairman) in the Chair:

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, in calling this session to order I would like to make a short announcement which I think is self-explanatory. It is in connection with Friday's schedule. Because of the illness of Mr. Paul Zimmerman, the President of the Reader's Digest Association (Canada) Limited, it will be necessary to postpone the Reader's Digest hearing set for Friday. We are, therefore, cancelling Friday's session and, of course, it will be rescheduled later on. We are not yet able to confirm the new date.

Mr. Gerry Goodis who was scheduled to appear at nine thirty a.m. on Friday morning has kindly consented to be with us instead at nine thirty a.m. tomorrow morning. The Reader's Digest hearing is postponed—not indefinitely, but until a date as yet we are not able to specify. The Maclean's Magazine brief will be received tomorrow morning at eleven o'clock.

As you know this afternoon we are going to hear at four thirty from Senator O'Leary and at two thirty from Saturday Night. This morning we are going to turn our attention to briefs we are receiving in connection with the farm press.

With us this morning for this first session are representatives from the Agricultural Institute of Canada. Sitting on my immediate right is Mr. Reg. Forbes, Principal, Agricultural Extension Centre, Brandon, Manitoba. On my immediate left is Mr. W. E. Henderson, General Manager of the Agricultural Institute of Canada and sitting on Mr. Forbes' right is Mr. Keith Bradley, a third member of the group here this morning who is a member of the Institute.

Now, Mr. Forbes, the brief we requested some three weeks in advance was received but unhappily not quite as far in advance as we might have preferred in terms of the Senators studying the brief. Some of them I know are familiar with the contents but others may not be as familiar with the contents as with some of the other briefs we have been examining. In any event the procedure is as follows. I am now able to offer you fifteen minutes in which you can expand or explain or add to or clarify anything which is in the brief—indeed you are perfectly free to talk about other matters. Following your statement we would like to question you on the contents of your brief and perhaps on some of these things you say in your oral presentation or on matters which aren't referred to in your brief or your oral statement. Welcome and we are happy you are here, Mr. Forbes.

Mr. Reg. Forbes, Principal, Agricultural Extension Centre, Brandon, Manitoba: Thank you very much, Senator Davey. Members of the Senate, ladies and gentlemen, on behalf of the Agricultural Institute of Canada, I would like to express our appreciation for the opportunity of commenting before the Senate Committee on Mass Media. Our comments will relate to the agricultural industry. We are privileged to be here and we hope that we can make some comments which will provide you with some information which will be helpful in your determination with respect to the activities which should take place relative to the press and particularly in our case to the agricultural press. May I first of all indicate something of the nature of the Agricultural Institute of Canada.

"It represents more than four thousand university graduates in the physical, biological and social sciences who are employed in the agricultural and food industry.

Members of the Agricultural Institute of Canada provide a professional service in all phases of the agricultural and food industry, including research, administration, teaching, extension, agri-business and communications. Affiliated with the Institute are eight scientific, technical societies: The Agricultural Pesticide Society, the Canadian Agricultural Economics Society, Canadian Society of Agricultural Engineering, Canadian Society of Agronomy, Canadian Society of Animal Production, Canadian Society for Horticulture Science, Canadian Society of Rural Extension, and the Canadian Society of Social Science.

The Institute, with the editorial assistance and advice of several of its affiliated societies, publish the Journals of Plant Science, Soil Science and Animal Science, we also publish the A.I.C. Review which is a bi-monthly magazine devoted mainly to articles or trends or developments in Canadian and world agriculture.

The Agricultural Institute of Canada this year is celebrating its fiftieth year. One of the objectives as stated in the charter of the organization is to 'serve as a medium where progressive ideas for improvements in agriculture education, investigation, publicity and extension work can be discussed, formulated and recommended for adoption where deemed advisable'.

It is by this avowed objective that the brief is presented to you."

May I first of all give you a very brief summary of the brief and a brief review of some of the recommendations which we would like to make to your Committee, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Fine.

Mr. Forbes: "The farm oriented mass media have made an essential contribution to the development of the agricultural industry. Farmers have used and continue to use the farm press as a source of information on farm practices, markets and research activities, and as a source of contact with the outside world. Because farmers often operate in physical isolation, the mass media are extremely important to this segment of society from a business and management standpoint. The effect of the mass media on farm practice is well documented. It indicates that a majority of farmers receive their first word on new ideas via the mass media. The process by which new ideas are normally transferred to practice stresses the importance of the mass media in the development of modern farming methods.

The farmer cannot live in economic or social isolation. Agriculture requires viable rural communities, centres of service which provide the amenities of life for those who provide essential professional, technical, educational, merchandising and other services. The mass media greatly influenced the image of the rural community as held by urban people. This affects the quality of personnel who are attracted to rural areas.

Just as agriculture itself has undergone rapid change and adjustment, the farm press, radio and T.V. have undergone an upheaval in recent years in trying to adjust to the changing needs of the industry. At a time when the farm business becomes increasingly complex, the need for information becomes more acute. The farm press in Canada has been under financial strain. Canadian agriculture has not been sufficiently profitable to support the kind of press required.

It appears that in the future the farm press will aim its various messages at specific types of farmers. The importance of radio and T.V. will decrease as sources of farm information. The success of the press in continuing to do a good job will hinge directly on the ability of the industry to support the press. It is in effect an inter-dependent relationship."

Gentlemen, if I may from our brief draw a few conclusions and make some recommendations.

"Number 1. The survival of an entrepreneurial-type farm industry is dependent on adequate farm information."

I think, gentlemen, that the brief documents this case. Because of the fact that we have in Canada some four hundred thousand farmers in total, two hundred thousand of whom are put into the commercial category and because of the fact we have so many of these people and because of the fact that there is a central organization who would direct the managerial efforts of the people you have to depend on some kind of mass media. These people have to depend on the mass media for new ideas and so on and so forth because it can't go down through any kind of organization like it does in most industries.

"Number 2. In spite of the trend of farm publications becoming highly specialized to serve the specific types of enterprises—that is—hog producers, poultry producers, and so on, the individual farm operator needs information of a broader nature so he can relate to the broader social and economic conditions which influence his operations. Therefore, this general information must be provided and should continue to be provided by the general mass media—that is, the general farm publication, and other media.

Number 3. Independent—non-public—mass media is the only means whereby the necessary dialogue between these various segments of the agricultural industry and between the industry and government can be assured.”

There have been some suggestions in the past that the farm press could in effect be a kind of expanded government informational source. We submit that this is not a fact, that we need the kind of independent press which can make editorial comment and establish the dialogue, if necessary, between government and various segments of the industry.

“Number 4. Government policies which encourage a market-oriented and dynamic agriculture will ensure that sufficient of the proper resources flow into the industry. An economically viable industry through the process of profit opportunity will support the highly necessary agriculturally-oriented media.

Number 5. Greater parody of educated leadership between urban and rural areas must be promoted. To attract the quality of leadership required in rural Canada, a means must be found of properly portraying the image of the rural community to urban people. It is suggested that those in the mass media study, visit and tell the urban people about the scientific, technical, business and social conditions which reflect life in rural Canada today.”

Number 6 gentlemen is more in the form of a question than a statement. You must recognize that we did not have as much time as some of us would have liked for the development of the brief and we did not have the opportunity to spend any time in Quebec and the statement with respect to farmers in Quebec is taken from association and dialogue with some of the members of the French Agricultural Community in Manitoba and I recognize full well that the U.C.C. and their publication, and La Ferme are doing an excellent job in Quebec and we simply pose number six as a question rather than as a statement.

“Number 6. Farmers in Quebec may have an unique problem, in that many may not be able to read English, and most of the farm publications on the North American continent are published in the English language. It is suggested that consideration be given to providing an abstracting service of agricultural information to the farm and related audiences in the province of Quebec.”

Here we are referring to such advanced publications that come from the American farm community and to be specific we refer to the Doan Press and Better Business and this kind of thing which is quite highly technical in areas in which we feel the United States is considerably ahead of the Canadian agricultural community.

Number 7 gentlemen—and here I would like for the official record—I would like to recommend a change in the last sentence of this summary. If you would, please, in the last sentence—the last few words, instead of, “information to farmers and the rural audience”, change this, if you will, to, “information to farmers and the urban audience throughout rural Canada”. Mr. Chairman, we request the liberty to change two items and this is one of them. Now, let me continue that full paragraph, if you will.

“Since the C.B.C. carries out extensive programming of two of the media, radio and T.V., we recommend that this Crown agency be urged to increase its total coverage of rural Canada to provide more information to farmers and the urban audience throughout rural Canada.”

In statement number eight we request that you put a period after the word, “releases”, and just stroke out the following, “rather than pay a subsidy to the press”.

The Chairman: Fine.

“Number 8. We further suggest that the farm press can be successful only when the agricultural industry as a whole is economically strong. In times of financial stress in the agricultural industry, we recommend that government departments and agencies embark on a ‘paid space’ program in selected agricultural publications for their releases.”

We feel that this would be more desirable than allowing the farm press to be directly subsidized and that if the government would embark on this program but only in times of financial stress (which could be determined by some criteria which we would be happy to suggest) we would then be able to sustain a free farm press.

"Number 9. According to the agricultural economics research council, the agriculture industry contributes forty-two per cent of Canada's gross national product. In view of the importance of the agricultural industry to Canada, it is important that all major daily newspapers employ agricultural editors to prepare material for inclusion on the business pages of their publications.

Number 10. Many farm publications have been adversely affected by the recent increase in postal rates and we would urge that all farm publications continue to enjoy second-class mailing privileges. We urge that all farm and farm organization publications be allowed special consideration because they bring scientific and technical information to the farmer in layman's language. There are also a number of non-profit scientific and technical organizations which publish scientific and technical information which generates information for the farm press to use. It is recommended that publications of this type of organization should also enjoy second-class mailing privileges or that provision be made in the regulations to recognize and offset the higher postal rates."

Mr. Chairman, with that brief review of the contents of the brief I would be very happy to attempt to answer any questions that you may wish to put.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Forbes. We will perhaps direct our questions to you but with any of them, if you wish to perhaps farm a few to either Mr. Henderson or Mr. Bradley, then by all means feel free to do so. I think we will start with Senator Smith this morning.

Senator Smith: Well, thank you, Mr. Chairman. I have a few questions but Senator Sparrow coming from an area of the country where agriculture is much more important he would perhaps have much more knowledge of the industry which he will perhaps direct into questions later on.

I was very interested indeed when we learned and it was repeated here this morning that the Agricultural Institute of Canada itself and the operations of the Institute is not under examination here at all, composed as you are of these thousands of graduates who are working in the agricultural and food industry. I think what you can do is help us understand the needs better of the farm press and we appreciate very much the evidence we are going to get from you. We know that your economic future doesn't depend on the attitudes that you might express or any conclusions that we might draw but they could be helpful to you.

I was rather interested in one statement that I think you made in your brief and you repeated it here this morning. You referred to the decline in radio and television aimed at the farming community. Would you like to give us an explanation of why this is happening. Has it to do with the flow of rural community people into the urban areas?

Mr. Forbes: Yes. I think that likely this is the greatest factor. The fact that our population is shifting and is becoming more urban and naturally the radio and television stations wish to direct their efforts towards the greatest audience and the greatest audience is urban so that is the way it goes. I think that that is probably the main reason that it is going this way and as examples on what has happened—if you take a look at the C.B.C. farm related programs where they used to be quite specific and aimed at the farm segment now, for instance, the Country Calendar has become quite different and is no longer a farm kind of program or informational kind of program for the farm audience. It is more of what you might call a public relations program on behalf of the urban community.

Senator Smith: Well, don't you think that is also valuable?

Mr. Forbes: Absolutely. This is essential to the retention of a viable rural community.

Senator Smith: Do you believe that the abandonment of a radio program such as the Farm Forum was a bad thing for the C.B.C. to do as a source of information to the farming community?

Mr. Forbes: I think that the farm radio forum served a real purpose during its time. It served for a long time but unfortunately it did not see fit to change its format in keeping with the changes of time and I think this is the reason it became redundant. I regret very much that this program became redundant because it was a good source of information. It gave the people an opportunity to enter into the dialogue with respect to farm policy and things broader than just the technical operations.

The Chairman: Mr. Henderson wishes to add a comment.

Mr. W. E. Henderson, General Manager, The Agricultural Institute of Canada: If I may just add a comment. Mr. Forbes has covered very well the situation vis-a-vis the C.B.C. but a brief history of public broadcasting in radio and television I think is significant in the private sectors.

Not more than twenty years ago scattered across Canada you had a farm program directed at a farm audience sponsored by companies that were in a position to sponsor products to the farm audience who were the potential purchasers, however, when the farm audience dropped and the mass audience became more urban, the radio and television stations could no longer keep this guy on staff because they couldn't pay his salary because of the revenues that come from advertising. As a result over the last twenty years, you have seen a disappearance of the kind of good technical, scientific farm magazine kind of information from public broadcasting.

The Chairman: Could you give us any examples of that, Mr. Henderson?

Mr. Henderson: I couldn't. I think in our brief it is documented. There are only a few left and one is Wingham...

The Chairman: Yes, I was going to mention that.

Mr. Henderson: And Mr. Forbes is here and perhaps could tell us about the station at Brandon, Manitoba. Has that disappeared now?

Mr. Forbes: We do have a couple of programs which are sponsored and which relate to the farm and have been retained on the Brandon stations. There is a fifteen minute T.V. program which is sponsored by a national machine company and there is a radio program which was sponsored by a local feed company.

Mr. Henderson: If it is not already covered in the brief—I am certain it is having read it a number of times—we would be glad to provide more specific information for you, if you wish.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Senator Smith: I used to listen to a program occasionally when I was back in my home area of Nova Scotia which came on about noon hour. When I got home early from lunch I would hear this program and it was directed almost entirely to the farm community and it even included a little play that had a lesson going. I remember the title of the play was "The Gillans". Now, is that sort of broadcast still going on?

Mr. Forbes: This was the eastern counterpart I believe of the programs we had in western Canada. In eastern Canada, the play was "The Jacksons". This was part of the C.B.C. farm broadcast program in which I spent a number of years. It was a farm show at noon and it had regional variations a part of which was the farm family. Now, this was withdrawn about five years ago.

The Chairman: What was withdrawn?

Mr. Forbes: The dramatized section.

The Chairman: Yes, but the farm program is still on?

Mr. Forbes: The farm program is still on, but it is a mixed bag of urban oriented material. I don't think I am suggesting that it is necessarily wrong but...

The Chairman: Let me just trespass on your questioning, Senator.

Senator Smith: Please go right ahead.

The Chairman: The thing that concerns me—doesn't concern me, that's hardly the word, but isn't your position somewhat ambivalent. It seems to me in the present format of that noon hour C.B.C. program and the format of "Country Calendar" on television—isn't the C.B.C. doing the very thing that you wanted it to do?

Mr. Forbes: It is doing the thing we want it to do in one respect. On the other hand, as far as portraying a better image of the rural community to the urban segment—as far as this is concerned, they are doing a better job in this. On the other hand, the farm information section is going wanting and we think there is room for both of these.

Mr. Henderson: If I may add to that. The brief quite well documents the experience of the C.B.C. people in the Prairies and the C.B.C. people in Ontario in co-operation with the Department of Agriculture and also in the Atlantic provinces doing specific kinds of informational programs for farmers. Some of them where farmers actually registered—the study lessons were sent out and the documentation in the brief clearly demonstrates how successful this was in reaching a tremendous number of people who never get into the agricultural representatives' offices. Now, Mr. Forbes is one of these people. He knows that half the time the kind of information that he knows isn't perhaps getting to the right people but the mass media can help him do his job and hence it is important in this extension process.

Senator Smith: I am sure you people have been much more aware than myself or any of us or the general public and perhaps much more aware of the situation with regard to the farm press than those who should have been more concerned with it. I am sure you have known for quite a while about this three thousand survey which indicated that the farm press was number one on the list of sources of vital farm information and I am sure you also know about the various surveys which have been made with regard to La Ferme, the French language farm newspaper and the Free Press Weekly, both of which surveys indicated that seventy per cent of the readers in the Prairies of the Free Press Weekly and the same percentage of readers of La Ferme get no other newspapers. They do not get a daily newspaper I should say so what is left? You are telling us that radio and television are weakening and there is nothing left but the farm press. Our problem, of course, is to dig at this thing and see how we can strengthen it and you have made some suggestions which, of course, are worthwhile. Would you like to say anything more on that theme?

Mr. Forbes: I don't think so. I think that you summarized our point very well.

Senator Smith: I almost made a major speech.

Mr. Forbes: There are members of the farm press here who I am sure support your summary.

Senator Smith: I was particularly taken with your suggestion which you mentioned here this morning again that the editorial strength on the daily newspapers should be beefed up and the main reason back of that is to inform the urban areas to what is going on in the country to establish better relations. Is that your point of view?

Mr. Forbes: I am afraid that unless urban people gain a better understanding of what rural life is all about that rural Canada is going to become a social desert. This concerns me immensely. One of the items that is mentioned in the brief is the fact that out of nineteen thousand graduates from the University of Manitoba who have remained in the province, fourteen thousand five hundred or so are in greater Winnipeg, where half of the population is, leaving only four thousand to service the other half of the population. I am sure that you would agree that you don't have to be an educated person to offer the kind of leadership which is needed in the rural areas or any other areas. However, it helps and it disturbs me and it disturbs us that a disproportionately large number of graduates from our university are going to the urban centre and leaving the rural community without any kind of leadership which they need so badly. This is, of course, at the present time when they are going through this upheaval.

Senator Smith: Do you think this lack of understanding on the part of urban dwellers also includes some older members and some of the younger generation who started out to be farm dwellers but who have moved into the city and have lost their interest on what goes on in the farming community?

Mr. Forbes: I don't think this is quite so. The thing which concerns us the most is the fact that people who come in from the rural areas, whether they be male or female, meet the people of the opposite sex, they get married and through a lack of understanding of the virtues of life in the rural community, the urban partner does not wish to move out. Therefore, there is a tendency to centre in the urban centres. Just last week I had occasion to discuss this matter with a couple of people who had moved out and they confirmed that they had no real understanding of what urban life was all about until they got out there. The portrayal of the urban community to them through the mass media was not honest.

The Chairman: Well, I am sure, Mr. Forbes—surely this problem is much broader than relates to images portrayed by the media?

Mr. Forbes: I agree but I wouldn't think it was only the preponderance of economic opportunity. I think that the image is also part of it. I am not going to detract from the importance of the economic opportunity which accrues to the urban centres but a part of this is also true.

The Chairman: What you said is interesting to me. My knowledge of rural Canada is confined almost exclusively—it is very limited and it is confined almost exclusively to parts of southern and western Ontario. I was under the impression that in that part of the country at least the farm population if anything is becoming more sophisticated.

Mr. Forbes: Yes, I agree with you, but I think that is a pretty small geographic area. I think, and Mr. Henderson is in a better position to comment on this—certainly the conditions which prevail in western Canada are different than this and I don't know, Senator Smith, about Nova Scotia, but I would imagine the same thing would exist.

Senator Smith: Yes, I don't think that Nova Scotia presents a typical cross-section of farming communities and you know the situation just as well as I do. It has struck me that a boy or a girl brought up in a rural community must maintain an awful lot of the love of the soil and an interest in farming problems and I am rather surprised that there isn't enough interest on the part of daily newspapers in the city to cater to that kind of audience. It seems to me that I am bumping into people all the time whose origin is in the country and they still love to pitch hay when they go home on the week-ends and on their vacations and this type of thing.

The Chairman: Well, perhaps Mr. Henderson would like to comment on that.

Mr. Henderson: Perhaps this is part of the problem. The Agricultural Institute of Canada recognizes that the daily newspapers are doing a better job in the last few years in trying to portray life in rural Canada, but it strikes us that too frequently the kind of story that gets into the daily farm press is of the type of farm operations of someone who is really a corporate businessman, who is a week-end farmer. Too often we think that the kind of articles that appear—that are newsworthy obviously are of the emotional ties with the land; that urbanites have a farm and live out on the farm and this is fine. But we would like to see that daily newspapers recognize that there are two different segments of agriculture. There is a non-viable kind which is in trouble and there is another section of agriculture which is commercial, ongoing, good leadership business management and we would like to see stories about the agricultural business as a business in the business pages because this is where we think it belongs. Our organization has prepared the document with a yellow cover which has been distributed and which enunciates some of the policies that we think the government ought to follow in respect to this sort of thing. We would hope that through these kind of policies—that there would become a difference between what is a commercial farm and what is sort of a week-end farm. We think that in the business pages of the major daily newspapers in Canada, the importance, the context, the managerial, capital management, manpower, technical, scientific should be reflected. There is no point for a youngster coming from rural Canada with emotional ties to the land thinking about being a farmer if he hasn't got anywhere to get one hundred thousand dollars. That is what it costs these days to set up a farm. Then you have all the educational and scientific background to back him up in making an economic enterprise out of it. This is to enunciate—perhaps not enunciate, but clarify a little bit further on what you said.

The Chairman: Mr. Bradley, would you like to comment?

Mr. Keith Bradley, Agricultural Institute of Canada: I would like to respond to Senator Smith. It is true that a great number of urban people do have rural roots. It has been so in the past. Look at the changes in population and the degree of urbanization—For instance, since 1951, something like four hundred and ten thousand farms no longer are in existence. The young people of our generation had parents who came from the farm, their grandfathers hoed farms—and this doesn't exist now. It will become even less and less as time goes on so I think in the future there is a responsibility of the press to make aware the rural situation of these people. We can look at it quickly in terms of conservation and in terms of environmental control which has known very, very many vistas. I think our press does have a responsibility to look at this perhaps more seriously or in greater depth.

The Chairman: Mr. Bradley, where are you from?

Mr. Bradley: I am from the eastern township of Quebec.

The Chairman: Are you farming presently?

Mr. Bradley: No, I am not.

The Chairman: Well, I am just not clear on what your role is?

Mr. Bradley: Well, I am with the Department of Regional Economic Expansion at the moment but I have spent about fifteen years in field work and extension work resource development.

The Chairman: I couldn't help reflect on the fact that all you three fellows live in the city?

Mr. Forbes: Well, I think, Senator Davey, you would agree that Brandon, although termed a city, is really rurally oriented and very close to the country.

The Chairman: Well, I think Brandon is becoming more and more citified, would you agree?

Mr. Forbes: Yes, but I hope we will provide more and more opportunities for farm people to be...

The Chairman: Well, I wasn't being snide, but I think you fellows are part and parcel of this?

Mr. Forbes: We all are.

Mr. Henderson: May I respond to this?

The Chairman: Certainly.

Mr. Henderson: My great, great grandfather chose an area in eighteen forty-six which had tremendous potential in terms of potash which was the only cash crop they had. Unfortunately in 1960 it didn't turn out to be a viable economic enterprise so my choice was either to remain on the hill or do something else which, of course, I decided to do.

Senator Macdonald: Mr. Chairman, isn't the general economic trend away from the rural areas into the cities. That is a fact of economic life all through Canada. What is the point of the news media trying to report it. They can't change that. What is the point in them trying to change that trend? The people are going to the cities because they can get a better living there.

Mr. Forbes: I hope that we can very briefly identify the difference between the rural community and the farm. We are talking about the centres of service, if you like. We want better people more educated people and more people in the centres of service. The people who service agriculture, the people who make the rural community, they need them. We are not suggesting that we have a back to the farm movement, but we are suggesting that we can't afford in our opinion the social cost of larger and larger urban centres and social deserts as far as the rural areas are concerned. We have to have more meaningful centres of service and in these centres of service we have to have educational leadership in the form of chartered accountants, lawyers, doctors and so on and so forth. These people we are having difficulty in obtaining at the present time. If we don't get more educated leadership in the rural areas then the deluding of these areas in a social sense is going to be aggravated. This is our concern. It is not a back to the farm movement, Senator Macdonald, but it is a retention of a viable rural community to which the farm people can properly relate.

Senator Macdonald: Don't you think you have to retain your farm population to have such a community?

Mr. Forbes: Not if the people as they are doing very quickly, particularly in Saskatchewan and Alberta—if the people relate to a different rural centre than they used to do. We can still have viable rural centres with a decrease in the farm population in order to retain all of the centres of service at the present time. Yes, we have to maintain the farm population, but by relating to different centres of service—different community centres then we can have this meaningful existence.

The Chairman: I think, Mr. Forbes, Mr. Henderson would like to comment on this.

Mr. Henderson: I would just like to say that we feel and have enunciated as an organization in this yellow leaflet our policy with respect to passing judgment as to what is a commercial farm and what is not one as a result of people. We have, in effect, said in our brief that we don't think that the status quo should be maintained. Indeed, we believe there is a reason to think that it perhaps could be accelerated but there must be meaningful programs so that this adjustment could take place with a minimum of hardship for the people concerned. Some of the policies and programs are enunciated in the literature provided as a supplement to our brief. This, in our judgment, has not been adequately provided.

The Chairman: Senator Smith?

Senator Smith: Mr. Chairman, still on the same general area—the exchange of information and communication between the various groups in the country, I have a question which perhaps might be an important one to get the answer to. What do you people think might be the role of the newly set up Information Canada to play in providing a better communication link between these groups we have been talking about?

Mr. Forbes: I am not as familiar with Information Canada as I would like to be.

Mr. Henderson: At this point I am not completely familiar with the details of how it is to be conducted but I think it would be most unfortunate if Information Canada was set up whereby it prevented or in any way stopped or curtailed the flow of—not political information but scientific technical and policy information to the farmers who are directly concerned.

Now, I do not know what safeguards have been built into Information Canada to maintain the information divisions of departments, such as the Department of Agriculture at the federal level which has, as you know, a very strong research organization. I would express the hope that it does not interfere with the ongoing of that activity. However, I recognize that there are very many inter-departmental responsibilities that perhaps could come under Information Canada. Our organization would plead that the flow of scientific and technical information from the federal and provincial Department of Agriculture be increased and improved in quality.

Senator Smith: Well, Mr. Chairman, I would judge that the purpose behind the proposal, which is just now being decided as there is not even a head of it now, is to improve the flow of scientific information. I am sure you must have read some of the background which led up to the formation of Information Canada. The task force was very critical of government information services in general.

Mr. Forbes: With the exception of agriculture.

Senator Smith: With the exception of agriculture and that might very well be. I know I am aware of the serious criticism on the part of fishermen with regard to the literature and information that comes out from the fisheries department. They have been trying for years to make themselves a more vital, a more valid source of information for fishermen. Although the task force wasn't critical, I wouldn't be surprised if there were lots of room for improvement in the flow of information dealing with agricultural matters. Don't you believe that that is so?

Mr. Forbes: It is quite possible but I wouldn't wish to say at this point categorically that it is bad. I think everything can be improved. I think we should wait and see and perhaps this is a responsibility of our organization to examine the adequacy of the flow as a professional organization.

Senator Smith: I would also hope in view of this new Information Canada that you have something to say to those people when they get underway and get organized as to how they should deal with the agricultural community. We can't get very far in this, but I was interested in your comments and they were really quite interesting.

Senator McElman: Mr. Forbes, what is your opinion of the newsletter as currently distributed—I believe weekly isn't it by the federal Department of Agriculture. Does it serve a real purpose?

Mr. Forbes: There are two different farm news letters, if you wish, that come out. One is the Farm News Letter which is truly a letter kind of thing and the other is News. This is very difficult to comment on because for four weeks or so we will get something that is really relevant to the western communities and conditions—I am sorry, I am provincial on this—and then you might go for six weeks and there is nothing really applicable. Some of this is directed at the farm press, and some of it is too technical, but I would hesitate to be overly critical of it because at the same time there are a lot of subjects and a lot of information which are appropriate, timely and definitely applicable as far as the farm situation is concerned.

Senator McElman: How widely is it distributed in the farm community?

Mr. Forbes: I am sorry, sir, I really don't know.

Senator McElman: In view of your comment, would you suggest perhaps it should be procured on a regional basis for the prairies or the Ontario, Quebec areas and for the Atlantic provinces?

Mr. Forbes: I think this would be worth examination from the point of economics of sorting it out. Sometimes information which could be deemed advisable for the eastern region provides a stimulus for an idea which may be picked up for the western region; I would hesitate to be too exacting on the regional selection of the material.

Mr. Henderson: Well, as perhaps most Senators know, the federal department is involved in a federal task force study of agriculture. We of the Institute hope that through this exercise that has been going on now for some two or three years, will come some fairly clear distinctions between what are federal and what are provincial responsibilities. Until we sort it out as to whether or not a federal extension service such as you have been talking about, Senator McElman, is, in fact, a federal responsibility or a provincial responsibility—we run into this jurisdictionally problem. It is one we, in the Agricultural Institute, hope will be dealt with in this federal task force report which I understand is to be published relatively soon. Through this exercise perhaps we will be able to sort out the kind of problems that you foresee. There are federal policies which cut across provincial boundaries with perhaps regional adaptations, but there are separate and different policies for each provincial Department of Agriculture. Now, fortunately for the agricultural industry we have an organization called the Canadian Agricultural Services Co-ordinating Committee, which is a federal body that attempts to co-operate and tends to co-ordinate all the services, research service extensions and all the services that are required. Over the last few years the provinces have also been setting up these co-ordinating agencies. This organization has done a job to try and sort out some of these things, but it seems to me that something further than this has to be done in terms of what we hope will come out in the federal government's task force report on agriculture.

Senator McElman: If I could put another question as a supplementary on another subject.

The Chairman: Senator McElman, yes?

Senator McElman: Mr. Henderson, you commented a few minutes ago that a young man who was interested in farming would need one hundred thousand dollars. What type of farm were you thinking of? A so-called commercial farm or the ongoing family farm?

Mr. Henderson: Well, first of all, let me say what I think a family farm is. Basically it is owner-operated with perhaps some hired help where the owner actually is the manager. You need one hundred thousand dollars to set up a viable unit in the Prairies for a grain farm. You need a comparable amount of money anywhere in Canada to set up a viable hog farm. You need perhaps considerably more amounts of money to set up a viable poultry enterprise. You are from New Brunswick?

Senator McElman: Yes.

Mr. Henderson: Well, you know the kind of money that would be required to set up a viable blueberry picking operation and Senator Smith from Nova Scotia would know the kind of money that is involved in the Annapolis Valley in setting up a apple producing venture.

Senator McElman: You are referring then to any kind of specialized farming, is that correct?

Mr. Henderson: Farms now have become more specialized.

Senator McElman: Agreed.

Mr. Henderson: When you talk about one hundred thousand dollars, this is a realistic and conservative estimate of the amount of money that is required to set up an economically viable one. It is not only money—it is technical, scientific and managerial know-how. One of the components other than communication through the universities, through the schools of agriculture are the supplementary services and ongoing things like the farm press.

Senator McElman: The reason I asked is that it struck me as rather high. I was just wondering what type of farm you meant in the one hundred thousand dollar bracket.

Senator Smith: I just want to turn for a very short time to some kind of discussion on what the future of communications might be in view of the rather important, even at this date, advances that have been made in technology. I seem to have been convinced a long time ago that television was the medium. It is the medium of the future as well as the medium of the day. Advertisers rush to that medium when they want to get a message implanted in children. As a means of information it is also a good medium of today. Therefore, it is perhaps a tragic kind of thing that television hasn't been able to keep up in playing its part in disseminating information as well as the farm news into far communities.

The Chairman: Mr. Forbes?

Mr. Forbes: Well, I wish I could comment intelligently upon this question. We have done a considerable amount of crystal ball gazing with respect to the future of communications as they apply to the farm. As mentioned in the brief we can only see the media of television going downhill as a source of farm information because of the high cost that is involved in televising and the fact that it is commercially oriented and, therefore, must beam messages at the greatest population. We have not made any comments here about any kind of technological developments, but perhaps we might be able to computerize a great deal more of the farm information and develop computerized banks which could be called on to develop techniques which might be in the offing. Individual farmers who would thereby be able to come by specific information that would suit their individual needs.

I have no idea, Senator, how far this is away—I am not even sure whether this is practical or not but it is something which could be given some thought. Perhaps this will be the direction we will have to go and, therefore, the urban segment of the population will not be saddled with having to carry the cost of something which is beamed upon the farm community. I am sorry, Senator, but my imagination isn't any greater than that.

The Chairman: Mr. Henderson?

Mr. Henderson: I would like to comment to this effect. I think that there are farmers who are sufficiently interested in staying viable, becoming better off and having more profitable enterprises and others who are at a stage where they want to improve themselves that, I should think, with the number of people we are talking about and the social disruption that is involved that surely we should be able to afford, in an affluent country like Canada, some means whereby at off-hours farmers could receive through television scientific, technological and managerial kinds of information. I am very sure for example my four brothers who farm at Swan River, Manitoba, need this active scientific, technical, managerial kind of information. If we could have this on at a particular time of the day when it isn't interfering with the great masses of urban audiences, who would be normally listening in at that time, I think we could perhaps make television work as an instructional tool.

The Chairman: Do you agree, Mr. Henderson, that technology is going to make that entirely possible soon?

Mr. Henderson: That technology will make this possible?

The Chairman: That kind of program possible.

Mr. Henderson: Yes. The technology is known now and the scientific evidence of its success has been documented in the brief. But is the public prepared to pay for it?

The Chairman: Well, that is a very good question, but back to the question of television programming presently directed at urban audiences, my study of the television situation leads me to believe that the advances are just as high in urban Canada as they are in the rural districts. In other words, there are just as many people out on the farm that watch the hockey games on Saturday night as there are in the city and the television ratings bear that out. Would you care to comment on that?

Mr. Forbes: Well, I would have to agree that because of television more rural people are becoming more urban-oriented in their thinking which is a good thing.

The Chairman: But surely you are not urban-oriented just because you like to watch a hockey game?

Mr. Forbes: No, but what I mean to say is how life is in the city is reflected to the rural audiences through mass media but why should it not be possible, for example, for the C.B.C. national news to have as part of that news team an agricultural reporter?

The Chairman: Well, I was going to ask you on that question—I am sorry, Senator Smith, it is your question.

Senator Smith: It is all right, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Now, I just wanted to know how many major dailies have agricultural editors? You made a reference to the fact that more should, so do you know how many do?

Mr. Forbes: I can't tell you off the top of my head but I am sure we could get that information.

The Chairman: Well, we would appreciate it, if you would.

Senator Smith: Mr. Chairman, I just have another question on these media which are apparently not being used to direct information and news to the farmers. We had an interesting brief from the Minister of Communications one day last week and I was interested in some of the things he had to say. He was talking to some knowledgeable people in his own department—and the man has some imagination and capabilities in a great many fields, as criticized as he may be by a great many people. Among some of the things that he told us—for example, and I am quoting him:

"The television programs aimed at specific groups rather than the general public represent the wave of the future."

And then, a little further on in his brief he goes on to explain how this may be done. Now, I will quote him again.

"The list of what is happening and what will happen is almost endless. Coaxial cables which can provide twenty, forty, sixty, or even eighty separate channels will enable television for the first time to appeal to specific minority audiences rather than to mass demands."

He goes on to mention the computerization which I think was mentioned by Mr. Henderson a little while ago. In our background material we got some information on something even more amazing than this. This isn't ready to come tomorrow but we were told by someone who made a special study for us that upwards of one thousand channels will soon be technologically possible through the use of laser beams in cables. There is no end to the possibilities in this thing. When we arrive—and I am sure we are going to arrive at that stage some day, some of us may not live to see it completely developed—who should be running the show then? For instance, if farmers are interested in certain kinds of programming and whatever, should they insist that the farm press co-operative movement supply that program with a combination of broadcasters public and private or do you have any ideas on that which you would like to get on the record early?

Mr. Forbes: Well, I would sure like to give this matter some thought and let you have an opinion on it. However, right off the top of my head, I would suggest that it should be directed by somebody who is fully familiar with the farm community and perhaps in co-operation with farm organizations, either commercial or social; that we shouldn't leave this to any particular segment of agricultural industry. I would think the whole industry should be involved and perhaps Mr. Henderson because of his former association with farm broadcast may want to make some comment on this.

Mr. Henderson: Well, I would just like to say that it is possible, if farming can be sufficiently profitable, to see the day when scientific and technological information is hooked up between a university in a province and individual farmers, so that we would get the print out every day of the news of hog producers, for example. He would get the print out in his farm office from the university about maybe new rations or maybe a crop breeding program, or maybe a new cost of feed or some method of scientific advance. But this won't happen unless agriculture is viable and economic. Yes, I think it is technologically possible to have all these different channels which could be beamed to a farm audience.

Here again, you are tying that farmer down to a particular time of day. Keep in mind that he is an owner, operator and doing a lot of the work himself. He has a wife and family but I must say there is that possibility. I would like to suggest with my farm background and my brothers who live and farm extensively are very, very busy people. Not only do they have the farm to operate but they are community leaders and they are run off their feet. It is pretty nice when they do get the time, after church on Sunday afternoon, to sit down and, at their convenience, read the farm newspaper with specific information about their operation.

The Chairman: You are suggesting that television can't do this?

Mr. Henderson: I am suggesting that television has a role, yes, but there still is an important role for the farm press.

The Chairman: Well, I don't think we are suggesting that there isn't but I think some of the Senators, and I must include myself, are very impressed with the impact of technology, which, for all intents and purposes, is here now. That perhaps prompts Senator Smith's question. Senator Macdonald, did you have a question?

Senator Macdonald: Well, to get back to this farm press thing. Your recommendation number eight, you say:

"In times of financial stress in the agricultural industry, we recommend that government departments and agencies embark on a 'paid space' program in selected agricultural publications for their releases."

In other words, you are asking for an indirect subsidy for these publications?

Mr. Forbes: That is an interpretation of it, yes, Senator. You will note that we are suggesting selected agricultural publications because it could be quite easily mis-interpreted and some people who have a small arm circulation might want to get in on the releases. We are suggesting that some criteria have to be established whereby a certain portion of the total circulation would have to be arm circulation in order to qualify.

Senator Macdonald: And in number ten you are asking for lower postal rates. When the Minister was here he suggested that the Post Office Department should not be asked to subsidize any of these privileges, as it were. He mentioned that each classification would be able to bear its own weight and that if the government wanted to make a subsidy they should make a subsidy to the Post Office Department and his department wouldn't have to be made to carry a subsidy for carrying second and third class mail. What do you think about that?

Mr. Forbes: Perhaps I shouldn't comment on this, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: You realize that anything you say is privileged?

Mr. Forbes: I would say that if the government of Canada is making the most use of the taxpayer's dollar, it shouldn't matter whether it comes out of the Post Office Department or the Department of Agriculture. We do it in the most efficient manner in order to get the best results. I would say that perhaps in the case of the farm press we have a little bit different case than we have in some of the other kinds of news information. The welfare of the farmer is directly hinged on the kind of information and the amount of information and type of information which he obtains.

Therefore, the economics of the whole agricultural industry, you may say, is to some extent dependent on a viable farm press. You are going to come by general revenues by virtue of a more reliable agriculture so it becomes a contribution to the economy rather than something that is going to detract from the economy. I repeat they should do this thing in the most efficient manner and whether it is the Post Office Department or the Department of Agriculture, I don't think it matters.

The Chairman: Well, is the most efficient method a direct subsidy of the farm press?

Mr. Forbes: Of the farm press?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Forbes: I would think that he who pays the piper calls the tune and I would be afraid of a direct subsidy. I would rather see it the other way where it would be identified that these specific releases were from the Department of Agriculture or some other public agency and, therefore, leave the press free to make editorial comment and put their interpretation on the other kind of news items.

Senator McElman: Aren't you, in fact, asking for a subsidy on page four, item number eight?

The Chairman: That was Senator Macdonald's question, I think.

Senator McElman: Aren't you really doing that?

The Chairman: Well, Senator Macdonald referred to it is an indirect subsidy.

Senator McElman: Well, I don't think it is very indirect. Are you not actually asking for a tremendous precedent to be set—well, perhaps almost indirect somewhere in between.

The Chairman: Well, it isn't a tremendous precedent because it was just put forward last week by the ethnic press.

Senator McElman: This is my point. Where does it end?

Mr. Henderson: I would just like to say that it seems to us that in the implementation of a suggestion of this type, we should try and define agriculture as Mr. Forbes has suggested. A weekly paper which is distributed seventy per cent to the people in the town and thirty per cent out in the country isn't really—even though it is in a rural community—a farm publication. Upon investigation certainly we could determine what is a farm publication in the truest sense. This is an administrative matter which could be taken care of.

The other point is this. If agriculture is going to advance, it is going to advance on the basis of good managerial, scientific competency. If the Department of Agriculture and the universities and colleges across Canada want to get this message across to the rural community, at the moment they use press releases. The editors are deluged with great bundles of this material, a percentage of which they cannot use. If there were safeguards built into the system so that it was made quite clear that the kind of material that was included in the advertisement was not political information, but designed to get across technical, scientific and programmed information, I feel certain that this would in its totality be much better than any direct subsidy to the farm press which would destroy the editorial freedom of the editor. This would be a despicable thing.

Senator Macdonald: Don't you do the same thing with the indirect subsidy?

Mr. Forbes: I don't think so. I don't think you do this. With the kind of subsidy that we are suggesting—I even hate to call it a subsidy—I would think that with paid government scientific releases that this should have no more effect upon the policies of the press than an advertisement from another commercial organization.

The Chairman: Well, let us just take a hypothetical case. Let us say that I am a Minister of a particular department and we give your paper a good deal of space and all of a sudden you write a particularly critical editorial about me. All I have to do is 'phone my Deputy Minister and take that paper off the list. You are going to know that so, therefore, are you going to write those kinds of editorials?

Mr. Forbes: I would hope that that would be particularly, Senator, a hypothetical question. It is a practical one.

The Chairman: In other words, the point we are trying to make, if I discern what the Senators are saying is that they agree with you on the question of the problem, but I think Senator Macdonald and Senator McElman are saying that a subsidy is a subsidy is a subsidy. You don't agree with that apparently?

Mr. Forbes: I don't agree with that, Senator. I would hope we would be able to establish—perhaps it is beyond hope, but you could establish the kind of relationship that would allow the scientific releases to be made and paid for without having any bearing on the editorial policy of a paper or any reaction to the editorial suggestion of the paper.

The Chairman: But you also say in item eight here—you preface your suggestion by saying:

"In times of financial stress in the agricultural industry".

Is that a proper use of advertising?

Mr. Forbes: I am sorry. Could you expand on that.

The Chairman: Well, is it a function of advertising to subsidize any medium in terms of sustaining its existence, if you will?

Mr. Henderson: If I may comment?

The Chairman: Please.

Mr. Henderson: I don't think there is any real difference between a chemical company, for example, advertising a product and the farm press accepting that advertisement that it is accepting paid space from a provincial or federal Department of Agriculture talking about the assistance policies or the technical or scientific information that is available within their departments.

The Chairman: Well, the chemical company would not have to place that advertisement in times of financial stress to subsidize the farm press. I agree that normally this would not be the case, I agree.

Mr. Forbes: I wonder if I might attempt to put this in its proper perspective.

The Chairman: Yes, please do.

Mr. Forbes: In times of financial stress there is not going to be the same degree of advertising by fertilizer companies or chemical companies for all of these farm input industries. This is when some additional sources of funds are necessary. You suggested, I think, Senator, that perhaps it wasn't right for the chemical industry at any time to subsidize the farm press. We have at the present time some farm press who live on the basis of advertising and charge nothing for the subscriptions.

The Chairman: No, the point I am making, Mr. Forbes—I don't want to spin it out endlessly. As far as the advertiser is concerned, this is advertising. They are not placing that advertising simply to keep the papers going.

Mr. Forbes: Yes, I agree.

Mr. Henderson: Well, let us say, for example, in western Canada right now where wheat fails, well, that is not even news any more.

Senator Sparrow: Yes, it is, it is bad news!

Mr. Henderson: There is a place for perhaps a new approach to Prairie agriculture. Now, what sort of policies are there? What sort of programs are there that either provincial or federal governments may offer to help the people in this time of financial stress of the industry to make adjustments so that they will get into Reg. Forbes' office—an ag. rep.—to get the details and to get the time to sign on the dotted line to help him out. This is a means of reaching the farmer in a palatable form.

Senator Macdonald: Wouldn't it be a better policy to advocate where these are necessary, like this governmental information that they pay for them in any event in advertising. If the farm paper makes some money off them o.k., good for them. Just don't put it in times of financial stress because they should pay for their advertising like any other advertiser.

The Chairman: Would you care to comment on that?

Senator Macdonald: And no one could say that you were trying to influence the advertising policy or editorial policy, or anything else.

Mr. Forbes: Well, we are perhaps small "c" conservative in your view.

Senator Macdonald: Well, I don't even have any objections to you being large "C" Conservative.

Mr. Forbes: We do think that if this became a blanket policy that it could become quite costly to the taxpayer. I think as professional people, and our group represents professional people, we are very conscious of our code of ethics—that we are not out to gouge the public. We are conscious of our code of ethics in terms of how far you can go and this is why we said "in times of financial stress."

I do not think it would be advisable to have this blanket policy at all.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: Have you any idea of what amount of money you are talking about? We have federal grants now in times of stress but could you put a figure on it? While you are thinking about that, it seems to me that what you are talking about—times of stress—times of stress in the agricultural industry can come very quickly, creating a surplus situation or a drought situation, and so on. I have not known a federal Government or provincial Government for that matter to act that quickly where you could get the insertion of funds which may be necessary that quickly. Now, it is very easy for a farm publication to go broke rather rapidly in a short period of time. Have you any idea, really, of the amount of money that you are talking about?

Mr. Forbes: I am sorry, I don't.

Mr. Henderson: I don't have any idea at all. However, we are probably talking in the area of one-half million dollars.

The Chairman: I hate to interrupt, but I would like to point out to the senators that we do have a second brief to receive this morning. It is now 11.25 and although I don't want to terminate the discussion I might ask the senators if you might conclude your questioning shortly. Senator Sparrow appears to be the only one who has a question. Would you like to take it now?

Senator Sparrow: Yes, Mr. Chairman. The farms as such are 430,000. Commercial farms are approximately 230,000. To get that figure of 230,000 it means farms with incomes of over $2,500 per year.

To have what you might call an economic farm production today, you have to have over $20,000 or make $20,000 per farm. That means that in considering any number of vulnerable farm units, we are probably in the neighbourhood of 145,000 to 150,000 farms. That means in fact that the media as such is going to serve 150,000 units. Now, I can't see the mass media as such looking after that limited number of people through the medium of television or radio. This means that there must be some protection for the printed word as such to cover this fact. It may mean that a direct subsidy may have to go direct to farm publication on a broad base, on the basis of each subscriber. That a legitimate farmer—with a commercial farm unit would have to keep this viable and if it is not viable then the farm press or the vertical magazine with its broad scope is not going to be able to handle it.

Now, I appreciate that you are not the people who should perhaps answer this question because this is really ranging in a broad field, but would you care to comment on that? Again, I just want to say that I appreciate what you were saying earlier about the Government freeloading. They used the word "freeloading" on the press—giving press releases and agricultural news releases and expecting the farm press to print that news release without being paid.

Mr. Bradley: I think that is right, Senator Sparrow. I might just respond to this as an extension worker and say that we have two distinct groups as far as the population is concerned. We have the commercial farmer with a gross income of at least $8,000—this is the dairyman who produces in the neighbourhood of 200,000 pounds of milk or closer to a half million pounds of milk per year per man. He is going to have the kind of organization to give him the kind of life that in a sense he wants. We look at the dissemination of information and in terms of the full picture of extension, the farm press is one. We mentioned TV as another and radio, and the whole of technological advances in video tape. The tools we have to reach the people are fantastic if we have enough money to employ these tools. The commercial farmer will require a specified kind of information. We also have the others who, shall we say, are on the brink. They may be part time farmers, they may have other incomes and certainly their units are not economical and it seems that there is a responsibility on the part of the press and of the Government to acquaint these people with the adjustment programs that are available to them now.

If we are going to encourage the movement of people away from the farms, if we are going to be realistic in terms of what agriculture has to offer the people I think we have to be realistic in what we do to people who cannot survive on the farms as we know it and our grandfathers knew it. I think this is another whole world for the farm press. I think this is another role that the farm press has to play. I think we have to separate the viable agricultural operations from the different agricultural operations that are almost welfare programs, the farmer who is subsidized. I think the farm press publications in general have a valuable role to play here.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: I would like to get back to this analogy that was used about chemical firms and machinery production firms, and so on. I would like to relate that to government ads and their releases. Is there not a basic difference between the two. One is selling something and the other is giving a service which is paid for by the public. Was it not a bad analogy?

Mr. Henderson: First of all, Senator, I think we have to differentiate between what we are doing here. An extension department of a government or a program of a federal Department of Agriculture—how these things relate to a program. A company has a product that has to be sold that follows up the selling of an idea to the person who uses it in the first place. I think they would go hand in hand. There is no point in me, an ag. rep. going out to a farm in Calgary and talking to him about the advantages of using a new chemical if this somehow or other isn't tied up with his product. Now, in our profession we bring together the people who are in the agricultural business with the people who are in farm communications, and science, et cetera, and tie them together because we do have a profitable team here. I believe we have to differentiate between what we mean when we say a press release. The kind of press release that we have in mind, as an institute, is the kind of press release that talks about the availability of programs, the new scientific and technological and managerial innovations with which farmers may participate and this is the kind of thing we mean.

For example, the Canadian Department of Agriculture—I don't really want to make an announcement here—but it is a known fact that shortly they will be introducing a computerized farm management system. This has been in existence—co-ordinated from the University of Guelph or somewhere else and it has been available in the province of Quebec as well co-ordinated from Macdonald College. However, there is reason to believe that this should be national in nature. Shouldn't the federal Department of Agriculture—if indeed it has the jurisdictional responsibility for this paid space—tell farmers in the designated farm publication as identified by a measuring stick that we would be prepared to have this program, it is available, and that they could participate in it. I believe it comes to a farmer in a package that he identifies with and has identified with for years.

The farmer, who like the rest of us urbanites, gets piles of mail that is completely unrelated and you have to sift through the stuff and it is time-consuming; however, if this was in a package, I think there is greater assurance that he will pick it up other than just having scattered bits of unco-ordinated material or information that the farmer objects to at the present time.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: The witnesses have suggested that the farm publications are necessary and that the farmers depend very heavily on them for new information, et cetera. If you relate this to the fact that farm publications are so essential in providing this kind of service which they aren't doing, are you doing the right job wrongly or just doing the wrong job?

Mr. Forbes: I would say it is a question of economics for one thing. I suppose the farm press which has gone under just recently had the greatest circulation and I believe the Family Herald which I understand was owned by one of the other newspapers from Montreal—they determined this segment of their business was just no longer possible because there wasn't sufficient advertising or the reporters were costing them too much money, or something in this nature. I simply say that these publications went out just because of the economics of it. Was it serving a purpose? Yes, I believe it was serving a purpose. However, I would venture to guess that the majority of income gained accrued through the advertising and not through subscriptions. As far as I know it was a straight kind of economic thing because as the general level of the agricultural economy goes down, there isn't enough revenue, there isn't enough advertising to support such a publication. When we say "times of financial stress"—it is a time when we have an ever-greater and ever-increasing need for more applicable and more practical information and this is the very thing we need.

Senator McElman: But surely, sir, if the farm press is providing that type of information, the essential information that you speak of, then surely the advertisers of these types of products—the chemical firm and the machinery firm would be very much interested in reaching the market that you speak of?

Mr. Forbes: Well, you are absolutely right except that this year—pardon me for using western Canada again as an example—we feel that this year there is going to be enough of a drop in fertilizer use and last year you may be aware that there was another drop—I believe it was 29 per cent although I could be off on that. As the fertilizer use dropped off, the advertising dropped off.

Senator McElman: Shouldn't it be going up to sell more?

Mr. Forbes: Well, no because there is no incentive for producing more wheat right now and therefore they don't use fertilizers. You know, Senator, it is the chicken and the egg situation—which does come first?

Senator McElman: That leads me to comment, Mr. Chairman, that I was reading in the paper this morning that the Honourable Otto Lang suggested that a lot of the land in the west will not be put into production next year. I was wondering if that had to be carried as a paid ad to reach the people?

Mr. Forbes: It would get there quite quickly, quite easily.

Senator McElman: I would think so.

The Chairman: Senator McElman, your facetious observation leads me to make another one. We have Senator Sparrow from Saskatchewan, Senator Smith from Nova Scotia, Senator Petten from Newfoundland and Senator McElman from New Brunswick and Senators Langlois and Beaubien are from Quebec, and I also note that we have Senator Macdonald listed as coming from Cape Breton.

Well, gentlemen, we don't have to tell you, I am sure, that the whole problem of communication is enormously complicated, a complex situation and one which intrigues us, particularly as the farm papers play a vital role in the overall structure of the mass media. I would only add that the documents that you prepared will be a useful addition to those we already have and which we will be studying at length.

I would like to thank each one of you. Thank you Mr. Forbes and perhaps through you I could thank Mr. Bradley and Mr. Henderson.

Mr. Forbes: Well, Senator, I wish to thank the Committee for the opportunity which the Agricultural Institute had for making our thoughts known to you and I assure you, sir, that the Institute stands ready to participate in any further measures which you may deem necessary.

Thank you very much.

Short Recess

BRIEF PRESENTED BY THE FREE PRESS WEEKLY
TO THE
SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, I wonder if I might call the meeting to order, please. The second brief which we are to receive this morning is the brief from the Free Press Weekly and sitting on my immediate right is Mr. R. H. Shelford, the General Manager of both the Free Press and the Free Press Weekly. He, of course, is here today in his capacity as General Manager of the Free Press Weekly. Although all questions about the Free Press won't necessarily be ruled out of order, you should be mindful of the reasons he is here. We have received a brief from the Winnipeg Free Press as I am sure you know.

Mr. Shelford, the brief you prepared has been received. The Senators have had at least some opportunity of reading it, but I am afraid it wasn't received early enough for all of us to give it the study which I think it undoubtedly deserves. I would suggest that perhaps you begin with an opening statement which you obviously are prepared to make and may I suggest that following your oral statement we would like to question you on the contents of your brief and on any comments you may wish to make and if you wish to take ten or fifteen minutes, that is fine.

Mr. R. H. Shelford, Vice-President and General Manager of the Free Press Weekly: Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen. The brief presented by the Free Press Weekly sketches the changes in the farm press in the past twenty years. It shows how a number of farm publications of a bi-monthly or a monthly variety were forced, through lack of revenue, to turn over to another publication their paid in advance subscription lists. These publications were unable to obtain sufficient support from advertisers and were getting little or no revenue from these subscribers. Most of them tried to be a publication of interest only to farmers, thereby restricting the number of advertisers that would find their readership appealing.

Two of the three remaining major English farm publications are of a weekly news type for general appeal for both advertisers and readers. Because the Free Press Weekly is a rural publication, seeking and successfully obtaining readers in all ten provinces it is entirely reliant upon the Canada Post Office both for delivery and for subscription renewals. Virtually the whole of its circulation is delivered by the post office to paid in advance subscribers. When selling in a rural market through door to door canvassers it was necessary to take subscriptions for periods of three, five or seven years so that a territory need not be canvassed again the next year. Farm papers, therefore, built up subscription lists paid in advance for many years. These subscription lists were not an asset but a definite liability; a commitment by the publisher to provide a magazine for years to come.

From experience gained by building and maintaining a subscription list of over five hundred thousand rural readers, it is demonstrated that obtaining subscriptions through salesmen or through direct mail solicitation is very expensive and in some cases can produce a negative return. That is the cost of getting the subscription is more than the subscription price secured from the reader. Thus farm papers in the past have not been able to rely on subscription revenue and have been mainly dependent on the advertisers. Canadian farm papers were and still are very sensitive to any competition that would deprive them of advertising revenue and to any increase in postal rates. Added competition for advertising in the form of television throughout the rural areas of Canada has been created by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation at public expense. It is quite reasonable that people living in rural and isolated communities should receive the same television service as people of urban areas yet advertisers are being given the opportunity to reach into these rural areas with the same message provided for urban distribution at no additional cost. The rural area viewing is a bonus provided to the advertisers in direct competition to rural publications. A consider able amount of advertising revenue has moved from farm papers to television placing the farm papers in financial jeopardy yet not improving the financial position of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. It would appear that the cost of providing the service to advertisers in rural areas of Canada is not being met by the additional advertising revenue.

Last year the Canada Post Office raised a number of charges and rates which affected the farm publications. The rates affecting third-class mail, that is circulars and promotional material, were raised without parliamentary approval. The rates and charges on second-class mail received parliamentary approval and came into effect on April 1st, 1969. Any discussion on the proposed rate increase for second-class mail failed to reveal the extent of these increases and its impact on rural papers. It was not clearly shown that the rate increases could result in an immediate increase of three hundred to four hundred per cent in a publisher's postal bill.

The Free Press Weekly had anticipated a postal rate increase and based its projections on the expectations that the postal rates would be doubled. On this assumption, it had entered into long term commitments with hundreds of thousands of readers. There had been no indication from previous Postmaster Generals or from the senior officials of the Canada Post Office that the special category for agricultural publications would be eliminated. That the long time practice of charging by weight of publication would be replaced by a per piece charge. As stated, it was anticipated that the charge of one and a half cents a pound could well be increased to three cents a pound. The actual increase was to eight cents a pound. Since preparation of the brief, the Postmaster General has appeared before this Committee and made some statements referring directly to the Free Press Weekly. In our view many of Mr. Kierans' statements did not give an adequate picture of the situation. When the new rate structure was announced we expressed our opinions and comments in a letter to Mr. Kierans. Despite Mr. Kierans' statements neither the Free Press Weekly nor to our knowledge any of the other farm papers were given time to study or consult with Mr. Kierans or his department on his new rates before they were rushed into second reading before the House. The cost formula determined by the Canada Post Office with the assistance of an outside consulting firm and so frequently referred to by Mr. Kierans were of a general nature applying to general classifications of mailings. They were not intended to determine accurately the cost of any one publication.

I should like to give an example of errors arising from the application of a general formula to a particular publication. The formula assessed a general cost of delivery of each article of mail at one and three-quarters cents a piece. No distinction was made between mail delivered by a letter carrier on foot in the city or by a mail carrier on a rural route or by placing a piece of mail in a customer's mail box in a rural post office. Clearly the single operation required in a rural post office is much less costly than letter carrier delivery in a city, yet the formula arrived at a general cost of one and three-quarters cents a piece. Applying this general cost to a publication such as the Free Press Weekly that is delivered through rural post offices and then multiplying the error twenty-six and a half million times, you come up with a fantastic annual cost. It is quite inaccurate and rather irresponsible. In October, 1968, Mr. Kierans quoted figures that produced an estimated cost of seven point one five cents per copy for handling the Free Press Weekly. Last week at this Committee he quoted figures that indicate an estimated cost of eight point five eight cents. These figures were used to substantiate a charge of a whopping deficit caused by the Free Press Weekly. The figures of seven cents or eight and a half cents can only be another indication of inaccurate information provided by the Canada Post Office or the revelation that there has been an increase of twenty per cent in the cost of handling mail in the last few months. Increased postal charges and rates make it very difficult and time alone will tell how difficult for a farm publication to carry on in Canada. The English language publications are existing now only through subsidies from related operations. The Free Press Weekly makes a strong plea to the government of Canada to review this entire subject of second-class mail rates. It is contended that the basis of cost analysis used by the Post Office is unrealistic and weighs heavily against second and third-class mail.

It has been shown that the United States Post Office has abandoned this method of cost accounting and that their new costing formula will bear most heavily on first-class mail. The Free Press Weekly respectfully submits that the factors most seriously affecting Canadian rural publications are the advertising rate structure of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the rate structure of the Canada Post Office. Both come under the scrutiny of the government of Canada and both deserve much closer scrutiny.

I thank you for the privilege and opportunity granted to present the brief.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Shelford. We will turn to the questioning in a moment but I would just like to ask you one question just for clarification. I have Mr. Kierans' presentation to the Committee and you mentioned eight and a half cents. Where is that in here?

Mr. Shelford: You take his figure of five hundred and thirty thousand—that represents twenty-six and a half million copies. Divide that into his cost and it will work out to eight and a half cents.

The Chairman: That is not a figure he used?

Mr. Shelford: No. It can easily be worked out.

The Chairman: I just thought you were quoting him, I am sorry. Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: You suggest a review of the rates for second-class mail. What is your recommendation? What should those rates be or how would you change them?

Mr. Shelford: We feel that the rates should be sufficient to cover the additional expense incurred in handling second and third-class mail. This, of course, is after the facilities have been provided for handling first-class mail. If, a rural truck run or some other facility has been put on to provide first-class mail service that only the additional space or cost for carrying second and third-class mail should be charged to second or third-class mail.

Senator Sparrow: Well, why not reverse it? Why not have the second-class mail pay the basic cost and let the first-class mail pay the rest?

Mr. Shelford: First-class mail is guaranteed first-class delivery. Both second and third-class mail can under postal regulations be left aside for the next day or even the next day after that if space and staff do not permit the handling of it. The facilities are clearly provided for the first-class mail and second and third-class mail get second and third-class service.

Senator Sparrow: You would agree that the first-class mail is probably the most important mail for the economics of the country?

Mr. Shelford: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: And they pay an additional rate and you can't really have a mail service without the different classes. However, the point I am getting at is that when Mr. Kierans was here he bulked all second-class into one basket and he didn't review individual operations as such, individual newspaper operations or so on. Is this what you are suggesting? That a policy be brought out then to look at each individual operation because I am sure your operation is much different than some daily newspapers for example who use the mail services more often. Are you asking for them to specifically look at your operation or similar operations and have a special rate for this operation?

Mr. Shelford: No, I am not suggesting that. That would be too costly from the standpoint of content review as the size and type of mailing changed in volume. What I am suggesting is that the cost, for example, the Winnipeg post office which the Free Press Weekly does not use because their handling and sorting system by-passes that office, be not included in a charge for the agricultural type of publication and most second-class publications do not go through their originating post office. They only go through the destination post office and yet the sharing type of cost accounting that the Canada post office uses charges the cost of these large urban post offices to all types of mailings. The incremental method of accounting which the American post office now uses eliminates parts of the first-class service and thus charges on second and third-class mail.

Senator Sparrow: Well, someone has suggested at our hearings that perhaps a refund for the services given would work and would not be considered a subsidy as such. What do you think of that?

Mr. Shelford: I think it would be simpler to set the charges so that it takes into account the fact that these services of sortation and so on and so forth are provided rather than work through a refund.

Senator Sparrow: Could you do that without being specific with the individual operation?

Mr. Shelford: If all of the second-class mailings were required to reach a certain degree of sortation then the charges could be set and a refund would not be necessary to some publications and not to others.

Senator Sparrow: Do you disagree with his calculations, the Minister's calculations of seven and a half cents in cost or the eight and a half cents in cost if, in fact, though it is dropped in the mail rather than being delivered by truck as you may do and so on. Are you arguing with that cost structure?

Mr. Shelford: I am not able to determine the cost structure or even guess at the cost structure of any other publication other than the Free Press Weekly. I can come up with a pretty good idea of the cost for handling a copy of the Free Press Weekly. I disagree with the seven point one five cents.

Senator Sparrow: Of handling that?

Mr. Shelford: Of handling that publication, yes.

Senator Sparrow: For the general second-class mailing though, are you arguing that that is the cost?

Mr. Shelford: No, I am not arguing against the general second-class mail.

Senator Sparrow: Have you asked the Post Office Department for a break-down of their cost as such? Have you studied their costs?

Mr. Shelford: I have studied the formula used to determine the allocation of costs.

Senator Sparrow: Do you agree with that?

Mr. Shelford: No, I do not.

Senator Sparrow: I am not talking now of your own publication. I am talking of the rates as such. I know you don't agree with it in your own publication.

Mr. Shelford: Well, that is the only degree to which I have studied it from the standpoint of the Free Press Weekly.

Senator Sparrow: He gives a very good story you know. Some of the editorials of the Free Press have eluded to the fact that he had perhaps misled parliament and so on but I wouldn't suggest that he was misleading us or that you are doing that today. He did his best to convince us that, in fact, these were legitimate second-class rates, but he did admit that there may be some publishers who are giving more service than other publications and maybe there should be some adjustment there of some nature. Is that, in fact, what you are asking?

Mr. Shelford: I am suggesting that the formula used and the figures quoted by the Postmaster General labelling the Free Press Weekly with a deficit of one million, seven hundred and forty-five thousand dollars annually were inaccurate.

The Chairman: What should that figure be?

Mr. Shelford: It should be a fraction of that.

The Chairman: Well, what should it be? Should it be fifty per cent or seventy-five per cent? If I may quote from a document of the Minister's, it says:

"Brigadier Malone also did not tell you that while his postal bill this year will be five hundred and thirty thousand dollars."

Now, do you agree with that figure?

Mr. Shelford: That is approximately correct, sir.

The Chairman: It is the cost to the Post Office of carrying the Free Press Weekly will be two million, two hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars. Now, you disagree with that figure?

Mr. Shelford: Yes, I object to that figure.

The Chairman: What should that figure be?

Mr. Shelford: As an appendix to the brief, we have shown that at the outside the cost of handling a piece of mail—a copy of the Free Press Weekly could not be more than three cents a copy. We are now paying two cents a copy.

The Chairman: And he says it should be?

Mr. Shelford: He says it is about eight point five cents and we say it should be around three.

The Chairman: So presumably then this two million figure becomes one million dollars?

Mr. Shelford: Well, less than that. The total figure should be around seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

The Chairman: That is the cost?

Mr. Shelford: Yes, that is the cost.

The Chairman: So you say the post office loses just two hundred and twenty thousand dollars only?

Mr. Shelford: Approximately.

The Chairman: That is a million and a half dollars about which you and he disagree. That is a lot of money and how can the gulf be that wide? Senator Sparrow said you didn't accuse the Postmaster General of misleading the Committee and really I think you are in effect. You did say that he didn't give us an accurate picture. You are suggesting that he was out a million and a half dollars in what he told the Committee. Now, is that correct?

Mr. Shelford: I am suggesting that the general application of the costing of formula—a formula that is designed to cover all second-class publications when applied to the Free Press Weekly is bound to come up with some very large differences because we are talking about a mailing of twenty-six and a half million per year. The difference can be in the range of a million dollars or more.

The Chairman: Well, getting down to specifics. Getting down to a specific per copy basis, what do you and he disagree about in terms of costing? In other words, you say it should cost three cents a copy—am I correct?

Mr. Shelford: Yes.

The Chairman: And he says costs by your calculation, I take it...

Mr. Shelford: Eight point five eight.

The Chairman: Eight point five eight. Okay, so that is a difference of five and five-eighths cents—that is the financial difference. What, in fact, does he say he does that you don't think he does? Is that a fair question?

Mr. Shelford: Yes, that is a fair question. The costing formula used by the Post Office covers three areas. Sortation which is the sortation of the piece mailed at the originating post office, transportation which is covering the movement of the mail from the originating post office to the destination post office and delivery which is the delivery of the mail from the destination post office. The Free Press Weekly has under the general application of the formula been assessed figures in the sortation area for handling the publication in the Winnipeg post office. However, the publication does not go to the Winnipeg post office. The publication goes directly on to freight cars in the railyards, delivered by our trucks and off-loaded by our men. There is no sortation. The transportation costs being in full freight car loads are less, I am sure, than the formula which would apply to part car loads of smaller publications.

We load in Winnipeg two car loads for Montreal, one and a half for Toronto, one for Edmonton and one for Vancouver and the transportation costs in a freight car of that type must be less than the formula as assessed. I have explained in my opening remarks why the cost of delivery in the destination post office is assessed at a figure far higher than the true cost in a rural post office. Many of the rural subscribers get their mail directly from their "locked box", as it is called, in the post office. It takes one operation to put a copy of the Free Press Weekly into that box and the subscribers come to the post office to get their paper; it is not delivered to them. The cost, therefore, is much less than that assessed by the costing formula.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: Would you estimate the value of the services that you supply to the Post Office Department by this type of delivery? There is a difference in what Mr. Kierans states as the loss they are taking. What do you estimate your cost to do the service that you are talking about?

Mr. Shelford: Our estimated cost is relatively small because our mailing list must be kept in the sortation system. We are not sorting it every day. That is the way it is produced. The only way that we can find the subscribers' address plate is to keep it in a proper sortation. The only way that we can ensure that it gets the most prompt service from the post office is to place the mail right in a mail bag that would be delivered directly to the destination post office with the minimum number of handlings, so that it gets there as quickly as possible. There is not an additional cost to us of handling or providing the mail pre-sorted this way, but there is a considerable savings to the post office because it is delivered in this form.

Senator Sparrow: If you dumped into the post office your papers one at a time or a hundred at a time, would they accept them?

Mr. Shelford: I do not know. I do not think they can under the present regulations and I am sure it would take more than a week to get them out.

Senator Sparrow: What is your time of delivery now for your newspapers by mail leaving your plant? How many days does it take to be delivered anywhere in Canada?

Mr. Shelford: It is about a day per province. In Manitoba it would be delivered the next day, going out to another province, Saskatchewan and Alberta, it would be delivered a day later and so on. Out in Vancouver, out in British Columbia and in the Maritimes about five days.

Senator Sparrow: How has the no delivery Saturday affected you? Do you get it out early enough in the week so that the Saturday delivery doesn't affect you?

Mr. Shelford: We changed our publishing date when this came into effect. We used to publish it on Thursday and Friday with an endeavour to get it carried over the week-end and then be delivered in the middle of the following week. We now publish it Monday and Tuesday so that the bulk of the mail could reach the post offices before Saturday and can be picked up or delivered by rural route before Saturday.

Senator Sparrow: I would just like to add to that that there are probably a lot of questions on mail costs because almost every brief has covered this but I would like to just get away from that for a minute. You operated your weekly at a loss this last year?

Mr. Shelford: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: Have you publicly stated the loss or are you prepared to?

Mr. Shelford: Yes. Although the revenues of the Free Press Weekly increased twenty-two per cent in 1969 over 1968, the increased postage costs and the increased postage was only for nine months in 1969 used up the whole of that twenty-two per cent increase and turned the publication into a loss position of approximately one hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Senator Sparrow: Did it lose in 1968?

Mr. Shelford: Made a very small profit in 1968.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: All of this attributable to postal rates?

Mr. Shelford: All of this attributable to postal rates.

Senator Sparrow: Did your circulation go up between sixty-eight and sixty-nine—where is this twenty-two per cent increase in revenue?

Mr. Shelford: In 1968 we added several hundred thousand subscribers of the Family Herald and were able to increase the advertising rates on that basis.

Senator Sparrow: Your circulation as such for your Free Press in other words did not go up or did it?

Mr. Shelford: The circulation of the Free Press Weekly did move from about four hundred and twenty-five thousand to over six hundred thousand by the addition of the lists of the Family Herald.

Senator Sparrow: Didn't you state that your circulation was five hundred and some odd thousand?

Mr. Shelford: There has been considerable evaporation since then.

Senator Sparrow: Due to?

Mr. Shelford: Partly due to the increased resistance to price increases by the farmer. We have increased our subscription rate and partly due to the fact that not all the people who had been subscribing to the Family Herald and who were forced to become subscribers of the Free Press Weekly took kindly to it and hence did not renew their subscriptions.

Senator Sparrow: In your opinion—and I appreciate you have a great deal of problems with the postal increases—was the problem greater because it was too much too soon and could you have adjusted to it had it been spread over five, seven, eight or ten years? I ask this question because again, the Minister was talking about additional increases. He is still talking about the Post Office being subsidized by seventy per cent, I believe his figure is. What about the extension of it. Would you be that critical could you adjust to it to see that the Post Office department is a break even proposition at least?

Mr. Shelford: If the postal rate increases had been more in line with the normal increase that business would expect from its suppliers of services, the subscription rates would have been changed more gradually and the subscribers would have taken it more casually. However, the farm market is such now that it is very resistant to any price increases and this was not the time to raise the subscription price as we did from a dollar fifty a year to three dollars a year. But it had to be done in order to obtain the necessary revenue to cover the postal increases.

Senator Sparrow: Does the three dollars cover it?

Mr. Shelford: Yes. If each subscriber that we have in the future will pay three dollars a year, it will cover it.

Senator Sparrow: Of your five hundred and fifty thousand, how many would still be on the old rate—now, I appreciate that some of those would still be in the papers that you took over, but what would the turnover have been now on the new rate?

Mr. Shelford: There are at least three hundred thousand that are still on our list at the old rate and will remain on for another year or more.

Senator Sparrow: When you take over a publication, you just take it over in fact and there is no compensation—it just increases your coverage for advertising revenue, is that correct?

Mr. Shelford: That is correct.

Senator Sparrow: Could you tell us how you obtain new subscribers and the cost of obtaining those new subscribers?

Mr. Shelford: There are two methods available. One is to send out salesmen, door to door canvassers and either pay their expenses or pay them a commission sufficient to make it worth their while to carry on. This commission has by custom been in the neighbourhood of ninety per cent though in more remote territories it is necessary to pay one hundred per cent commission to get a traveller working. The other alternative is to solicit by mail, sending out one or two hundred thousand pieces of mail at five cents a piece offering the prospective customer a subscription, normally at a reduced rate. You must offer a bargain or they won't return the order.

At certain times of the year it is possible to get four per cent return or slightly better and this is a break even point at the present time.

Senator Sparrow: For production mailing costs?

Mr. Shelford: Yes. To cover production and mailing costs. A mailing, in the wrong time of the year, say mid-summer, would certainly lose money. You would not get the return from the farmers.

Senator Sparrow: You are talking about that type of mail return—four per cent return. This is for new people. This is not renewal subscriptions?

Mr. Shelford: This is for former subscribers or to names obtained through the post office. You can purchase lists of rural post office patrons from the post office and from that list obtain the names of the persons who are not taking your publication and mail out to them.

Senator Sparrow: How faithful are your readers then for renewal of subscriptions? I assume, of course, that you send out one, two, three, four or more renewal notices?

Mr. Shelford: We are experiencing a change in the situation because the price of the publication has been increased. We used to under the former price structure obtain an eighty per cent renewal. It has now dropped to the neighbourhood of sixty per cent.

Senator Sparrow: Sixty?

Mr. Shelford: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: Do you have any insurance plans and so on that you sell at the same time as your publication?

Mr. Shelford: No, we do not carry any other type of sales promotion.

Senator Sparrow: Are your salesmen that you put out, do they only sell your publication or do you contract with other firms?

Mr. Shelford: We let them or we encourage them to handle other publications also because it helps cut their travelling costs. We do not have any restrictions on the salesmen as to the number or type of publications they handle.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: Where do you purchase those lists that you speak of?

Mr. Shelford: They are available from the post office.

Senator McElman: Fine.

Senator Sparrow: Straight householders' lists?

Mr. Shelford: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: How many regional editions have you?

Mr. Shelford: We have two. One in the east and one in the west.

Senator Sparrow: What is the difference—how many pages are different in your editions?

Mr. Shelford: It can vary as much as four pages, but in the heavy advertising seasons, they are probably the same. That is national advertising covering both editions, both east and west, will warrant the same size of edition. The edition size is determined by the amount of advertising.

Senator Sparrow: Well, news content and editorial content, is it about the same?

Mr. Shelford: Editorial comment is the same. The news is tailored to the part of the country the edition is designed for.

Senator Sparrow: Are the advertising rates and subscription rates the same in the east and the west?

Mr. Shelford: Subscription rates are the same. The advertising rates are based on the relative circulation of east and west editions and are very, very close to being the same with the exception of livestock advertising and classified advertising.

The Chairman: I am going to turn to Senator Everett who has indicated that he would like to ask some questions, but I would like to return just for a moment to the postal rate matter which I find very troublesome. Well, you and I have established here that there is a million and a half dollar discrepancy between you and Mr. Kierans. I think, Mr. Shelford, that I don't even for a moment question your sincerity, but I must say in andor that I don't question the Postmaster General's sincerity. He made a point when he was here in the question period and some of the Senators who were here could correct me if I am wrong about suggesting that Mr. Malone or yourself or someone from your company could visit him at the Post Office and inspect the figures on which he based this particular computation. Is that not correct?

Senator Sparrow: That is correct.

The Chairman: Have you done this and would you accept his offer?

Mr. Shelford: When he made that offer prior to the second reading on the postal bill, there was not sufficient time to make any inquiries...

The Chairman: I think you misunderstood me. He made it the other night here.

Mr. Shelford: Well, we had already gone over the formula provided by the accounting firm. We disagree with the formula because it was an audit—the results of an audit of the figures provided by the Canada Post Office and it was not a study in depth as it should have been. At no time were we, the largest user of second-class mail, approached by this outside consultant as to how we handled mail or how our various operations fitted in with that of the post office. I would call it a study or audit and not a real in-depth...

The Chairman: Well, you have seen the study?

Mr. Shelford: Yes.

The Chairman: Where did you see it, here or in Winnipeg?

Mr. Shelford: In Winnipeg.

The Chairman: And it was made available to you by the post office there?

Mr. Shelford: No.

The Chairman: Well, how did you get it?

Mr. Shelford: We got it from another source.

The Chairman: What source?

Mr. Shelford: A private source.

The Chairman: A private source?

Mr. Shelford: Yes, a private source.

The Chairman: Now, why haven't you accepted the Postmaster General's observations and why don't you and he get together and discuss this million dollar discrepancy?

Mr. Shelford: We have had a number of letters—there has been a considerable amount of correspondence between the Postmaster General and Mr. Malone, our publisher, on this matter.

The Chairman: I am sure.

Mr. Shelford: I think that the matter is still open.

The Chairman: Well, I think perhaps it is still open, but I would have no way of knowing, but I would suggest that surely there could be some more—some meetings of minds which isn't apparent now. He also said and will you comment on this in his document. He said, "The Free Press Weekly would have to increase its annual subscription rate by eighty-three cents which works out to one and two-thirds cents more per copy. That is the full extent of the burden we have asked the Free Press Weekly to pay. It still amounts only to twenty-five per cent of our estimated cost." Do you agree with that figure of eighty-three cents?

Mr. Shelford: Yes, I agree with that. That is a correct figure, but if I may add to that?

The Chairman: Yes, please.

Mr. Shelford: It is not possible to add that eighty-three cents to each subscriber that you have now on the list because you are committed to them.

The Chairman: Yes, I appreciate that.

Mr. Shelford: We hope in time that the subscribers will be paying this extra eighty-three cents. However, they are not at the present.

The Chairman: Well, I have a couple more questions I would like to ask, but perhaps I should turn to Senator Sparrow.

Senator Sparrow: But also you say they wouldn't have to do this. You say that that is going to have to be paid but you say, in fact, that they shouldn't have to pay it?

Mr. Shelford: No.

Senator Sparrow: Well, you are saying that the rates are wrong?

Mr. Shelford: I am saying that the calculations of the Postmaster General showing large deficits are wrong. It is the deficits that I am objecting to.

Senator Sparrow: Not the rates?

Mr. Shelford: Not the rates.

Senator Sparrow: The rates are all right?

Mr. Shelford: The rates are reasonable at present, yes.

The Chairman: Senator Macdonald?

Senator Macdonald: Do you agree that their calculations on all second-class mail are correct?

Mr. Shelford: No, I don't agree that all calculations on second-class mail are correct. Their assumption of sortation and distribution is in my mind inaccurate.

The Chairman: Yes, as we have discussed already. You broke down the three components, transportation and so on.

Mr. Shelford: Yes.

Senator McElman: I would like to go back to your question there a moment ago which I don't believe Mr. Shelford completely answered. Would it not be a practical thing, Mr. Shelford, since you are here in Ottawa, now to actually instead of the long distance call or writing—editorial writing deal—feel free to sit down with Mr. Kierans or with his officials or both and discuss this?

Mr. Shelford: Mr. Kierans stated in the House that he disagreed completely with the attitude of the Free Press Weekly, that second-class mail should be classed as a marginal cost in first-class operations. If he does not accept the marginal or incremental cost operation or application there is no ground on which we can meet.

Senator McElman: You don't feel you would have any chance of changing his view or his official's views by discussion?

Mr. Shelford: Mr. Kierans stated before the Transportation Committee of the Senate in October of 1968 that the strongest representation he had had was from the Free Press Weekly and it didn't seem to have any effect.

Senator McElman: You still really haven't answered my question. You don't think it is very practical then?

The Chairman: Well, I think he has answered your question.

Senator McElman: Very good.

The Chairman: We don't want to put words in your mouth...

Mr. Shelford: We have represented our theory of marginal costing as strongly as we can.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: Well, let me go to another subject. Senator Sparrow asked you whether you could put down your papers in the Winnipeg post office rather than on the freight cars and your reply, I believe, was that you didn't know. It would seem to me that you would have an opportunity to become pretty darn snarky with Mr. Kierans because it wouldn't reduce your costs to put them down there, but it would seem as heck increase his costs wouldn't it? Have you thought of discussing that angle with him?

Mr. Shelford: We would, and Mr. Kierans is fully aware of this, never consider putting down all our papers in bulk in the Winnipeg post office because as I mentioned before it would take more than a week to get them out of there. It is a weekly newspaper and we want to get them out of there as quickly as possible. We are anxious to get service and prompt delivery to our subscribers. We would just never consider that.

Senator McElman: All right, let us take a third approach. Since you are saving the Post Office a reasonable sum of money by not doing that, would it be practical for you to discuss with him some division of that cost?

Mr. Shelford: I believe in this Committee last week Mr. Kierans suggested that.

The Chairman: Suggested?

Mr. Shelford: Suggested that there should be some consideration of the sortation being done by larger publications.

Senator McElman: Then there is a movement or opening for discussion?

Mr. Shelford: There is an opening for discussion on that.

Senator McElman: Would you think it would be practical to discuss it with him?

Mr. Shelford: We would be willing to discuss it with the Postmaster General, certainly.

Senator McElman: It would be more practical than editorially?

Mr. Shelford: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: I am confused. May I interrupt?

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: On this point you said you weren't in favour of a rebate for services. You said that the rates should be lowered—a policy of rates taking this into consideration, then a moment ago you said the rates are all right, that they are fair and I am not so sure that I understand what you mean.

Mr. Shelford: There are two rates being considered. The rate we are being charged which is two cents a copy and the cost per copy which is being bandied about somewhere around seven, eight, or ten cents a copy. It is the costs that are being bandied about that we disagree with. Not the rate that is being now charged.

Senator Sparrow: It is him saying that the costs are higher than what you say they are?

Mr. Shelford: Right.

Senator Sparrow: But you just answered Senator McElman by saying you would be prepared or wished to discuss with him the idea of a special consideration. Isn't this what you are saying?

Mr. Shelford: Yes.

Senator McElman: Yes, that was my understanding.

The Chairman: Yes, that was the answer.

Mr. Shelford: We can discuss that with him. It would probably have some bearing on the future rate increases that Mr. Kierans has indicated are in the offing.

The Chairman: I think what you are really saying is that you think the extent to which the Post Office is subsidizing your company is much smaller than Mr. Kierans thinks they are. Is that a fair statement?

Mr. Shelford: We categorically deny that it is a subsidy to our company and we also feel that the figure, if it is a subsidy to anyone, is overstated.

The Chairman: Well, I would like to come and talk about that in a moment but Senator Macdonald has a question.

Senator Macdonald: I was just thinking this. If you are correct then, the cost accounting system of the Post Office is wholly wrong as far as second-class matters are concerned. There might then be a presumption, but if it is wrong with regard to second-class mail, it could possibly be wrong for all types of mail.

Mr. Shelford: It is, as stated in our brief, that assumption that the United States Post Office has come to.

The Chairman: Back to this question on subsidies and so on and I don't use the word to annoy you but presumably it costs the Post Office more to carry the publication than the Post Office gets back in revenue from the company?

Mr. Shelford: Right.

The Chairman: So whether you call it a subsidy or no matter how you describe it, the Post Office carries the publication at a cost to the public.

Mr. Shelford: Well, I gather from your question, you say there is a subsidy and is the question who gets it?

The Chairman: No, that is not my question at all. My question is, do you agree that the Post Office loses money carrying the Free Press Weekly?

Mr. Shelford: I am not so sure that if, under the marginal cost operation, that is assuming and binding and determining the actual cost of handling the Free Press Weekly, I am not too sure that it would be losing money.

The Chairman: Do you think that the Post Office loses money carrying anything at all?

Mr. Shelford: Yes.

The Chairman: Obviously there is an enormous deficit in the Post Office so how does this occur?

Mr. Shelford: Well, the Post Office is providing a service. I think it is provided for the benefit of the first-class mail. The second, third and fourth are added and get marginal use of those facilities. Which class of mail should be charged for the basic cost of the Post Office in which it should be charged for the additional expense of carrying any particular type of mail is our...

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Shelford, we have had publication after publication come before this Committee and we have received brief after brief after brief complaining about postal rates. We have had the Postmaster General come before the Committee and say to us that the Post Office loses money carrying these publications. Now, the point I am putting to you is—you agree with both sides, don't you? I mean you agree that the Post Office rates are hurting the vast cross-section of the publications, but would you agree with

Mr. Kierans that the Post Office does lose money on the things it carries?

Mr. Shelford: Our main point of disagreement is the amount of money that it claims it loses.

The Chairman: Well, that is all right, that was what I was driving at. You think that there should be a rationale for the Post Office losing some money on some of the publications it carries?

Mr. Shelford: I do not—and I am getting back to the Free Press Weekly...

The Chairman: Fine.

Mr. Shelford: I do not think that the Post Office should continually provide at less than expense a service to the Free Press Weekly but it is going to be very, very difficult to convince anyone as to the degree of service we think we are getting and the cost of that small degree of service.

The Chairman: Well, even by your own figures the Post Office is running at a deficit of something like two hundred and twenty thousand dollars.

Mr. Shelford: And that is the maximum. You will notice that in Appendix B of our brief it says that the maximum that it should cost is three cents a copy.

The Chairman: So even if it is losing two hundred and twenty thousand dollars as the maximum figure, you think that that is a regrettable situation, do you? Please believe me, I am not trying to put words in your mouth, but did I understand you to say that the Free Press Weekly should pay its way with the Post Office?

Mr. Shelford: I believe it should because we do not expect any government subsidy in the operation of the Free Press Weekly.

The Chairman: All right then, I would like to turn to something else, if I could. In Appendix C of your brief you give the total advertising lineage. You have the figures for 38, 48, and 58 and 68. Could you give them to me for 1963, Mr. Shelford?

Mr. Shelford: I am not so sure that I have, sixty-three here—I have sixty-four.

The Chairman: Well, that will do.

Mr. Shelford: Classified was five hundred and seventy-seven thousand approximately.

and display was four hundred and fifty-four thousand, eight hundred.

The Chairman: Well, taking display for the moment, because your grievance with the C.B.C. relates to display advertisers, not classified advertisers. Your 1958 display lineage was five hundred and eighty-eight thousand, your 1964 lineage is four hundred and fifty-four thousand and your 1968 lineage was three hundred and ninety-two thousand so would I be fair in concluding that the problems you have don't relate entirely to postal rates but rather to a waning interest in farm publications?

Mr. Shelford: Well, as I mentioned at the outset, there has been a loss of advertising revenue to television.

The Chairman: Would you explain that to me? I would like you to sort of restate your position on that.

Mr. Shelford: The Canadian broadcasting stations have been creating around their core stations, satellite stations or satellite relays that have been covering the rural areas and the advertiser in the core station gets his advertising projected in the core area. Someone mentioned during the presentation of the previous group, the farmers watching the hockey broadcasts through the satellite stations, and the advertiser in that case is given that coverage and it is a considerable coverage. Around Winnipeg, the station reaches as far as Thompson and Churchill and Dryden and Antikokan into Ontario. The advertisers, therefore, are able to, in one package, reach out into the rural area at the same time as covering the urban audience. He is doing this in the Winnipeg area at an advertising rate lower than the competitive station which only covers the Winnipeg area.

The Chairman: What is the competitive station?

Mr. Shelford: A C.T.V. station.

The Chairman: In Winnipeg?

Mr. Shelford: Yes.

The Chairman: And the C.B.C. station you can buy at a lower rate including the satellite than the C.T.V. station?

Mr. Shelford: Yes. This is according to the rate card that I have from the Canadian Rates and Data.

The Chairman: What is the relative cost per thousand of spot announcements on C.B.C. television and the Free Press Weekly?

Mr. Shelford: I am sorry, I could not give you that. I do not know.

The Chairman: You list in Appendix A, a group of national advertisers, Gillette, Bristol-Myers and so on saying that in the fifties they spent a minimum of fifty thousand dollars a year in the farm papers and now that money has gone into television. Aren't you being a little unrealistic in sort of laying the blame for this situation at the feet of the C.B.C.?

Mr. Shelford: Well, it is the C.B.C. that has created these satellite stations in the rural areas, not the other.

The Chairman: If the C.B.C. were to take the costs of the broadcasts on the satellites and on the originating stations and decided that they would sell these announcements at a cost which would totally defray the costs of the broadcast, isn't it likely that the national advertisers couldn't afford the C.B.C.?

Mr. Shelford: I do not know the economics of broadcasting, but...

The Chairman: But if it were—if that were the case, if the costs then became prohibitive and were passed on to the national advertisers, would you still argue as you do on page four of your brief?

Mr. Shelford: Yes, I think so. We have been or it has been suggested by the Postmaster General that we increase our advertising rates to cover costs of increased postage and it is only reasonable that another operation subsidized out of public funds should increase their advertising rates to cover into the rural areas.

The Chairman: Isn't there a difference? Isn't the Free Press Weekly a private company and isn't the C.B.C. financed out of the public purse to the extent that advertisers pay part of the costs of operating the C.B.C., doesn't it save the taxpayers of Canada some money whereas the tax to the people of Canada are not saved any money at all through money which the Post Office uses to defray costs for various companies?

Mr. Shelford: Our suggestion is that if the advertisers are going to be given a projection into the rural areas, that they should be charged for it, but if they don't want it, shouldn't be given it and then they would be required to advertise in rural papers.

The Chairman: So the C.B.C. makes no additional charge for the satellite coverage at all?

Mr. Shelford: Apparently not. If it is possible to buy the core coverage at a higher rate...

The Chairman: What percentage of viewers are satellite viewers of the C.B.C.?

Mr. Shelford: In western Canada the rural area is pretty well covered by satellite stations and, therefore, you can consider that the ratio of farm population to urban population would be the ratio of viewers satellite to urban stations.

Senator McElman: Have you, in fact, increased your advertising rates since the Post Office rates were increased?

Mr. Shelford: No, we have not.

Senator McElman: Why not?

Mr. Shelford: Advertising rates are based on circulation in relation to what Senator Davey said, cost per thousand, and it is not reasonable to increase advertising rates when the circulation is dropping. That is what has been happening on farm paper circulation.

Senator McElman: Surely the advertisers would also have some responsibility here to carry part of the cost in reaching his customers? Other costs go up, Mr. Shelford.

Mr. Shelford: If we are providing fewer readers, he is actually getting or being faced with an increase in cost per thousand in what he is buying. His actual rate has gone up but the charge rate has remained the same.

Senator McElman: In relative terms—I believe you said you increased your subscription rates from one fifty per year to three dollars?

Mr. Shelford: That is correct.

Senator McElman: I recall that it was two dollars, but it was one fifty?

Mr. Shelford: Yes.

Senator McElman: Well, in relative terms a one hundred per cent increase passed off to the subscriber and no increase to the advertiser. You are providing a service to both, aren't you?

Mr. Shelford: That is correct. We have increased the subscription rate in order to compensate for the increase in postal rates and other increased costs, wages, newsprint etc. and as I just mentioned, advertisers are in effect, getting an increase because his cost per thousand is increasing as the circulation is being reduced.

Senator Sparrow: You said your increase in revenue was twenty-two per cent. Where did that come from?

Mr. Shelford: We had an increased advertising rate when we took over the subscription lists of the Family Herald.

Senator Sparrow: And that is the twenty-two per cent?

Mr. Shelford: Yes.

Senator McElman: You said that list was one hundred thousand?

Mr. Shelford: It was about four hundred thousand.

Senator McElman: Oh, but it shook down to about one hundred thousand, is that correct?

Mr. Shelford: It was four hundred thousand and the amount of duplication was over two hundred thousand so that the net was one hundred and eighty thousand and that has evaporated to the extent that the net addition is now seventy to eighty thousand.

Senator McElman: What is the break-down between your eastern edition and your western edition in round figures?

Mr. Shelford: I have the latest figure here, they are practically the same. The eastern edition is two hundred and thirteen thousand, the western edition is two hundred and forty-three thousand.

Senator McElman: And what are your advertising rates for each of those?

Mr. Shelford: The advertising rate is the same for each. Two dollars and twenty-five cents a line—that is east or west and the national edition is three dollars and eighty-five cents a line covering both editions. There is no difference between the rate for eastern and western Canada.

Senator McElman: Well, I understood there was a rate differential?

Mr. Shelford: No.

Senator McElman: Is there a rate differential...

Mr. Shelford: Well, there is a rate differential in the type of livestock advertising which comes mainly from the east. We receive none from the west so there is really a special rate of I think it is a dollar twenty-five a line for livestock advertising in the eastern edition only.

Senator McElman: The eastern only?

Mr. Shelford: The eastern only.

Senator McElman: On another subject, you suggested that for those canvassers or agents that go after subscriptions for you in many cases you pay ninety to one hundred per cent commission?

Mr. Shelford: Yes.

Senator McElman: Does this apply for a new subscription rate?

Mr. Shelford: We have eliminated the canvassers completely from western Canada and the Maritimes. We have a few operating at eighty-five per cent around the heavy farm areas of Ontario. I am not too sure how long we can continue to keep these men employed.

Senator McElman: In other words the increased rate comes down to a subsidy to those people, doesn't it?

Mr. Shelford: I can't quite follow that.

Senator McElman: Well, your rate was one fifty and it is now three dollars so if your agents in Ontario were getting eighty per cent or ninety per cent before, he was getting a dollar forty we will say and he is now getting eighty-five per cent of three dollars so he is getting two forty-five. He is in better than a dollar?

Mr. Shelford: The canvasser does not take one year's subscription as a rule. The canvassers try to get a five dollar bill from the customer. Previously, we were operating five dollars for five years and we are now offering for five dollars a two year subscription. The canvasser is still only getting five dollars, but the increase means a shorter subscription time or term. It may be that he can go around more often, but we do not know as yet. His commissions, his net at the end of the week is the same as it was before.

Senator McElman: On matters of circulation which we have discussed with various witnesses, we have asked how do you meet competition and so and at least one and I think more have answered that, "We produce the kind of paper that the people in our circulation area cannot afford to miss." Do you produce that kind of a paper for the farm community?

Mr. Shelford: I would like to be able to answer yes, but we stretch out far more than into the farm communities. We are a rural paper stretching into non-farm areas such as Newfoundland, British Columbia and the areas over northern Lake Superior. I believe we can continue to be wanted by these people, particularly as they do not get daily newspaper service. Our aim is to be a publication that reaches people who do not get a daily newspaper. As the daily newspapers are not stretching out into the rural areas to any great extent and, in fact, some of them are closing in a little, it is quite likely that our publication will continue to be wanted right across the country. The number of people living in those areas is declining at an increasing rate and, therefore, the number of possible customers is being severely reduced each year.

Senator McElman: I notice that with your subscribers in the west seventy per cent say they don't receive a daily newspaper. Does this indicate to you that you are providing a service for the western farmer that is vital and that the eastern edition paper is not providing such a vital service since it is just the converse to the east seventy per cent say they do get a daily newspaper?

Mr. Shelford: I do not believe—and it was expressed with the previous panel—that the family newspapers are giving agricultural information to the rural people either east or west and, therefore, even though seventy per cent of our readers in the east get a daily newspaper, I do not believe they are getting agricultural information from those papers. They will still continue to want an agriculturally oriented paper.

Senator McElman: Well, obviously the west you are providing a newspaper which is holding the readership very, very strongly—amazingly so. Is the content for agriculture generally not sufficient to hold up the same across the country? Is it largely western oriented?

Mr. Shelford: No. We do have an eastern edition with eastern related news we believe that the people in any part of the country want to know what is being done in the field of agriculture in other parts and the eastern edition carries western news. The western edition carries eastern news to relate the various sections of the country to what is being done in other parts.

Senator McElman: Well, with a dwindling subscriber list that you referred to, what changes or efforts are you making to compensate for this in your paper I appreciate there is a fall-off because of your move to the urban centres but that is not all of it?

Mr. Shelford: We have within the last three years eliminated some of the entertainment features such as the colour comics that went with the paper and reduced the frequency of serial stories and tried to become more of a news farm journal rather than a household publication. We felt that entertainment was now being provided through other sources, daily newspapers and television and radio.

Senator McElman: Has this simply reduced your costs as related in the twenty-two per cent increase in profits or profitability or has this been turned to make a better paper by providing more agricultural information?

Mr. Shelford: That twenty-two per cent increase was not profitability but revenue.

Senator McElman: I am sorry, revenue.

Mr. Shelford: We have turned it to paying for more correspondence of a regional nature to relate to their farming operations and to purchase articles by working farmers. There has been some series on the Canadian grain situation by a farmer outside of Prince Albert which was of great interest in western Canada. That is just one example.

Senator McElman: What would be your sources of in-depth studies for articles or information in the Atlantic provinces?

Mr. Shelford: The Department of Agriculture is our main source.

Senator McElman: The federal department?

Mr. Shelford: The federal Department of Agriculture is our main source.

Senator McElman: What about the provincial department?

Mr. Shelford: We do not have a contact with them to any great extent really.

Senator McElman: Are they not closer to the local problem?

Mr. Shelford: They may be, but they are not close to our publication. I think it is a matter of distance.

Senator McElman: You don't believe it would be better to have a closer contact with the provincial department then?

Mr. Shelford: I believe it would be beneficial, but it would also be very expensive.

Senator McElman: Well, I was thinking of calibre.

The Chairman: May I point out to the Senators that it is now one fifteen and...

Senator McElman: Well, I will pass.

The Chairman: Well, I wasn't suggesting that you should pass.

Senator McElman: Well, Mr. Chairman, I will pass.

The Chairman: Well, may I say to the witness and...

Senator Macdonald: Just one last question Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Certainly.

Senator Macdonald: Going back to this idea of costs, was it your idea that the principle the Post Office should follow is that their primary duty is to carry first-class mail—they must carry that anyway so all they would charge for second-class mail would be the additional costs?

Mr. Shelford: That is our basic concept.

Senator Sparrow: I don't know whether it was your brief talking about the particular "free-loading"...

The Chairman: That was the first brief this morning.

Senator Sparrow: Well, can you tell me what the federal government would spend in a year on farm publications in advertising?

Mr. Shelford: I wouldn't know that.

Senator Sparrow: Do you feel that you are getting a fair amount of the advertising dollars spent in the farm press by the federal government?

Mr. Shelford: I cannot say because there are two ways of disseminating information. You can print pamphlets and have them in the office of the ag. reps. to be picked up and they can lie there for a long time or you could quite possibly at the same cost provide that in an advertisement in a farm publication and reach everyone immediately and, as the previous group indicated, in a more acceptable form. I do not believe that the cost of advertising is the question. It is the cost of dissemination of information. I have no idea what the cost of printing these publications would amount to.

Senator Sparrow: Well, you get your share then of advertising for, say the Canada Pension Plan, for example?

Mr. Shelford: Yes.

The Chairman: The Canada Post Office is another example.

Mr. Shelford: I would assume that we get it, reluctantly.

Senator Sparrow: I wonder if our witness would maybe just sum up for us—we really haven't got into this area and if he could in a few minutes sum up what he feels is the future of the farm press in Canada—if it really is, in fact, challenging and I say this—again, as I said earlier, I can't really see T.V. covering the needs of the rural community or radio for that matter as it exists today and I feel so strongly that this rural press is required.

Mr. Shelford: I can put it into one sentence. With the reduced number of farmers we now have and are being faced with, the future of specialist publications such as hog producers and dairy products and so forth is probably very insecure and they will probably disappear. We do not have a large enough market to support these publications such as they have in the States, but there certainly must be an area for general farm publications even if the number of farmers is reduced to two hundred thousand the publication will be viable in that area.

Senator Sparrow: I have the impression that the vertical type of publication would succeed longer than the general publication and you are suggesting that that is not your thinking?

Mr. Shelford: That is not my thinking because if you study the publications that have gone out of business such as the Canadian Countryman, the Farmer's Advocate, the Farmer's Magazine and others, they were trying to be particular publications to a particular region and they could not exist.

Senator Sparrow: They weren't particularly a publication for a certain segment of the industry as such. They were regionalized for a segment as such?

Mr. Shelford: Yes.

The Chairman: I would just like to say to the Senators that we are going to meet again this afternoon at two-thirty no matter what happens.

Senator Sparrow: These vertical prints, are they being competitive to you for the advertising dollar now?

Mr. Shelford: Not particularly.

Senator McElman: Seventy per cent of your readers don't take a daily newspaper? In view of that they are presumably not getting the authoritative type of coverage that urban young people do on the changing society or the way they would like to change it. Obviously you have a service to provide. Are you providing it? Do you have on your staff young people who are directing their attentions through your columns to the young people of the rural community other than their agricultural problems? In other words, their social problems?

Mr. Shelford: Well, I would say so.

Senator McElman: Religion, pot and so on?

Mr. Shelford: It would be desirable, but there is a limited amount of space that we can economically provide in the publication and after we have covered general news, farm news and women's interests, we have run out of space.

Senator McElman: Don't you think you have a responsibility where seventy per cent of your readers do not get daily newspapers in the Prairies?

Mr. Shelford: We feel that by reaching in a general home publication we are, through the women of the home, influencing the young people, but that is about as far as we go.

Senator McElman: Don't you think you could go further? Don't you think you have the responsibility?

Mr. Shelford: It would be possible to go further by increasing the size of our publication at our expense.

Senator McElman: In other words everything that is in there is so precious that it can't give way to any social structure to the younger people

Mr. Shelford: Everything that is in there is at the discretion of the editor and he has made the choice.

Senator McElman: Do you have any young people on your staff?

Mr. Shelford: Yes, we have. We have young people on the staff who are writing and who are looking at the 4-H club operations and so forth. We are not trying to direct a portion of our paper specifically to the youth. We do not have a youth section.

Senator Sparrow: It seems to me that with five hundred and fifty-five thousand in circulation and four hundred and thirty thousand farmers that you are covering this field very well excepting, of course, the fact that I realize that you send about sixty thousand copies to B.C. to retired farmers. I think you said that in your brief?

Mr. Shelford: Yes.

The Chairman: May I on behalf of the Committee, Mr. Shelford, thank you very much. The very fact that we have run way beyond the one o'clock adjournment time is a measure of the interest. Thank you for coming. May I also, Senators, just acknowledge the presence in the room of Mr. T. R. Melville-Ness, publisher of The Western Producer in Saskatoon. He has been here all morning. He said he would be available for questioning, but I think he realizes why I didn't ask him to come up and answer questions as well.

Also, we are meeting at two-thirty to hear the brief from Saturday Night and then at four-thirty in this room Senator O'Leary. Thank you very much.

The Committee adjourned to 2:30 p.m.

The Committee resumed at 2:30 p.m.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, this afternoon we are going to receive a brief from Saturday Night. On my immediate right is the President of Saturday Night, Mr. William Nobleman, on my immediate left is Mr. Robert Fulford, the Editor and Director of Saturday Night, and on Mr. Fulford's left is Mr. David Fry who is the Secretary of Saturday Night.

Mr. Nobleman, as requested, the brief you were kind enough to prepare was received some weeks in advance and it has been circulated to the members of the committee and presumably studied by them. We are now able to offer you 10, 12 or 15 minutes to make an oral statement. You can explain your brief, amplify or add to it, subtract from it or anything else that you may wish and then we will turn to questioning from the senators. The questions may well deal with the content of your written brief, or your oral comment, or indeed other things which you may have on your mind.

Mr. William Nobleman, President, Saturday Night: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I am grateful to you for the opportunity to speak briefly and I am even more grateful for something you have done in leading up to this moment which is to put the Minister of Communications before the committee. This has given me an opportunity which in the light of the events of the last year and a half, I would have thought been denied me for all time and that is the opportunity to find myself in rather large measure of agreement with the Minister of Communications on something—particularly his remark before your Committee mentioned in the newspaper report in the Globe and Mail of last Thursday that he felt that the day of the mass media was going quickly. This is a sentiment which we agree with.

It is a point of view which indeed led to the near resurrection of Saturday Night some six and a half years ago. It is no accident I think that those who were responsible for taking Saturday Night over in the summer of 1968 had for the most part a background in education, because the thing which has struck us was that the tremendous expansion in the numbers of persons being exposed to a post-secondary education would for the first time create in Canada the kind of market which has long since existed in the United States for specific journals of comment and opinion.

The kind of thing I am referring to in the United States is such magazines as The Atlantic, Harpers and Saturday Review. I think it is a fair statement that these kind of magazines find their audience among the best educated and the most politically, socially and culturally contrast segment of the population.

Saturday Night's presence and its editorial direction and editorial performance since the summer of 1963 have, I think, been an exemplification of the Minister of Communications' thesis that a well educated individual tends to be precisely that, an individual and his desires in media tend to be much more specific than the mass media can serve, and Saturday Night's function is to serve a relatively well defined small but steadily growing segment of the Canadian population.

Now, we feel that the tremendous circulation and growth of Saturday Night, particularly over the last couple of years, is an implicit endorsement of the point of view which we adopted six and a half years ago that there was a market for this kind of medium. I think that the stature which the magazine has gained, the influence which it has been able to demonstrate and its public acceptance all make that point.

However, Mr. Chairman, you would forgive me if I went on to say that having found an area of agreement with the Minister of Communications that I think that is about as far as I can possibly go. Having found an area, I regard that as a milestone in itself. I must say that the operation of one of the major departments entrusted to his care, being the Post Office, would tend to suggest that his understanding of the kind of service needed in an area, where communications will become increasingly specialized, appears to be limited at best.

The article above the one to which I made early reference from the Globe and Mail talks about the post office playing God to the publishing industry. It may be that the Minister of Communications and I have somewhat different impressions as to what the role of the post office is. I thought the function of the post office in the area of reduced postal rates for publications was to serve the reader. If in so serving it should happen to serve the publishing industry as we, I think this is a happy by-product, but my clear-cut impression is that the post office exists not as something which is designed to pay for itself but rather as a service in precisely the same way as the Government offers a host of other services.

I think if we were to carry to its logical extreme the view that user payment should be the criteria for most government services that we would find ourselves back in the era of toll roads and a great many other anomalies of the age. I would be interested to know, incidentally, how he justifies the armed services from that point of view. The situation seems also to be a little absurd in terms of the view as to whether or not there is a responsibility incumbent upon the Government of the country to ensure that the person who wants the written word delivered to them is well served when the Government is and does continue to be prepared to subsidize the transmission of broadcasts at a very, very high level.

We find it a little ironic, to say the least, in an area where the Government spends $150 million a year to insist that 60 per cent of the content produced with that $150 million a year should be Canadian in origin. We find it a little difficult to quite understand the point of view which suggests that it is O.K. to ask for 60 per cent Canadian content when you are putting $150 million into the pot, but that it is not a proper charge at least on the part of the general revenues of the country to provide a service to the readers which in most instances is 100 per cent Canadian. In this case in the form of Canadian magazines. It may be that the minister's reported words that he feels that there should be a specific vote of the house to provide a level of support to second class mail rates is really a semantic quibble. I would have understood when he presented his extremely well documented case for the last increase in postal rates to the house and pointed out that these rates would not cover the cost as the post office calculates them of the second class service. We left the members of the house with the very distinct impression that they were doing precisely what the minister was asking—that is to say directing a specific level of public moneys into the provision of this service.

We feel that there is a need in this country, a far greater need in this country, to provide communications which are Canadian origin, Canadian in approach, and Canadian in outlook. We have laboured as the brief has pointed out under very frequently discouraging and often down right damaging circumstances in the attempt to provide this. One is not reassured by a climate of government which suggests that this is not deemed to be particularly necessary. On the other hand we continue to feel and the continuing publication of Saturday Night is our expression of our feeling that magazines like Saturday Night are essential to the existence and to the growth of a genuine Canadian identity and we shall, Mr. Chairman, continue to publish Saturday Night for that reason and in the hope that we may eventually provide an economic justification as well.

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Nobleman. This is a very forthright and very forceful statement. When we proceed to question you by all means feel free to direct questions over to your colleagues if you wish.

Mr. Nobleman: By all means, thank you.

The Chairman: I wonder if I could perhaps ask the first question and ask Mr. Fulford is the Trudeau Government anti-culture?

Mr. Robert Fulford, Editor and Director, Saturday Night: That is the heading on the copy.

The Chairman: Yes, I realize that. The senators who received a copy of the current issue will notice that the heading is "Is the Trudeau Government Anti-culture?"

Mr. Fulford: That is an article which asks that question...

The Chairman: And you think we should read it to find out?

Mr. Fulford: Yes, I think so.

The Chairman: You can't give us a short answer?

Mr. Fulford: A short answer is, perhaps.

The Chairman: That is a very political answer?

Mr. Fulford: Yes.

The Chairman: I was interested in your biography to see that you were a sports writer. Where was that?

Mr. Fulford: The Toronto Globe and Mail when I was about 19 to 21 years of age.

The Chairman: The Toronto Globe and Mail?

Mr. Fulford: Yes.

The Chairman: Yes, I had forgotten that.

Mr. Nobleman, you made some eloquent statements about things Canadian and expressed a number of views which I certainly for one would subscribe to. Do you regard the Canadian issue of Time as a Canadian magazine?

Mr. Nobleman: Editorially no, but in a business sense, yes.

The Chairman: You are familiar, I am sure, with the recommendations contained in the O'Leary Report and you are also familiar with the recommendations contained in the report and the subsequent legislations specifically exempting Time and the Reader's Digest. In retrospect do you think that that exemption was in the interest of the magazine industry in Canada?

Mr. Nobleman: Absolutely.

The Chairman: Why?

Mr. Nobleman: Why? Because without the Reader's Digest and Time magazine there wouldn't be a magazine industry in Canada.

The Chairman: Would you explain that?

Mr. Nobleman: Yes, it is very simply this. We deal in the brief with two trends which are apparent in the buying of the media. One of which the Government, I suspect, quite unwittingly fostered by its heavy subsidization of the C.B.C. That is a marked tendency on the part of buyers of media to look at markets as mass markets, a view in which television has been a major force in promoting. The net result of looking at most markets as mass markets is that there is a genuine reluctance on the part of the buyers of advertising to buy specialized media, particularly when the numbers of persons involved in the audiences of those specialized media is small. It is a most unlikely circumstance that many advertising agencies or many advertisers would be prepared to bear the cost of preparing advertising material for small circulation magazines. The more magazines there are in the field, the more incentive there is for the advertisers to prepare advertising material for the group. Our ability to survive as part of that group would, I think, be much more limited than it is.

The Chairman: So if the exemption which Time presently enjoys were removed, you would expect your magazine to disappear?

Mr. Nobleman: I would say that it would be a very, very real possibility.

The Chairman: You belong, I believe, to the Magazine Advertising Bureau?

Mr. Nobleman: Yes we do.

The Chairman: Has that been to your advantage?

Mr. Nobleman: Oh, I would say undoubtedly.

The Chairman: Could you explain how?

Mr. Nobleman: Well, it has for one thing very successfully conveyed the idea of a magazine network for a magazine approach. As the brief also points out we have a very, very small sales staff. Our ability to compete as an individual medium is markedly diminished by our own lack of resources and particularly shows in the fact that we can maintain a sales staff of very limited numbers. What in essence the M.A.B. has done for us is to provide us with a very real and a very meaningful extension of our own sales efforts. A great deal of a basic selling job for magazines as a medium, a great deal in many instances of a specific selling is done for Saturday Night along with other members of M.A.B. by the M.A.B. and it in most instances represents an added sales effort which we simply couldn't muster the resources to carry on.

The Chairman: The Magazine Advertising Bureau as you may well know is coming before the committee tomorrow so I don't want to ask a lot of questions about them, but who would be some of the national advertisers that you have acquired through M.A.B.?

Mr. Nobleman: Through M.A.B.?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Nobleman: Well, I would say that in almost all of the basic advertising categories in which we are involved and these would include automotive, alcoholic beverage, travel, financial institutions that the M.A.B.'s efforts have been a very real factor in getting whatever business we have got in these areas.

The Chairman: Have they been more of a factor than your own salesmen?

Mr. Nobleman: Depending on the area, in some instances yes. I would say certainly this would be true in the automotive area.

The Chairman: The M.A.B. is jointly financed by all of the magazines. Is that correct?

Mr. Nobleman: We all kick into the pot, yes.

The Chairman: What percentage would Time pay?

Mr. Nobleman: They would pay more than us.

The Chairman: They would pay more than you?

Mr. Nobleman: Yes, thank God.

The Chairman: They would pay considerably more than you?

Mr. Nobleman: Yes.

The Chairman: Would they pay more than half of what it costs?

Mr. Nobleman: Of the M.A.B.?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Nobleman: Certainly not, but I would suggest that that question might be more appropriately directed to Mr. Crosbie who presumably would have those figures at his finger tips.

The Chairman: I am sure we will be putting the same questions to him. Would it be fair to say this: that the M.A.B. for its existence that Time membership is terribly important; just as it is important to the survival of the magazine industry in Canada, it is equally important for the survival of M.A.B.?

Mr. Nobleman: Well, I would say that the M.A.B. would be a much weakened body if Time were not a member.

The Chairman: Does it concern you as a Canadian that the magazine industry in Canada might be in serious jeopardy if it were not for Time?

Mr. Nobleman: Yes, but the time to have done something about that was long before I became involved in the magazine industry.

The Chairman: For example when Senator O'Leary made his report?

Mr. Nobleman: Much too late.

The Chairman: Even then it was much too late?

Mr. Nobleman: Oh, it was miles too late.

The Chairman: Well, how much too late?

Mr. Nobleman: How much too late? Fifteen years.

The Chairman: When did Time Canada start?

Mr. Nobleman: In the early forties would be my recollection.

The Chairman: I don't want to spin this particular line of questioning out endlessly but presumably you think that when Senator

O'Leary made his recommendation as far as Time and Reader's Digest was concerned it was already too late and that in exempting Time and Reader's Digest from the ultimate legislation, the Government did the right thing?

Mr. Nobleman: Well, I am on the public record as having said that in 1963, at the time the exemption was made, so I would hardly want to change that position now, since I think the correctness of the Government's action at that time has since been more than amply demonstrated.

The Chairman: Were you in the magazine business at that time?

Mr. Nobleman: Yes I was.

The Chairman: Where were you, Mr. Nobleman?

Mr. Nobleman: I had just come to Saturday Night.

The Chairman: Just arrived at Saturday Night?

Mr. Nobleman: Yes. I had been with Chate-laine just prior to that.

The Chairman: What did you do at Saturday Night? Were you a salesman?

Mr. Nobleman: I came to Saturday Night as Director of Advertising Sales.

The Chairman: So you are very familiar with that side of the business?

Mr. Nobleman: Yes.

The Chairman: Well, let us talk about advertising sales for a moment. I noted in your last issue that you had a full page ad from Time magazine?

Mr. Nobleman: Right.

The Chairman: Was that a paid proposition?

Mr. Nobleman: It sure is.

The Chairman: How much would Time pay for that if you don't mind my asking?

Mr. Nobleman: In January, $1,075 less frequency discounts.

The Chairman: That is a contract is it?

Mr. Nobleman: Yes.

The Chairman: They are on a monthly contract?

Mr. Nobleman: They are on a 12 time contract for this year.

The Chairman: I am sorry. You said the price was?

Mr. Nobleman: In January it was $1,075 less the appropriate discount.

The Chairman: Well, would that be approximately $1,000?

Mr. Nobleman: Roughly. The rate went up somewhat in February.

The Chairman: So that Time magazine spends $12,000 a year advertising in Saturday Night?

Mr. Nobleman: Yes.

The Chairman: How much would your biggest advertiser spend?

Mr. Nobleman: About thirty.

The Chairman: How many would spend more than $12,000?

Mr. Nobleman: One tries to anticipate every possible question that could be asked, but that is one I didn't anticipate. I would have to make a pure guess and I would say possibly 10 or 12.

The Chairman: On the reverse page there is an ad for an FM station in Toronto. Would that be a contra account?

Mr. Nobleman: That is a contra account.

The Chairman: The contra account...you would receive air time?

Mr. Nobleman: Exactly. We use it to promote our newstand sales in Toronto.

The Chairman: You have had a number of interesting comments to make about the role and function of the C.B.C. which I presume you regard in a sense as a competitor?

Mr. Nobleman: I would regard television generally as the chief competitor.

The Chairman: Television more than the balance of the magazine industry?

Mr. Nobleman: Oh yes.

The Chairman: Well, for example, are Maclean's and Time competitors of yours?

Mr. Nobleman: Well, let me just answer that question in this way. Time and Maclean's are competitors for advertising dollars within the very limited number of advertising dollars that the industry gets. The fundamental problem of the magazine industry in Canada is that it does not begin to get nearly enough dollars and the fundamental reason it doesn't get nearly enough dollars is that I think the major or part of the dollars which might otherwise be directed towards magazines are in fact going into television.

The Chairman: And yet you, throughout your brief without giving a specific instance, are appealing to a particular cross section of audience, a particular quality of audience. The phrase is in there "there is no substitute"—I think that is the actual wording that I recall. Do you believe that a national advertiser—I realize it doesn't matter what you believe, but it is what the agencies believe—do you believe that a national advertiser can reach the Saturday Night audience by buying television time?

Mr. Nobleman: We have a host of information which indicates that he cannot.

The Chairman: They do not?

Mr. Nobleman: That he cannot. But the problem is, as you have already stated sir, it is what he believes.

The Chairman: What the agency person believes?

Mr. Nobleman: And/or the client.

The Chairman: And getting back to competition—well, I believe I have already asked this question that you think there is no substitute for Saturday Night but you are not saying that there is no competition for Saturday Night?

Mr. Nobleman: There is no competition I think in the direct sense for the minds of our readers. I think that the job which we do for our readers is one that is unique to us and to them.

The Chairman: You don't regard the newspapers in any sense as competition?

Mr. Nobleman: Not certainly for reading time in the sense—well, I would like to direct that question to Mr. Fulford.

The Chairman: Fine. I would be delighted if Mr. Fulford would answer but I could perhaps just preface it by saying that some publishers have indicated and some briefs have indicated that there is a trend in the daily newspaper publishing business to increasingly meet the television challenge by assuming more and more of a magazine format.

Mr. Fulford: I think that is true and I think that as that happens, Saturday Night has to become more and more specialized. It has to be more of a magazine and more intense in its developments of its ideas and it has to be better than the newspapers than what the newspapers are increasingly trying to do. They are trying to become magazines to some extent because the people get their news, their direct news from television.

I don't think at this point that there is any national competitor to Saturday Night. In some areas of the country some people are fairly well served by newspapers in some of the areas that we cover, but as a national medium, Saturday Night does not have the competition so far as I know.

The Chairman: I think some of the other senators have questions. I have a couple more, but I believe Mr. Fortier has a question.

Mr. Fortier: I do not know whether Mr. Nobleman or Mr. Fulford wishes to apply his mind to this one, but in view of the malaise in the magazine industry in Canada and in the United States, I think the committee would be very interested in hearing from you gentlemen as to whether or not there is a future in North America for the general interest magazine?

Mr. Nobleman: Oh, I should have to ask you for a definition of what you mean by a general interest magazine before I attempt to answer that question.

Mr. Fortier: I think rather than attempt to define it I would merely oppose it as to special interest magazines such as Playboy, and I would probably have to say a magazine such as Chatelaine fall into a special category. The general interest being Life, Time magazine, and so on.

Mr. Nobleman: Well, I would exempt Time magazine from that group as well. The comment which I would make, and I also would suggest that Mr. Fulford's viewpoint would be valuable—I think that the general interest magazines as such, stand to lose the most from the visible trend in newspapers towards the role which traditionally has been that of the general magazines. I think that they are in more danger from it, but I would not for one be prepared to say that there is no future. I think it may possibly be somewhat of a more difficult future than there is for specialized magazines if we as specialized magazines can begin to change the market attitude.

Mr. Fortier: You seem to indicate in your brief, at least I so understood as I read it, that you considered yourself to be more of a specialized magazine?

Mr. Nobleman: Oh, absolutely.

Mr. Fortier: Than a general interest one. How do you fit yourselves into that category?

Mr. Nobleman: Well, I think I will throw that one to Mr. Fulford.

Mr. Fulford: I think it is not so much a special group of people, certainly not in any professional sense, but a group of people, a collection of people with an interest, a kind of psychological bond, if you will. They tend to be liberal people, they tend to lean towards professional people and fairly well educated people and they tend, I think, to have a higher than average interest in Canada and the past of Canada and the identity of Canada and...

Mr. Fortier: I am sorry to interrupt you, but I am tempted to ask you potentially how many of those people are there in Canada? One hundred and one thousand?

Mr. Fulford: Well, I think there are more. I think there are more and I think we will get to many more of those people in the future, but I think we have a good readership now and we get very good response from them now with letters and we have a feeling of a constituency for Saturday Night, a group of people who want the magazine. In that sense it is a specialized magazine, but it certainly is not for everyone. On the other hand, it is not for a tiny minority either, just for a very high brow elite. It is for—you might apply the word that is not often applied in a complimentary sense—but you might apply the word “middle-brow” to these people.

Mr. Fortier: Given this reasoning you certainly then would not consider television as your main competitor. Is there another print or electronic medium in Canada competing for that sort of reader or viewer?

Mr. Fulford: Well, there are two ways to consider competitor. One way is for advertising and the other is for readership. In terms of readership there is no direct competitor, but there are competitors for parts of our readership and parts of our function. That is some newspapers in some areas of the country, Montreal and Toronto for example, can do some of these things that we do. I would like to think that we do them better but they are doing some of the same things. However, I do not think there is any national competitor. I think our real competitors are mostly American magazines for the reading time of our readers.

Mr. Fortier: Which ones?

Mr. Fulford: They tend to be Atlantic, Harpers, Saturday Review, The New Republic and The Nation. Magazines of that kind.

Mr. Fortier: You make the point also in your brief on the newsstand that these magazines appear to get a more favourable display than Saturday Night. I know you have asked us to look into it but since you don't expand on it much I would like to have your opinion why that is?

Mr. Fulford: I can't really say for certain but I think that there is attached to American products in Canada, in English-speaking Canada, there is the glamour which is not attached to a Canadian product. Now, that is just my guess but why I should see Saturday Night stacked two stacks behind an American magazine with the same price which we out-sell consistently year after year, I can't really give you a complete answer to that.

Mr. Fortier: From the news sellers' point of view...

Mr. Nobleman: I think there is an historical reason and that is the fact that we have not historically outsold those magazines. Our ability to outsell them, and particularly outsell them on a scale which we quote in the brief—for example a single issue of Saturday Night outsold all six of the monthly issues of those magazines—is a relatively recent development. I think the consciousness that we represent that kind of return has yet to percolate to a great many news outlets.

Mr. Fortier: And with your two or three advertising salesmen you are not in a position...

Mr. Nobleman: Well, I think you are confusing two other areas. We are largely in the hands of our newsstand distributors for that. This is not a function of the advertising sales organization and I have no reluctance in paying a public tribute to our newsstand distributing organization because I think they have (a) worked miracles and (b) given us a fantastically disproportionate share of their time.

Mr. Fortier: However, you are still caught in that circle?

Mr. Nobleman: We are increasingly coming out of it. I am delighted to see that we have made the front row of the Chateau now.

The Chairman: I would like to ask you a question at this point. That particular statistic of comparing your sales to their sales was that just an overall figure or the newsstand figures?

Mr. Nobleman: That is specifically the newsstand figure.

The Chairman: How about in the non-newsstand?

Mr. Nobleman: Oh, I would think the margin would be even greater. I would think that our circulation would be in the order of three or four to one.

The Chairman: Of theirs combined?

Mr. Nobleman: Of theirs combined.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: You paint a very bleak picture in your brief for what you call small consumer magazines. How big does a small consumer magazine have to become before it ceases being termed a small magazine? What circulation are you looking for?

Mr. Nobleman: Well, that is a very subjective question I should say and requires a very subjective answer. I think the point at which you cease to be small varies from medium to medium. There may be publications, and I can think of some which are represented here in this room which are quite healthy, with circulations which leave us in considerable difficulty, but I would say for example that I think Saturday Night should at present be capable of generating a 150,000 circulation. I would say that our problems would be very, very substantially lessened if we were able to deliver that circulation at the present time.

Mr. Fortier: Well, given a loan from either I.D.B. or a contribution or loan from an organization or body similar to the Canadian Film Development Corporation—which I found most interesting, I must say—what would you do with the money? What would you do? Improve the circulation or improve your appeal to the advertisers?

Mr. Nobleman: Well, the first thing I would do is give more money to my editor so he can improve the magazine. We think it is a pretty good magazine, but I believe he would be the first to say that it isn't as good as it could be.

Mr. Fortier: Supposing you had half a million dollars, Mr. Fulford, what would you do to improve Saturday Night?

Mr. Fulford: With half a million dollars—I can't imagine a figure that high actually because that is beyond my imagination. If I had $4,000 a month to spend on contributors instead of $2,000 a month I would just begin paying contributors more to get better contributors and get better work out of them.

Mr. Fortier: That would be your first priority, would it?

Mr. Fulford: Yes, that would be my first priority. Beyond that I would increase the staff so that I could have staff writers as well as contributors so that we could spend more time researching and developing stories for Saturday Night. Beyond that, the money should go into circulation promotion because I think this is where we are sadly lacking. We don't spend enough money to increase the circulation. As I said before, I believe there are a good many more people in Canada who would be ready to read Saturday Night and subscribe to it if we could work a little harder to reach them. It costs a lot of money to sell subscriptions even though you get the money back. We make money on a circulation but you have to invest money to increase the circulation and I think there are a lot of people we would like to be reaching whom we are not.

Mr. Fortier: How would you go about reaching them. Which is the best way?

Mr. Nobleman: By direct mail. By direct mail without question.

Mr. Fortier: This is now considered third class, for example?

Mr. Nobleman: It has been.

Mr. Fortier: And is now even more expensive as a third class medium?

Mr. Nobleman: Yes. I would say that the increase in third class has substantially inhibited our ability to do even the amount of circulation promotion which we had done before. The point is now that we are faced with a 66½ per cent increase in the basic postage cost alone, and if we tag on to that a 60 per cent increase in the cost of the return mail, almost punitive cost on undelivered mail—we maintain direct mail lists of our own and the ability to maintain a list without a single error is just non-existent. The whole darned thing comes up to the point where it represents substantially inhibition in our ability to do even a limited scale of direct mail solicitation which we were doing.

Mr. Fortier: Because of what has been referred to as high pressure forms of subscription sales have you...

Mr. Nobleman: We have discouraged them from the moment I came to this magazine. We have reached the point in our ABC statement where 72 per cent of the subscriptions sold to Saturday Night, according to our last statement, came from the mail and my objective is to get that figure up to around 90 per cent, the other 10 per cent representing quite legitimate areas of direct personal contact selling.

Mr. Fortier: Do you purchase mailing lists?

Mr. Nobleman: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: I noticed you also offer them for sale?

Mr. Nobleman: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: This is one of the services you have?

Mr. Nobleman: The lists which we offer for sale are actually lists which were compiled for Monday Morning, which is our teachers' magazine. If you want to rent Saturday Night names, the best we will do is give you the names of those unwise souls who did not renew their subscriptions.

Senator Macdonald: Are there many of those?

Mr. Nobleman: It is a very much decreasing number. We are at the point where we are renewing a great many more subscriptions than we are losing when expiry time comes. Probably the singly most heartening and probably the singly most economic sustaining aspect of the entire operation is the dramatic improvement in the number of people who do renew their subscriptions.

Senator Macdonald: The list would be of little value to anyone applying for it?

Mr. Nobleman: I am sorry, sir, I couldn't hear you.

Senator Macdonald: The list would be of supposedly little value to anyone buying it?

Mr. Nobleman: Well, since some of them come back and repurchase it there must be some value.

The Chairman: I would like to ask you a question on section 5 of your brief. You say:

"We attempt consciously to lead public opinion rather than follow it and the extent to which we can lead public opinion is probably a good indicator of our success."

The example that you talk about, I think you say that you were the earliest English language magazine or publication to endorse Prime Minister Trudeau.

Mr. Nobleman: Right.

The Chairman: Can you give us another example of the magazine successfully leading public opinion?

Mr. Fulford: I have only been there a year and a half and haven't had much time to lead public opinion as yet. However, I think possibly—just to suggest the reverse side of the coin in regard to the Prime Minister, I think we were more critical earlier of the Prime Minister than perhaps some other publications.

The Chairman: Well, setting the Prime Minister aside.

Mr. Nobleman: Well, I have a longer background and perhaps I can field that one.

The Chairman: All right.

Mr. Nobleman: Some three and a half years ago when the Government proposed a new maximum security building program for penitentiaries, we ran a rather biting article analysing statistics on the number of people who required maximum security custody and we analysed the trends in sentencing, and so on, and offered, I would say, a literally biting indictment of the penal department's proposal to build these maximum security institutions. It may be the purest coincidence, but the only one of those maximum security institutions that has been completed is the one which was under construction at the time of the article. The others have never been proceeded with. We would be hard pressed to say that we were the specific factor which led to the abandonment, or at least the postponement, of that program, but it is certainly one.

I think we have played, as the brief points out, a major role of the interpretation of events in Quebec. We have consistently, I think, been ahead of the newspapers and consistently been ahead of other media in our ability to interpret the significance and the root causes of events in Quebec.

We have been in the position—again, I can go back to 1966 in offering certain comments on the trends in educational development in Canada which subsequently and almost totally anticipated the reports of royal commissions.

The Chairman: Would you describe your editorial stance as being small "l" liberal?

Mr. Nobleman: Yes.

The Chairman: You say you are going to lead public opinion in a wide variety of areas and I would like to ask you about two which you list, medicare and marijuana. Where are you leading public opinion in terms of medicare?

Mr. Nobleman: Well, medicare, that was intended as post facto. We did publish a whole issue in May of 1965 on the subject of medicare and I think our position in favour of medicare was quite unmistakably enunciated. My editor having very recently written a piece on marijuana, I will let him speak for himself.

The Chairman: Mr. Fulford?

Mr. Fulford: Well, it was really a piece arguing for the liberalization of the laws on marijuana and the elimination of the idea of sending people to jail for possessing marijuana. It was just that.

The Chairman: And you are in favour, I presume, of an independent Canadian culture?

Mr. Nobleman: You might say.

Mr. Fulford: Yes, I think so.

The Chairman: Well, you think so; are you not sure?

Mr. Fulford: I think that probably Saturday Night by its mere existence suggests such a thing. It suggests that there is such a thing—that it is possible for discussion among Canadians and we suggest that it is important. We put our careers into this and we say that this is an important national matter and beyond that what we say in the magazine can be taken separately. We may be more nationalistic one year than another.

The Chairman: Well, the question I was coming to is this: In your opinion is an independent Canadian culture possible without a national public broadcasting system?

Mr. Fulford: No.

The Chairman: Do you agree with that Mr. Nobleman?

Mr. Nobleman: Absolutely.

The Chairman: Coming again to your comments, Mr. Nobleman, with regard to the C.B.C., are you in favour of the C.B.C.'s subsidy being removed or are you in favour of you getting a subsidy from the Government?

Mr. Nobleman: I am in favour of neither of the two alternatives suggested.

The Chairman: What are you in favour of?

Mr. Nobleman: Well, as far as the C.B.C. is concerned I think it has a justified claim on the general revenues of this country. What appears to me to be unreasonable is the suggestion that there is no room for support in the distribution of the printed word.

The Chairman: Who made that suggestion?

Mr. Nobleman: Well, it seems to me that that certainly is both the net effect and the net opinion I have gathered of the views of the Minister of Communications.

The Chairman: Well, perhaps I could quote a speech he made the other night and he concluded by saying—he quoted from the Glassco Commission and this is a quote from the Glassco Commission in which he recommends an annual grant from Parliament, and he goes on to talk about further assistance to your industry and he says:

"Two elements are essential. One the Government should not give specific subsidies to specific publications as it would be quite inappropriate and, two, the publishing industry should make specific suggestions on how within the financial limits set by Parliament the assistance could be most equitably divided among the different types of users."

So I take it that it may be—I am the Chairman of the committee and I don't want to put words in your mouth or in the mouth of the Minister of Communications, but it would seem to me that he was not opposed to some form of assistance to companies like yours.

Mr. Nobleman: Well, let me put it to you this way, Mr. Chairman.

It seems to me that there is a twofold gap in reasoning. I have a fundamental philosophic difference with the Minister of Communications. He regards postal service as one which should by its inherent nature apparently pay its own way. It is my view that the post office is a public service and that it is inappropriate, as I suggested in my opening remarks, to expect that the specific user of the postal service will pay the full cost of that service as it is to suggest that this should be true to a wide variety of other governmental services.

The second area is that I can't—and maybe we are involved in a semantic quibble—but I can't see the difference between the Government setting a postal rate which the post office tells us is insufficient to cover the cost of second class mail and the Government saying on the other hand this is the short fall—we will vote this amount of money.

The Chairman: Well, if you can't see the difference and Mr. Kierans can, you can't say he is opposed per se of some form of assistance?

Mr. Nobleman: Well, I reiterate the point that I am not talking specifically of his assistance to a company like ours. The assistance he offers is an assistance to our readers to get our product. That, I think, is an indirect and influential kind of benefit.

The Chairman: You are in a somewhat different position, aren't you, than for example the C.B.C. which is a public corporation. You are a private company?

Mr. Nobleman: Exactly. About the only major point of similarity, I suppose, is that we are both non-profit.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: The suggestion has been made Mr. Nobleman that if publishers were to accept subsidies from the Government, and you seem to recommend that this seriously be considered either in the form of an I.D.B. loan or in the form of an agency such as Canadian Film Development Corporation. Do you feel that this would be an attack on the freedom of the press in any way if you were to accept money from those sources?

Mr. Nobleman: Well, I think we are talking of slightly different things. The bulk of the recommendations which I have made in fact deal with the availability of loan capital. The suggestion in none of those cases is that there be outright grants.

Mr. Fortier: An involvement of the publishing industry with the Government.

Mr. Nobleman: Well, to speak specifically to the recommendations that are involved as it stands at the moment the publishing industry is effectively barred from access to any of the sources of loan capital which are available to, say, a manufacturer of widgets. We are barred by statute as effectively as we could conceivably be. In a period of tight credit such as exists at the moment, the thought that we are so barred becomes a real operating disadvantage. I think that in essence I personally would much prefer that Parliament operate in terms of postal rates so far as the publishing industry is concerned rather than in terms of direct subsidy, or of any specific earmarked assistance for any specific publication. I don't for a moment suggest or believe that this would necessarily at some point constitute or be capable of constituting an infringement on the freedom of the press to do as it believes. I just believe that it would be an unwise thing to do.

Mr. Fortier: Well, what about the argument, though, that in so doing magazines and newspapers which need to be helped are being subsidized just as much as those newspapers or magazines which do not need these subsidies?

Mr. Nobleman: Well, I can only comment that I think that the point is true. I can only comment that I think that it is not beyond the minds involved to devise methods which would make this less true.

Mr. Fortier: There are mutations and permutations...

Mr. Nobleman: Oh, I think there are an infinite number of them if the comparison is not too extreme. I think that what you are offering is parallel to the argument that the family allowance has long ceased to serve its original purpose by being given to everyone. There are obviously differing degrees of need for family allowances. Now, I am quite sure that the National Health and Welfare will find it possible to come up with a means whereby the family allowances can be more equitably distributed in terms of need and I am sure the same could be true in terms of whatever form of assistance is devised in this area.

Mr. Fortier: Do you think you would qualify if a means test was applied to a publishing industry?

Mr. Nobleman: I think I would prefer to reserve my answer until I knew the nature of the test.

Mr. Fortier: A good answer.

Mr. David Fry, Secretary, Saturday Night: Those that don't require the funds, Mr. Fortier, would return half of them in the form of income tax.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Fulford, you were making the point a little while earlier that at Saturday Night you attempted to lead public opinion. Do you feel that in so doing you are exercising a prerogative which is any different than that which belongs to the publishers of daily newspapers?

Mr. Fulford: No, I don't think so. I think that it is possible that a magazine of our type can, and I think Saturday Night's history suggests this is true, can lead public opinion, perhaps in ways that newspapers can't. However, there is no prerogative that we have and there is no reason why a daily newspaper shouldn't say anything that we say, or do anything. It is just that we are small and independent. We don't have that enormous bureaucracy and editors and executives that every large daily newspaper has. We don't have a chain that we belong to or anything of that kind. So for those reasons perhaps we are in a position to offer more free expressions of some views.

Mr. Fortier: Do you think belonging to a chain—you have opened the door and I feel I must go in—belonging to a chain for a newspaper impedes the progress of that newspaper or the impartiality of that newspaper?

Mr. Fulford: I think that it probably makes it harder for that newspaper to develop individual views and individual editors. I think that when the chains have taken over the daily newspapers in Canada they have tended as far as they could to maintain the original character of the newspaper. However, that character was built when that newspaper was an individual newspaper and owned by one or two people, one family, let us say, and they developed under this one family, one ownership system, they developed those individual views and those individual editors. In a few cases very great and important journalists. Whether those people can be developed in a chain system seems to me very doubtful. I think even with the best will in the world on the part of the chains, I think they will find it very difficult to develop individually.

Mr. Fortier: Would you care to apply that reasoning to the Globe and Mail before and after F. P. acquisition?

Mr. Fulford: Well, in that case they have just left the same people in charge. What I am suggesting is that in 15 years from now, or 20 years, or 25 years from now it will be much harder to work up an individual point of view in each city, within each unit of the chain.

Mr. Fortier: That is a potential danger that you see?

Mr. Fulford: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: What is your opinion on the level of journalism in Canadian newspapers in Canada, Mr. Fulford?

Mr. Fulford: I think it is an awful lot better than I ever expected it to become when I started out. I think the newspapers that I read from Vancouver, Toronto and Montreal and Ottawa have improved in the last 20 years since I started as a journalist. I believe they have improved enormously and the quality of professionalism and professional pride of the journalist has increase enormously.

Mr. Fortier: Would the competition from television have anything to do with that improvement?

Mr. Fulford: It has a great deal to do with it. I think it has a great deal to do especially with developing individualists on the papers. People who speak in their own voices as individuals and people who are given freedom more or less to be themselves. Freedom to be themselves rather than being company men or a Star man, or a Globe man, a Gazette man—rather than being what they are themselves, and I think there are far more of those people now in Canadian newspapers than there were when television began, and I am sure television has had a great deal to do with it.

Mr. Fortier: Do you find that the in-depth reporting in daily newspapers in Canada is adding a new dimension to daily journalism?

Mr. Fulford: I think it is. As like the difference between the newspaper I started with 20 years ago and the newspaper today—like the difference between a choir and a vaudeville show—thinking of vaudeville shows with affection rather than with disrespect. I think that in a choir around 1949 or 1950 when I started, everyone sang pretty well from the same score on any given newspaper, and today people come on and do their act, they come on and do their performance individually throughout the newspaper, and it makes newspaper reading a great deal more interesting than it was. It had to become a great deal more interesting and this is the way it has done it.

The Chairman: Do you relate that statement to the papers generally in Canada?

Mr. Fulford: The papers that I read.

The Chairman: Which are?

Mr. Fulford: Well, I see the Vancouver papers, I occasionally see the Winnipeg papers, the Toronto papers and Montreal papers, and the Ottawa papers. I don't see them every day, of course.

Mr. Fortier: You won't be seeing the Vancouver papers for a while, Mr. Fulford?

Mr. Fulford: No, that is true.

Mr. Fortier: What about the very indiscreet question given some of your friends in the room here—what is your opinion on the level of journalism in the magazine industry in Canada?

Mr. Fulford: Well, setting aside Saturday Night...

Mr. Fortier: Of course.

Mr. Fulford: I think that it has improved a great deal. I think that they are much better writers as a whole than they were 10 or 15 years ago. I think that the writers in the magazines in Canada—the few magazines that we have—it is hard to generalize—I think they tend to be again much more individuals, much more people speaking in their own voices rather than working to a format. When I first started thinking of becoming a magazine writer in the middle fifties, there was considered to be about one way to write a magazine article and you were expected to learn that formula and follow it. Today there can be a great many variations on it.

I think that a very important contribution to this, just in the last few years, has been the development of a great many independent magazines which are amateur magazines. Amateur in the best sense, meaning from love. Magazines and newspapers which are put out by staffs who are either paid nothing or paid very little. Magazines like Take One, whose publisher and editor are coming tomorrow, and Pop In magazine in Vancouver which is an excellent magazine. It is one of the best pop culture magazines in the world which is put out in Vancouver. The Mysterious East down in Fredericton, the Georgian Strait, which is a newspaper format but very like a magazine in Vancouver again, and I think that these have made a very important contribution in that sometimes we get very sad about the periodical press on a national scale but we can take some consolation from the fact that these keep cropping up here and there across the country.

Mr. Fortier: Do these magazines or daily newspapers arise because of shortcomings in the existing magazine and newspaper industry in Canada and if so what are they?

Mr. Fulford: I think that in each case the ones I have mentioned deal with a specialized interest. A very special interest. In the case of the Mysterious East I would say that in Fredericton they are dealing with a very monopolistic press as they see it—monopolistic daily press and broadcasting and they express a small "1" liberal view in an area of the country where that view is not expressed as well as they would like to see it expressed indeed it is expressed at all.

The same with the pop culture magazine—Pop In in Vancouver. They look around and no one is saying the things that they want said and this is the basic reason for publishing. If you have something you want to say and someone to say it to—this is how a magazine comes into being.

Mr. Fortier: How long do these magazines survive, in fact, in your opinion?

Mr. Fulford: Well, when I went to Maclean's as a writer in 1962 I was told that Maclean's had about six months to live by various people outside Maclean's. I look at the newsstands and it is still there so I am not taking seriously anyone's suggestion that this magazine or that magazine has only so long to live, or that such and such a kind of magazine is going to die. I think the Canadian Forum has been operating on a shoe-string budget for I think something like 50 years and it has made a valuable contribution to Canadian culture in that time without ever paying an editor or contributor a nickel.

Mr. Fortier: Is there such a thing as a national daily newspaper in Canada in your opinion?

Mr. Fulford: No there isn't.

Mr. Fortier: Is it possible to have one?

Mr. Fulford: So far as I know technology is becoming available but I think what we lack at the moment is the density of markets. If the Globe and Mail were to print in four centres across the country, they could deliver the same paper every day feeding it from these four cities or perhaps five cities. However, at the moment, there isn't sufficient money and sufficient market-place across the country to justify that, but I think perhaps there would be in 15 or 20 years.

Mr. Fortier: Do we have anything approaching a weekly national magazine or national newspaper?

Mr. Fulford: The closest we have to that I am afraid to say is the first few pages of Time magazine.

Mr. Fortier: You would go so far as to say that, would you?

Mr. Fulford: That is as close as we could get to a national magazine, a national weekly magazine. The Financial Post is a newspaper of course.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, that was the second part of my question. We have a weekly national newspaper.

Mr. Fulford: Yes, the Financial Post serves part of that function for part of the community, yes.

The Chairman: Why do you say "you are afraid"?

Mr. Fulford: I am sorry to say that.

The Chairman: All right, you are sorry. Why are you sorry to say it?

Mr. Fulford: Well, I would much rather see a national magazine published weekly in Canada right across the country which is owned and edited entirely by Canadians.

The Chairman: Do you share that opinion Mr. Nobleman?

Mr. Nobleman: Yes.

The Chairman: Do you share Mr. Nobleman's opinion expressed earlier that it is too late to have that happen?

Mr. Fulford: No, I don't think it is too late. However, I don't think he said that.

Mr. Nobleman: No, what I said was the action to remove Time and Reader's Digest from the Canadian scene was too late.

The Chairman: I see. You think it is possible?

Mr. Nobleman: I think it is possible given a whole pot of money, but I really question anyone's willingness or desire to deliver it.

The Chairman: Well, do you think this is possible to see this happen Mr. Fulford?

Mr. Fulford: Well, I think it is possible but I can't see the prospects for it on horizon at the moment. I think it is a very distant possibility. Given again a richer market perhaps, that it would be possible to find a place for more than one weekly magazine in Canada delivering a magazine of public affairs, and if there is a place for a second one I hope it is a Canadian one and I hope it can be done within 10 or 20 years.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Are you through?

The Chairman: Well, if you would like to get yourself organized I would like to ask a question of Mr. Fulford.

Mr. Fulford, you predicted in September of 1968 the feud which eventually blew up in December of 1968 between Prime Minister Trudeau and the press. Were you editor then?

Mr. Fulford: Yes I was.

The Chairman: I have just been handed by Mr. Nobleman a leaflet entitled "We Told You So", and then you open it up and it says "Trudeau Puts the Press in its Place", and you are suggesting that Saturday Night predicted in September what happened in December?

Mr. Fulford: We predicted that there would be a lot of difficulty between the Prime Minister and the press.

The Chairman: Well, my question was what are you now predicting for the Prime Minister and the press?

Mr. Fulford: I am predicting a long winter.

The Chairman: Is that all?

Mr. Fulford: A long winter between the Prime Minister and the press.

The Chairman: Would you say it would be an interminable winter?

Mr. Fulford: No I don't think so. I think the winter will end when the press have to face the alternative.

The Chairman: Well, there are Senators on the committee who may not let that pass by.

Mr. Fortier: Given that prediction of a spring thaw, Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I could ask questions relating to the use of four letter words in Saturday Night which is quite prevalent. I was re-reading in your brief Mr. Sheppard's definition of the aims of the magazine as written in December of 1887. I was wondering how the use of four letter words in Saturday Night could be related to any one of those aims and whether it was a reference to "the most piquant and entertaining of any Canadian paper" or whether it was the reference at the end of the page that the magazine should avoid "anything that is scurrilous or improper."

Mr. Nobleman: Well, let me say first that I think the use of the term "prevalent" if you will forgive me, is a gross exaggeration. We have probably published in the last year a million words...

Mr. Fortier: Maybe I compared it with Time magazine.

Mr. Nobleman: Well, just let me say...

The Chairman: What four letter words?

Mr. Fortier: "Love"—l-o-v-e.

The Chairman: Well, let me just say in fairness to the witness that as a regular reader of the magazine I agree that the word "prevalent" is wrong. Perhaps Mr. Fortier would agree to substitute "occasional". How would you answer the question then?

Mr. Nobleman: We feel—and it is really an editorial question—I can simply say that from the standpoint of publishing policy we feel that we have an obligation to deal with the world as it is and as it is seen to be. And you know those words do exist.

Mr. Fortier: Well, I am not disputing that. I am asking the question on behalf of your readers?

Mr. Nobleman: They are not used just for shock value, and I would doubt that of those million words 100 would be four letter words other than love...

Mr. Fulford: More like 10.

Mr. Nobleman: Yes, more like 10. They might have been those that, in other years and in other times, might have been a source of shock or a source of offence.

The Chairman: As you have said, those words exist; but those words existed 50 years ago?

Mr. Nobleman: Right but the standards of taste change and the standards of propriety change and the standards of pertinence change.

Mr. Fortier: How does that reach you? This change in taste and this change in morals, and so on?

Mr. Nobleman: Well, I am not sure that I understand your question.

Mr. Fortier: How does it reach you eventually to the point where you felt that you must use these four letter words?

Mr. Nobleman: Well, let me point out that we were probably using those four letter words years before you noticed them.

Mr. Fortier: It could be.

Mr. Nobleman: The first use of the classic four letter word which I can recall in this magazine dates back a good five years and it was just quietly inserted into an article where it was totally pertinent and we received a grand total of one letter from one reader who noticed it.

Mr. Fortier: That was going to be my next question but I hope you understand that I am not critical?

Mr. Nobleman: No.

Mr. Fortier: I am asking the question simply because the comment has been made and we would like to hear from you what eventually led you to the use of these four letter words?

Mr. Nobleman: I am going to let Mr. Fulford tell you because it really is his area.

The Chairman: Well, as he is speaking perhaps he could answer another question which I think in a sense is a supplementary question.

When, in your opinion, can we expect to see these self same four letter words in the daily press in Canada?

Senator Macdonald: A supplementary to that. Can the four letter words be the same kind of language that is used by the high class elite clientele you say reads your magazine?

Mr. Fulford: Yes. I am acquainted with quite a number of the high class clientele who read the magazine and to my knowledge pretty well all of them use those words at one time or another. Sometimes admittedly only under duress, but all of them use them a one time or another.

Senator Macdonald: Well, excuse me for interrupting, but is your clientele as high class as you think it is?

Mr. Fulford: Well, that of course is a matter of opinion. As to why we use the words, I think it is just the simple recognition of the standards of the period. I think our readers are the kind of people that go to the plays and to the films in which such words are used all the time, and it seems to me as a journalist that there is no reason why journalism should be denied the use of these words where they might be effective if you can use them in the cinema and you can use them in a play.

At the Royal Alexander in Toronto a few weeks ago I saw "Hair" in which a whole skit is based on one four letter word. If they can have that freedom why shouldn't journalism have that freedom? I think it should. I don't think it harms anyone to read such words. A few people will object as Mr. Nobleman has said, but very, very few in the context of our circulation.

Mr. Fortier: Would daily newspapers be—I am using your word here—more effective if they used them?

Mr. Fulford: I don't think so. I think in a few areas of the daily newspapers they would certainly be a lot more in touch with the material that they were dealing with. For instance a book reviewer reviewing certain novels cannot quote sometimes a very relevant significant passage simply because he can't use the words that the novelist has used and which novels have now been using for the past 10 or 15 years.

The Chairman: May I just interrupt to tell the Senators who don't know, that Mr. Fulford was the book reviewer at the Toronto Star for a long time. How long Mr. Fulford?

Mr. Fulford: It was six years.

The Chairman: Six years. Fine. Carry on, please.

Mr. Fulford: At times in reviewing books, or films, or plays for a daily paper you find yourself in a curious position of describing and even appraising material which you couldn't begin to print, and sometimes you find yourself even in more of a peculiar position, where you are defending the right in a civil liberties court action for instance—an obscenity action, you are defending the right of people to print or say things that you yourself will not print or say in a daily paper. You find yourself in a peculiar position but on the other hand the publishers of daily newspapers believe that people of all ages read papers and that parents will be upset if they think their children will come across a four letter word in a daily paper.

Mr. Fortier: I am sure you are well familiar with the definition of obscenity as we find it in the Criminal Code. If you were asked to suggest a definition of obscenity as applied to material published in magazines and newspapers what would you venture?

Mr. Fulford: I wouldn't venture a legal definition.

Mr. Fortier: No, I don't want a legal definition.

Mr. Fulford: I would say that which is disgusting or repulsive to the reader who is reading it.

Mr. Fortier: That is a very subjective definition.

Mr. Fulford: Well, I believe that is closer to the dictionary than the Criminal Code gets actually.

Mr. Fortier: Well, how for example would the Georgia Straight which is a hippie newspaper which I am sure you have consulted and read on occasion—do you ever consider that any of their material is obscene from your point of view as you read it?

Mr. Fulford: No I don't.

Mr. Fortier: Would you term yourself an average small "I" liberal leader in Canada?

Mr. Fulford: Probably not, because I probably read a lot more of those things than the average person does because it is part of my work to do so.

Mr. Fortier: Do you feel that the average Canadian should be offended or would be offended if he picked up a copy of the Georgia Straight?

Mr. Fulford: I am not sure who the average is, but I think a great many people would be offended.

Mr. Fortier: Do you think that a line should be drawn by Parliament beyond which material does in fact become obscene from the legal point of view?

Mr. Fulford: No, I believe each citizen should draw the line for himself.

Mr. Fortier: Each citizen for himself?

Mr. Fulford: Yes.

Mr. Nobleman: I would like to add at this point that we are dealing in an area where the option of looking or not looking rests with the person looking. No one is forcing people to read the Georgia Straight and no one is making Logos compulsory reading. No one is compelling anyone to go and see "Hair". So it seems to me to suggest that there is a standard which is offensive to the community which is what a legal definition must be—when in fact it is not offensive to large numbers even though they might be a small minority of that community is an unreasonable and unwarranted point of view. If you are in a position to compel people to expose themselves to this language which they might find objectionable there might be a reason to react to a community standard of taste, but so long as it is up to the individual whether he reads it or not what is the pertinence?

Mr. Fortier: Well of course, I follow your reasoning. I don't have to go to a theatre, I don't have to read a newspaper, I don't have to read a magazine, but there is a limit to that because I wish to be entertained and informed on the events of the day.

Mr. Nobleman: Yes, but you can certainly find by your own definition the daily newspaper which will presumably inform you without offending you in terms of the use of specific language.

The Chairman: You would not be in favour of the use of four letter words in the daily newspaper?

Mr. Nobleman: No, I didn't say that.

The Chairman: Well, would you be?

Mr. Nobleman: Well, I think that as Mr. Fulford has already pointed out it would be a hell of a lot more realistic on a lot of occasions if they did. I just used a four letter word and I never even thought of it.

Mr. Fortier: You have been reading Saturday Night!

Mr. Nobleman: For a long time.

The Chairman: Well, I wonder if I could perhaps just change the subject. You mention on page 4, section 8, the following:

"This, we feel, imposes upon us the obligation to ensure that a wide variety of opinions, and particularly a wide variety of conflicting opinions, are made available to our audience."

How do you meet that particular obligation, Mr. Nobleman?

Mr. Nobleman: Simply by publishing a wide variety of conflicting opinions. Let me cite a specific example. In paragraph 11 we describe how we have treated the question of the student radicals—we have published articles on student radicals which range the entire gambit from total endorsement to total condemnation.

The Chairman: Well, let us talk about national politics. I haven't read anything in the magazine which has been very good about Prime Minister Trudeau for some time. I have not read anything in the magazine which has been complimentary to Mr. Stanfield for some time, nor have I read anything in the magazine which has been complimentary about Mr. Douglas for some time. Where is the balance?

Mr. Nobleman: Well, is the balance solely a matter of time? The fact that at one stage you offer a ringing endorsement of a man and subsequently offer a ringing condemnation of aspects of his behaviour constitute balance because the two are not related.

The Chairman: There are three national political parties in this country and I don't think I have read anything good about any one of them for some time.

Mr. Nobleman: Well, I am going to duck that because I don't have an answer to that but I think my editor's answer would be more pertinent.

The Chairman: Fine.

Mr. Fulford: Well, I think we had...

The Chairman: Does my question not have a little bit of validity?

Mr. Fulford: It does in terms of political life, but I am not sure that it does in terms of magazine journalism.

The Chairman: All right, that is a good answer.

Mr. Fulford: I think it is first of all the duty of a magazine to discover and discuss and to a large extent quite often oppose and sometimes make constructive suggestions, but when the magazine sees nothing particularly pleasing, or exciting, or to be admired in any political parties for a year I don't think that's very exceptional. I wouldn't agree with your facts exactly. For instance, we did an article last year on the labour minister which was really a very highly favourable article and in fact it was really written as almost a kind of discovery on Mr. Mackasey.

The Chairman: It was on balance favourable?

Mr. Fulford: Yes, it was on balance favourable.

The Chairman: But on balance?

Mr. Fulford: Yes. Well, it wasn't a song of praise but he did come out of it looking very good. As an another case, we have a new personality in Premier Schreyer and we certainly wrote about him in such a way—here again I don't think his public relations man would have written the way we wrote it, but I think one would discover from that article many admirable things about him and many focal things about his government. Perhaps with some of the other people you mentioned they haven't made that much news that could be commented upon.

The Chairman: Do you think the magazine is preoccupied with Pierre Elliot Trudeau?

Mr. Fulford: I think the country is preoccupied with Pierre Elliot Trudeau and the magazine is part of the country.

The Chairman: Could you discuss the comment you make at the top of page 5 about the journalism schools? It actually starts at the bottom of page 4 where it says:

"It is interesting to note that in the last 18 months no graduate of a journalism school has written for Saturday Night. This is not part of a conscious plan by any means. Rather, our guess is that journalism schools do not produce the kind of writer who turns into a commentator on cultural or public affairs."

I have two questions and perhaps I should put them to you, Mr. Fulford. The first one is (a) Do you think that that is a regrettable state of affairs and (b) Why does it exist?

Mr. Fulford: Well, first of all I should say that that was written in response to a specific question.

The Chairman: Yes, I realize that.

Mr. Fulford: From the guidelines of the Committee and I was just not drawing this out of the air. I was trying to respond to your inquiry about journalism schools. As I say, I guess our schools don't produce the kind of writers that turn into commentators on cultural or public affairs and my guess is that this is because the journalism schools are basically craft-oriented and that the kind of person who will turn into a writer for Saturday Night will probably come out of other university courses. He will probably be a university graduate and will quite frequently have a graduate degree, but it will be in some other discipline than journalism.

The Chairman: Well, now, what about these schools themselves? Would you care to comment on them?

Mr. Fulford: Well, so far as I know I have visited only a couple of them and basically the students, and so far as I know the staff, are simply interested in turning out a fairly standardized product, if you like. The person who writes for Saturday Night and indeed Maclean's is the person who breaks out of the traditional craft of journalism and goes towards some form of personal expression.

The Chairman: Do you think that the journalism schools—and here again I call upon your experience in the newspaper industry—do you think the journalism schools are doing an adequate job to service newspaper needs?

Mr. Fulford: I think that within the limits of their goals and the goals of their students they are doing a competent job. I think that within the context of journalism as a whole they are probably not, but I think perhaps journalism schools aren't the answer. I think perhaps they are not the best answer to the need for better trained and more professional journalists. I think perhaps in service training is a more important answer.

The Chairman: We didn't hear, or at least I can't recall hearing any comments or questions or observations about government advertising until last week. We had the ethnic press complaining about not receiving sufficient advertising and this morning we had the farm press complaining that they did not receive adequate advertising from the government and now we have you at page 9 saying somewhat the same thing. You say:

"Even here where Saturday Night would frequently appear to be an ideal medium for the message which the Government is attempting to convey, it is obviously most often a last buy."

You will want to give some examples, but why do you feel that Saturday Night is the ideal medium for Government of Canada advertising?

Mr. Nobleman: Well, let me pick a very specific example. Independent research conducted on behalf of the magazine industry demonstrates that the readers of Saturday Night are more likely to purchase Canada Savings Bonds than the readers of any other publication in the country. The only publication covered in that study which did not receive advertising for Canada Savings Bonds was Saturday Night.

The Chairman: Why?

Mr. Nobleman: I am afraid that is an answer I can't give you.

The Chairman: Should we put that to the Magazine Advertising Bureau?

Mr. Nobleman: Well, considering that Mr. Crosbie is attempting to go to bat on behalf of a large number of publications and considering that he was successful in all but one case I could hardly think you could cite that as a failure of the M.A.B.

The Chairman: Please believe me I am not suggesting that it is. There is something strange somewhere.

Mr. Nobleman: Well, there is. I don't think it is a failure either of the advertising agencies involved as a whole because the advertising agencies involved as a whole are users of Saturday Night, but it is I think a reflection on what was pointed out earlier and that is where the product appears to have a potential of being sold in the mass the first instinct of the people buying advertising is to attempt to buy advertising which appears to have a mass appeal. This tends to totally disregard the fact that some people are measurably better prospects for a given product or given service than are others. If you simply look at it in terms of the numbers that are involved, and mean numbers—never mind whether the people buy the thing or not—then you wind up in a situation where the magazine which produces the audience most likely to buy the thing doesn't get the advertisers.

The Chairman: That is true of government advertising generally in your case?

Mr. Nobleman: Well, I think it is true in a very great number of cases. I think the classic example—one of the other national advertising programs we got this year—we received a single page, literally every other publication carried it and they all received at least two and one got six pages.

The Chairman: What was that?

Mr. Nobleman: That was a campaign for the Manpower and Immigration Department.

The Chairman: And when was that, Mr. Nobleman?

Mr. Nobleman: Last fall. I must say that it does tend to create a fairly high level of frustration when you take what you consider to be really a very strong case in and you still wind up coming out on the short end of the stick.

The Chairman: Have you made representation to the Government on it?

Mr. Nobleman: Yes.

The Chairman: To Ministers?

Mr. Nobleman: Yes.

The Chairman: To no avail?

Mr. Nobleman: No.

Senator Macdonald: To Mr. Trudeau?

Mr. Nobleman: No.

The Chairman: Well, the Ethnic Press went right to Mr. Trudeau so they were far more aggressive than you have been.

Senator Macdonald: To get back to these postal rates—I just don't quite understand. On page 11 in item 19 you say:

"The effects of last year's postal increase have been devastating. The increase in postage for Saturday Night for magazine mailing purposes is over $15,000 per year."

Then you go on to say at page 13 that you raised your subscription $1 a year. I take it your mail subscription is about 90,000

Mr. Nobleman: Right.

Senator Macdonald: That means in about another two years you will be getting $90,000 extra?

Mr. Nobleman: Yes. However, it will take us two years to put ourselves in the position where we could recover a postal increase which we had to pay from the day one.

Senator Macdonald: Well, it is going to be a pretty nice thing to have $75,000 extra isn't it?

Mr. Nobleman: Sir, at this point in time, the effect of paying that $15,000 is such that it puts a pretty severe handicap in the way of our getting to the point where we get the benefits from the $90,000.

Senator Smith: This reference is in relation to your lack of adequate working capital, is it?

Mr. Nobleman: That is right.

Senator Smith: Is that the point?

Mr. Nobleman: Yes. It is $15,000 which we have had to find from within the very limited capital resources which we have had. The other aspect which I point out, and we have also mentioned, is that we went immediately to the full rate because the weight factor just doesn't enter into our situation and the introduction of a minimum rate per unit was the rate on to which we went immediately and the effects on us were much more marked in proportion, I suggest, than they were in the case of those publications which were happy enough to benefit from the weight provisions.

Senator Macdonald: The witness this morning took the stand that the post office should operate on the principle that it is there to carry first class mail and that the only charge for other types of mail should be any extra costs. Would you go along with that?

Mr. Nobleman: Well, I am not sure, particularly with reference to third class mail, which is also a particular problem for us. If I were running the post office I would necessarily subscribe to that view, but I do feel and I know it has been a constant subject of controversy for this committee, I do think the calculation for what it actually costs the post office to carry a piece of second class mail which we must deliver to the post office, pre-sorted, bagged and ready for shipment, simply doesn't involve some of the charges which are laid against it.

Mr. Fortier: Are you paying your way?

Mr. Nobleman: Sir, I will bet that we are closer to paying our way than anybody in this room simply because we are getting whacked at a rate which is higher in proportionate terms to anybody else.

Mr. Fortier: Your select list of readers—would they not have agreed to pay $5 a year instead of $3.50?

Mr. Nobleman: Mr. Fortier, you wind up in a relatively critical vicious circle again. If we could generate the kind of income that would allow me to give the editor a budget which is really proportionate to their needs, I have no doubt that our readers would pay $5; but the problem is that we produce a magazine which is in blunt terms a very skimpy product in terms of the total number of pages we deliver. It is, I think, and I will admit not only to being prejudiced but to being bigoted on the subject, I think it is a superbly well-produced magazine given the resources which we have.

However, when one tests the market given the nature of the product we feel we are charging the market as much as it can bear and with no disrespect whatsoever, I would point out that our rates for subscriptions are 75 per cent higher than Maclean's magazine for a magazine which generally averages half the number of pages. Now, that is a pretty easy comparison for a person to make.

Mr. Fortier: For a magazine which is distributed from Newfoundland to British Columbia and also, though specifically I have not seen the figures, widely distributed in the Province of Quebec.

Mr. Nobleman: Not really. Over 85 per cent of our circulation in the Province of Quebec is confined to the City of Montreal.

Mr. Fortier: To the City of Montreal?

Mr. Nobleman: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Have you ever considered—and if so, why have you dismissed it—the possibility of opening up some four or six pages in your magazine to articles in the French language?

Mr. Nobleman: Well, we went further than that, Mr. Fortier. For four issues we published a French language version of Saturday Night.

Mr. Fortier: When was that?

Mr. Nobleman: That was commencing April 1968 through January 1969.

M. Fulford: Parallèle.

Mr. Nobleman: Parallèle. Now, we found that we just again did not have the resources to sustain that effort. We simply couldn't. We had to confine it to the news stand because we simply did not have the necessary capital to set up an organization to handle subscriptions which would have meant staffing a Toronto office or a Montreal office with French language personnel.

We found we were hampered to a considerable degree in getting this editorial material which was heavily, heavily planted in precisely the area of which you are speaking—it was a principle of parallel issues of Saturday Night that half the material was to be written in French and half originally in English and the appropriate adaptation made for the other language. We simply did not have the resources to continue to call upon people to provide the material to us of a quality which we felt was commensurate with the magazine. We found that we could not afford the services of people who could adapt—and I use the term advisedly rather than “translate”—adapt the material so that it was precise, idiomatic, and so on. The net result was we simply had to give the effort up.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Peter Desbarats was an associate of Parallèle wasn't he?

Mr. Nobleman: He was the editor of Parallèle when it was an English language magazine.

Mr. Fortier: Which I recall, and then you say it became a French language magazine?

Mr. Nobleman: We bought the list of Parallèle when it ceased publication and we added the English subscribers to the subscription list of Saturday Night with their consent, I might add, and used the name in its French language version Parallèle to produce a French language publication. This was one of our intentions at the time we made the acquisition. Again, the situation was just beyond us economically.

Mr. Fortier: Did you lose your shirt?

Mr. Nobleman: No, we actually broke even on the four issues of Parallèle which we published, but the point was to actually make any money out of it we would have had to invest capital which we did not have and it was beginning to be a real drain on the resources of our editors. I mean, the physical resources of our editors.

Mr. Fortier: I remember picking it up and I don't recall ever seeing reference to the fact that Saturday Night had purchased the English Parallèle and was now publishing it in French.

Mr. Nobleman: Other than the mat head reference there was none. The only point of similarity would have been if someone who was familiar with the English language version would have recognized that the material was fundamentally the same except in the other language.

Mr. Fortier: What lesson have you learned in this process?

Mr. Nobleman: I am certainly not going to try to publish in the French language unless I have sufficient capital to be darned sure of my English base.

The Chairman: Could you tell us about what Mr. Arnold Edinborough describes on page 7 of your January issue and I quote:

“A terrible year of ownership by a bunch of social credit promoters.”

Could you tell us about that year? Were you there?

Mr. Nobleman: No.

The Chairman: If you weren't there that is perhaps an unfair question to ask you unless you would care to comment on it?

Mr. Nobleman: I would prefer to let it stand by the author's terms.

The Chairman: Fine. Mr. Edinborough is connected with the magazine but he is no longer one of the owners, is that right?

Mr. Nobleman: That is right. He is connected in an honorary capacity.

The Chairman: And I gather from this article that he is going to contribute on a monthly basis?

Mr. Fulford: Yes, contributing regularly. He is on his own now as a writer.

The Chairman: And he is no longer part of the ownership structure?

Mr. Nobleman: No, he is not.

The Chairman: I have only one other question. Perhaps if the senators don't have any, we could perhaps adjourn until 4.30, but I would like to ask about advertising sales which is your field, Mr. Nobleman.

You talk about the fact that Time has nine people, Reader's Digest has eight, Chatelaine has ten and I believe you say you have two.

Mr. Nobleman: Three.

The Chairman: Three, I am sorry. Two in Toronto and one in Montreal?

Mr. Nobleman: Right.

The Chairman: Are those three salesmen paid as much money individually as the nine salesmen from Time and the ten from Chatelaine?

Mr. Nobleman: Do mean man for man?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Nobleman: At the sales management level, probably yes, At the sales level, probably no.

The Chairman: Whose advertising salesmen are paid the most money in the magazine industry?

Mr. Nobleman: I haven't the faintest idea.

The Chairman: You don't know at all?

Mr. Nobleman: No, I don't.

The Chairman: Well, perhaps we can talk to the Magazine Advertising Bureau about that. Do any of the other senators have any questions?

Senator McElman: Mr. Nobleman, I noticed in your February issue your advertising is one-third of total content?

Mr. Nobleman: Right.

Senator McElman: Isn't it pretty light for a magazine?

Mr. Nobleman: It sure is.

Senator McElman: I notice as well that the advertising seems to fall into several distinct categories such as travel, liquor, the availability of high class books, and one small ad for flowers. Is this what you go after?

Mr. Nobleman: Yes it is a direct function of the limitations of our manpower. As an operating principle we have our sales people, limited in numbers as they are, work by advertising categories. That is to say, we have a man covering the automobile manufacturers regardless of geography. We have a man covering liquor accounts, we have a man covering travel accounts. Now in our experience the kind of expertise which a salesman can develop, if he is concentrating in two or three areas only, is such that he goes some distance towards overcoming the competitive disadvantage which is inherent in not having the same number of people. Now, our problem in advertising terms is very simple. We have consistently maintained our share of the total number of advertising pages run in those advertising categories where we can deploy an individual to work in that category. We get clobbered, and I use the term advisedly, in those areas where we cannot deploy a person to work in the category. If we take the eight categories where we specifically have salesmen operating, our share of total advertising space is quite consistent but our percentage of all other advertising pages has been declining on a steady basis for four years.

Senator McElman: It struck me that with the readership that you have—for instance, clothing would be an ideal type of thing to advertise?

Mr. Nobleman: Well, we agree but the problem is simply this. The sales problem in terms of time to secure a clothing advertiser is widely disproportionate to securing say liquor advertising or automobile advertising or travel advertising. With the very limited number of people we have, we have made a cold judgment that we cannot afford to deploy someone to chase clothing advertisers. We just can't afford the time.

Senator McElman: I was going back in my mind to your earlier comment about the M.A.B. where some of the advertisers who have their art work produced for other magazines where their heavy costs have been written off in this fashion, and I was wondering why M.A.B. wouldn't be able to get high class clothing advertisements for a publication such as yours?

Mr. Nobleman: Well, I think you mistake the function of M.A.B. in that particular context. The function of M.A.B. is to sell the industry as a whole. I think that it would be a very, very dangerous situation for M.A.B., which is after all a coming together of a wide variety of people—if they were to place any undue emphasis on any single medium or any single magazine within the medium. I think it is a little unrealistic to suggest that it is M.A.B.'s function to steer any specific advertising in our direction. I don't expect this and I don't believe any of the other publishers expect this. Where M.A.B. serves is in creating the basic awareness of magazines as a medium.

Now, it then becomes our function at the individual level to go out and sell the suitability of Saturday Night who carry the specific advertising program which M.A.B. may have brought into the magazine area. To be very realistic about it we have, I think, a much tougher sales problem than do some of the other magazines because the degree of identification of the nature of the audience of some of the other magazines is much more ascertainable than it is for Saturday Night. If you say to a buyer of the advertising medium, Time, what is its audience? He responds with a certain conception of the audience. Ditto Chatelaine, ditto Maclean's and ditto most of the other publications. We are in the position where the audience in demographic terms, in terms of education or income or distribution is much more amorphous and we have to interpret what is essentially a psychological link between the magazine and its readers.

This is relatively more difficult to do and is compounded by the fact that the heavy emphasis on the buying of television has made most media buyers mainly conscious of buying numbers. The greater the numbers, the more effective they assume their advertising to be. We are bucking two trends with relatively inadequate resources. We are bucking the fact that Saturday Night is roughly a tough proposition to sell and we are bucking the trend still existing in the purchase of media which says that big numbers are per se better than small numbers for advertising purposes. Now, I think this is mistaken and we spend a great deal of our time attempting to convince the buyers of advertising that this is a mistake, but here again the very limitation on the numbers of people we deploy to do this job effectively reduces our ability to convince these people that they are mistaken.

Senator McElman: On another topic it has been suggested to the committee by more than one witness, I believe, that daily newspapers are trending towards more of a magazine type of reporting. Do you sense this as a threat to your future?

Mr. Nobleman: No. I think the statement is accurate but we do not regard it as a threat to our future. It simply means that the kind of highly specialized coverage which we give to specific areas becomes that much more pertinent.

Senator McElman: I am sure you are familiar with the developments in technology which suggest that perhaps within five years we will have in workable form, using coaxial cables (forgetting about the laser beam and its tremendous potential) we will have the capability of having probably the maximum of 70 or 80 channels with great selectivity. As to the approach taken on a channel, and which direction it takes, and so on, do you see this as a real possibility, not as a threat to magazines but as new form for magazines.

Mr. Nobleman: Well, I would certainly hope that it will so develop. I think that if we cannot take advantage of the technology which is developing in the area of television transmission, to do what in fact the Minister of Communications suggested and that is reach out to people on a much more individual basis than a television network is able to do, we will have missed the purpose of this particular technology.

It is a development which we agree will happen, which we think should happen and which we heartily concur, but I would point out that the programming even on the selective basis on those cable outlets will be at an extremely local level unless there is developed a really concrete form of interchange of program material. We would suggest the necessity for national media, which can provide the unifying thread in terms of the kind of material that Saturday Night provides, will become more essential rather than less as audiences are fragmented by cable television.

Senator McElman: As one of the leading and more respected periodicals in Canada are you actually looking at this field now? Are you looking at this field now with the prospect of it being on us within a very short period of time?

Mr. Nobleman: Well, we are looking at it and I suppose the best adverb to use as to how we are looking at it would be wistfully. We feel that the kind of expertise we have developed, if you will, in programming a magazine of this kind will give us a national entree into the programming of some of the select media. If we can find a suitable and satisfactory means by which we can transfer that expertise into the cable area we are willing to make every effort to do so.

Senator McElman: Thank you.

The Chairman: Are there other questions the senators have? If not I would like to thank our guests from Saturday Night, Mr. Nobleman, Mr. Fulford and Mr. Fry. I personally have been a reader of Saturday Night for as long as I can remember and I hope I will continue to be a reader far into the future. It has been a very useful session and of particular interest to me, and I think we have all enjoyed it and benefited from it. We have appreciated the time that you have taken to be here and all in all we are very grateful. Thank you.

Mr. Nobleman: Thank you.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, I will call this meeting adjourned and we will resume at 4.30 p.m. with Senator Grattan O'Leary.

—A short adjournment.

—Upon resuming at 4.30 p.m.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, if I may call this session to order.

An introduction is hardly in order so perhaps I will confine my observation to say that to me personally one of the highlights of this entire series of hearings is the presence of this particular witness. Having said that, Senator O'Leary, and having said it most sincerely, if you would care to sir, make some opening or introductory statements and then following that we would like to ask you some questions.

Senator Grattan O'Leary: Thank you very much, Senator Davey, for the kindly warmth of your introduction. I have prepared no brief as we understood this, but I have jotted down here a few rambling observations and if you will bear with me until I deliver them I will then submit myself to your mercy.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Senator O'Leary: Well, Senators and ladies and gentlemen, when you first brought this matter to the attention of the Senate I don't need to tell you that I was not too enthusiastic about it. However, I must say to you frankly, having followed the proceedings of the committee as well as I could from the press and from attending one or two sittings, I think this committee is doing and has done a splendid job.

The reason I say that is you have made the press look at itself, you have made it look inward and to get away from its state of euphoria. My distinguished colleague, Mr. Norman Smith, has mentioned this already and to get away from its complacency, and I think there was complacency within the press organization. To get away especially from those venerable sanctified clichés about press freedom.

I have often asked myself listening to newspapermen at their gatherings just what they had in mind about press freedom. Press freedom, of course, is not an absolute. The freedom itself is not an absolute. We know this from our libel laws for example. We hear a tremendous lot in recent times about the press being the trustees for the public, trustees for what they call the people's right to know. Now, I accept and believe with some qualifications what is meant by the people's right to know, but I ask myself, and I have asked this question often, how do you make that right meaningful? Do you accept government handouts? Human nature being what it is and politics and parties being what they are, you just can't accept government handouts as the truth. Well, what do you do? As a newspaper all you can do is to try to secure examination of those reports, a searching analysis, if you will, of those reports by the reporters which you employ at a newspaper. But what if these reporters are not competent? What if they can't give to those reports, the searching analysis which they deserve or should have, if you are going to carry out the people's right to know. What, I ask again, if they are not competent to examine, and what if they are lacking in integrity?

Mr. Stanbury who has just been placed at the head of our information services said, I think yesterday, and this disturbed me, I must confess, that he was going to use television more than other channels for dispensing information about what the Government was doing. Well, I have wondered, and I wondered when I read it, just how Mr. Stanbury's television would have handled Mr. Benson's White Paper. Would the gentleman on television have told us, would he have admitted as Mr. Benson is now admitting that some of it may be unworkable? Would he have said what some of our critics, industrialists, financial men and politicians are saying about this White Paper now? I am afraid he wouldn't. I may say in passing that I didn't consider the handling of his White Paper by the press very competent. For weeks on end they personalized this document. We didn't hear as much about the White Paper as we heard about Mr. Benson. Day after day, almost ad nauseam, we had pictures of Mr. Benson and his pipe but very, very little explanation of what was in the White Paper. Now, maybe this was inevitable, but I fear if you are going to give out government information and information on what the government is doing by television you are letting yourself in for a lot of trouble.

I hope, sir, that when you come to make your report that you will deal with more than the press; that you will deal with communications as a whole. What we are getting now in the way of communications is we are getting people who seem far more concerned with how they are communicating than with what they are communicating. There is an Alice in Wonderland quality in communications that we hear night after night. I have convinced myself that today through television we are getting superficiality, we are getting false dimensions of reality, and we are getting matters which confuse and mislead the public. Lord Macaulay once said that parliamentary government was nothing but government by talking, but I think if Macaulay were alive today he would say that democratic government today is largely government by communications. It has a tremendous importance to us.

I must say that it disturbs me and frightens me to see reporters—they call themselves newsmen now—reporters out in the hallway of Parliament sticking microphones into the faces of politicians and getting them to say things “off the cuff” and off the “top of their heads” which can only escape condemnation by avoiding comment. This goes on day after day and you are coming now to the point where television seems to be more important than Parliament—not what they are communicating, but how they are doing it. What Mr. McLuhan is saying, and I think with some truth, that the medium is more important than the message—this is what is happening.

People don't sit down before the television set—not all of them—to listen. They sit down to look and what they hear, or think they hear, is gone with the wind. There is no record of it. There is no record by which you can check it. You can of course go to the C.B.C. or the other stations and get a brief the next day, but if you are sitting out on a farm in a farmhouse in western Canada and you hear some alleged authority on television telling you what is wrong with the world and giving you all the answers—how do you check them? This is the difference between television and print. You can check print but you can't check television. I who listen a lot to television—I listen to Viewpoint, for example, and if you want to be frightened really, not so much by misrepresentation but by superficiality and sheer ignorance then listen to Viewpoint. Listen to some underpaid university professors going on TV and telling you in eight minutes what is wrong with the whole universe and what we should do to correct its behaviour.

This is one of the dangers of communication which I am frankly afraid of. The result of all this of course is the tremendous amount of confusion, and doubt, and fear in the public's mind. The press is not wholly blameless.

Let us look and try to remember what happened when peace came in Biafra. The U.N. had observers there who reported back to their governments that things were not as bad as they seemed—that there was no widespread hunger, no widespread famine, little rape—not any more than you would expect at the end of a war when the occupation force enters the country—and so on. On the other hand, you had 80 reporters who went in there and reported exactly the opposite. They reported famine, death, pestilence, rape and what have you. Now, who and what is the public to believe? Because of this sort of thing and because our communications are in such disarray people are becoming afraid. People everywhere are asking what is the waning of faith in our institutions and there is a waning of faith even in our churches. People everywhere are asking what is the truth? Some are asking what is truth, and like Pilot they are not staying for an answer.

This is a dangerous thing in a society. I hope, sir, that when you come to make your report you will try to treat that danger. To say that television is better than the press or that the press is better than television, or the press has this fault or the other is not good enough.

I was delighted to hear the editor and publisher of the Toronto Star saying here the other day that you were not going deeply enough. I don't know whether you are or not, but the very fact, that he, the publisher of perhaps the largest and most influential paper in this country or indeed North America, would come here and confess to you that he didn't think you were going deeply enough into this subject, is in itself, a wonderful thing to me.

You have had some come here, I will admit, who have said "Everything is for the best, the best of all words", but that isn't true. The ablest people you have had here have admitted that things are not all well in the press; that things are not all well with communications and this in itself is a good thing. If you follow up with that and show where and how and in what measure things are not right with the press, with television and in communications, I think you will have served a very useful purpose.

I have been one of those who have preached nearly all my life that the press are relying too much upon this cliché about press freedom. They seem to think—a lot of the people think—that a journalist has some special privilege in society. This is nonsense. I, as a journalist, have had no more privileges and no more rights than the humblest citizen in the land. I heard one gentleman here the other day say that he thought that press freedom should be enshrined in the Constitution as it is, he said, in the Constitution of the United States. The gentleman is wrong. It is not enshrined in the Constitution of the United States at all. All the U.S. Constitution says, I believe it is the second amendment, is that there shall be no interference with free speech or the press. "Free speech or the press"—the press came last and all they meant was that my right as a citizen to speak my mind openly, regardless of the state, regardless of the police—that that right should be extended to the printed word as well. The little printer in his garret or wherever he may be has just as much right, just as much privilege as the publisher of the largest newspaper.

Freedom of the press was not one and was not laid down for the sake of large newspapers. It certainly didn't guarantee them to make a profit and when these men come and say to you as I have heard them say "we are the trustees of the public right", I think a fair answer is, "who appointed you? If your paper failed and went out of business, who takes your place? Who takes your place as trustees for the public right?" In any event, I have also preached this. Even if we admit, even if we believe that we have some special privileges it follows that no privilege includes the right to injure the society granting it. I think that is a fair criticism of some sections of the press. You can't take a cliché about the freedom of the press and then go and invade private rights. You can't invade privacy. You can't print things that injure the individual.

Another thing which I reject completely is the claim that a reporter has a right to protect his sources. He can go out and injure some man's character and he is sued and brought to court for defamation and when he is asked by the prosecution "Where did you get those facts on which you based those statements you made", he says "Oh, I must protect my sources." My friends, this is nonsense. This is dangerous nonsense. He says "I have the same rights as the priest in the confessional or I have the same rights as a doctor with his patients", and that is sheer nonsense. The priest doesn't walk out of the confessional and indict the man who confessed to him, and a doctor doesn't go out and tell the public how one of his patients contracted syphilis, and so when you put power like that into the hands of an individual—the power to go out and ruin a man's character, to ruin his reputation, to ruin his place in the community then you are putting terribly dangerous power in the hands of those men. What if he has no sources? Lord Northcliffe asked that in England not long ago. What if the reporter has no sources? He can say "Well, I must protect them"—but he ruins the man's character in the process.

These are things that I really have been opposed to all my life. God knows I believe in press freedom, God knows I believe in freedom, but freedom limited by the needs of society.

The constant task of every government has been a redefinition of rights. They have done it and they have done it by action and by laws and when they cry about censorship, every law on the statute books is the censorship of something or somebody. Why these words by which we frighten ourselves? Loss of freedom, lack of freedom, censorship. Censorship has always been necessary in civilized society and it always will be necessary.

Now, I am sure that some of you are going to ask me, what about your report on Canadian magazines? Well, very well. What we did about Canadian magazines—and I will be very brief in this—we simply started with the proposition that a society, a community, a nation deprived of searching criticism of its own, among its own and by its own, had within it, seeds of decay.

I have always believed that there are three things in a nation that a nation must protect. It must protect control of its banks, it must protect control of its transportation and it must protect and keep control of its communications.

In the last speech he ever made John F. Kennedy speaking to the Newspaper Society of the United States said that a nation's protection of its communications was as vital as its protection of its defence. This is true. That was all I meant when we made this report and I think, sir, you have read this report, and I submit to you, and I hope without immodesty that what we recommended there—what we said there—what we predicted there has not been dealt too hardly by events.

I must add this though. If I were making that report today, I would have had one qualification—the qualification that our Canadian periodicals should be more Canadian than they are today. Maybe they have come to their present position because my recommendations were not accepted, but we said in our report that we had no desire whatsoever to provide a storm shelter for inferior Canadian magazines; that we had no desire to provide sanctuary for mediocrity.

I read some of our so-called Canadian magazines today and I think that in recent weeks, recent months, the new editor of Maclean's has made some improvement in it, but I have read prints of it in the past only recently and that magazine might just as well have been published in San Francisco or Timbuktu or New Orleans. They were not Canadian. When I made my report Maclean's magazine had a correspondent in Ottawa—its Canadian editor and a very able one, the late Blair Fraser. It had a correspondent in Washington and a correspondent in London, and it was within its ability and its financial capacity trying hard to explain and to interpret Canadian life to Canadians. That is not true today.

I pick up a recent copy of Maclean's magazine and what do I read? That modesty has more sex appeal than nudity. It has given itself over to the sort of people you now hear talking—youngsters and sometimes oldsters who think that four letter words is all that sex means. This is what we are getting in this country. The loss of faith, a crisis of faith and a crisis of the meek, and I blame it largely on television and some of it on the press.

Now, it is up to you, sir, to provide the remedies if you can. That is all I will say now—I could say more but I would keep you here all afternoon. Now, I throw myself on your tender mercy. Fire away.

The Chairman: Senator O'Leary, speaking only for myself, I could sit here and listen all afternoon and dispense with the questioning period but I think that would be unfair to you.

Senator O'Leary: Well, Senator, as I told you outside I hope you have the number of the Exclusive Ambulance, because I am tired.

The Chairman: All right, we will turn to the question period. This morning we had a witness before us who somewhat apologetically said that he was a small "c" conservative and Senator Macdonald immediately spoke up and said that he would have no objection if he was also a big "c" Conservative. Therefore, we thought this afternoon we would have the questioning started by a big "c" Conservative. Senator Macdonald?

Senator Macdonald: There is so much I would like to have your comment on in view of your experience in the newspaper business. It struck me while you were speaking about reporters, do you believe that the press gallery adequately report of the events in Parliament?

Senator O'Leary: I am afraid I would have to answer, no. Now, mind you there are extenuating circumstances. It is not so easy to always get the right people, the most competent people to represent you in the press gallery. What I feel about the press gallery—and I was in it 55 years ago and I am an honorary life member of it—it contains some very brilliant young men. But if you read Hansard and if you are a very small part of Parliament as I am, you do get the impression that this is not an adequate picture of Parliament. I think there is too much of a tendency to treat Parliament as a clique, a scuffling clique where opponents are game-cocks fighting each other. You get this reported day after day and to my surprise I see in the press, time and again, criticism of the question period which they think is a waste of time. The question period is the very heart of Parliament. This is the place where the Queen's ministers have to stand up and answer questions. I would extend the hour in Parliament myself. I know some of the questions are repetitious and I know some members, unfortunately, don't quite know how to ask a question but you must put up with that. These are the sort of people we send to Parliament and they are there. They are there to check the Queen's Estimates and they are there to find out what the Government proposes to do. So for God's sake, let them ask the questions and try to encourage the thing. Now, this is my criticism of the press gallery at the present time.

Sometimes—and I took this up the other day with my friend and colleague, the editor of the Journal—I think there is sloppiness in journalism. I will give you two examples. One was a young gentleman, and this was a by-line. (Mind you we have an inflation of by-lines. It used to be that a man had to have a column of distinction to get a by-line and now you are liable to find that the office boy has a by-line). However here was a young man I presume of experience and he was reporting the Liberal Convention which he listed Mr. Bourassa as leader and he made this statement. He said, it is believed that Mr. Bourassa would give to Quebec if he becomes Prime Minister—would give the same efficient Government that Mr. Trudeau is giving Canada. Now, for all I know Mr. Trudeau is doing all right. I don't know because I am working myself dumb in the Senate, but this is what this young man said. Now, that was in a Canadian Press dispatch and given to perhaps a hundred daily newspapers in Canada, and that is bad reporting.

21443—51

Just last Saturday—I have forgotten what was being discussed, but this gentleman reverted for some reason to the Munsinger trial and he spoke of this lady as having had relations, he said, with several of Mr. Diefenbaker's cabinet ministers. Now, for all I know she did. I don't know. But the point is this. There were two ministers mentioned but, well, I know that and you know that but what impression would the man sitting out in a farmhouse on the prairies get? The impression that this lady had had relations, presumably sexual relations with several of Mr. Diefenbaker's ministers. That statement got away. Who in the Canadian Press failed to edit it?

Now, I know that the Canadian Press has some estimable gentlemen and I know they try to be fair and I know they try to be objective—although I object to that word because nobody is objective. I have never been objective in my life and I think it is nonsense to try to be objective. You are influenced by your background, your education, your environment, your prejudices, and I am full of them. I find it awfully hard to write something objective, but there was a statement of fact—that this lady had had relations with several of Mr. Diefenbaker's cabinet ministers. Now, if there had been any kind of an editor on the desk he would have killed that, but he didn't. These are two examples, and I see Mr. Metcalfe sitting down at the back of the room and that appeared, Mr. Metcalfe, in the Ottawa Journal.

Does that answer your question?

Senator Macdonald: Let us get away from the reporters on newspapers.

Senator O'Leary: Good.

Senator Macdonald: Would you care to comment on the reporters for TV and radio?

Senator O'Leary: You mean the general reporting?

Senator Macdonald: Yes.

Senator O'Leary: What they put on Saturday night, for example. They have this program on Saturday night called Weekend. I think it is deplorable. I have listened to it and watched it on Saturday night and if I may use this language in the presence of ladies it was all damned nonsense. It is utter tripe. And yet, you have this program which I understand is costing a great deal of money but why they are running it I don't know. It certainly was giving false dimensions of reality. This is not reporting, objective or unobjective. It is just stupidity. It is just incompetence and that is all it is and it is nothing else. It often results in unfairness.

Senator Macdonald: There was a witness yesterday who said that on account of TV giving sort of instant reporting that the so-called objective reporting for the newspapers has gone and that it must be interpretive reporting.

Senator O'Leary: Well, I am afraid that as far as I am concerned I can see no other future for the press. Now they are talking about—and this is terrifying—they are going to have 24 hours of broadcasting—news on the hour every hour for 24 hours, and of course this is just silly. There isn't that much news in the world to start with. A lot is happening but not every hour on the hour.

Now, the newspaper's functions, surely, is to try and give what we call the news behind the news. To try to explain, to interpret, and I see no other future for the newspapers. What is the sense of coming out at 2.30 in the afternoon with a flair line about something which has been on the radio since eight o'clock in the morning. Now, I will grant you that interpretive reporting is going to be a difficult thing. You need to get people who can interpret but they are not always available.

Really what it means is not only more education for reporters but more education for the public. Once the public is educated to the point where he can detect flaws in the press then the press is bound to respond, but that is our role and I see no other role for the press. Editorials are not enough. They must be supplemented by interpretive reporting. This again gets back to human prejudices, human follies, and so on, but you will never get a perfect press.

Senator Macdonald: You mentioned the fact about inflation of by-lines. Do you think that there should be a by-line so that perhaps a reader would know that a reporter is prejudiced or has strong views on something and then the reader could judge?

Senator O'Leary: Well, Senator, I doubt if that could be. I think that by-lines should only go to people who do something of a particular distinction and they should be rewarded with a by-line. You can't scatter them around.

Supposing the Ottawa Journal this afternoon carried a news report or an interpretive report with John Jones' name on top of it. Well, who the devil is John Jones? They wouldn't know and how would you know he was prejudiced?

Senator Macdonald: Well, perhaps he wrote a book.

Senator O'Leary: Well, I hope he doesn't. I started one and it is tough going.

Senator Macdonald: You mentioned, Senator, the Government information bureau. Apart from the fact that they are going to use T.V., what about just having one bureau on information. Do you have a comment on that?

Senator O'Leary: Well, it could be all right. I must say, however, that I am a little afraid of it. I don't know who would do this work because you see I have noticed over the last few years the executive assistants and public relations people. God, public relations people. Public relations at polls—you know, somebody goes around with a notebook and meets you on the street in a snow storm and wants to know if you are herding with the mob. This is utter nonsense.

I am afraid of this and from what I know, Mr. Stanbury says we are going to do a lot of this on television. Who is going to do this on television? How can we depend on them being what we call objective? How can we depend on them not wanting to boost a minister and most of these young boys—and they think it is all right—they do. What do we do with the image makers? Indeed, there is a tribe that should be destroyed. This is what you are up against with a government information bureau.

Now, maybe the Government has taken on an honesty which it didn't possess in my day or in my years, and I am speaking of all governments. I would say exactly the same thing if it was a tory government, or God forgive me for using that silly term, a conservative government with a small "c". You cannot depend on governments to hand out information of that kind. You can't. What would you do about it if it came out on television? You can check the print. How do you check it? You might do it in Parliament, but when I see what goes on in Parliament I am not sure that they would do it adequately there. No, I would prefer to wait and see. I am sure that Mr. Stanbury is a man of integrity and I like him very much personally, and

I am sure he will do the best he can, but I am afraid that this is beyond the reach of human nature.

Senator Macdonald: This afternoon, Senator, a witness from Saturday Night I thought defended the use of four letter words in that magazine. He didn't say they used them too often, but what would you say about that?

Senator O'Leary: I would say that is bad. Four letter words—I am not afraid of them. You meet them in the best of books. I met them the other day in Graham Greene's latest book "Travel With My Aunt" and I have met them in very serious works. They don't terrify me at all, but I doubt if you can throw them around in magazines and newspapers. There is such a thing as public taste, after all, and I don't think public taste goes for that sort of thing. No. I didn't hear what this gentleman said, but I think this is a bit dangerous as well.

I remember in the days of newspapers when we didn't even report that someone was giving a cocktail party. The public just wouldn't stand for it. We called it entertaining "late in the afternoon". Not only that, you take the word "pregnant." Some people just love that word. It is being used every day, but 25 or 30 years ago you wouldn't dare use that word in a newspaper.

Now, this is what we call the permissive society and I suppose there are people who would say that this is a good thing. It is honest, they say. Well, maybe so. But I think we can find other words to describe what we mean better than using four letter words.

Senator Macdonald: Going back—you mentioned your report, Senator. Somewhere in that report you said:

"Therefore, so far as the printed word is concerned, it is largely left to our periodical press, to our magazines big and little to make a conscious appeal to the nation, to try to interpret Canada to all Canadians, to bring a sense of oneness to our scattered communities."

And also you continue:

"Only a truly Canadian printing press, one with the "feel" of Canada and directly responsible to Canada, can give us the critical analysis, the informed discourse and dialogue which are indispensable in a sovereign society."

Since the time of that report would you say that Canadian magazines have done that?

Senator O'Leary: No they haven't done it because my report was not accepted. It was accepted in part, but in legislation brought down by the Government two years ago they conferred honorary Canadian citizenship on Mr. Luce. He was allowed to go on and they entrenched his position. They said—and this is in effect what they did say: "Now look, it is true that you have been hurting our Canadian magazine and we know this, we accept this, and we are not going to allow this to happen in the future to those who are not here. However, you are here and you have been doing what is wrong and we are going to allow you to continue." They entrenched his position and that of the gentleman who prints Reader's Digest. They entrenched their position and gave them a monopoly. They said no other Americans can come in here and do what you are doing, but since you have been here over the years we will allow you to continue. I think, I should add this in all have improved their position, circulation-wise fairness, Reader's Digest and Time magazine have improved their position, circulation-wise over the years and I am not so sure that Time magazine today is not the best Canadian magazine we have. This of course is in terms of content. Of course, it has faults, but every publication has.

You take the last ten issues of Time magazine and compare it with the last ten issues of Saturday Night or Maclean's you will find more Canadian content in Time than you will in the Canadian publications. And so I say, as I said a while ago, were I making my report today, I would not have been so concerned for those magazines. When I made my report Maclean's had two issues a month. Now they have gone down to one and changed their format; sometimes they bring out a magazine and you think it is a pale imitation of Playboy. This is what I am complaining about, but I blame this on the failure—not only of one party, but of both, because the Conservative government was not going to accept my report either. Not in whole; they did accept some parts of it and they even gave some assistance to Mr. Trudeau's Cité Libre. I recommended it. I went all out for the little magazines because I thought they reflected a better and pure Canadian spirit than the bigger magazines did.

Now, they gave postal concessions to the magazines and I am not dismayed by this. Somebody once said that if Moses had been a Royal Commission, the Israelites would still be in Egypt. This is true, of course. This is what is happening to Royal Commission after Royal Commission so I am not too disturbed, but I am disturbed that they give it in not a too honest way.

Senator Macdonald: It has been stated here more than once that without Time and Reader's Digest, there could be no magazine industry in Canada. What do you think of that?

Senator O'Leary: That is nonsense too. The magazines including Maclean's and Saturday Night—well, Saturday Night doesn't count—but you know Mr. Chairman that the advertisers said "Look, if we destroy Time and Reader's Digest, and so on, the advertiser will forget about magazines. He will be giving his advertising to some other channels." Now, I don't think this was a good argument but it was an understandable one so they said we must keep so many magazines in existence, Saturday Night, Maclean's, Chatelaine, Time, and what have you. I think when I made my report—I call it my report but there were two other gentlemen on it and a very brilliant secretary—I think that Time and Reader's Digest were taking between them some 40 per cent of all Canadian magazine advertising. We held that that was too much and we held that the Canadian advertisers as Canadian citizens had an obligation to Canadian media, and that is why we said, all right, if you want to put your advertising in Time or in Reader's Digest, O.K., we are not stopping you, but we would not allow the magazines to deduct that from their income tax. We didn't interfere with press freedom as they call it. We didn't change anything. We didn't stop American magazines from coming in here. We only said if they come in here as they are published at home, very well, but if they change them, change their character and merely made them carriers of packaged advertising for the Canadian consumer, we would not let them in and we advocated a change in the tariffs for that reason.

Senator Macdonald: To go back for a moment to reporting and this is my last question, Senator—both the radio and TV reporting. There seems to be a tremendous amount of news from the United States and if you take the national news in my mind there often seems to be an anti-United States bias to it. Would you care to comment on that?

Senator O'Leary: I deplore all this nonsense about the Americans taking over our universities, and so on. Good God, we used to go into paeans of praise in the old days because we had gone over and taken over their universities. You will remember the President of Cornell and other people who went over there. And then there is this talk about some monolithic American culture going to engulf us—gentlemen and ladies, I am prepared to stand up to the culture of Harvard which, incidentally, has the largest library of Canadiana in the world—larger than any Canadian university. And I must say that I am prepared to stand up to the culture of the Atlantic Monthly, of Harper's, of the New Republic. These are publications we don't possess, so what are we talking about? It used to be that nobody said anything about it.

I remember when almost every Canadian university—almost every one had a British president. McGill had Peterson and Queen's always had a British president.

Incidentally, when I held that a Canadian publication must be owned in Canada, edited in Canada, I held that against the British Commonwealth as well as against the United States. We had no prejudice against the Commonwealth as such but we wanted to control by ourselves and within ourselves—our own writing, our own management, and so on. I would not allow any member of the Commonwealth outside of Canada to completely own a Canadian newspaper.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Senator O'Leary, what would be the ingredients in 1970 of a good Canadian reporter?

Senator O'Leary: Well, I suppose the quick answer would be that he has to have a university degree and so on, but that is not true either. The best newspapermen I knew in Canada in my day, the most famous and the greatest didn't have university degrees. Sir John Williston never had a university degree, John W. Dafoe never had a university degree. This idea that you must go to university to become a competent member of the press is not quite true.

I think all things being equal, this is an advantage, and I think the policy of the Journal was and still is in employing reporters, that they do seek out people with university degrees, but that doesn't say that the man with the university degree will always be the best reporter. I never opened an English grammar in my life—I haven't yet although I read Fowler's English through. I never went beyond the third grade in a primary school and I think I became a better reporter than some of the people who have worked with me who had all sorts—they had more degrees, my gosh than a thermometer. This is true. You have to deal with individuals, with people. And then I hear people talking about chain papers, and all this sort of nonsense. One individual owning a newspaper, the sole owner, could be an evil man and do more harm than a chain. Newspapers are people, whether you call it a chain...

The Chairman: But senator, that man could do more harm if he owned a chain?

Senator O'Leary: Well, that could be, but it is people that count. When my friend Norman Smith and myself sold the Journal we had offers from individuals. We had one man, I remember, and Norman will remember, who came in and put a cheque book on the table and said "Fill it out". We wouldn't sell it. We didn't think he was a fit and proper person to run a paper like the Journal.

We had another very distinguished owner of newspapers who came and wanted to buy the Journal and we refused to sell it to him. We sold to people of character who had been in the newspaper business all their lives, understood the press and what it should be and what it stood for. I don't care if you call it a chain or not, we sold it to people. There is nothing to a newspaper but people. It is just like the Senate; there is nothing in the Senate but people.

Mr. Fortier: Do you see a trend, Senator O'Leary, to group ownership of newspapers?

Senator O'Leary: This I think will depend a great deal on financial and economic conditions. There is not a trend on the part of people but there is a compulsion, a financial compulsion. I would have liked, and I am sure my friend Mr. Norman Smith would have liked, to go on running the Journal as we were running it. We owned it, we were happy with it and we thought we knew what a newspaper should be. We thought that P. D. Ross and E. Norman Smith had a tradition in the Journal and they had. E. Norman Smith always said, we must go into a home with grace and courtesy and P. D. Ross used to tell me "O'Leary, say what you like about a man's policies but don't say anything about him personally that you wouldn't be prepared to say to him at your own dinner table." Now, that is the way to run a newspaper. That is why we refused to sell to certain people who wanted to buy the Journal, but that didn't apply to the Siftons. They were men of character. They were men who knew what a newspaper should be. They had built up the great tradition of the Winnipeg Free Press.

So when you speak of a trend I think what you mean is will economic conditions compel more and more of these chains? This is something I forgot to mention earlier. A lot of the bad that happened to the press happened when the party press died out. I believe in party newspapers.

Mr. Fortier: Could you expand on that, senator?

Senator O'Leary: When you have in a city two newspapers, one Liberal and the other Conservative—they might not understand the philosophy of their party, but at least they understood the rivalry. So you have in London—let us take London, Ontario—you had the London Free Press and the London Advertiser. (The London Advertiser was owned by the proprietor of the Toronto Star, Mr. Atkins.) These papers day after day went at each other hammer and tong. Now, most of what they said might have been more vigorous than sensible, but the reader got both sides and you could come to some conclusions.

When one paper dies because of economic conditions, then you have one paper. What would the owner of that one paper say—he says "Good God, whatever I do here I can't afford to offend all the Advertiser's or old Liberal subscribers" so he becomes a bit of a unit. If you go over the list of Canadian newspapers—and I have said this often to my colleagues—you go over the list of the Canadian daily newspapers and they put themselves down as what? Very few as Liberal or Conservative. Most call themselves "Independent". All they mean by that is neutral. If there is a damnable thing in the world as far as democracy is concerned, that is a neutral newspaper. You must stand up and be counted in your place when the chips are down. I believe in the party press.

Gentlemen, let me tell you this. I wrote editorials with the Journal for over 50 years. It was an independent Conservative paper and there is a difference. By independent Conservative paper what you mean is this. You accept the party philosophy, but you don't accept the party line. God help me, and I cross my heart and say it, I never did. I was a maverick. I am glad I was. But still I believe in a party press. A lot of the people who are going around deriding the party press don't seem to understand that had it not been for politicians there never would have been the free press. It was because the old Whigs protested and damned the Tories, when the Tories were in office, for suppressing their pamphlets, and vice versa. When the Whigs got in having damned the Tories for suppressing their papers, they couldn't set out to suppress the Tory paper, and so it came about, the freedom of the press, and that is the only way it came about.

And yet you will hear this—I have heard this—Get away from party newspapers, get away from politics. What do they mean get away from politics? Our whole governmental society is based on party politics. Independence, yes, within a party, good, but if you are going to say that I don't believe in any party's philosophy; I don't believe in the history of the Liberal party in Canada; I don't accept Sir John Williston's "Laurier"; I don't accept Donald Creighton's "Macdonald"; parties haven't mattered in our country. My friends, parties made this country. Who brought about Confederation? Not neutral newspapers. At the time of Confederation there were 100 newspapers published in this country. One hundred papers, daily and weekly, discussing political events, discussing Confederation.

Mr. Fortier: There are 113 today.

Senator O'Leary: Yes, but not of that category. Sometimes it is very interesting to go back and read the editorials that appeared in the press of Canada at the time of Confederation. They were magnificent.

Mr. Fortier: Do we have any strong party daily newspapers in Canada today, Senator?

Senator O'Leary: I can think of two or three papers that support a party philosophy. I think the Winnipeg Free Press does, I think the Ottawa Journal does.

Mr. Fortier: Are they tugging with their competitors in their respective cities?

Senator O'Leary: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: In view of what you have just said, does that make them better newspapers?

Senator O'Leary: In my view it makes them a lot better and makes them more honest and more intelligent. What is a paper for? Is it just selling news? If it is just selling news, why on earth should it ask for any special privileges? You will hear this cry from the young members that come along and say you mustn't tax advertising. Good Lord, advertising is taxed every day. Newspapers are taxed. Newspapers pay real estate taxes—they pay taxes on practically everything that goes into the newspaper including the newsprint, and if you took the Ottawa Journal today and the Ottawa Citizen—you look at them and compare what they have in the way of advertising I think you would have to come to the conclusion that 60 per cent of their gross revenues is derived from advertising. Very well, the Government comes along and taxes that at 48 per cent. What is it taxing? Of course, it is taxing advertising. But to have these clichés and to go ahead with them—they don't mean a damn thing.

Senator Everett: Can you tell me whether in your view, Senator, the party newspaper is possible in a one newspaper town?

Senator O'Leary: It would be difficult, I think. I don't know whether it is possible—a lot of things are possible but yet not probable. I would like to see it, but whether the newspaper could survive, I don't know. Because of television and whatnot, the party spirit has died out and I am aware of this. They say you must be impartial—impartial—be damned. Of course, you can be impartial—the Supreme Court of Canada is impartial, but in the end it must stand up and declare itself. Of course you can be impartial but at some time you must come to a conclusion. That is why I believe in the party newspaper. Because, what do you believe in, if you don't believe in a party in a democratic state? You believe in a babble of voices? Do you believe in what I call a Pentecostal Donnybrook?

Senator Everett: What do you suggest for cities like Edmonton that have one dominant newspaper?

Senator O'Leary: Well, I suppose if I went to Edmonton with two or three million dollars and would like to get out a newspaper, the chances are that I would lose my two or three million dollars. This idea that you can start a newspaper on a shoestring is nonsense. I think Edmonton would have to put up with what its got. I don't read the Edmonton Journal; I don't know how good it is or how bad, but personally I would like to see two newspapers in a town the size of Edmonton.

Mr. Fortier: Two good party newspapers. Ideally?

Senator O'Leary: Ideally.

Senator Everett: Do you have any suggestions as to how this could be brought about in a place like Edmonton?

Senator O'Leary: Well, if you can go and get that dear old gentleman—Mr. Roy Milner to put up three or four million dollars you might bring it about. However, how would you finance it? How would you do it? It is money and you cannot run a newspaper today without money. No matter what your ideals. People come to you and say "Why don't you do this and do that, like the New York Times does?" We just don't have the capital nor the means of getting the revenue, and they also come and say "Why don't you have more philosophy, more book reports, more religion, and more what have you?" You say to them, now look there are papers in the world that devote themselves to that type of thing—there is the Economist in London, there is the New Statesman in London, the Spectator in London, and some in the United States. Are you subscribing to them? They don't. In the old days it was possible to run a newspaper—not on a shoe-string, but without a great deal of money, but it is no longer possible. This is one of the major problems. This doesn't mean of course that good people shouldn't print good party newspapers.

Senator Everett: You seem to suggest...

Senator O'Leary: I seem to suggest? If that is all I am doing I am a hell of a failure.

Senator Everett: You suggest that there is no form of medium that can vie with the newspaper for public representation. Do you think that there is any hope for television or radio or cablevision?

Senator O'Leary: Well, I don't profess to be an expert on television. I don't know. Again, there are all sorts of circumstances that enter into the picture. I think television could be improved enormously. I think radio today to me is a far better thing than television. I used to listen to television for the 11 o'clock news... I don't do it any more. I listen to the radio. I know it comes from the Canadian Press and these people don't even dot an "i" or cross a "t" but in any event I don't think they waste the space they have with a lot of damned nonsense. For example, TV is obsessed with fires. They put on fires that happen all over the place. The fire is a fire. A TV news report is a bad report and then of course to make it worse they come on with this thing they show you (Viewpoint)... he is telling you what is wrong with the world and he drives me mad.

The Chairman: Senator, when you say you prefer radio for the news, do you listen to the private radio or CBC radio?

Senator O'Leary: I listen to both but on the whole I listen to CBC radio.

The Chairman: For news you listen to CBC radio?

Senator O'Leary: Yes.

The Chairman: If I may,... we would like to keep you here all evening...

Senator O'Leary: Well, you are not going to.

The Chairman: Well, if I may I would like to turn the discussion to magazines and in particular to your report. You used the phrase this afternoon, and it is a phrase I recall from the report itself "a sanctuary for mediocrity." Would you expand upon your statement that Canadian magazines have in effect become sanctuaries for mediocrity?

Senator O'Leary: Well, I don't know if the sanctuaries are there, but I must say I have no praise for existing Canadian magazines. Maybe that is my fault, I don't know.

The Chairman: Senator, when I made my original speech proposing this committee in the Senate (I know you were present in the chamber that night) and when I came to speak about magazines I said I felt that as to the dilemma of the Canadian magazine industry, which we should examine... that the solution of the problem might be as simple as implementing your report fully. I don't know whether I think that any more or not, but the thing that has happened at these hearings is that the magazine industry... the Canadian magazine industry has come before us... Time and Reader's Digest are still to come, but the Canadian magazine industry or those representatives who have come before us... some have said that you were wrong in your recommendations and others have said that you were right in your recommendations but those recommendations not having been implemented, it is now too late.

In any event, it appears to me and I perhaps shouldn't prejudge matters we are still discussing, but it seems to me that a substantial cross-section of the Canadian magazine industry has for all time abandoned opposition of any kind to the exemption which Time and Reader's Digest presently enjoy. Could you comment on the current situation?

Senator O'Leary: Well, I don't know enough about it, really. I know that they have changed and I know they went along with this idea that we must keep the magazines alive and get magazine advertising, but I don't know enough of the inner circumstances which would lead editors to believe what they believe now. They haven't told me this and in fact I have had no talk with them at all, and I had very little talk with them when I was preparing my report. It may be that the situation now warrants that the so-called Canadian magazines remain in Canada, but I can't get excited about it now. I can't get excited about the publishers of Canadian magazines, as a matter of fact.

The Chairman: Time magazine, we could use it as an example—the latest statistic carried in your report, was 1959 and certainly the trends indicated in your report have been confirmed in the extreme. Time's circulation has doubled in Canada and its advertising revenue has more than doubled. If you were writing the report today, would you make the same kind of recommendation?

Senator O'Leary: I would if I thought the Canadian magazines were what they were when I made my report. They have changed and they say that they are satisfied with the situation—and so why in the devil should I go out of my way to protect them? I won't protect Saturday Night. You know what is keeping Saturday Night alive as well as I do. It is being kept alive for that very reason. We want more magazines. It is not being kept alive by its own efforts. It is being kept alive because other Canadian magazines want to keep it alive and have taken the necessary financial precautions to keep it alive. If they want to go along with that, all right. I don't know if Maclean's is making money now, but I think Maclean's magazine is one log in the raft.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Senator O'Leary, I am sure the committee would be very interested in hearing your views as to why many general interest magazines are either disappearing or having financial difficulties both in the United States and in Canada. Would you care to comment on that?

Senator O'Leary: Well, I think it is true that taste in magazines—public tastes change. I remember the old Liberty, for example, and the original Life, and Saturday Evening Post which was a bible almost. Now, tastes change and the people to whom Saturday Evening Post appealed, disappeared. There was a new generation—what they call the generation on gap, and poor old Saturday Evening Post fought and fought and changed editors, and so on, but it couldn't keep up with Look, and Life, and the other magazines.

Then, you have McCall's and what happened there was—this magazine achieved the greatest circulation of them all. It achieved that circulation because it was bought by a rich oil man in Texas who said "Go ahead and spend money and beat out the Ladies' Home Journal" and they did. If you want to throw your money away, you can certainly build up a magazine and they built up this magazine. I venture to say that 50 years ago Playboy couldn't have existed.

Take another, take Esquire. When Esquire started—well, you were afraid to walk down the street with Esquire in your pocket. You were looked upon almost as a deviate. Now, Esquire has become a very splendid magazine and it has more advertising than any of the others and it is making money. I don't know, you just can't keep a magazine in one format all the time. Collier's disappeared. I was the Canadian editor for Colliers for five years and I used to go down and sit there and say "why are you getting this magazine out", and they would say "we don't know." And they didn't know. So that they had no aim, no purpose, no direction, and they died.

I think this is what has happened to a number of magazines, and if you take the list—I gave a list in that report and I must say that the list in the United States is just as long and the obituaries of American magazines has been just as wide and just as large as our own.

It is a matter of taste, but in our case I was arguing that our magazines were going out of business regardless of how they were run. I was hoping that my report might be accepted and I was hoping that I was going to be able to save the Canadian magazines that were worth while—not the sort that are published today. I am sorry to have to make this criticism, but I didn't come here to tell fibs.

The Chairman: There is an auxiliary issue which you deal with as well, Senator, in your report which I would like to have your comment on. Perhaps in putting this question to you I could quote the introductory statement from the report which I quoted in my Senate speech and which I will quote again because I agree with it totally.

"The view of the Commission is that in an area as vital and sensitive as the press, whatever is done should be positive rather than negative, with the goal the promotion of the Canadian periodical, not the suppression of the foreign."

Now, I agree with that totally, so it is in no narrow nationalistic sense that I put this question to you. The problems of overflow circulation are perhaps again more acute even than at the time of the report. Would you care to comment on that?

Senator O'Leary: Well, we looked at it as hard as we could, but we thought it terribly difficult to come up with it. What do you do? Do you stop them? Do you stop them at the border? There is such a thing as reader preference and if some readers—a hundred readers, a thousand readers or hundreds of thousands of readers in Canada want to read a certain American magazine I didn't think it was up to us or the Canadian Government to interfere with them. Now, it has grown; if you go down this evening to the Chateau Laurier and go into their news room and look at what you see on the shelves, it frightens you. Yet, someone is reading those books. They wouldn't be there unless someone was reading those books. When we made our report do you know who was looking after the circulation of Maclean's magazine? Curtis Publishing Company, the Saturday Evening Post. We had no prejudice against the Americans and the overflow was the difficulty and it was hurting as well, but we didn't want to censor it.

The Chairman: When you talked, Senator, about the American culture and you mentioned the Atlantic and Harper's and the Harvard library, I must say that the thought went through my mind about Playboy and about 25 million comic books that come in here annually, and as well the very worst of American television on the CBC. Doesn't that aspect of American culture concern you?

Senator O'Leary: Well, the Americans aren't forcing these magazines on us. We are buying them, Canadians.

The Chairman: Does that concern you?

Senator O'Leary: If you are concerned about the whole aspect, the whole world, public morality, public taste, then it might. However, I am not sitting in judgment on anybody. I read Playboy myself—I find it a very interesting magazine, lots of fun. It is when you come to deal with these things—you may deplore it, you may exhort, and you may try to persuade, but there comes a time when you say all right, how do you keep them out? If Senator Keith Davey wants to buy Playboy—which I understand he buys every week—am I going to stop you?

The Chairman: I hope not.

Senator O'Leary: No, of course not. We tried to avoid coercion as far as we could and there wasn't one line in our report of coercion. Not one line. This is something that we avoided from beginning to end. There must be no interference with press freedom, there must be no interference with readers' choice, readers' preference and no interference whatsoever with these magazines coming in here unless they came in here with packages of advertising directed to Canadian consumers.

The Chairman: Yet the inundation grows?

Senator O'Leary: That is because we are not Americans. We are children of geography and we are subject to the same foibles and follies and prejudices as they are. Don't let us try to set ourselves up as being apart. The Americans—I said in that report and I will say again—that we should sit down—kneel down night after night and thank God that our border is not the border of Czechoslovakia, but the border of the United States.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Given your just uttered comments, Senator O'Leary, would you care to comment about the proposals which were put forward by Mr. Juneau, the Chairman of the CRTC last week for the increased Canadian content on television and radio. Should the CRTC, the Canadian Radio and Television commission, force a certain type of program, a certain content on the Canadian viewers?

Senator O'Leary: I am not going to say whether they should or not, but I know they are not going to succeed. This is over-simplification if you ever heard it. We had this problem as well and we dealt with it. Canadian content. What is Canadian content? People ask to have more news, more of this and more of that and the other thing. Is Commonwealth news Canadian content? No. Mind you, I don't know enough about cable television, as I don't have one myself, but if a Canadian wants to have cable television—I would have liked to have seen the prize fight last night and if I had cable television, I would have been able to watch it, but I had to wait and read a bad report in the Montreal Gazette this morning.

Mr. Fortier: Don't get personal, Senator.

The Chairman: It was on radio.

Senator O'Leary: I didn't know it was on the radio.

The Chairman: It was on the CBC.

Senator O'Leary: Well, I spent the whole evening reading Mary Queen of Scots.

The Chairman: Well, Senator, it was a very short fight.

Mr Fortier: Is it a form of coercion of which you disapprove?

Senator O'Leary: Well, you always have a stigma when you come to the matter of blame. This is where people fall down all the time in dealing with freedom, in dealing with coercion. It is a question of degree and that is the heart of the thing. To what degree are you enforcing coercion? Frankly, I don't want to comment on it, really, because I haven't read the text of the proposals and I haven't read the articles against it so frankly I don't know.

Mr. Fortier: You spoke, Senator O'Leary, in your opening remarks of the euphoria or complacency of newspaper journalists. I wonder if you again would give specific instances of this?

Senator O'Leary: Well, my ex-colleague Mr. Norman Smith knows a great deal more on this than I do, but if you went to a meeting of the Canadian Press you will hear people getting up and saying—and these are good technicians, they try to improve the service and so on, but it never occurred to them as far as their discussions were concerned that the press might be at fault in a great many ways. This never seemed to enter into the discussions. I have gone and heard orations and people quoting Milton—"Give me the right to know, to utter, to argue according to my conscience", and all that sort of damned nonsense—there has never been a more lucid sentence in the English language—they will quote these things and talk about press freedom. They ran a series of ads a few years ago on what press freedom meant and whoever wrote the ads didn't know what he was talking about. I quote Socrates in my report—"that the unexamined life is unfit to be lived." It goes for the newspaper world, it goes for all of us, and it goes for the community.

Mr. Fortier: Again, Senator O'Leary, in your opening remarks you say that Canadian newspapers by and large did not attack or treat Mr. Benson's White Paper the way they should have. Would you give us instances of events which in the last few years have been properly treated in the Canadian press?

Senator O'Leary: No sir, I will not attempt that because I can't remember. However, when I talked about Mr. Benson's report, that was quite a good example. At a first look I accepted Mr. Benson's report saying that 100,000 people would be taken off the income tax rolls and the middle income people are to be taxed a little more and I don't see why they shouldn't be. There were, however, many other things, and I was not in a position to read the fine print and I didn't know. My point is this—if you are in the Press Gallery and you are trying to supply your newspaper with facts, with interpretations of what the Government is doing, it seems to me that there are lots of people you could have gone to and said, "Now, look, will you tell me about this? Will you tell me what you think is wrong with it or what is right with it and give me some clear account of this?" This wasn't done. Mr. Benson's words were taken holus-bolus and as I said before I was sick of looking at his pipe. This was the image, the personality. They didn't concentrate on the White Paper itself and it was not until businessmen, financial men looked at this report closely that the press began to criticize it at all.

Mr. Fortier: Well, could it be that the readers on the one hand, or the viewers on the other, or the listeners as it applies to radio, are somewhat to blame for the press that they get or for the lack-lustre television programming that they receive?

Senator O'Leary: No, I don't believe that at all. You see, once you descend to the level of entertainment, you are lost. When the press tries to vie with all sorts of publications that come out, the fun publications, it is in trouble.

ble—and radio and TV with such programs like Red Skelton et cetera—what the hell. On Saturday evening some time when you are not too busy with your law look at this program called Weekend. What are they trying to do? Just what is the purpose? What is the direction or philosophy of a program like that? I suppose it is a type of entertainment, but I didn't find it too entertaining. Are they trying to inform people? Are they trying to build up what they call Canadian identity? Are they trying to promote Canadian unity? Just what are they trying to do with that program? This is what I am criticizing TV for.

Mr. Fortier: Is it at all possible to use the television medium with the same effectiveness as the print medium? Do you envisage that possibility?

Senator O'Leary: No.

Mr. Fortier: You do not?

Senator O'Leary: No. I do not because as I said in my preliminary remarks, too many people just go to look, not to listen and in any event what do you have when it is all over? You have nothing. If you print something in a newspaper a man can take it home. He can read it, he can underline it, he can have marginal notes, he can challenge it. He has a record there in front of him and you are on record. When you are going on record and you know that you will be challenged and criticized you will be a little more responsible. You get some young man who goes on TV and he makes the most outlandish statements—who is to check him?

Electronic journalism. There is no such thing as electronic journalism. Did you ever hear of electronic poetry? For God's sakes, why do we talk such nonsense?

The Chairman: Senators, I think in fairness we will sit here as long as you will...

Senator O'Leary: Well, I am tired.

The Chairman: Well, I know you are, so I am going to terminate our discussion with your approval, senator, in five minutes at six o'clock. I apologize to those senators who wanted to ask questions and have been unable to. I know Senator McElman you had one so why don't you go ahead.

Senator McElman: Well, first of all a supplementary question. You have aroused my curiosity...

Senator O'Leary: Could you speak a little louder, please?

Senator McElman: You whetted my curiosity when it was learned that you are both avid readers of Playboy. Would you tell me please if you both keep the centre spread?

Senator O'Leary: I didn't get the question.

The Chairman: He wants to know if you enjoy the centre spread of Playboy?

Senator O'Leary: Well, of course I do. Why not? Josie, what do you think of that?

Senator Quart: Come up and see me some time!

Senator McElman: Senator, you have spoken very frankly on the matter of chain ownership. One of the problems that appears to be growing in strength and apparently in danger in the United States is the acquisition of media by great conglomerates such as the I.T.T. What is your feeling with respect to conglomerates?

Senator O'Leary: Well, I would prefer to have it the other way around. However, what you are up against again is the financial interests. You see, you couldn't have an euphoria gazette or you couldn't have William Allan White because he would go out of business. You had these small papers in the old days and you had these personal journalists, but they couldn't exist today.

You go to the United States and I will give you a list of papers—the Brooklyn Eagle was one of the great newspapers in the United States, the Springfield Republican was a great newspaper in the United States, as was even the Baltimore Sun. Now, these were great papers 25 years ago but they are not today. The Kansas City Star—President Roosevelt when he retired—the first Roosevelt—became the editor of that paper and this is what you had but you can't have that sort of thing today. You can't compete.

You go and try to start a good paper in Los Angeles today and see if you can compete against the Los Angeles Times so inevitably this is going to happen. I don't like it because I believe in personal journalism and I believe in the old newspapers and the old journalism, but I know what the situation is. I know that you can't have it and the only cure for it will be a public revolt against it. You will have in the end to depend upon the direction or censorship, if you call it that, of the public itself.

If the public comes to believe that this kind of ownership is a menace to democracy, a menace to freedom, a menace to government, then I hope and would expect that in time the public would deal with it. In the meantime, just to deplore it is not enough.

Senator McElman: I refer in particular not so much to chains which are strictly in the newspaper field but those whose prime interests are outside of publishing. I am relating it purposely, of course, to the I.T.T. situation in the States where their great massive interests are in many, many other areas. Are those acquisitions dangerous?

Senator O'Leary: I don't know to what degree of danger, but I think they are bad. Why would a man who had no interest in the financial end of a paper buy the paper in the first place? We have had cases in Canada within the last year where very powerful people bought newspapers. They appear to have dispensed with them now, and under what conditions I don't know, but you see the only man who should own a newspaper is the man who wants to promote something good in the community. If he wants to promote his party, if he wants to promote something within the State if he thinks it is good for the state, let him buy the newspaper.

Why should he buy a newspaper if he has a billion dollars and doesn't expect to get anything for it? What is the idea? Surely he wants to use it for other purposes other than finance. He wants to use it to promote something he is interested in. You know of cases as well as I do in this country and in the United States a well. This is a danger but how you deal with it? I don't know. This is something for statesmanship and something for politicians to deal with.

Senator McElman: It has been suggested to us quite strongly by several responsible publishers that perhaps we need a strengthening of our combines legislation.

Senator O'Leary: Well, that is outside my province and I frankly don't understand enough to say whether the Combines Act could do this or not. If it is debated in Parliament and discussed as it should be, (for legislation of that kind must be examined very critically) and if it goes before Parliament or a parliamentary committee and Parliament in its wisdom or lack of it says "This should be done" through the Combines Investigation Act, O.K. I don't like governments jumping at these things.

Senator McElman: One last question.

The Chairman: Yes?

Senator McElman: Because of the lack of training facilities in Canada for people in the electronic media, that is, so-called electronic journalists, there has been particularly with the CBC a great influx of people from the United Kingdom. Have you noticed any influence upon the programming as a result of this?

Senator O'Leary: No sir. I know nothing about it.

The Chairman: Senator O'Leary, my closing comments will be almost as brief as those with which I began the session. You sir, if I may speak as a partisan, you sir are one of my favourite Tories. Your presence here this afternoon has honoured this committee, and I mean that most sincerely and your comments have been of great service to us.

Before adjourning, I would just point out to the senators that tomorrow we do have a long and rather heavy day but I think it is an interesting one. All meetings will be in this room. At 9.30 tomorrow morning we have Mr. Jerry Goodis, at 11 o'clock Maclean's Magazine, at 2.30 p.m. Chatelaine magazine, 4.30 p.m. the Magazine Advertising Bureau. Tomorrow night at 8 o'clock the International Typographical Union and tomorrow night at 9 o'clock Mr. Kenneth Lefolli.

Thank you very much.

The Committee adjourned.

Second Session—Twenty-eighth Parliament

1969-70

THE SENATE OF CANADA

PROCEEDINGS

OF THE

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE

ON

MASS MEDIA

The Honourable KEITH DAVEY, Chairman

No. 21

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1970

WITNESSES:

Mr. Jerry Goodis, Advertising Executive. Maclean's Magazine: Mr. F. Gerald Brander, Publisher, Maclean's Magazine and Le Magazine Maclean; Mr. Ronald McEachern, Executive Vice-President, Maclean-Hunter Limited; Mr. Peter Gzowski, Editor, Maclean's Magazine; Mr. Jean Sisto, Editor, Le Magazine Maclean; Mr. Lloyd Hodgkinson, Director, Maclean-Hunter Limited and Publisher, The Chatelaine Group; Mrs. Doris McCubbin Anderson, Editor, Chatelaine Group and Editor-in-Chief, Miss Chatelaine; Mme Fernande Saint-Martin, Editor, Châteline. Magazine Advertising Bureau: Mr. John Crosbie, President, International Typographical Union: Mr. James P. Duffy, President, Ottawa Typographical Union; Mr. Allan Heritage, Former President, Toronto Mailers' Union; Mr. Allan Histed, President, Hamilton Typographical Union; Mr. Robert Earles, President, Toronto Mailers' Union. Mr. Ken Lefolii, Broadcaster and Commentator.

MEMBERS OF THE
SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA

The Honourable Keith Davey, Chairman

The Honourable L. P. Beaubien, Deputy Chairman

Beaubien	Langlois	Prowse
Bourque	Macdonald (Cape Breton)	Quart
Davey	McElman	Smith
Everett	Petten	Sparrow
Hays	Phillips (Prince)	Welch
Kinnear

(16 members)

ORDERS OF REFERENCE

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Wednesday, October 29th, 1969.

With leave of the Senate,
The Honourable Senator Davey moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lang:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to consider and report upon the ownership and control of the major means of mass public communication in Canada, in particular, and without restricting the generality of the foregoing, to examine and report upon the extent and nature of their impact and influence on the Canadian public, to be known as the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media;

That the Committee have power to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry;

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have power to sit during adjournments of the Senate and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation to this Special Committee from 9th to 18th December, 1969, both inclusive, and the Committee have power to sit during sittings of the Senate for that period;

That the papers and evidence received and taken on the subject in the preceding session be referred to the Committee; and

That the Committee be composed of the Honourable Senators Beaubien, Davey, Everett, Giguère, Hays, Irvine, Langlois, Macdonald (Cape Breton), McElman, Petten, Prowse, Sparrow, Urquhart, White and Willis.

After debate, and—

The question being put on the motion, it was—
Resolved in the affirmative.

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Thursday, November 6th, 1969.

With leave of the Senate,
The Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Smith:

That the names of the Honourable Senators Giguère and Urquhart be removed from the list of Senators serving on the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media; and

That the names of the Honourable Senators Bourque, Smith and Welch be added to the list of Senators serving on the said Special Committee.

The question being put on the motion, it was—
Resolved in the affirmative.

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Friday, December 19th, 1969.

With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Langlois:

That the names of the Honourable Senators Bélisle and Phillips (Prince) be substituted for those of the Honourable Senators Welch and White on the list of Senators serving on the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media.

The question being put on the motion, it was—
Resolved in the affirmative.

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Tuesday, February 3, 1970.

With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Langlois:

That Rule 76 (4) be suspended in relation to the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media from 10th to 19th February, 1970, both inclusive, and that the Committee have power to sit during sittings of the Senate for that period.

After debate, and—

The question being put on the motion, it was—
Resolved in the affirmative.

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Thursday, February 5, 1970.

With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Haig:

That the names of the Honourable Senators Quart and Welch be substituted for those of the Honourable Senators Bélisle and Willis on the list of Senators serving on the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media.

The question being put on the motion, it was—
Resolved in the affirmative.

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Tuesday, February 17, 1970.

With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Connolly (Halifax North):

That the name of the Honourable Senator Kinnear be added to the list of Senators serving on the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media.

The question being put on the motion, it was—
Resolved in the affirmative.

ROBERT FORTIER,
Clerk of the Senate.

MINUTES OF PROCEEDINGS

Wednesday, February 18, 1970.
(21)

Pursuant to adjournment and notice the Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 9.30 a.m.

Present: The Honourable Senators: Davey, (Chairman); Beaubien, Everett, Hays, Kinnear, Macdonald (Cape Breton), McElman, Petten, Prowse, and Smith. (10)

In attendance: Miss Marianne Barrie, Director and Administrator; Mr. Borden Spears, Executive Consultant; Mr. Yves Fortier, Counsel.

The following witnesses were heard:

Mr. Jerry Goodis, Advertising Executive;

Mr. F. Gerald Brander, Publisher, Maclean's Magazine and Le Magazine Maclean;

Mr. Ronald McEachern, Executive Vice-President, Maclean-Hunter, Limited;

Mr. Peter Gzowski, Editor, Maclean's Magazine;

Mr. Jean Sisto, Editor, Le Magazine Maclean.

At 12.55 p.m. the Committee adjourned to 2.30 p.m.

At 2.30 p.m. the Committee resumed.

Present: The Honourable Senators: Davey, (Chairman); Everett, Hays, Kinnear, Macdonald (Cape Breton), McElman, Petten, Prowse, Quart, Smith and Sparrow. (11)

In attendance: Miss Marianne Barrie, Director and Administrator; Mr. Borden Spears, Executive Consultant; Mr. Yves Fortier, Counsel.

The following witnesses were heard:

Mr. Lloyd Hodgkinson, Director, Maclean-Hunter, Limited; Publisher, The Chatelaine Group;

Mrs. Doris McCubbin Anderson, Chatelaine Group; Editor-in-Chief, Miss Chatelaine;

Mme Fernande Saint-Martin, Editor, Châteline;

Mr. Ronald A. McEachern, Executive Vice-President, Consumer Magazines, Maclean-Hunter, Limited;

Mr. John Crosbie, President, Magazine Advertising Bureau;

Mr. F. Gerald Brander, Publisher, Maclean's Magazine and Le Magazine Maclean.

At 6.00 p.m. the Committee adjourned to 8.00 p.m.

At 8.00 p.m. the Committee resumed.

Present: The Honourable Senators: Davey, (Chairman); Beaubien, Everett, Macdonald (Cape Breton), McElman, Petten and Prowse. (7).

In attendance: Miss Marianne Barrie, Director and Administrator; Mr. Borden Spears, Executive Consultant; Miss Nicola Kendall, Research Director; Mr. Yves Fortier, Counsel.

The following witnesses were heard:

Mr. James P. Duffy, President, Ottawa Typographical Union;
Mr. Allan Heritage, Former President, Toronto Mailers' Union;
Mr. Allan Histed, President, Hamilton Typographical Union;
Mr. Robert Earles, President, Toronto Mailers' Union;
Mr. Ken Lefolii, Broadcaster and Commentator.

At 11.10 p.m. the Committee adjourned to Thursday, February 19, 1970, at 10.00 a.m.

ATTEST.

Denis Bouffard,
Clerk of the Committee.

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Wednesday, February 18, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 9.30 a.m.

Senator Keith Davey (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, I might call the session to order.

This morning we are going to receive a brief from Mr. Jerry Goodis of Toronto, who is another in our series of nationally known communicators.

I should perhaps emphasize that he is not here in his capacity as President of Canada's seventh largest advertising agency. Indeed, Mr. Goodis hardly conforms to the classic stereotype of an advertising agency executive.

His much publicized feud, or perhaps a difference of opinion would be a better way of describing it, with Marshall McLuhan is paralleled by his almost continual confrontation with many inside his own industry.

Now, I understand we did not receive a brief three weeks in advance. We did receive a brief only this week end which has only this morning been distributed to the senators, which you are now going to read from.

I think, Jerry, you have fifteen minutes to discuss your brief, and amplify it, explain it and following that there will be a question period. The senators will question you on the contents of your brief, on the remarks you make now, and perhaps on other things which are not covered.

Mr. Jerry Goodis: Thank you, Senator Davey.

Honourable Senators, I have a thin voice so I hope you can hear me reading this to you.

As a Canadian involved in communications, I welcome this study of our mass media and I welcome, of course, the opportunity to make this submission. I think this committee has already made a very profound contribution to the improvement of the mass media by placing before the Canadian people a true picture, for example, of who owns what, and where and how.

I should like to try and dig a little deeper into the "how" part this morning, if I may —how the media serves or fails to adequately serve all of our people.

At the outset I should like to emphasize that I am not, as Senator Davey has suggested, an official representative or spokesman for my industry. I am not going to act as an apologist for, or as a defender of advertising. I have been invited to appear here as an individual. I understand that the Institute of Canadian Advertising will be presenting a brief to you at a later date.

I won't, and I suggest you shouldn't be surprised, if my submission differs or conflicts with the official ICA submission. I have a history of breaking ranks and contradicting the party line, much to the dismay of some of my fellow advertising practitioners.

I have, in the past, been critical of some advertising agencies, and some advertisers. I attack, when I can, the rude intrusions into our lives made by "Josephine the Plumber", "Wanda the Witch", "The Man from Glad", and other forms of White Knightism. I think my criticism of such styles of advertising and the people who foist it on the helpless consumer, the hapless viewer, stems from some kind of built-in defense mechanism which I have to keep well oiled in order to preserve my self-esteem.

As a result, I have been openly accused of biting the hand that feeds me and secretly asked how I get away with it. I have always been able to say the Goodis, Goldberg, Soren has enlightened clients who, while they may disagree sharply with what I say, would take issue with anyone who wanted to stop me from saying it.

So, allow me to say it.

We have a situation in this country where all of the income of the principal media is derived from the sale of space or time to advertisers. Income from the audience of the media, except in the case of newspapers, is non-existent or negligible.

Because this situation developed gradually and because it is now so much a part of our lives, we regard it as normal, right and inevitable. The benefit of course is immediately obvious. We have mass media because we pay for them in the form of advertising; access to radio and TV programming is free with the purchase of a TV set or radio, a newspaper still costs only a dime and a magazine subscription costs the subscriber only a few dollars a year—on the surface, a real bargain!

However, as I watch TV, listen to radio and read our magazines and newspapers I sometimes wonder if this wholesale dependence on advertising is an unmitigated blessing. I wonder if it doesn't have some unfortunate consequences as well. I wonder if it's one of the reasons our mass media aren't as good as they should be or as good as they could be.

Allow me to be specific.

One of the findings of the 1967 Institute of Canadian Advertising submission to the Senate/House Committee on Consumer Credit (Prices) was that: Advertising expenditures contribute 75% to total revenues of newspapers and to between 86% and 96% of total revenues of broadcasting stations. You have heard these figures before.

According to the O'Leary Report it has become so difficult for consumer magazines to gain new subscribers that the total cost of soliciting and acquiring subscriptions is greater than the revenue from such new readers.

So it is apparent that the mass media have two distinct sets of customers. The one set made up of the viewers, listeners, and readers; the other set made up of advertisers. A set of nonpaying customers; a set of paying customers.

And there are two sets of people within the mass media. One set, the editors, reporters, directors and newscasters works for and supplies the non-paying customers. The other set, the business side, works for and supplies the paying customers. Often located on separate floors and often housed in different buildings they come together only at the top. In my experience it is the dog who normally wags the tail. In any conflict of interest the paying customer comes first and the free rider takes second place.

Am I suggesting that advertisers, because they pay the shot, impose their will on the mass media? Not at all. They don't have to. The competition among media for advertising dollars is so intense that, like any good salesman, they have become skilled at anticipating the requirements of their advertiser customers.

The business side of the mass media is devoted to building and selling the right audience; an audience of the right size and the right composition. Because the advertiser is not interested in everybody. The advertiser wants to address those who buy and more importantly, those who can choose what they will buy, those whose choice is not dictated by necessity. In a word, the affluent. Pick up just about any media presentation or advertisement, aimed at advertisers and their agencies, and it reads sort of like a financial who's who.

Radio Station CFRB in Toronto runs an ad which says:

"Canadians 25 and over are the biggest spenders. Each week over one million of these big spenders listen to us."

In an ad for the Hamilton Spectator we read as follows:

"See the Hamiltonian. He lives and works in Hamilton. Hamilton is not like other metropolitan cities. It has the highest average weekly income.

Spend, Hamiltonian, spend. If you had his money you would spend too. Wealth, wealth, wealth. He is part of a billion dollar market."

A groovy piece of copy!

And of course, if you want to reach the market the ad says, you use the Spectator in Hamilton.

What are the results of the necessity to build an audience of affluent consumers to serve up to the advertiser a more affluent or more efficient audience than the next man? Editorial content inevitably comes to serve this end. The measure of editorial acceptability becomes how does it fit, or will it interest the affluent. As a consequence the mass media increasingly reflect the attitudes and deal with the concerns of the affluent. We don't have mass media, we have class media—media for the middle and upper classes.

The poor, the old, the young, the Indian, the Eskimo, the blacks are virtually ignored. It is as if they didn't exist. More importantly these minority groups are denied expression in the mass media because they cannot command attention as the affluent can.

The report of the Economic Council of Canada in September 1968 in a typically understated and austere fashion says: "The statement that one Canadian in every five—one Canadian in every five—suffers from poverty does not appear to be a wild exaggeration." But twenty per cent of our population is invisible too, or why would Senator Croll be going around this country like Diogenes with his lamp, searching not for an honest man, but a poor man. Instead of stories and pictures about the poor, we more often get stories and pictures about the convenors of charity balls. And when the few reports on the problems of the poor do appear, they represent the point of view or the 'answers' of the government, the universities, of all kinds of "experts". What we don't see in the mass media is how the poor themselves feel about themselves or what they think could be done to improve their condition.

How revealing it is that those people from whose shoulders the burden of taxation will be lifted, according to the Benson White Paper, the poor, have not had one bloody inch—column inch—of space in print media. But the screaming, wild-eyed, middle class—I call them the rabid bullocks—have dominated the main pages of our newspapers for weeks. Go for their wives, starve a few Biafrans, submit some Canadian Indians or Eskimos to a few more indignities—silence from the middle class. But ask them to share the burden of running the country just a little bit more equitably, and pow!! our media gives these guys coverage equal to a thousand D-Days.

It's revealing too, how the media treat Indians and the Eskimos, when they talk about them at all. There are individual articles of course... about a brawl in a bar involving Indians, a report of a court case dealing with hunting rights; fragmented, confusing reports about Indian reaction to the 'White Paper'. But who reports the cause and extent of Indian poverty, the appalling state of Indian educational facilities, and the injustices inflicted on native Canadians, through government actions and our general apathy or prejudice?

In The Unjust Society, Harold Cardinal points out that "Television has brought to our homes the sad plight of the Vietnamese". Canadians hear about and care about the U.S. racial strife and starving Biafrans. They don't hear and feel the 'shocking reality' of life on the reserve.

And what about our young people? I think it's apparent that many of them do not see themselves or their point of view adequately represented in the mass media.

True. Commercials remind the bubble gum set to drink the 'in' cola, cover your blemishes, use the right toothpaste and get the guy. And every now and then a program or article focuses on some strange or shocking example of young behaviour—usually to do with sex or dope. Like '15 year old pusher supports his own habit' or 'Yorkville Village crash pads spreads hepatitis, VD'. That is what they read about themselves in our mass—or class—media.

What is to a great extent ignored in the mass media are the things which I suppose are characteristic of youth. We were all like that when we were young, except we choose to forget when we were young. Like their continual questioning of the establishment "Why can't things be changed?" "Why can't we have peace?" they ask. The idealism. The bitterness and frustration with grown-up hypocrisy.

Out of desperation some of them have created a medium of their own, where they can at least tell each other how they feel. I was very happy to learn recently, that a group of underground press people is going to appear before this committee.

It is in the underground press that we can see the subjects the young are interested in, and read their often biting criticism of social injustices, their hopes for a changed and better society. I have an issue here of "Harbinger". Frankly, I am embarrassed to show it here, but I am going to submit it to the committee as an example of underground press journalism.

The first article is about labour practices at Eaton's. It mentions in passing that because of it's large advertising account in major papers, Eaton's has insurance against an unfavorable press. That is what the young kids think. Other articles discuss pollution, the status of native people, trial by media, draft dodging, and so on.

Shouldn't our sane, old society allow itself to be pricked into self doubt by the young, whatever strange (to us) packages they and their views may come in? I suspect that the disgust many people feel at the obscenity or rawness of the underground press (and you ought to read some of the four letter words in here) is part of the hypocrisy young people rail against. We'll pay $10. a head and be happy to hear those four letter words in the safe entertainment setting of "Hair". But we draw back when the message is as blunt as the language that expresses it.

While print media are deficient in editorial coverage of minorities, leave a great deal to be desired in their explanations of how the problems of such groups come about and are laggard in mobilizing public opinion to better such situations, the problem is acute—most acute—in broadcasting where advertising accounts for essentially all the income of the enterprise. Listening to radio and watching TV in this country prompts one to ask if, as advertising comes in the front door, does it bring entertainment with it and proceed to shove information out the window? Is the present state of affairs on radio and TV a potent of what will happen as the print media become more dependent on advertising revenue?

In my short lifetime radio has degenerated into background noise, enlivened by commercials and periodically interrupted with bursts of hysterical information about the fire at the City Hardware on Elm Street followed by a report of the latest international crisis ripped off the Telex on the way into the studio. Listen today and you will see what I mean.

Entertainment, if you call MUZACK entertainment, has proved the most economical way to create and maintain an audience for advertising. And it is becoming increasingly obvious that the principal occupation of radio stations is to create audiences for advertising. Sounds strange, coming from an advertising man.

And of course, on television what most Canadians see is the results of the wholesale importing of American programming. Because unfortunately, this is the cheapest way to build an audience for TV commercials and to fill in the spaces between them.

It's simple. Our television stations buy U.S. programs because it costs them less than producing their own. Murray Cherkover, in this morning's Globe and Mail admits it. Read it—very interesting. They don't even have the excuse of lack of native talent. Some of the best directors, writers and producers on the continent came from Canada—Norman Jewison—Harvey Hart. They are all writing and directing shows like "Andy Williams" and "Laugh-In", and the now smothered to death "Smothers Brothers" show. Maybe if more shows, more work, had been done here instead of imported from there, these talented people wouldn't have left our country in the first place.

Television, the principal educator of our children and many of our adults, has been virtually abandoned to U.S. programming. And hear, hear, for Mr. Juneau.

I think all of us are aware that this American influence must—must—have a serious effect on the way our children think about their own country, and their awareness of Canadian culture, Canadian history and Canadian problems.

My concern that kids are losing their awareness of a Canadian identity prompted me to do a little research of my own.

Quite unscientifically, people in my agency prompted me to go to two classrooms and ask questions. I did that; I asked questions of fifty nine Grade 5 students at a suburban school in Don Mills, known as a very sophisticated educational system. These students at Overland Drive Public School were nine or ten years old. We had a question and answer period which we taped—I am going to table the tape for your committee. Then I had a questionnaire which I asked the children to fill in, asking them who certain people were.

The results were, to say the least, thought provoking.

All of the kids knew who the Frito Bandido and Maxwell Smart are. I wonder if you do?

Senator Beaubien: I don't.

Mr. Goodis: I will fill you in, Senator.

Forty-eight of the fifty-nine knew that George Washington was the first President of the United States—predictably—okay. Only one child knew Louis Riel. Thirty-nine knew who Abraham Lincoln was. Three children—three children—had heard of Wilfrid Laurier.

Mr. Fortier: Did they spell it that way?

The Chairman: Carry on. The question period will be later, Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Goodis: Twenty-eight could identify John A. Macdonald—not bad. Of the others, one girl was so brainwashed by American television advertising that she related the name John A. Macdonald to "a place that makes hamburgers".

The complete results of this survey are attached to my brief. I will not bore you by reading them here. Please study them later.

But what you can't get out of facts and figures is the way the kids responded. There was an overwhelming, happy, spontaneous response to TV questions—they roared the correct answer in unison, you will hear it on the tape, when I asked who Clark Kent was.

Senator Beaubien, do you know who Clark Kent is?

Senator Beaubien: No.

Mr. Goodis: He is Superman—while much hard thinking and puzzlement followed questions about Canada. There was a very long pause when I asked who our Governor General was, before I got the hesitant answer "I think it was or is Roland Michener". I think the kid is trying to tell us something. Only one child knew what the Governor General's function was. Television seems to have much more power than schooling or anything else in implanting knowledge that stays in the forefront of the mind. That knowledge is not of Canada.

Our mass media are Americanized. Canadian culture is degraded and polluted by American overflow. Our media are safe, middle-of-the-road politically, socially, intellectually. They reinforce our already formed opinions and prejudices, and generally avoid unpopular causes or ugly truths.

I think it's noteworthy that it's in the single medium where there is no advertising at all, where the audience pays the whole shot—it is in books that positive, serious social criticism must start. Michael Harrington brought to light the millions of buried, invisible poor in America. Ralph Nader, all by himself, (I have the book. I am leaving it with you), made us aware of the fact that our cars are unsafe, and poisoning us all into the bargain. Where were the mass media? Sitting at home, filling us up with a diet of carefully controlled news and warm reassurances from automotive industry PR men. Just think how many lives might have been saved if the mass media had done even a little of Nader's work for him, before the young lawyer talked himself hoarse to make people listen.

And take pollution. Sure, right now newspapers and television are very big on the subject and that's great. But where they ten years ago when Rachel Carson wrote "Silent Spring"? Why didn't the newspapers, radio and television do the research, cause the reaction, and get the public and the government moving years ago?

In Canada, there's Walter Gordon. He had to make a thousand speeches, write a book and commit political suicide (or was he murdered?) in his effort to explain how we are selling this country piece by precious piece to our neighbour. Our mass media watched him do it, as a passer-by watches a lonely man balancing on a high windowsill. They watched him, reported what he said, but with the exception of The Toronto Daily Star and a handful of others, made hardly any attempt to sympathetically interpret his case.

Harold Cardinal was so totally frustrated by the lack of understanding of the government and the Canadian people in general, he wrote a book to tell the rest of us how it really is on the reserve. He is not content to let us rest on our prejudices, accepting what the media care to tell us.

Writers like Cardinal and Nader expose problems and inform us of things we may not want to hear. They strip away the comfortable excuse of "I never heard-read-saw anything about that. How could I know?" And we can expect more books like theirs. Somewhere, an articulate Eskimo may be getting ready to tell us more about second class citizenship and the benevolent, misdirected welfare-statism to which his people are subject. A book has just been written about how far we have gone already in selling water to the U.S.A. It's called Continental Water Boy, by Donald C. Waterfield.

I doubt that such stories could start in the mass media. Because, in the mass media, there's little room for a critic of business or government until an overwhelming case is made that can no longer be ignored. Likewise, in the mass media minorities' problems tend to be pushed aside.

Of course, this is a blanket condemnation. And there are exceptions. The Toronto Daily Star, The Montreal Star, Le Devoir, to name a precious few, have consistently attempted to speak up for the minorities. Individual columnists and commentators—Peter C. Newman, Stanley Burke and Ron Haggart are names that come to mind—and there are others. They have tackled unpopular causes with conviction and supreme journalistic skill. Especially in the CBC, television producers have worked minor miracles to overcome apathy and bureaucracy to alert us to subjects we might find unpleasant or unpalatable. The exceptions are too few. And their revelations carry too little weight.

It's time, it's past time for change. And I'm glad your committee is diagnosing the ills afflicting the Canadian mass media. Because I think we should realize by now, that we can't hope to have participatory democracy, we cannot achieve the Just Society, (they are simply political slogans) without some fundamental changes in our mass media.

The mass media are controlled by a handful of men—you have already exposed that.

The income of these media is almost wholly derived from about 100 big businesses in Canada. And about 70 per cent of Canadian big business is owned in the U.S.

It's not very surprising then, that the content of the mass media is influenced by their commercial interests. That they cater to the affluent, and neglect the poor and the minorities. Or, that they choose the cheapest, easiest way to build an audience, with made-in-America 'culture'. The problem in the mass media seems to be one of imbalance. There is too much emphasis on publishing and broadcasting as business, and too little emphasis on publishing and broadcasting as instruments of social progress.

In too many cases, the media do not lead the way to informed opinion, but rather, support the status quo.

They are not as honest, as accurate or as free as they have to be to fulfil a truly useful role in a world that's changing faster than most of us can understand.

In closing, I'll read a few lines from a prophetic song by Bob Dylan, whose words are very much in tune with the feelings of tomorrow's leaders of the country, if we have a country left:

Come senators, congressmen, please heed the call

Don't stand in the doorway, don't block up the hall

For he who gets hurt is he who has stalled

The battle outside is raging.

It'll soon shake the windows and rattle the walls.

The times they are a'changing.

Honourable Senators, it's time that we too changed with the times. Before it's too late.

Thank you.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Goodis. Perhaps I could inform Senator Beaubien that Maxwell Smart is on an American television program, seen in Canada, called "Get Smart". I guess you would call him a sort of comic-opera detective—is that it?

Mr. Goodis: A bumbling detective.

The Chairman: But I must say that even I don't know who the Frito Bandito is, and neither does Senator Beaubien. Could you enlighten us?

Mr. Goodis: Frito Bandito is a character in a television commercial which sells potato chips, or something, and all the kids know it.

The Chairman: Is he a Canadian?

Mr. Goodis: No, the commercial is an American commercial made in the United States.

The Chairman: I must say, because I know Mr. Goodis well, that he was uncharacteristically nervous before this presentation this morning. Why? Do you find it difficult to appear before a Senate Committee?

Mr. Goodis: Yes. People in my profession telephoned me—the word got out that I was going to appear before this Committee—they said, "Don't say what you really think because you are going to get into all kinds of hot water".

Senator Beaubien: Have you said what you think?

Mr. Goodis: Absolutely. I had more to say, but Senator Davey said that I had fifteen minutes and I took twenty, I think.

The Chairman: You took twenty-five.

Mr. Goodis: It reminds me of the story of two Jewish partisans who were caught in Poland during the war by the Nazis. They were sentenced to death, of course, right on the spot, tied to a tree, and just as the German lieutenant was saying "Ready, aim—" one of the partisans screamed "Stop! Halt! I demand, as a citizen of Poland, a blindfold".

Whereupon the other partisan, next to him at the other tree, leaned over and said "Irving, don't make trouble". That is the thought that ran through my head when my friends said, "Don't go to that Committee".

I said, "Look, I am subpoenaed, I have to go".

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Goodis, have you ever thought of going into politics?

Mr. Goodis: I have a deal with our Prime Minister.

Mr. Fortier: Tell us about it.

Mr. Goodis: He has agreed to stay out of advertising if I agree to stay out of politics.

No, I have not thought of going into politics.

Mr. Fortier: Supposing you had another deal with the Prime Minister, Mr. Goodis, and he appointed you Czar of the written and electronic media, how would you go about curing the ills that you have described in our brief?

Mr. Goodis: Well, that's a tough one.

Senator Prowse: That's our problem.

Mr. Goodis: Well, if I had all the answers, yes, you wouldn't need this Committee, I guess.

Mr. Fortier: All we need is the assistance of people like you.

Mr. Goodis: I come to this Committee like a nervous intern before an operation.

It would be the pinnacle of presumption for me to show you, Honorable Senators and Mr. Fortier where to make the incisions and what to remove and how to fill it up nice and neatly. I am just an intern. If I had all the answers, you wouldn't need this Committee.

As I say, I am not sure where I would start. I am not sure I have any original suggestions of my own. I wholeheartedly support the efforts of Pierre Juneau of the CRTC.

The new rule requiring 60 per cent Canadian content overall and the minimum of 60 per cent, I think it is, in prime time is an absolutely necessary step but it is going to cost us a lot of loot, a lot of money, and the government and the taxpayers and my clients and me, I guess, as taxpayers, are all going to have to pay for it, to recreate the Canadian programming that we have let slip away.

I think the results can only be good, if that becomes law. With more Canadian content, there will be great opportunities for employment of Canadian talent, for example.

It is our last big chance to develop talent that has been suffocated by the American overrun or as Mr. Juneau said something to the effect that the "CRTC is searching for ways to give the CBC a more imaginative role in developing a Canadian intellectual and cultural life", and I subscribe to that thesis.

Private broadcasters are screaming that it is going to cost money. I know of no TV station in North America that has ever gone broke. Chercover in this morning's Globe, to my disgust, says that it is going to cost a lot of money and we are going to have to do something and he is crying. They are just fine, I would like to have stock in that company, as a matter of fact.

Senator Beaubien: Which company, not the CBC?

Mr. Goodis: Oh no, he is from CTV. I wouldn't like to have stock in CBC.

Senator Smith: Give everybody a share of CBC and make the people pay their part of the deficit every year.

Mr. Goodis: May I finish my answer. You Senators should be warned that when you ask a short question, you get an awfully long answer.

I have read that someone has recommended the establishment of a National Press Council. I think that could be a good idea in spite of the fact that it has some dangers—you know, the hands of incompetence. It could become a way of toning the news, suppressing the news, a way of perhaps even censoring the news. That could be bad, but it also could be good. It could raise the level of reporting and it would be beholden to no one because there would be no advertising in it.

The Chairman: We are delighted to have the witness give long answers, but he is answering questions which have not been put.

Mr. Goodis: Oh, really!

Senator McElman: With the upgrading of the Canadian content, do you believe that Canadians will develop their own originality or will they come up with Canadian versions of "Hoss Cartwright" and "Maxwell Smart?"

Mr. Goodis: Oh, God help us!

Senator McElman: I agree.

Mr. Goodis: At first, yes. English-Canadian talent will tend to ape and copy America, but you know, in French Canada where they don't have the problem of American cultural pollution, they have developed the finest and most talented actors, writers, directors and producers, because they have been forced to, in my view, they have been forced to, and they have happily developed. They do their own thing, as the young people say.

Mr. Fortier: That is why Senator Beaubien didn't know about the American Personnel.

Mr. Goodis: Oh, I see.

That is developed over the years and ultimately I think we too will develop a true, original Canadian culture but we must stop imitating those guys below the border.

So, in the first few years, maybe we will have pale imitations of "Hoss Cartwright". Why doesn't somebody do a show about Louis Riel or Joseph Papineau or someone like that?

The Chairman: I think Senator Everett has some supplementary questions and then Senator Hays.

Senator Everett: The basis of your brief is that our media are advertiser oriented. Let us take the newspapers for example. You say they won't deal with issues because of some influence of the advertiser, they are going to stay on safe ground.

Quite frankly, that isn't a new comment. We have been aware of it and I think all Canadians have been aware of it for quite some time.

What really would be of interest to this Committee would be to know what you would do about it.

Mr. Goodis: I said before, Senator, that I do not have stock answers. It is a terrible problem.

Senator Everett: I'm not asking for a stock answer. I am asking for an indication. You have obviously thought about the problem and you think it is the overwhelming problem of the media. Surely you have got some indication of the way you think it is going to go or suggestions that we might take to overcome this defect that weights so heavily on your mind.

Mr. Goodis: Well, I do not have concrete suggestions, really, outside the suggestion I made for a National Press Council. It is not my suggestion, I am echoing another submission. I think it is an excellent idea. I think rich publishers should hire some writers from the poor, put them on the staff to express how the poor feel about their lot in life, how they got there and how they can get out of there. I don't know whether that is a concrete suggestion.

A lot of rich publishers have poor writers—Lubor Zink and Mackenzie Porter. They are poor writers. Maybe the underground press should be bought out by a large newspaper and printed holus-holus as a part of their newspaper.

Senator Everett: Do you think it would improve if...

Mr. Goodis: Well, young people would start reading the paper.

Senator Everett: ...if the wealthy publishers owned the underground press?

Mr. Goodis: No, if they merged them into their own papers and let the kids say how they feel in their language.

Now, I am not suggesting that we encourage them to use four-letter words because that is what we get out of it, really, and we miss the main point. They want to say how they feel about things in general from their own point of view, not how some college professor thinks they feel about some social or political issue. Is that a concrete suggestion? I don't know. I really am hard put to come up with a definitive path for this Committee to take. I think you have already made a grand head start by placing it on the public agenda. You will figure something out, I'm sure you will. I wish I could help you.

Senator Hays: I was wondering, Mr. Goodis, are there any countries that you are familiar with that do comparable jobs?

The Chairman: To Canada?

Senator Hays: Yes.

The Chairman: That have a comparable problem as he has described?

Senator Hays: Yes.

The Chairman: Are you familiar with countries that have a comparable situation?

Mr. Goodis: The United States, I suppose, has.

Senator Hays: Do you think it's better than the Canadian?

Mr. Goodis: Far worse, I would guess. I don't operate in the United States, so I don't know. I only observe their media from a distance.

Senator Hays: Do you think they have greater problems than we have?

Mr. Goodis: Oh yes, I think so.

Senator Hays: Do you know of any countries that you feel are doing a better job than we are as far as this situation is concerned?

Mr. Goodis: No, I am not aware of any countries who are doing better than we are. We have much to be embarrassed about and much to be proud of too. It is a mixed bag. The very fact that we can have this Committee is a great thing, because somebody, somewhere is worried.

I guess Senator Davey in the first place was worried and then you Senators were worried and therefore we have a committee but I am not an expert in international communications. I hardly know anything about the Canadian media.

The Chairman: Speaking of you being an expert in international communications, I think the Senators might be interested, and I would myself, with what is the difference of opinion you have with Marshall McLuhan? What is his position and what is yours?

Mr. Goodis: I thought that issue was dead and buried.

The Chairman: Well, I mentioned this in my introductory comment.

Senator Prowse: It's resurrected.

Mr. Goodis: I think he is a charming man. I have no issue with him as a man. I take issue with some of his ideas which I think are dangerous.

"It doesn't matter," says Marshall McLuhan, "what you put on TV as long as you put it on". "The medium is the message".

In all the reading that I have done of Marshall McLuhan, upon checking what he has written, he has twisted history in order to fit his theories.

The other thing that I wonder about Marshall McLuhan sometimes, is, I am either a very stupid man—and people have suggested that—or that man can't speak English.

He and I were to appear on TV once, and we both chickened out. I was afraid of him, because I was afraid I couldn't understand him and he refused to bring an interpreter with him so that was the end of that.

I think the man is dangerous. As a man, he is charming. I think his ideas are quite dangerous.

Immovable type, he says, is passé and the printed word. The man became famous with the printed word. He bites the hand that feeds him, just like I do, I guess.

I am sorry I have not prepared myself for a long dissertation on Marshall McLuhan—perhaps tomorrow.

Mr. Fortier: Do you suggest, Mr. Goodis, that newspapers constitute a very powerful medium?

Mr. Goodis: Absolutely.

Mr. Fortier: They do?

Mr. Goodis: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: How would you compare their effectiveness as a conveyor of messages to television?

Mr. Goodis: I'm not sure I understand that question.

Mr. Fortier: How do they perform their role as purveyors of information as opposed to television?

Mr. Goodis: I think terribly effectively, newspapers do. Television does too. The thing about a newspaper is that you can keep it, put it away, take it out and study it. Television is here and gone with the wind, so to speak.

Mr. Fortier: Is there a substitute for a good newspaper?

Mr. Goodis: No.

Mr. Fortier: Do you know of a good newspaper?

Mr. Goodis: In Canada?

Mr. Fortier: Yes, in Canada.

Mr. Goodis: Oh, yes, a dozen.

Mr. Fortier: You do?

Mr. Goodis: Sure.

Mr. Fortier: Do you know of a good television station?

Mr. Goodis: The CBC National Broadcasting—the programs that emanate from the CBC nationally.

Mr. Fortier: Do you listen to radio?

Mr. Goodis: Of course.

Mr. Fortier: The CBC radio, is that a...

Mr. Goodis: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Do you have any clients?

Mr. Goodis: After today, I wonder.

Mr. Fortier: Let me ask you a serious question. For example, I am looking at paragraph 24 of your brief where you say "drink the 'in' cola, cover your blemishes, use the right toothpaste and get the guy."

Do you have any toothpaste clients?

Mr. Goodis: No, or how could I make that statement?

Mr. Fortier: Do you have any cola clients?

Mr. Goodis: Of course not.

Mr. Fortier: Any cosmetics?

Mr. Goodis: Yes, yes we do.

Mr. Fortier: Tell me, you are a very outspoken man, have you ever lost any client as a result of your well-publicized views, such as those you have expressed today.

Mr. Goodis: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Would you care to give us instances?

Mr. Goodis: I would not care to, because it would compromise the people who still work at the company.

I lost a large American corporation because I spoke out against American domination of our country and forty-eight hours later, we were fired, but I can not give you, unless I am forced to, the name of that company.

The Chairman: You are not forced to, but why won't you?

Mr. Goodis: Because people who work at that company in Canada are still friends of mine, and I would rather not, Senator Davey.

The Chairman: Do we need to know the name of the company?

Mr. Fortier: It is up to you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: I don't think we do, then.

Mr. Fortier: Everybody knows what the name is.

The Chairman: I know, and I think you people know, but...

Mr. Goodis: Write it down on a piece of paper and if you are right I will give you a year's supply of the product. I can't stop being an advertising man.

Mr. Fortier: Which one of the products?

Mr. Goodis: That will give it away.

Senator Everett: In this sheet that accompanied your brief on who you are and what you have done, you state that "Some of the advertising campaigns for which his agency has derived industry fame are those created for Greb Hush Puppies, Speedy Muffler King, Hiram Walker, Dupont, Aluminum Company of Canada, Formosa Brewery, Tambllyn Drugs, Wonder-Bra, Texaco, Robin Hood, Fiat, Salada Foods, Robin Hood Flour and others." Can you tell me what fame your agency derived from, say, the Wonder-Bra campaign?

Mr. Goodis: Yes, we sold a lot of brassieres for the company—very tasteful, good, sophisticated fashion advertising on TV.

Senator Everett: Can we be the judge of that?

Mr. Goodis: It was a series of television commercials. Would you like me to describe it.

Senator Everett: Please do.

Mr. Goodis: A photographer taking photographs of a model dressed in very fashionable clothes—dressed in very fashionable clothes—with the suggestion that underneath she is wearing very well-designed and well-fitting garments and the commercial has some very effective music behind it.

It was also a radio commercial, in supreme good taste, in our view and affected the sales of the company for whom we worked.

Senator Everett: Up or down?

Mr. Goodis: Up.

Senator Prowse: What is a bra supposed to do?

Mr. Goodis: If the sales went down, we would call it a reverse upward trend. We never admit that sales go down.

The Chairman: Senator Everett, you don't wish to pursue that line?

Senator Hays: Apparently, they didn't sell in Winnipeg.

Mr. Goodis: You haven't seen the commercial.

The Chairman: I'm not sure why they didn't sell in Winnipeg.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Goodis: can the contemporary journalist, and I'm referring here mainly to the newspaper aspect of your presentation, do you think he can adjust to the changing society which you describe.

Mr. Goodis: I doubt it.

When the power to effect social and political change is in the hands of the establishment, which is what it is in the hands of in our country, the slow ponderous pace of change is called evolution and when that power falls into the hand of people, it's called revolution, I guess.

In an evolutionary society where manipulative mass communication is so vital to the preservation of the status quo, journalists grow on trees. There are all kinds of them. We need them. We use them.

In a revolutionary society, those same journalists don't grow on trees. I am afraid they hang from them.

I don't think many of our journalists today will be able to change, and it is changing. We can sit here in this fancy room, protected from the outside, but it is changing. Otherwise, why do we have papers like that and rioting in the streets in—in other countries even just below the border.

Mr. Fortier: Montreal—we don't have to go over the border.

Mr. Goodis: It's not quite as bad, but it's coming.

I am not talking about rioting but I am talking about the change that is taking place so fast that even you and I can't see it.

The Chairman: In this revolutionary society you are talking about, will there be a place for advertising agencies?

Mr. Goodis: That's a very interesting question, Senator.

I hope so, otherwise I will have to open a chain of Ladies Ready-to-Wear stores.

There will be a Ministry of Propaganda I suppose. I don't know. It depends on what kind of a society we are going to evolve into.

Yes, I think there will. We will always have to sell goods to people and that's okay. I make my living selling goods to people who have money and there's nothing inherently wrong in that. That is fine, and if anyone in this room suggests that I think it is wrong, they have missed the main point of my submission.

It is okay to sell goods to people and the media do an excellent job of delivering those audiences. My point is, there are four million people in this country they don't give a damn about. That is what upsets me, because they don't have the loot to buy the brassiere.

Senator Hays: There are people prepared to pay four dollars or five dollars a month for cable TV which adds up to sixty dollars a year. Do you think the government should go back and reinstitute licenses for TV to cover some of the cost of the CBC?

Mr. Goodis: Yes, Senator Hays, absolutely.

As a citizen, I am prepared to pay the government two hundred dollars per year if it will stop Maxwell Smart from tromping through my living room every night.

I am prepared, and I think we all should be prepared, to help pay the shot. We cannot speak with forked tongues.

The Chairman: Can't you stop Maxwell Smart from tromping through your living room by changing the channel?

Mr. Goodis: No, my kids like to watch it, Senator Davey.

I can legislate him out of the house until I have to go to the movies and then he is on again.

If it isn't Maxwell Smart, it is Frito Bandito.

Senator Hays: What you want is to be able to buy...

Mr. Goodis: I think—I'm sorry, Senator Hays—that is a good idea and if that is what it takes, I'm all for it. Just don't take any money from those four million people who can't afford it. Take it from the affluent like you and I.

Senator Hays: Do you feel then that this charge should be passed on to the consumer, rather than taken out of the Federal Treasury?

Mr. Goodis: Perhaps we should all contribute. We all own the country.

Senator Hays: Well, we do anyway, but...

Mr. Goodis: Perhaps we should all pay.

Senator Hays: This is the easiest way probably to get at what you are suggesting.

Mr. Goodis: I would think that is an excellent suggestion. Watch me get a letter from Mr. Bullock.

Senator Prowse: You feel then that the necessity of advertising revenue has resulted in the deterioration of the press performing a function that we generally think of when we talk about free press. Is this true?

Mr. Goodis: Unquestionably. If we have twenty million people in this country and we are only serving the interests of sixteen million people, then your definition stands.

Yes, I agree it has deteriorated.

Senator Prowse: Do you think that it is probably true that as long as we have newspapers and TV and radio that are of necessity business institutions, that they must have revenue to stay alive.

Mr. Goodis: Yes, they must.

Senator Prowse: And that revenue must come from this same source.

Have you got any suggestion at all as to how we could reconcile their ideal public duty with the business necessity of staying alive. This is the problem.

Mr. Goodis: There are a number of newspapers in Canada doing it now.

I read about a forum that the Daily Star had with Mr. Benson last week. It was quite a forum. It was quite a forum that the Star had on the poor and on pollution.

The Star is the largest newspaper in Toronto (I guess it is the largest newspaper in the country). They are doing just fine. There is a company I would like to own stock in. It can be done.

They are also delivering to my clients an affluent audience and the Montreal Star does much the same thing.

I see Gzowski sitting here. He writes, and his people write excellent stories about those people in our country who are not represented and I would imagine they are doing just fine. He has made a qualitative change in that magazine for the good.

It can be done, but advertisers think they have to deliver that affluent audience to the exclusion of the other people who are crying to be represented. That won't drive their advertising sales down. It might even drive them up.

Senator Prowse: This may be the area we can find an answer in, if we follow it.

The big strong institution like the Toronto Star, has enough confidence in itself that it knows the advertiser needs it the way it is. It doesn't have to tailor itself to the advertisers.

Mr. Goodis: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Now, does the damage come from institutions who because of their insecurity or lack of self-confidence then tailor themselves for their advertiser and not for their social responsibility.

Mr. Goodis: Absolutely.

Senator Everett: So, the wealthier the station, the wealthier the newspaper, the more chance...

Mr. Goodis: Well, I would not make that leap. It has nothing to do with wealth. It has to do with journalistic skill and journalistic prowess. That is, yes, how the Montreal Star got to where it is and Le Devoir and the Toronto Star—by being very good newspapers to begin with.

Senator Everett: Then would you say that if the people who are in charge of the media understand their capabilities and skillfully exploit them in the sense that they keep the public duty in mind, they can serve both customers to the benefit of both.

Mr. Goodis: Absolutely. It is being done.

Senator Macdonald: On that same thing, I take it from page three of your brief that you are saying that advertisers don't have to try to exert pressure because the editorial side try to anticipate what the advertiser wants and follows that line.

Mr. Goodis: You are reading it, or I probably read it a little too literally.

I didn't mean that the editorial people write what the advertiser wants them to write. Not at all, they don't exert that kind of pressure nor do the editorial people feel compelled to write to satisfy the needs of Eaton's or Simpson's.

They are writing to a class of people, by definition, the people who they think are reading their paper, who also have money to open a charge account at Eaton's. That is what I mean in general terms.

I know of no case where an advertiser has said to a newspaper or a TV station, "take that program off or don't write that article or we will remove our advertising". I have heard rumours like that, but I could cite no case that I could back up with evidence.

Senator Macdonald: That is not quite what I meant. Publishers have come here and said, Now there's absolutely no influence by advertisers on their editorial policies but it was suggested that newspapers hire people on their editorial side who they know are in sympathy with the newspapers point of view.

Mr. Goodis: You are talking, Senator, about political things then, are you?

Senator Macdonald: No, in relation between advertising and the editorial policy.

Mr. Goodis: I'm not sure how to answer.

The Chairman: I think if I could perhaps clarify the question.

Mr. Goodis: I don't understand it.

The Chairman: Well, all right. You made the point which Senator Macdonald takes that direct specific influence by advertisers...

Mr. Goodis: ...is not necessary.

The Chairman: Not only is it not necessary, it is just not done, presumably.

Mr. Goodis: Right.

The Chairman: I think what Senator Macdonald is asking you, how then is it done. What is this influence you are on page three, "Am I suggesting that advertisers, because they pay the shot, impose their will on the mass media? Not at all. They don't have to."

Well, I think what Senator Macdonald question is, why don't they have to.

Mr. Goodis: If we take as read that the mass media depend on delivering an audience to advertisers, in order for them to make a living—if can we agree on that—THAT—then it follows that in order to keep that audience, you write to that audience, you satisfy that audience.

That is their market, the people who read that newspaper or watch that television station are their market because if the market changes and the market stops reading the newspaper, or stops watching the television station, suddenly we don't have as many affluent people to whom that television station can deliver to an advertiser, and then they are in big trouble, as you, Senator Prowse, suggested.

So, you satisfy your market. You satisfy that segment of the community from which you draw your living and that's fine.

I am saying that there is an imbalance and that they should both satisfy the affluent people and reflect what's going on in the rest of the country—four million Canadians. It can be done and they can continue to make lots of money and the airways don't belong to Murray Chercover, they belong to you and me and the people...

The Chairman: I am not sure the Senators know who Murray Chercover is.

Mr. Goodis: Oh, Murray Chercover is the President of CTV and he is on my mind now because he made the foolish statement in the press today. Have I answered your question, Senator?

Senator Macdonald: Yes, you are doing fine.

Mr. Goodis: I'll probably be out of business when I get back.

Senator Macdonald: Go a step further and take the newspapers. They don't talk about the plight of the Indians and poor because that is not a market for the goods that their advertisers are selling.

Mr. Goodis: I didn't say that. I said they talk about the plight of the poor from our point of view. They talk about the plight of the Indians from our point of view. How many newspapers in this country reprinted Harold Cardinal's book? I know of one, and there are probably a couple of magazines that did it, perhaps Maclean's.

I see Mr. Gzowski is signalling me back there. Maybe I am wrong.

Harold Cardinal is an Indian and he said it the way it is and he makes some sweeping condemnations of guys like me and you and our government and nobody wanted to print it except a couple of social-conscious newspapers.

They are not in business just to make money. They are in business to carry accurate news and information about every segment of our population and some of them are doing it, but most of them are not.

You had K. C. Irving here and someone asked why don't you carry stories about pollution in the Fredericton Gleaner. I don't know what he answered, I wish I had been here to hear the answer.

Senator Everett: You have given us examples such as the Montreal Star and Toronto Star of papers who do not suffer from this subtle influence. Can you give us a couple of notable examples of newspapers who do?

Mr. Goodis: Subtle influence?

Senator Everett: Well, I think you say that there is a subtle influence because they derive their revenue from the advertiser, they will not print certain articles from the viewpoint of the people involved.

Mr. Goodis: I have heard, and I cannot back this up with facts, Senator Everett, that a newspaper in Alberta would not print excerpts from Mr. Cardinal's book. It is that kind of thing that is a rumour and that you hear in the industry. I don't want to get anyone into trouble, but all newspapers are guilty of one part of my charge, some of them, as I keep saying over and over again, do it well by talking about unpopular causes and taking up unpopular issues but they are precious few.

So, they all write to the affluent audience. They must, in order to stay in business. It is not a crime. I guess you and I would do the same thing.

I am only saying that there is a terrible imbalance.

Senator Everett: Isn't it a good thing to write to the affluent audience?

Mr. Goodis: Sure.

Senator Everett: Presumably, if you want to rectify social injustice, those are the people that are going to do it, aren't they?

Mr. Goodis: The middle-class—rectify?

Senator Everett: I say, those are the people you have got to get to in order to do it.

Mr. Goodis: In order to effect change?

Senator Everett: Doesn't that come down to your concept of evolution as opposed to revolution?

Mr. Goodis: Well, there have been middle-class revolutions and there have been working-class revolutions too, in our recent history.

Who effects change in our society? I guess the large middle-class—the silent majority until you go for their bankbook.

That is not really the point of my submission, Senator.

Senator Everett: Then I have missed the point, and I would like to be enlightened as to what the point is.

Mr. Goodis: Should I start on page one?

The Chairman: I think you should start with your conclusion.

Mr. Goodis: May I?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Goodis: Is he a hostile witness or am I?

The Chairman: You're the hostile witness.

Mr. Goodis: Forgive me for being facetious but I thought we had covered it.

Senator Beaubien: Before we go to the conclusion, can I ask a question?

The Chairman: You can, but let's deal with Senator Everett's question, Senator Beaubien.

Mr. Goodis: "The mass media are controlled by a handful of men." You have established that. I didn't establish that—your Committee did. "The income of these media is almost wholly derived from about one hundred big businesses in Canada." I have a list which I will leave with you. "About 70 per cent of Canadian big business is owned in the United States."

It is not very surprising then, that the content of the mass media is influenced by their commercial interests." They do it in order to stay in business. That is not a crime, and I do not suggest that it is. "That they cater to the affluent, and neglect the poor and the minorities. Or, that they choose the cheapest, easiest way to build an audience, with made-in-America "culture"." (We are talking about broadcasting media here.)

"The problem in the mass media seems to be one of imbalance. There is too much emphasis on publishing and broadcasting as business," (delivering the affluent audience,) "and too little emphasis on publishing and broadcasting as instruments of social progress."

That is the point of my submission.

Senator Everett: You say that certain newspapers and I think, notably, the CBC...

Mr. Goodis: Yes.

Senator Everett: ...do not suffer from the defect of not dealing with the problem, but you say that they all suffer from the defect of dealing with the problem through the eyes of the affluent. Is that correct?

Mr. Goodis: No. I said some of them also look at problems through the eyes of the disenfranchised. Some of them, notably the Montreal Star, Le Devoir, the Toronto Star and a handful of others.

Have I answered your question? Do you understand what I'm trying to say? I may be wrong. You may disagree. I just want to be sure that you understand my position—my point of view.

Senator Everett: Well, if I do understand your point of view, your point of view is that the social issues that affect the disenfranchised should be written to appeal to the disenfranchised, not to appeal to the affluent.

Mr. Goodis: It is not a question of appealing to. It's written from their point of view so that you and I can gain some understanding with their lot in life and perhaps help them. That is where the deficiency is.

We have a Senator running around the country with a butterfly net looking for poor people. That is because nobody ever writes about them in a meaningful way. And that is missing from our media, the media belongs to the people of this country, even though they have to be a business, even though they have to have advertising dollars.

I give them ten million advertising dollars a year and I am glad to because they deliver the audience I must have for Wonder-Bra.

The Chairman: I think if I could interpret Senator Everett's point, I think that you have not taken the point that he is making. I think the point that he was making is that it would be in the interests of the disenfranchised, it would be in their long-run interests if the media were to do these things that you are recommending.

It would be in their long-run interest because the people to whom the media are presently appealing are the people who could be helpful.

I think that was the point he is making.

Mr. Goodis: I agree. I am sorry that I missed it.

Senator Everett: It seems to me that, for instance, the underground newspaper will not appeal apparently, to the sort of people who are probably most going to influence the decisions regarding the disenfranchised and it seems to me that it begs the question to say that the newspapers should just include the underground press as part of their...

Mr. Goodis: Senator Everett, I was being facetious...

Senator Everett: My sense of humour is not well-developed this morning.

Mr. Goodis: Mine isn't so hot, either. How would you like to run this sketch from Harbinger in the Fredericton Gleaner.

The Chairman: We heard from Gratton O'Leary on that yesterday.

Mr. Goodis: I did not mean that.

Senator Everett: Well, I answered the question.

Mr. Goodis: That would drive the circulation—it would drive it down because so many people would have heart attacks when they see that thing, they would lose readers.

Mr. Fortier: Do you really believe that?

Mr. Goodis: No, I'm making a joke.

Mr. Fortier: Well, then my sense of humour may be a little—I had a longer night's sleep than Senator Everett.

Do you feel that there is such a thing as obscenity is a newspaper?

Mr. Goodis: Of course.

Mr. Fortier: Is there?

Mr. Goodis: Of course.

Mr. Fortier: All right then, what is your definition—not a legal definition—what is your concept of obscenity? Is that sketch obscene?

Mr. Goodis: Oh, sure.

Mr. Fortier: That is obscene?

Mr. Goodis: Oh, sure.

Senator Smith: It depends on how old you are.

Mr. Goodis: That is my concept of obscenity. That should happen in a bedroom not in the Fredericton Gleaner.

Mr. Fortier: Should it happen in the hippie press?

Mr. Goodis: My God, man, they are operating out of frustration. That's a lashing-out at us squares. They are doing it to debase us.

Mr. Fortier: Is the Playboy center-fold obscene, in your opinion?

Mr. Goodis: I get it every month. No, it's not.

Mr. Fortier: Fine, is there obviously a need—that the emergence of the hippie press—if I can have the attention of the Senators away from the center spread—that the emergence of the hippie press has responded to in society today.

Mr. Goodis: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: What is that need?

Mr. Goodis: It is called a voice.

Mr. Fortier: Should we let the hippie press fill that need or should the conscientious publishers of newspapers and magazines in Canada attempt to fill it?

Mr. Goodis: They should attempt to fill it.

Mr. Fortier: How?

Mr. Goodis: And then there would be no need for that kind of thing.

Mr. Fortier: Are there other ways...

Mr. Goodis: I am not a publisher—I am only an intern. I don't know.

Mr. Fortier: As an advertising man, would any one of your accounts accept to run some advertising in the hippie press?

Mr. Goodis: I probably would not recommend that they do.

Mr. Fortier: Why wouldn't you. There is a market there, why wouldn't you?

Mr. Goodis: Because I think that when you run an ad in something, a television show or a newspaper, what is around the ad reflects upon the advertiser.

Mr. Fortier: But there is such a thing as a market. There is such a thing as an area of consumers.

Mr. Goodis: I choose to go after young people in a different way for my clients. When my clients decide that my way is wrong, they will fire me. I would not recommend that any of my clients buy space in that publication.

Mr. Fortier: Then I suggest that you are speaking out against the flourishing of the hippie press, which you feel is in answer to a need which is being felt.

Why would you not try and convince your clients that by advertising in the hippie press they will help keep it alive. Why wouldn't you?

Mr. Goodis: I'm not so sure I want to help keep it alive.

Mr. Fortier: We are running around in circles.

Mr. Goodis: Why—where do I contradict myself?

Mr. Fortier: Well, I think that you have answered earlier or you have made the point that the hippie press is filling a need of some readers in the Canadian community and you say, "but I am not going to encourage my advertisers to advertise in the hippie press because that is not the medium that they should use."

But who is going to keep the hippie press alive?

Mr. Goodis: Well, somebody is. It is there. I haven't looked at the ads. Somebody is keeping it alive.

Mr. Fortier: As an advertising man, you don't feel it is your responsibility?

Mr. Goodis: No, of course not.

If you were my client, you made a product, and I came to you and said, "We are going to run a full page ad in the Harbinger, next to that sketch, would you let me?"

Mr. Fortier: Well, let's define product. If I...

Mr. Goodis: Coca-Cola.

Mr. Fortier: Coca-Cola? Yes, I would.

Mr. Goodis: You would?

Mr. Fortier: Yes, but I am not an advertising man as you obviously can tell.

Mr. Goodis: And I am not a publisher.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, Coca-Cola, sure, why not—headache pills?

Mr. Goodis: You know what, I think he is winning me over. Maybe it is not a bad idea. We could be a first. I think I will go to the Coca-Cola Company with that thing and suggest they run a full page ad and then probably get hung outside their main office for the idea. It's not a bad idea.

I think that's a side issue in my view. It really is. It is interesting that there is a paper currently being published and flourishing with no national advertisers. Is there a lesson in there for us?

And they say it like they feel it, want it with the four-letter words and the obscene, if you like, pictures and there it is, it is being published. Is there an idea for us there?

Mr. Fortier: Yes, you fear the conclusions, don't you?

Mr. Goodis: I sure do.

The Chairman: May I say to the Senators and the others that the underground press are coming before this Committee, I think on the tenth of March.

Mr. Goodis: Don't tell them what I said.

The Chairman: Perhaps we can pursue national advertising standards and suggest to them that they call on Mr. Goodis and other national advertisers.

We are going to hear Macleans magazine at eleven o'clock. I would like to adjourn for five minutes before we do, which means I would like to complete this particular session in about ten minutes.

I have a supplementary question from Senator Everett. I know Senator Prowse wanted to say something.

Senator Prowse: Let it go.

The Chairman: All right, then I have a supplementary question from Senator Everett, a question from Senator Hays and a question from Senator Beaubien.

Senator Beaubien: You can withdraw mine.

Senator Everett: Did you just say that you were concerned about the editorial material that surrounds an advertisement?

Mr. Goodis: Very much so.

Senator Everett: If you are concerned about it, and you are supposed to be the maverick of the advertising world, how can we ever change the situation that you refer to right in your brief here?

Mr. Goodis: Why don't you figure it out? I am not a member of this Committee. I have no idea. I am just a witness. You figure it out.

Senator Everett: You have no idea at all?

Mr. Goodis: No.

Senator Everett: Thanks.

Senator Hays: Mr. Goodis, do you think that there is such a thing as too much TV, too much radio, too much exposure, too much news, and so on? Do you think it affects our productivity?

I am thinking about my ranch. I can't get my bunkhouse cleaned if "Edge of Night" is on. If a baseball game is on, I can't get my foreman out... I can't get the people out.

Right across the fence from me, there are Hutterites beating me to death because they have no newspapers, they have no TV, they have radios. They farm better. They don't take the old age pension. They don't take the baby bonus. They don't ask for anything and they get along very well without any news.

Do you think that we can get too much of this sort of thing?

Mr. Goodis: No, I think that we have to... we are our own men, you know. We have to judge for ourselves when we, or our children, or our family have had quite enough.

When we have had enough, the guy next door hasn't had...

Senator Hays: Let me put it another way, does it affect education?

Mr. Goowis: Oh, yes.

Senator Hays: Does it prevent children from completing their university education?

Mr. Goodis: No.

Senator Hays: From completing their schooling or getting their homework done?

Mr. Goodis: I know of no cases like that.

The way it affects education is the way I have described it in my presentation.

I am curious that I have been questioned, incidentally, if I may, about a lot of things except the one thing that alarms me the most and that is the pollution of our culture by the influx of American TV.

I don't think we ought to dictate how many hours a television and radio station ought to broadcast, except as they are now dictated by the laws we have. Some radio stations run twenty-four hours a day, and that is all right with me. Who is to say how much is too much.

The Chairman: I just have one last question. Do any of the Senators have questions?

You mentioned in your brief a classmate of mine, Norman Jewison.

Do you honestly think that any of the Canadian media could pay enough money for people like Jewison and some of the others you mentioned to return to Canada.

In other words, are you realistic in your suggestion that we can compete with the Americans when it comes to cash on the barrelhead?

Mr. Goodis: I think we have no choice. I think we must find ways and I heard a good idea from Senator Hays on the question of licensing.

We must find ways of employing these people. Why should we roll over and play dead and lose these people to another country. It is criminal.

Realistic? Yes, it is realistic. The government will have to help. Citizens will have to help. Advertisers will have to help but there must be a way of building a Canadian broadcasting community with the best talent that is available anywhere and that is us.

If we don't start, it is going to be too late.

The Chairman: Thank you. Are there any other questions?

If not, Mr. Goodis, on behalf of the Committee I would certainly like to thank you for a viewpoint which was refreshing, which was forthright and which was, perhaps not exactly the kind of a presentation we might have expected from an agency president.

However, as has been apparent prior to your presentation and in your presentation this morning, you say what is on your own mind.

I think the document you have prepared will be a valuable addition to our collection.

Mr. Goodis: Thank you.

The Chairman: Senators, we will adjourn until eleven o'clock.

The Chairman: If I may call this session to order—we have received a brief from Maclean's and Le Magazine Maclean.

Seated on my immediate right is the publisher of both magazines, Mr. Gerry Brander and seated on Mr. Brander's immediate right is Mr. Ronald McEachern, who was here last week and who as you know, is the Executive Vice-President of Maclean-Hunter Ltd.

On my immediate left is Mr. Peter Gzowski, who is the editor of Maclean's Magazine and seated next to Mr. Gzowski is Mr. Jean Sisto, who is editor of Le Magazine Maclean.

Mr. Brander, the brief was received some three weeks in advance in compliance with our request. It has been circulated to the Senators. It has presumably been examined by them.

We would like to have from you an opening oral statement which could take as much as fifteen minutes. It need not take that amount of time. You can explain, amplify or comment on your brief. By all means, you can talk on other matters which aren't contained in your brief, and then we can turn to the questioning period.

The questioning, as you know from having been here before, will be on the contents of your brief and on other matters.

I understand you wish to use at least part of your fifteen minute opening oral statement to allow Mr. McEachern to say just a word or two in opening as well.

Mr. Brander: Thank you.

Mr. Chairman, Honorable Senators, ladies and gentlemen. As you know, I am F. G. Brander, publisher of Maclean's Magazine and Le Magazine Maclean and with me today are Mr. Peter Gzowski, editor of Maclean's and Mr. Jean Sisto, editor of Le Magazine Maclean.

In addition, Mr. Ronald A. McEachern, executive Vice-President of Maclean-Hunter Ltd. is present as he has executive responsibility for Maclean-Hunter magazines.

As you pointed out, Senator, I was privileged to be present as a spectator during the Maclean-Hunter appearance last week and am thus well aware that any basic questions concerning Maclean's were discussed at that time and at some length.

With respect to my own magazines, this hearing might be regarded as a continuation of that earlier appearance.

We are here as a magazine group and hope to be helpful.

I do not intend to take your time with a lengthy introduction or report detail which has already been delivered in our written presentation.

However, I would emphasize that Maclean's is a general magazine of large circulation. It is published in two editions, English and French. Its editorial purpose is, very simply "For and about Canada". Its specialty is Canada.

Both Maclean's and Le Magazine Maclean have their own editorial staff. The editor of each magazine operates within his own editorial budget and decides suitable content for his particular magazine.

Through the process of practical and acceptable collaboration between editors, the editorial resources of the English edition are available to the French editor. Similarly, features developed by the French edition are available to the English editor.

Each editor has a highly professional and appropriate staff. In addition to staff, the editors use the service of free-lance writers, illustrators and photographers.

You have heard some reference to the difficulties encountered in the publishing of a profitable magazine in this country. While it has not been easy, I am proud to say that operating within the ground rules of the last decade, Maclean's and Le Magazine Maclean have made considerable progress.

Maclean's has taken bold steps to meet the challenge of rising costs and increased competition.

There have been major changes such as frequency, format and printing methods. We are constantly seeking more effective and economical processes and doing everything possible to publish viable magazines.

Both readers and advertisers have applauded our innovations. These magazines have taken initiative in developing profitable subsidiary activities through the sale of compatible books, records, maps, educational courses. These are sold through the magazine and through mail order lists. There is a wide response to books dealing with the Canadian Heritage.

In particular, I would remind the Senators that Maclean-Hunter has continued to publish Maclean's over the years because of the firm belief that at this time, perhaps more so than at any other time in our history, Canada needs a positive, unifying force which will help to hold this country together as one strong nation.

Maclean's and Le Magazine Maclean are vital in this role.

Mr. McEachern: Very briefly, may I bring back into perspective some facts and realities which may have become distorted and unreal in a recent hearing before this Committee.

As the representative of Maclean-Hunter, I am very glad to hear of the high regard in which our big magazines are held and of the great things expected from them.

May I bring back into your mind some of the things that have occurred in the past ten years.

It was during the last decade that television got into its full stride as a colossal consumer of the viewer's time and of the advertising dollar. During that period, a few of the better daily newspapers moved into the traditional role of the magazines as the interpreters and backgrounders on major public and social issues.

During that period, tabloid magazine-style stuffers were introduced into weekend editions of major daily newspapers across this country.

These became very major consumers of available magazine advertising dollars.

Now, all of those developments meant that our magazines lived in a completely new climate. Our survival depended on our adaptability to change, on our readiness to change, and our success in making the right kind of change.

The very large Canadian audiences were rapidly moving towards new styles of life, new values, new tastes. Certainly, if we had continued to produce mass magazines of the kind we did ten years ago, they would have been irrelevant to all but a small and elderly group of people who like the realities of a Canada as it used to be.

One test of how magazines cope with change and their success in doing so is circulation. For both Maclean's and Chatelaine, circulations today are at least 50 per cent higher than they were five years ago. Newsstand sales for both of them are about double what they were about five years ago. Both Maclean's and Chatelaine now have French language counterparts, and those French language editions are by far the biggest Canadian circulation magazines in the Province of Quebec.

It used to be difficult and expensive for our magazines to get and hold subscribers. For many long miserable years, our circulation expenses were greater than our circulation revenue. That is no longer the case. Now, we have a most agreeable circulation surplus and there are some big name publishers of mass circulation publications who very greatly envy us in this regard.

So, by the hard test of the market place, the mass audiences for our magazines are giving us a very big vote of confidence—a bigger vote of confidence than they have in a quarter century.

A second point, the Canadian population has been getting younger. The proportion who can read has grown greatly in the younger ages and has declined in the older ages.

Now, most certainly, our magazines are being created with younger people very much in mind. Of course, we want to interest the broad spectrum of Canadian life, the old, the middle-aged and the young, but a good deal of the reading content is designed specifically to serve the interests of the young.

Ten years ago, it may have been that our magazines appealed too much to the older segment of our population and too much to those with leisure and a nineteenth century cast of mind, but we have very valid professional and business reasons for taking the position that we must in carrying out our public responsibilities, have vitality and value for the young people of this country.

They are our main audience for tomorrow and I think it is more important to have some good effects on the minds and hearts of young Canadians than it is to worry too much about the other Canadians.

In doing so, I regret that some of our older readers may not be enraptured with some of our content but the fact is that the mass audiences for our big magazines approve and like the kind of magazine now being produced better than they ever did before. Remember that our circulation figures for a country of Canada's size are very large.

Our editorial content has to be of interest and value to a very wide variety of people, not just a specialized few.

My third and final point is this. Let no man impugn the strength and sincerity of our company's concern for the welfare of the future of our country.

I regret that the president of our company, and its chief shareholder, has been extremely ill and is not well enough to be here and speak to you himself about the matter that has come up. I may point out that he has not sold out. He is sticking around to cope with his problems.

Our company has paid an extremely high price indeed, and I mean high price and a very large amount of dollars for its conviction that it has been performing a useful piece of public service in publishing a completely Canadian mass magazine.

As I said when I appeared here a week ago, our big magazines went through an extremely painful period of readjustment created by television and other developments of the past ten years. Those new facts of life deeply affected every publisher in the western world.

However, we are putting our money where our mouth is. The present financial position of our big magazines is much better than it was some years ago. Our economic health is improving, but so far, despite very inadequate earnings, it has been the deliberate decision of our President and Directors that we would continue these operations. The important reason for that decision is that we believe we have and do and will serve a useful public service in Canada.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. McEachern and Mr. Brander.

I think Mr. Fortier, you have the first question.

Mr. Fortier: I would like to direct it, Mr. Chairman, to Mr. Gzowski.

Mr. Gzowski, why did you ask for the job?

Mr. Gzowski: Because I think any journalist of any worth, in this country, aspires to the editorship of Maclean's, which is Canada's pre-eminent magazine, and I thought I could do it.

Mr. Fortier: Tell us, Mr. Gzowski, back in October, 1964 you had some pretty harsh words to direct at Maclean's magazine and its executive Vice-Président, Mr. Ronald A. McEachern, in the Canadian Forum.

Mr. Gzowski: I thought they were mildly funny.

Mr. Fortier: I enjoyed the article.

You said, "The appointment of R. A. McEachern, as executive vice-president in charge of magazines was the beginning of the end". Then you went on to say (I don't think that's funny)—you went on to say, "anyone who would have expected him to keep his hands off the editorial direction of Maclean's would have been out of his mind. When the interference grew steadily more evident, Ken Lefolli felt there was implicit mistrust of his judgment. He resigned" followed by different people, including you.

Then you concluded: "Probably our six resignations will help to make it a little better for a while than it might have been. But it can't be as good as when they let the editors do the editing."

The Committee would like your comments on these particular extracts which are not entirely fair since I have taken them out of context, but we would like to hear from you. Are you doing the editing right now at Maclean's, or is Mr. McEachern?

Mr. Gzowski: I am doing it, Mr. Fortier and Senators. I am doing it within the bounds that are normally prescribed around the editorship of any publication. Perhaps they are broader at Maclean's than they are anywhere else but in answer to your specific question, I am doing the editing.

Mr. Fortier: What guarantees of editorial independence do you have that Mr. Templeton did not have or Mr. Lefolli did not have?

Mr. Gzowski: Well, I have no contract and I have no great formal undertaking, to dismiss that possibility.

Mr. McEachern, Mr. Brander, Mr. Hunter and other executives of Maclean's and I sat down at some length and discussed both sides of what was a very complex and I might say, overpublicized difficulty between the editors of Macleans in the past and management in the past.

This is a thing that I am always somewhat bemused by, the delight newspapers leap onto it with.

We have discussed both sides of this, and I think we have reached a mutual understanding that the editor does the editing and the executive Vice-President does the executive Vice-Presiding and the Publisher does the publishing.

I think the strongest answer I can give, or the most meaningful answer I can give to what is implicit in your question is that in the time that I have been there as editor, since October, 1969, I have had no quarrels with Maclean-Hunter management and to my knowledge they have no quarrels with me. That is all that is important to me.

The Chairman: Just a supplementary question, Mr. Fortier.

When you say, Mr. Gzowski, that these things are over-publicized, have you not contributed substantially to that very publicity with the article which appeared in the Forum and in particular, as I mentioned last week to Mr. McEachern when he was here, and your Friday night radio program on CBC, the night that Charles Templeton resigned?

I think you devoted the entire—almost an hour...

Mr. Gzowski: Not quite.

The Chairman: Certainly, fifty minutes.

Mr. Gzowski: No, I think around fifteen or twenty, but it may have seemed like an hour to many people who were listening.

Senator, if your idea of contributing to wide coverage is writing an article for the Canadian Forum, six months after the fact, it differs somewhat from mine.

I wrote the piece in the Forum, actually in some sort of reaction to the vast amount of publicity that had been given in the daily press and in Time Magazine, where I felt the issues were not understood and at some point I wanted it, for my sake and for the other people who were involved, to be written as we saw it (as the editors saw it) and the Forum seemed a good place to put it on record. I didn't get any money for this or anything.

The Chairman: How about the CBC program?

Mr. Gzowski: The CBC program, Templeton's resignation was an issue of the day and the CBC program on which I was then working, and still work, attempts to deal with issues of the day.

We examined it and I interviewed Mr. McEachern publicly, and Mr. Templeton publicly, but that program runs for six hours, Senator, and we devoted certainly less than half an hour to it, so I don't think we are playing it up as much as some others.

I'm delighted that you listened to that.

The Chairman: I listen to it every week. I think it's a very good program, very timely and very topical, but I thought you leapt on that particular incident rather quickly. I was delighted that you did. It was a very enjoyable piece of radio broadcasting.

Mr. Fortier: Did Mr. Templeton, in your opinion, over-emphasize his reasons for his resignation last September?

Mr. Gzowski: One man's over-emphasis is another man's rational act, but not to dodge your question, I would consider that sending carbon copies of one's letter of resignation for release at a specific date might be—is some kind of over-emphasis, yes. It is a curious way to behave.

Mr. Fortier: You're a professional journalist, and a very good one in Canada. You knew of Mr. Templeton's differences. You lived through some difficult times at Maclean's prior to leaving with Ken Le Folli and others in 1964.

Did you ask for any assurances from management when you sought the position of editor-in-chief of Maclean's Magazine, and if so, did you receive them?

Did you ask for any assurance of editorial independence, call it what you want to, you know what I mean?

Mr. Gzowski: Yes, I think the best answer is that we discussed it at some length and I think they knew my position which had not been a secret one, because of radio programs and the Canadian Forum. I certainly knew theirs. We weren't dealing with strangers.

We had long discussions, but they were more informal than would be implied by asking for assurances and things.

I think the air had been cleared substantially by events of that unfortunate time. I think that perhaps things were redefined slightly.

Mr. Fortier: I think these questions are very important from the point of view of your readers. Your readers are aware of as we say, Mr. Templeton's well-publicized reasons for resigning and also the Lefolli incident of some six years ago, so this is why I ask them.

Hence this one. Were you told, Mr. Gzowski, "Whatever may have happened in the past, it won't happen again because we are changing this or I am changing that or I am not overseeing this anymore"?

Mr. Gzowski: I think any answer I give you will sound woolly because there is no formal assurance of that kind, but implicitly I think there is a sense of redefinition of function.

I am obviously answering these questions with some awkwardness...

The Chairman: I think you are answering them very well.

Mr. Gzowski: Well, I feel I am answering them with some awkwardness because we are talking about a specific situation which in my opinion has been resolved eminently satisfactorily, so to try to draw some general conclusions out of them provides some kind of awkwardness, I think.

To me, there is one central issue. Am I the editor of Maclean's or am I not?

Mr. Fortier: Are you?

Mr. Gzowski: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Are you free to pursue in depth any topic which in your editorial wisdom you feel may be of interest to your readers, and I do stress the "any".

Mr. Gzowski: I would think so.

Let me back up or return to "Am I the editor". Mr. McEachern was asked that—you are very good at reading from other magazines to people—and he was asked about the "editor-in-chief" in Time and my understanding of his answer, with which I don't agree at all, is that to some extent he is the "editor-in-chief". We don't have anyone called that on the masthead. He is the executive vice-president.

Decisions that I make are obviously answerable through him to management of Maclean-Hunter.

I am not free to put my wife's banners—you know, to do things that are reprehensible by common standards of journalism, but I think that Mr. McEachern and I understand standards of journalism and pretty well generally the same terms.

Maclean-Hunter and I do, the same way.

So, am I totally free? I am certainly as free as any other editor I know and substantially more than most.

Mr. Fortier: Are you as free as Robert Fulford is, to use four-letter words if you see fit?

Mr. Gzowski: I don't know, because I don't think they would be fitting in Maclean's, although I'm one of the people that has used them in Saturday Night, as a matter of fact. They are kind of fun to write.

Mr. Fortier: And to say?

Mr. Gzowski: And to say.

Mr. Fortier: Given the appeal that Mr. McEachern has underlined earlier in his oral remarks to the youth of today and given the emergence of what you have referred to as underground newspapers, hippie press and so on, do you feel that Maclean's Magazine has a role to play in Canada for readers of the Georgia Strait and Logos?

Mr. Gzowski: Yes, I certainly feel it has. I hope it has. If I felt free to occupy an hour of your time to describe the magazine's job, that would be one of them.

The Chairman: Take five minutes.

Mr. Gzowski: Well, I think it is very important and Maclean's is one of the central places to do it—to provide a kind of bridge between, if you like, the establishment, (a word that has been tossed around here this morning and probably will be throughout your hearing, as it has been before, but I am not prepared to define it and I wonder if other users of it are) on the one hand, for the sake of a better word, the establishment, and on the other hand, for the sake of a better word, the hippies. The disenfranchised is a more satisfactory one.

I would hope that Maclean's Magazine would provide a kind of meeting place for the ideas that they hold in common. This is one of the things that we have instituted in the magazine very recently. We have a guy writing under one section whom we call "our token radical" and I am happy with that choice of words because we are not saying that we endorse Bob Bossin's point of view, which we feel is worth listening to and we feel that the other end of the spectrum is equally worth listening to. We hope that in Maclean's, which is a magazine which takes its contents seriously, and I hope publishes them responsibly, that we can provide a meeting place for both sides of the over-cliche-ed "generation gap" or whatever it is.

So, I think Maclean's has an enormous role, among other things, to get through to young people and say that older people have something worth while to say to them, as I feel that it has a role in getting through to older people and saying that the disenfranchised, the young, the angry, the hippies, or whatever, the love children are not totally the unwashed, stupid, illiterate people that they are often regarded as being.

Mr. Fortier: Have these people been neglected in the daily press of Canada?

Mr. Gzowski: Well, in one sense, I think they have been neglected in that nobody takes them very seriously but in another sense they have been highly underneglected.

Certainly, every mal-adventure they get into is over-reported by everyone and people have an unfortunate image of them, but I think people get—Mr. Goodis in his earlier comments certainly got onto one track here—that all too often their views are filtered through the minds of reporters, who, not through any establishmentarian fault of their own, but just because they are human and fallible as anyone else, don't really explain the young people's point of view; so I think they are neglected in that sense if you want to make a generalization.

Mr. Fortier: In recent issues of Maclean's you seem to have discontinued editorials, and I am reminded of a section in your brief.

The brief speaks of the "magazine's special function to interpret Canada to Canadians."

Given this discontinuation of editorials in the last few issues, has there not been material for editorial comment? Is there nothing to say? Can you explain it to the Committee?

Mr. Gzowski: Yes, there has been a great deal to say, but I have not chosen to say it as editor.

I think the editorial in a monthly magazine is a fairly curious, and I would say, disappearing fact of journalistic life. It is the engraved tablet being issued from on high, once a month.

As editor, I do not feel blessed with special wisdom on the fourteenth day of every month, when I can issue a dictum of interest to four million readers.

What I have attempted to replace that official editorial with, is a kind of forum, which we have labeled "In our view and yours", and I am suggesting by that, that we endorse some of the views, many of them written by our own staff.

If I do meet a burning bush on my way down to University and Dundas some morning, I would be delighted to contribute to that forum myself and sign it, but the unsigned editorial as the great, revealed truth is slightly passe in the kind of journalism that I am interested in. I am just not that interested in my own editorial ideas.

The second point, if I may just dwell on it a moment, I think that many parts of the magazine that we are attempting to put out are fulfilling in a different way the original function of the editorial.

We did a whole takeout in "Canada Report"—we called it "The heartening surge of a new Canadian nationalism". At the top of that in display type, we said (I can't quote it) but we said to the effect that we happened to endorse this as a magazine. We endorse it very strongly.

Now, this was six pages which I think is a certain kind of editorial. We said, we want to fan the flames of this nationalism. We believe in it, but it happens that I wasn't a contributor. Other people had better things to say about that than I did.

Mr. Fortier: I would like to direct some questions to Mr. Sisto.

The Chairman: Yes, I should perhaps alert the Senators that this probably will be in French and we have simultaneous interpretation, if you wish.

Mr. Fortier: That is why I made the announcement.

The Chairman: Thank you, yes.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Sisto, you have been with Le Magazine Maclean since the end of 1969, have you not? You heard the comments exchanged earlier between your colleague, Mr. Gzowski, and myself. To what extent are you in Montreal dependent on the head office in Toronto?

Mr. Jean Sisto, Editor, Le Magazine Maclean: I think I am dependent in the same way as he. That is, I am editor-in-chief of the magazine; as far as its editorial content is concerned, I have the last word. So far, at least, I have never had a problem in that area.

Mr. Fortier: You haven't had one?

Mr. Sisto: No.

Mr. Fortier: I remember that in late 1960 and early 1961, when Le Magazine Maclean was launched, it was the company's intention that it should be an original magazine with its own articles and editorials, etc. You doubtless recall the subsequent incident in the fall of 1969, when the other Mr. Cardinal, as I call him, left Le Magazine Maclean for reasons that were very well publicized at the time. That is, they had been asked to make Le Magazine Maclean a simple translation, for all practical purposes, of Maclean's Magazine. When you agreed to become editor-in-chief, Mr. Sisto, did you ask yourself for any assurance regarding your editorial independence? Did you request that Le Magazine Maclean should not be a mere translation of Maclean's Magazine?

Mr. Sisto: That is what I requested. That was the first point to be discussed. The result was an editorial signed by Mr. Brander in the January issue which, of course for that issue, there was no one else left to do it. So it is obviously a translation. He says that the magazine will not be a translation, and there is no question of it.

Mr. Fortier: Do you...perhaps this is a question I should ask Mr. Brander. But do you know why this policy of September, 1969, was radically revised a few months later? Do you wish to answer or...?

Mr. Sisto: No, I would prefer him to answer. I was not there at the time...

[Text]

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Brander, my question to Mr. Sisto, which he readily says should be directed to you was, how do you explain this change in policy from September, 1969 until the time that Mr. Sisto joined Le Magazine Maclean?

Briefly, it was announced in September, 1969 that Le Magazine Maclean would be, to all intents and purposes, a French translation of Maclean's and Mr. Sisto says that he agreed to become editor-in-chief of Le Magazine Maclean on condition that it be anything but that. How do you explain this change over a period of a very few months? What led to the one decision, and then what led to the second?

Mr. Brander: There never was an announcement that Le Magazine would become a translation in French of the English. This was an incorrect assumption that was widely distributed and misquoted. It was certainly attributed to Monsieur Cardinal in the general press, and in the Province of Quebec. On the point of Mr. Cardinal's statement or feeling, I can only say this, that in a general review of our operations, which took place last year in a quite customary fashion, we reviewed some of our original objectives for the magazines, both French and English.

We reminded ourselves that very rarely, if ever, in the past year had there been adaptations, not translations, from the English into French for Le Magazine Maclean and at that time the group of editors, both French and English, sat down together and agreed that there were some topics where basic research and data could be shared usefully and there were some articles which were quite appropriate for both audiences and the question was put, in assessing our role for the forthcoming year and forthcoming month and in looking at some of our expenditures and our general operations, could we not move more closely together.

This was the suggestion put to Mr. Cardinal. It was never finalized. It was never discussed past this point and in an unfortunate set of circumstances, Mr. Cardinal rather quickly stated, I think in an impromptu fashion, that Le Magazine Maclean in future was to be a translation in major part, but not in whole, of Maclean's. That is a statement that I think he later regretted and I think in one form or another has later retracted.

Mr. Fortier: This sort of prise de conscience or realization which was expressed to Mr. Cardinal and which led to his departure together with that of very well-known members of his team, has it changed at all?

Mr. Brander: Has the operation of the magazine changed at all from the operation, as it existed during Mr. Cardinal's editorship and, let us say, previous editors?

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Brander: The editorial performance of Le Magazine Maclean today is exactly as it was established in the beginning, some ten years ago, where, subject to the editor's decision, material is adapted from the English magazine into the French and vice versa, so that you will have an issue of Le Magazine Maclean, such as the current issue, when there will be perhaps one or two articles which began, if you like, in the English copy which had been adapted into French.

Generally speaking, the content of this issue and subsequent earlier issues is original.

This is a two-way street, and as I said in my opening remarks, this is the choice of the editor.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Gzowski, when was the last time—I realize you have only been there for a short time—but has there been an instance in recent months since you have been editor of Maclean's, where you have used an article which appeared first in Le Magazine.

Mr. Gzowski: Nothing that has been published yet—there is one scheduled.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Sisto, to what extent do you co-operate with Mr. Gzowski, for example?

Mr. Sisto: First of all, we...

Mr. Fortier: Or vice versa?

Mr. Sisto: First of all, we have monthly meetings to determine what line we shall take, what we might work on together, what he might use of what I am able to produce, and vice versa. This kind of co-operation is difficult, of course, because it has never been done before.

Mr. Fortier: This was not done in the past?

Mr. Sisto: Not to my knowledge. We are really looking for ways of co-operating more and more closely on subjects that are of interest both to English Canada and to French Canada; there is an example in our May issue, which contains a rather sensational article on the danger inherent in Canada's selling her water to the United States. I felt it as a very important article, as much for Quebec as for Ontario and Alberta. So we ran it.

Mr. Fortier: When you decide to run an article like that, do you have to ask someone's permission?

Mr. Sisto: Absolutely not. When we arrive at these monthly meetings with Mr. Brander and Mr. McEachern, we tell them what we are going to have in our next two or three issues.

Mr. Fortier: Are you satisfied, do you endorse—when I say "you", I include you and your staff in the term—do you endorse the aims set out in your brief, the brief from Maclean's Magazine.

"Maclean's is for and about Canada". Then its specialty is Canada and it should be a unifying force to keep the country together."

Mr. Gzowski: Its specialty is Canada.

Mr. Fortier: Do all the members of your staff endorse that learned statement of principle?

Mr. Sisto: I would be very surprised.

Mr. Fortier: Do you feel called upon to acquaint yourself with the political opinions of your editorial assistants, contributors, etc.?

Mr. Sisto: No.

Mr. Fortier: No?

Mr. Sisto: What I try to assess is the work they do for me; I don't concern myself with their political ideas.

Mr. Fortier: Have you received any directives from Toronto on this subject?

Mr. Sisto: None.

Mr. Fortier: None. Do you think—with regard to that passage in the company's brief—do you think that it is one of the responsibilities of Le Magazine Maclean to encourage the survival of Canada in her present form?

Mr. Sisto: I believe that our duty, as the staff of the magazine, is to reflect Quebec society. Whether the reflection leads us towards a united Canada or not will be decided by the people. I personally have no special mission to defend Canada. I try to publish a range of opinions so that people may make up their own minds, but I have no special mission, nor have I undertaken one.

Mr. Fortier: For example, in your February, 1970, issue, there is a Gilles Lesage interview with Jérôme Proulx. If Mr. Flamand, say, finally decided to become a Créditiste as well, would you send one of your correspondents to meet him and get an interview like that?

Mr. Sisto: Probably, yes.

Mr. Fortier: And if Mr. Wagner decided to join the Union Nationale, in order to cover the story—to what extent, you say that you are trying to present your readers with a reflection of Quebec society—a statement I can but endorse. To what extent do you think Le Magazine Maclean provides its readers with a reflection of Canadian society? I do not want you to turn to your right before answering.

Mr. Gzowski: That is not his right, Sir.

Mr. Sisto: To be accurate, I do not know. From what I am able to deduce, English Canada is also in search of an identity, and it certainly helps it to find one. From English Canadians I know, from my own experience and from what I read, I believe it is certainly a problem in English Canada, to find a reason for Canada's existence.

Mr. Fortier: Does Mr. Gzowski—I am going to ask him the question in a moment. Does Mr. Gzowski depend on you for articles on Quebec, or does he have his own staff? Perhaps I should ask him?

Mr. Sisto: "Depend" is not the word. I think it is precisely in this area that collaboration would take place.

Mr. Fortier: Does this collaboration exist, Mr. Gzowski?

Mr. Gzowski: Collaboration in the sense that we discuss them—but they are not assigned from Toronto.

Mr. Fortier: If you are pursuing a certain topic, a certain subject, and if you would like a French point of view...a Quebec point of view...do you go to your colleague, or would you send a member of your Toronto team to Quebec?

Does collaboration go to that extent that you would ask, for example, Mr. Sisto, would you please get me an article on this or would you please...

Mr. Gzowski: Well, no, I would not call that collaboration. I would call that direction, and he is running a magazine and we are running a magazine, but there are many places where they would fit together and the collaboration is the important word.

We might very well have an article on...the one on water that Jean mentioned was done previously to his incumbency, but in a case like that, if we wanted a Quebec file, because we knew he was going to use it, we might very well ask him if he could possibly supply us with something there rather than using an independent stringer of our own.

The one sense that it would be wrong is that we don't issue any orders or ask for things in that sense. It is all by agreement. It is consensus.

Mr. Fortier: In Quebec, Mr. Sisto, whom do you regard, which medium do you regard as the competitor of Le Magazine Maclean?

Mr. Sisto: Probably, Réalité.

Mr. Fortier: Réalité. Is Sept Jours a major competitor for you?

Mr. Sisto: No.

Mr. Fortier: Are there any others?

Mr. Sisto: Monthly magazines, no.

Mr. Fortier: Do you regard television as a competitor?

Mr. Sisto: Of course, there are the CBC public affairs programme, after all, as well as the supplements produced each week by Le Devoir and La Presse and, to some extent, the Montreal Star, which also has some French Canadians among its readers.

Mr. Fortier: A supplementary question for Mr. Sisto, Mr. Chairman. We have heard

Senator Everett and Mr. Gzowski discussing the difficulties faced by a daily paper in becoming established in a community where there are other papers already in operation. You were with La Presse for nine years, and during those nine years, the Nouveau Journal experiment took place; as you know, it had not $450,000, but millions of dollars, and it only lasted four, five or six months. Then there was Pierre Péladeau's Le Journal de Montréal, which became established in a short time...a circulation of 40 or 50,000 copies, I think it is...and which is still being published. How do you explain the fact that in Montreal, the Nouveau Journal, with all the money at its disposal, did not succeed, and Pierre Péladeau did succeed with Le Journal de Montréal?

Mr. Sisto: I think it was really because of their respective production costs. When the Nouveau Journal ceased publication, its circulation was about 40 or 50,000 copies. Obviously, if their costs had been the same as those of Le Journal de Montréal, they would have kept going too. Le Journal de Montréal is produced using fairly slender resources, while the staff of the Nouveau Journal was almost as large as that of La Presse.

Mr. Fortier: You think they aimed too high to begin with?

Mr. Sisto: Aimed too high to begin with, yes. Or again, they would have needed enough money to keep going for some years before the paper became self-supporting.

Mr. Fortier: How do you explain the Le Journal de Montréal phenomenon? It is one of the few instances in Canada, not just in Montreal, in which someone has managed to bring out a newspaper in competition with other well-established papers, and done so with such success.

Mr. Sisto: Well for one thing, Le Journal de Montréal was helped somewhat by the fact that La Presse did not appear for a period of seven months.

Mr. Fortier: That gave them some momentum.

Mr. Sisto: Secondly, a newspaper published by a conglomerate, as it were...they already have the printing facilities, and a good number of journalists working for the 36 papers in the chain. So their production costs, for one thing were certainly nothing like those of the Nouveau Journal or La Presse, or even Montréal-Matin.

Mr. Fortier: There are no other definitive explanations you could offer us?

Mr. Sisto: A probable explanation is that there was a market for a newspaper of that kind, with news highlights, court news...

Mr. Fortier: Sport?

Mr. Sisto: Sports.

Mr. Fortier: However, with regard to news highlights, court news and sports, it seems to me that Montréal-Matin, which is in direct competition with Le Journal de Montréal, covers them fairly well, after all?

Mr. Sisto: I agree with you completely. I don't fully understand it myself. I really wonder why it is that Le Journal de Montréal is still coming out.

Mr. Fortier: An interesting phenomenon.

Who is your main competitor, Mr. Gzowski, in Canada?

Mr. Gzowski: Competitor in what sense?

Mr. Fortier: Let's look at it from the reader point of view.

Mr. Gzowski: Oh, my God—the world.

Mr. Fortier: Your main competitor—given the products that you are offering for sale to Canadians.

Mr. Gzowski: The reader's attention?

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Gzowski: I don't know. You almost have to boil it down to an article because we are a spectrum...

Mr. Fortier: As a package.

Mr. Gzowski: As a package for the reader's time, I just don't think I can answer that. An easy answer might be Time, but they are a weekly news magazine—an American weekly news magazine.

Mr. Fortier: You don't consider Time Magazine published in Canada as a Canadian magazine?

Mr. Gzowski: It has a few Canadian pages.

Mr. Fortier: Would you term it a Canadian magazine?

Mr. Gzowski: I would term it a Canadian edition of an American magazine.

Mr. Fortier: Senator O'Leary, yesterday, when he appeared before this Committee, had this to say, and I am reading from the Globe and Mail report which I think is quite accurate.

Mr. Gzowski: About Time being the best magazine in Canada?

Mr. Fortier: That's right. I want to get—"I am not sure that Time magazine is not the best Canadian magazine we have". Would you care to comment on that?

Mr. Gzowski: Just before I do, I wonder if you would care to read where Senator O'Leary said that Macleans has gotten very much better in the last couple of months, if you are going to read from Senator O'Leary.

Mr. Fortier: We will come to that in a moment.

Mr. Gzowski: I think that Senator O'Leary was right on the one I just quoted and I suggest he is wrong on the other one, much as I respect Senator O'Leary.

Mr. Fortier: Are you in a competitive position—is Macleans Magazine in a competitive position vis-a-vis Time Magazine?

Mr. Gzowski: That is why I asked you in what sense—if you are talking about the reader's time, I would say, sure. We are in competition with numbers and numbers of other things from television to the supplements to the daily newspapers, to American magazines. Sports Illustrated competes with us when we have a good hockey piece, so I don't think...

Mr. Fortier: All special interest magazines as opposed general interest magazines?

Mr. Gzowski: Well, I think we are a special interest magazine.

Mr. Fortier: Your special interest being Canada?

Mr. Gzowski: Yes, it is a very important concept.

Mr. Fortier: Canada is a very general notion.

Mr. Gzowski: Sports are a pretty generalized idea too, but people put out specialized magazines about that. Television is pretty general, too, and so on. I think Canada is a lot more definable than some of those.

Mr. Fortier: Do you think that Time has an edge over Macleans in seeking out readers and advertisers. Let's lump them together, and if so, why?

Mr. Gzowski: First of all, let us not lump them together. I think it has an edge in seeking out readers for a news magazine because it is faster and it has the resources of an enormous world-wide network behind it, and whatever one thinks of Time Magazine, it is extremely good at what it does.

One of the things I don't think it does very well is be a Canadian magazine but it is a very good weekly news magazine and getting better. It is getting almost as good as Newsweek. We are not a news magazine, so we are not competing with them.

As for advertising dollars, we are into another argument...

Mr. Fortier: Should Newsweek be given the same privileges which Time and Reader's Digest were given by the Canadian Government, as it is such a good magazine?

Mr. Gzowski: Please, no, Mr. Fortier, Senators, and Senator Davey.

The Chairman: I was going to ask Mr. Gzowski a supplementary question.

Would you comment as an editor on the Canadian section of Time?

Mr. Gzowski: May I comment on it as a reader?

The Chairman: Of course, yes.

Mr. Gzowski: Because, editorially I think they do very well.

The Chairman: As a reader, then.

Mr. Gzowski: I don't read Time for the Canadian content, and I doubt if very many people do. I read Time for many other things but I can get by without their coverage of the Canadian news.

Editorially, I respect it, but there are several magazines in the world I respect but don't find it necessary to read.

The Chairman: You don't think that the Canadian news section of Time sometimes puts certain Canadian events into the kind of perspective which is lacking in the daily newspapers.

Mr. Gzowski: Oh, I think it occasionally does. It puts them into perspective but I live in Toronto, which is extremely well served by a daily press and which does put things into perspective and I very seldom learn anything, or get a special perspective, to use your words, Senator, from Time Magazine.

I think they do a fine job, but in four pages, I wouldn't attempt to cover Canada every week, or five, or six pages.

Mr. Fortier: Why is there not a magazine that attempts to cover Canada every week. Why is there not a national Canadian magazine.

Mr. Gzowski: There is a Canadian national magazine.

Mr. Fortier: But not published every week.

Mr. Gzowski: No, I think the economics are simply against it.

As someone who have spent some time looking at budgets of possible magazines as well as some extant ones, I would not attempt under current conditions to start a Canadian news magazine, nor would I invest in one.

Mr. Fortier: With your feel, and your deep sense of journalism, is there a need for a weekly Canadian magazine, if the economic problems could be settled?

Mr. Gzowski: It would not hurt. I don't feel my keen—and what was the other flattering adjective—I do not feel a great, crying need for it, but it would be a very useful supplement to what is going on now. If one existed, I would be very happy to see one exist.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Brander, at the end of your brief, you say

"In our view, Canada needs more national periodicals as well as the encouragement of those presently published."

Would you please explain what you mean by this, "encouragement of those presently published".

Mr. Brander: I don't mean anything specific in the sense of making precise recommendations or asking for anything that we don't have. I suggest that the best way that magazines that operate in Canada today can be encouraged is to understand them, be interested in them, and then leave them alone to pursue their own destiny—nothing more than that.

Mr. Fortier: The sentence certainly lends itself to more than what you have just said, but you are repeating what you said last week, Mclean-Hunter is not asking for anything.

Mr. Brander: No, I deplore a general indifference sometimes to what good magazines are accomplishing and as a generality sometimes, to me, there is appalling ignorance, if you will, of some of the content of our issues.

In my own case, even today at these hearings, there have been some general sweeping statements that the press does this, or doesn't do that—usually, it doesn't do that....

So often, these things are being done, so I just suggest that there should be a genuine interest, to whatever degree possible and reasonable in the work that we are doing and seeking to do, and in that sense, there is a kind of vitality and background and environment of encouragement.

Mr. Fortier: I think you would admit, as a publisher, that Maclean's Magazine is in competition with Time Magazine.

Mr. Brander: Very definitely.

Mr. Fortier: Do you feel that you are battling against uneven odds?

Mr. Brander: To some degree.

Mr. Fortier: What are they?

Mr. Brander: Well, I think it is only fair to state that Time Magazine has resources and money which are not possible for Maclean's Magazine, operating within these markets and in the practical sense, Time (Canada), if they wish to do so can outspend us and to some degree, outmaneuver us in the practical fields of advertising sales or promotion.

I think this is a realistic and a practical disadvantage which would be untruthful not to recognize.

Senator Everett: Do they outspend you on promotion? $

Mr. Brander: My impression is they do, but I don't have the figures.

Senator Everett: Is it your impression that it is by a large amount?

Mr. Brander: I would think there is a reasonable difference.

Senator Smith: Does Time Magazine advertise in your magazine?

Mr. Brander: Very rarely—they have occasionally a center-page, perhaps on some special book or service, yes.

Senator Smith: We saw an ad just the other day that appeared in Saturday Night. I was just wondering if that was common practice to patronize all the competitors of Time.

Mr. Brander: I would be quick to say that I don't think Time Magazine is patronizing any magazine.

Senator Smith: They are getting value for the money they spend.

The Chairman: Why would they have a monthly full page in Saturday Night and not in Maclean's? I am sure as an advertising medium, Maclean's can stand up to Saturday Night.

Mr. Brander: I don't know. I think you should ask Time Magazine and Saturday Night.

The Chairman: Well, we have asked Saturday Night and we will certainly be asking Time Magazine. Have you gone after that particular campaign—or your salesmen?

Mr. Brander: Not to my knowledge.

Senator Everett: While we are on that subject, do you feel that under the O'Leary Report it would have been better if Time and Reader's Digest had been treated as American magazines?

Mr. Brander: My view on that question is, I think, similar to views you have heard expressed and I have heard them expressed.

At the time of the O'Leary Commission, I was one of the concerned individuals of the future of magazines in Canada but I came eventually to the, I think, pragmatic conclusion that any effective operation of a magazine industry in this country required a number of magazines, and that we would have been in a more difficult position without both Time and Reader's Digest.

Senator Everett: Do you still feel that way?

Mr. Brander: Yes.

Senator Everett: Notwithstanding the disadvantages that you were talking about?

Mr. Brander: Yes.

Senator Everett: Do I take it that your complaint about Time is the amount of promotional budget that they are able to spend and not the whole cost of the editorial content?

Mr. Brander: I don't think, Senator, I am complaining. I am just stating a fact of life. It is the environment. The question is, do we have any difficulties. There are competitive differences we have to recognize. So I take this as one other competitive problem. We have other competitive problems with other media.

The root source of the additional funds and the availability, certainly stems back to a different kind of an operation and here again, in any operation of a parent magazine there are savings which are just not there for anyone producing an entirely original magazine, so the two are related, yes.

Senator Everett: But you don't think anything should be done to change that situation?

Mr. Brander: I just don't feel there is anything that can be done or will be done.

Senator Everett: We are interested in, not your frustrations, but your feelings. Do you think anything should be done?

Mr. Brander: I don't think so.

The Chairman: Can I just ask a supplementary question?

Since 1960 Time's advertising revenue has doubled. Yours has in fact, decreased. Is there any reason to think that that trend will change, or in ten more years are they going to double again and yours will be down still further?

Mr. Brander: Well, we are not doing that badly. Actually, last year our revenues were up over the previous year, and if you look at the cycle over a number of years, we did go down for a while. We also introduced our French magazine. If one takes the figures today, I think you will find we are back where we were a few years ago and we are moving ahead. I think that over the long term, with the normal ups-and-downs of the business, that Maclean's and Le Magazine Maclean can both continue to make progress.

Whether or not we can make the rate of progress that I think it is likely that Time Magazine will continue to make is an open question.

I just don't know.

I do think this, that the size of the market in Canada is only so large but I do think some of the growth and some of their present advertising content is generated in part by the fact that they are an international advertising medium.

The Chairman: This is Time you are talking about?

Mr. Brander: Yes, and the Digest, too.

The Chairman: We don't want to talk endlessly about this same question that Senator Everett has brought up but I thought I detected in one of your answers, a few minutes ago, almost a note of despair. You seem to say, nothing will be done so what is the point of discussing it. Is that your position? Do you think if anything could be done, should it be?

Mr. Brander: I just think that the elimination, if you will, of the Canadian edition of Time and Reader's Digest at the present time, is an impractical and unwise step that will harm the magazine industry as it exists in Canada, and as part of that harmful effect, that Maclean's and Le Magazine Maclean will be worse off.

The Chairman: But what about Mr. Fortier's question put earlier to Mr. Gzowski. Mr. Gzowski said he prefers Newsweek to Time. Why don't we allow Newsweek to come in here with a Canadian edition and give Time some additional competition. Would you be in favour of that?

Mr. Brander: I certainly would not.

The Chairman: Why?

Mr. Brander: The competition would be increased, and one of the problems of the magazine industry and the advertising business in Canada, as a whole, is that we are carving up a very small pie—so I would not welcome the introduction of another major U.S. competitor.

The Chairman: How small a pie are you carving up, Mr. Brander. Do you know off-hand the percentage of the national advertising revenue expenditures in Canada...

Mr. Brander: Two to three per cent.

The Chairman: Two point four per cent is the figure that I have in mind. That is going down. Is there any reason to think that trend will be arrested.

Mr. Brander: I don't think it will change significantly, no.

The Chairman: Do you think it will level off?

Mr. Brander: There are changes that go on, and the magazine industry in Canada, all of us, are regaining to some extent what we call lost television dollars. These modifications will take place.

Senator Everett: I want to ask Mr. Gzowski, how he feels about the business of the continuing form of journalism, when he views the demise of the Saturday Evening Post and the fact, as I understand it, that Life and Look are perhaps losing money or certainly not in the dominant position financially that they were.

Do you think there is going to continue to be a form of journalism.

Mr. Gzowski: Oh, yes, Senator, very strongly. I think it is going through a period of reappraisal and redefinition of itself, and the Saturday Evening Post's misfortune, to understate what happened there, was part of their failure to do that kind of reappraisal, or at least to do it efficiently. Collier's died the same death several years ago. This is nothing new in the business. It is just accelerated.

I can see the future of magazines, though, as an enormously healthy one and I can see some turn, as Mr. Brander says, there's some leveling off in Canada now, but it is a matter of magazines doing what they are now doing, adapting themselves to a change in interpretation of the function of the magazine.

It is a new world, and magazines have to adapt to it, but they can, and will and those who are, are flourishing.

Senator Everett: What sort of adaptation do you see?

Mr. Gzowski: Well, a very careful definition of one's market and a change from the (a technical term that I'm sure all you Senators have heard) from the horizontal market to the vertical one, and one of the directions I think Maclean's must take, and is taking, and will take, is to an even greater emphasis on its own Canadian-ness which is the definition of its constituency.

The magazines with a clear understanding of their constituency throughout North America and throughout the world are flourishing. Magazines which have no definable constituency, (the Saturday Evening Post being the most dramatic case in point) are floundering, but in North America generally, and in Canada specifically, there is great future for magazines who understand this.

Senator Everett: Do you think then, that Canada is a vertical constituency in the terms that you have defined?

Mr. Gzowski: Yes, sir, I do.

Senator Everett: Not a horizontal constituency?

Mr. Gzowski: Yes, I think Canada is a vertical constituency.

Senator Everett: And therefore, you think a magazine could survive on that constituency?

Mr. Gzowski: Yes.

The Chairman: Could magazines which are further specialized—could a Canadian magazine dealing strictly with sports survive?

Mr. Gzowski: On that particular one I would doubt it, because they are dealing with the verticalized Sports Illustrated which is an incredibly good magazine and carries news of special interest to sports fans, such as you, Senator, and such as me.

I can't imagine that a Canadian sports magazine could give a better insight into the kind of sports that I am interested in than Sports Illustrated does.

Maclean's, when there is a specifically Canadian story, fulfills that function and carves it out where Sports Illustrated would not normally, and that, I think, verticalizes Maclean's.

The Chairman: I think you carry far more hockey news than Sports Illustrated does—not news, but articles, features.

Mr. Gzowski: Just better, Senator, not more.

Senator Everett: That means in your judgement we won't have the large circulation magazines?

Mr. Gzowski: Well, Maclean's is a pretty large circulation magazine in some sense. We are certainly going to have Maclean's.

Some of these other magazines that have come up, have been mentioned, as defined vertical markets are pretty large. Vertical markets are not necessarily small.

Senator Everett: On this subject, but it is slightly personal, we have been told by many, many witnesses that it is virtually impossible to start a daily newspaper in a large community.

In your judgement, is the vertical approach best, do you think that is possible as a means of daily newspapers.

Mr. Gzowski: I think it's possible in starting a new kind of press, but I don't think it would be a daily newspaper.

The unfortunate magazine that got waved around a lot, earlier this morning, is fulfilling a very real—and one hesitates to get into the vertical or horizontal adjectives there—but it nevertheless is serving a certain constituency, and there is evidence throughout the country of publications serving general or specific constituencies within geographical boundaries.

There is the Mysterious East in the Maritimes, and the Fourth Estate, and so on, and across the country, these are happy little pockets, but I can't see, not in my lifetime anyway, this turning into a whole new kind of daily newspaper.

Senator Everett: Do you see them as periodicals?

Mr. Gzowski: Yes, I think so. I would be delighted if there would be a daily, but even in New York, where there is a flourishing kind of this newspaper, the Village Voice survived and now is getting rich.

It is curious to think of the Village Voice as being a highly successful business enterprise but it certainly is. It is serving that constituency, but it continues to be a weekly. It did very well during the newspaper strike. But it never went daily, nor can I see this happening.

I would agree with all the other witnesses that we cannot start a daily newspaper now.

The Chairman: Can I ask you what purpose is served by the weekend papers—the Canadian and Weekend, which Mr. McEachern I think, if I quote him correctly, referred to in his opening comments as “stuffers”. I think that was the noun he used. What is your comment, Mr. Gzowski, on those. Do they serve a particular constituency?

Mr. Gzowski: Yes, they do, I am unable to infer it from reading the weekend publications. They put a little colour in the daily newspapers, that would be what I think they do.

The Chairman: I think the Committee would benefit greatly if you would spend a moment or two, and tell us about your own efforts, which I am aware of, but perhaps some of the Senators are not.

You spent some considerable time and effort trying to start a magazine in Canada. As a matter of fact, I think that was probably almost a full time occupation prior to your move to Maclean's. Could you discuss some of the difficulties? Did you despair of starting such a magazine yourself?

Mr. Gzowski: Curiously enough, no, I did not despair, and knowing what I know now, after having spent eight or nine months in failing to produce it, I'm still convinced it could be done.

I think maybe I did a few things wrong, but I think it could be done. I think it will be done by other people.

The Chairman: What was the biggest problem? Money?

Mr. Gzowski: That was the only problem, Senator.

The Chairman: That was it, in total?

Mr. Gzowski: Well, we didn't have it.

The Chairman: How much would you have needed to start?

Mr. Gzowski: Our projection was $450,000 which some people with more experience in this area, have told us was too low. A few people of comparable experience aid it was about right, but it was $450,000 that we set out to raise.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: That was a supplementary question, I have other questions on other subjects.

The Chairman: Senator Everett?

Senator Everett: I have just one question that sort of follows on. On this difference in the size of the promotional budget between Maclean's and Time, has the Magazine Advertising Bureau made any difference to this? Is this important? Has this reduced the difference?

Mr. Brander: The Magazine Advertising Bureau have been very helpful to each one of the members and Maclean's and Le Magazine Maclean are both members. And in fairness to my earlier statement, where I made the suggestion that large promotion monies could be available and I think also said, and deliberately, that could be spent if they so desired.

I would also like to give the other half of the coin, and pay tribute to Time and to Reader's Digest for the every substantial amounts of money, which are available from them, to help promote the magazine industry in Canada. That money is available through the quite legitimate, and equally proportioned to revenue, contributions which they make.

Senator Everett: What does the Magazine Advertising Bureau do?

Mr. Brander: Its specific purpose is to promote the sale and acceptance of advertising in magazines in Canada.

The Chairman: Does it promote the sale of magazines too, to the public?

Mr. Brander: Not circulation, no—strictly advertising.

Senator Everett: My question still stands. Does this reduce the difference then in the amount of monies expended by Time and Maclean's on promotion?

Mr. Brander: I have no idea.

Senator Everett: Do you think it has?

Mr. Brander: I think the two are quite separate items, but certainly there are some things where we work together, such as, audience studies, research, and so on, whereby working together we can pursue projects which, if we paid for them independently, would be terrifically expensive. In this way, all the magazines participating do benefit.

The Chairman: Mr. Brander, page eight of your brief, you say in the second paragraph, "In particular, the CBC government subsidy produces inequitable competition." Which is it that you are suggesting, that the subsidy be removed from the CBC, or that your company gets a subsidy?

Mr. Brander: I am not suggesting that our company get a subsidy. We have not asked for one and don't want one.

The Chairman: Are you suggesting that the CBC subsidy be removed?

Mr. Brander: I don't know. That is beyond my province and wisdom, but I cannot help but recognize, as part of the communications industry, that it is sometimes an odd situation in that we find ourselves competing against television, which is government subsidized.

The Chairman: You say it is beyond your province. It may be beyond your province, but it is in your brief. You say, "The CBC government subsidy produces inequitable competition."

Let me ask you more directly, what do you think should be done about it?

Mr. Brander: I do not know. I feel this, that I think this Committee's members should be well aware of the existing subsidy, and I am sure they are, and I think that this is something that they need to ponder very seriously and the effect it has on all the communications media in Canada.

The Chairman: However, you would not be in favour of a subsidy for your industry, or for your company?

Mr. Brander: No.

The Chairman: Presumably then, the only conclusion I can draw is that you think that we should examine, unsympathetically, the subsidy which the CBC receives.

Don't let me put words in your mouth, but I'm trying to...

Mr. Brander: No, I merely state the fact that it makes it very difficult for other media to the country, a subsidized television operation. Yet I would be the first to say that a good deal of the work of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is significant and important to the country.

The Chairman: We can leave it at that.

Senator Prowse: Let us get a little more specific. To what extent do you get hurt by the activities of CBC television and radio? How much advertising did you lose to them, and let us get it all together and compare it with what you lose to the independent TV and radio.

Mr. Brander: Television is certainly one of the chief competitors of the magazine industry and in that sense, we are competing against two chains.

I don't have the facts here, therefore I don't want to make assumptions, but in some cases it is true that advertisers can purchase CBC programs at very low rates, resulting simply from the fact that the CBC is subsidized and this sets up inequities in advertising structures and costs, which are difficult to...

Senator Prowse: Have you any reason to believe if the CBC wasn't there, the market presumably would be reached by independent TV and radio stations, would it not? Can we assume that...

Mr. Brander: The market would be reached but whether or not by independent television over the same broad range of the country, I don't know.

Senator Prowse: So what you are saying really is, you get hurt by people that want to put advertising in TV or radio rather than putting it into a magazine.

Mr. Brander: That's true. It depends on the amount of money available. Sometimes there are advertisers who for a good reason wish to advertise in television, but the facts of life are that we only have so many dollars. They may still wish to use magazines sometimes, but there's just no money left. This is one of the difficulties of the magazine industry—that the total cost of advertising in television is so enormous and we get back to the size of market in Canada and the number of dollars which are available...

Senator Prowse: Wouldn't you say that anything that you get hurt by the CBC, by the fact that there is this government subsidy, to provide an extension of services to a particular area that nobody else might want to go in to, if it hurts you at all, hurts you very little. That is not your real problem, is it?

Mr. Brander: Would you like to comment on that, Mr. McEachern, on the precise point perhaps?

Mr. McEachern: I would say certainly in the diversion of dollars into that area, yes.

The point I just wanted to make prior to your question, you understand that the CBC undertakes to program for its network, so many hours per day. They get confronted with a programming situation. They are going to put them on the network. Some revenue is better than no revenue, so they come to you and say, will you give us fifty thousand? Their cost might be four hundred thousand but fifty thousand is better than zero dollars, so this kind of situation, call it what you will, creates a botching effect on the whole rate structure in the advertising world, and all sorts of advertising decisions are made in a very curious way. As a result you may be able to go to CBC and get a very expensive show for a relatively small amount of money.

Senator Everett: Do you have any evidence that they go off their rate chart?

Mr. McEachern: Not with me.

The Chairman: It might be useful, Mr. McEachern, if you could supply it to us, because the CBC are coming before this Committee and we feel it would be useful to us to have this information.

Mr. McEachern: I don't think I am telling you any news.

Senator Everett: I could understand if you are talking about a situation in which the revenue doesn't cover the cost of the show, but I thought you suggested that they will go off the rate chart.

Mr. Gzowski: I think there may be a little confusion here, Mr. Chairman, although the CBC is a better source than I am, but I don't think the point is going off the rate chart. I think the point is being able to sell, on the rate chart, a program which costs a great deal more to produce than the sponsor can pay for it, so it's not really, I don't think, off the rate chart.

Senator Prowse: Well, to come back to my point, what I'm getting at is this. Is this a substantial complaint? Are you saying you are being hurt by the CBC, or is this just repeating a general feeling you have. Then I have one more question.

Mr. Brander: I think it is repeating and emphasizing one of the difficulties in magazine competition against television.

Senator Prowse: Now, let's take the next to final question, which is this. You stated that, although you have a complaint of much the same character, for a different reason, against Time and Reader's Digest, you still feel that is in the interest of the magazine industry that Time and Reader's Digest should stay in business because they create that kind of community?

Would you say that the price that we pay for the CBC, under these circumstances, may produce a better service to the Canadian public than they would get without it, and in the same way, do they get better magazines because those two are there?

Mr. Brander: It may well be, at the present time, and the size of the market, and the development.

Senator Prowse: In any event, you can't suggest to us any immediate and simple answer?

Mr. Brander: No.

The Chairman: What about the competition. You single out the CBC. Surely The CTV network must take advertising revenue that might otherwise go to magazines.

Mr. Brander: Yes, it does.

The Chairman: That causes you some unhappiness, but you can't...

Mr. Brander: It is a peculiar fact of, perhaps, of attitude, that one wants to compete on equal ground somehow.

The Chairman: Have you ever known CTV to indulge in this particular practice of selling a program for less than it cost to produce?

Mr. Brander: Not to my knowledge.

The Chairman: You can't—are you sure?

Mr. Brander: No, but I'm not completely knowledgeable.

The Chairman: Can you tell me Mr. McEachern?

Mr. McEachern: No, but this is not the sort of thing we are likely to have specific information on.

One fact of life, which I know about, are that CTV program costs are of a very different order to those of the CBC.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. McEachern, in your brief, as well as your opening remarks this morning, you make very much of the fact that Maclean's is "for and about Canada". You speak of Maclean's having as a constituency, Canada.

You speak of Maclean's unique roll, by referring to the roster of writers and illustrators which Maclean's has introduced and developed for Canadian readers, and you give a series of names, L. M. Montgomery, Robert W. Service, T. B. Costain, C. W. Jefferys, Stephen Leacock, Beverley Baxter, and many others.

You seem to stop in or around 1960 with your list of names and this is why I am led to quote to you, a statement made by Senator O'Leary yesterday before this committee, and again this is reproduced in this morning's Globe and Mail, on the first page, in fact.

He said before us, that when he was chairman of this commission, in 1960, he was "hoping to save those Canadian magazines that were worth while—not the sort that are published today."

He went on, being particularly outspoken about Maclean's and its lack of Canadian interest and Canadian content, and he said "In recent months the new editor has made improvements". But before then, that magazine might have been published in San Francisco or Timbuctoo or New Orleans... sometimes they get out Maclean's and you think it is a pale imitation of Playboy."

Would you please comment, Mr. McEachern?

Mr. McEachern: I don't think I should be asked to comment on the quality of Maclean's performance in recent years, or on the performance of specific editors.

The Chairman: You are being asked to comment on Senator O'Leary's statement.

Mr. McEachern: I did, and what I said earlier, points out that we are now producing a very different kind of magazine than we were ten years ago.

Mr. Fortier: Is that now, as opposed to ten years ago?

Mr. McEachern: I did say that if we were now producing the same kind of thing as we were ten years ago, we would probably be quite out-of-date.

Mr. Fortier: But Senator O'Leary suggested that ten years ago, Maclean's Magazine was a magazine which was worth preserving.

Mr. Brander: And he says it is not now, I gather.

Mr. Fortier: Right.

Mr. McEachern: That's a difference of opinion.

Mr. Fortier: You don't agree with it?

Mr. McEachern: No, Sir.

Mr. Fortier: And you don't agree that any time in the last ten years it has prostituted itself in any way to a point where a chairman of the Royal Commission would say, "Had I known that Maclean's was going to become the kind of magazine it has become, I would not have suggested to the government of the day, that it be protected."

Mr. McEachern: This I disagree with. I would certainly disagree with the word 'prostitution'.

Mr. Fortier: That was mine.

The Chairman: In fairness to Senator O'Leary and in fairness to the witness, that was not a word that was used.

Senator Everett: Could I just hear Senator O'Leary's statement again?

The Chairman: Do you want to read it again, so Senator Everett can hear it? This is as reported in the Globe and Mail, you will appreciate.

Senator Everett: Mr. Fortier said he thought it was fairly accurate.

The Chairman: I think it is, but we haven't got the transcript. We are reading from the Globe and Mail.

Mr. Fortier: We must rely on newspapers on occasion.

"He was especially outspoken about Maclean's and its lack of Canadian interest and content." He said, "In recent months, the new editor has made improvements, but before then, that magazine might have been published in San Francisco, or Timbuctoo, or New Orleans. . . sometimes they get out Maclean's and you think it is a pale imitation of Playboy."

Mr. McEachern: First of all, you are aware of some things that have created some controversy in an attempt to seek a new kind of Maclean's.

Secondly, and I made the point this morning, or earlier, we used to be charged with being highbrow and with being limited to too small an audience.

A magazine of Maclean's circulation is not going to be of very intense interest to Senator O'Leary personally. This is just one of the facts of life. He would probably be more content with the kind of editorial content which would be appropriate to a magazine with a circulation of ten to fifty thousand.

Ten years ago, I think the charge probably was fairly legitimate. The editorial content was pitched at the older, educated person—high educated person. This really doesn't make sense...

Mr. Fortier: You say ten years ago. That is the period which he investigated and he said, "That's what I wanted to preserve", is it not?

Mr. McEachern: Well, we, in the meantime, had the big problem of preserving ourselves.

Mr. Fortier: Would you care to comment, Mr. Brander?

Mr. Brander: No, I think Mr. McEachern has covered it. I just think there's a lot of generalization coming into the statements of yesterday, and I know that there is a reference that sometimes Maclean's is a pale imitation of Playboy.

On the other hand, there was evidence yesterday that Playboy was a very popular and well read magazine, by Senator O'Leary and by the Chairman of this Commission, so, you know, this is confusing.

The Chairman: I also read Maclean's.

Mr. Brander: And I would expect you to do so, sir. But the circulation performance is the thing I think you have to come back to, and ten years ago, the circulation performance, generally speaking, was a very sound result.

All through these years of, these years of experimentation, these years of deliberate change, and the process of flexibilities that we go through, aggressively, sometimes in the magazine business, all through it there has been this growth of leadership and acceptance and acceptance of the magazines, and I think it is rightly changing with the times.

I would say this, that all of the people, generally speaking, associated with the magazine, throughout this decade, have made some notable contributions to it.

Mr. Fortier: I think, maybe, Senator O'Leary's use as a comparison of Playboy, was not a happy one, because, as I understood it, his comments had to do with Canadianism, and this is why I relate them to your brief.

So, is Maclean's Magazine less of a Canadian magazine than it was ten years ago, given all the remarks which we have heard?

Mr. McEachern: Absolutely not, because the only thing that is in Maclean's—it is all Canadian.

I believe that Senator O'Leary deplored the fact that we no longer had news bureaus in Washington and London, or something.

The Chairman: He mentioned that.

Mr. McEachern: All right, one reason we don't is the deluge of television news from Washington and London, so by the time people get to Maclean's, they have already had that dose, so we are becoming more Canadian. We have to be.

The Chairman: Why must you become more Canadian?

Mr. MacEachern: Because these people, the mass audience, has already had its dose of stuff from Washington and London, and the foreign stuff, so this is one of the pressures that we have had to submit to. We have to face the facts of life.

The Chairman: Mr. MacEachern, I know it is not your problem, but would you think that Time will have to become more Canadian?

Mr. McEachern: I think that Time is in a very comfortable position.

In relation to your earlier questions, the facts of life with Time are, that Time Corporation revenues are colossal by all publishing standards, and what is a substantial sum of money for us, is cigarette money for Time, so Time literally, can do what they want to do.

For various, I would say, special reasons, because of the uproar at the time of the O'Leary Commission, and probably as a result of these hearings, Time is extremely interested in maintaining and strengthening its position in Canada.

I don't say this with any antipathy to the Time people. This is one of the natural reactions that this great corporation has.

Remember, that to a degree, Time Canada is a test situation for Time International. Ten years ago, they were threatened in this country. Time has editions in thirty countries. If all thirty countries developed ideas such as Canada had ten years ago, Time would be very unhappy, so this is one very practical reason why Time wants to do well in Canada and by Canada.

The Chairman: I know they want to do well in Canada. It is the question of wanting to do well by Canada that interests me at the moment.

You said that your magazine is going to have to become more Canadian. Now, that is an exact quote.

Mr. MacEachern: Is it an exact quote? I hope I said, "to do the Canadian job better".

The Chairman: Fine. Do you not think then that Time by the same token, should become more Canadian, to do the Canadian job better. That is not your problem, I appreciate that.

Mr. MacEachern: The Time people are very smart. They know how to run publications. If they think that the Canadian population wants twelve pages of Canadian news, instead of four to eight, well, they can easily do this.

With this prodigious power of financial resources, these things don't matter.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. I wonder if we might put your question, Mr. Fortier.

That is, you were asking really for comments on Senator O'Leary's remarks yesterday.

I think it might be useful to the Committee, to ask Mr. Gzowski to comment on that because that was approximately the period of time when he was away from Maclean's.

Also, Senator O'Leary was very generous to him in the course of his comments.

What validity would you place in his comments about Maclean's in the years that you were away? I appreciate that's a very tough question.

Mr. Gzowski: Not as tough as the answer.

I think Senator O'Leary—I was thinking as I read the report of his comments this morning, how badly we need writers with that ability to turn a phrase and I think Senator O'Leary has a colorful headline and news-making ability with words, which I admire and envy.

I would suggest to him that he overstated a few points of his case, and I would also suggest to him that the writers who were producing the Maclean's of the nineteen fifties and early nineteen sixties—I, incidentally, was one—are still around, are generally coming back in Maclean's insofar as they have ever left it.

I very much believe that there is a new generation of Canadian writers, doing perhaps, a different kind of thing than Thomas Costain, who went to edit the Saturday Evening Post, which shows what he knew, but I think that there are literally scores of writers in this country.

I wish we had space and opportunity in Maclean's to use them all, but we are using as many as we can. I think there is a new generation doing things in a new way, which may not be Senator Grattan O'Leary's way, but I would also suggest that the circulation figures and the general health of Maclean's reflects that this is a successful way to do this.

As for the more Canadian part of it, I think it is fundamental. I hope we can leave this Committee with the impression that there is a genuine community of able, talented writers in this country and that it is very necessary that they survive as a part of the survival of Canada as a country, and that the people of this generation now coming into the seats of fame are equal to those of any previous generation and perhaps even better.

I think that Maclean's is going into a period—particularly at this juncture in history—that it has never been more important that Maclean's survive, so I would disagree diametrically with Senator O'Leary on that point.

The Chairman: Mr. Brander, this is the March issue of Maclean's—when do you first see that issue?

Mr. Brander: I get what is called a rough checking copy of the magazine.

The Chairman: That is the first you see of it?

Mr. Brander: Of the magazine as a whole, yes.

The Chairman: When would you first see it, Mr. McEachern?

Mr. McEachern: I would see rough proofs six weeks or two months ago.

The Chairman: Would either one of you be free to make changes at that point?

Mr. Brander: Not at the point I see it.

Mr. McEachern: Make suggestions, yes.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Brander, Senator O'Leary, in his report, page thirty-nine, said that Canadian magazine publishers spend ten per cent to twenty per cent of their total revenue on editorial content.

We would be interested in knowing today what percentage of your total revenue you spend on editorial content.

Mr. McEachern: You have the figures. This is something we would not wish to announce publicly.

Mr. Fortier: I know we have those figures, but I think you can probably see why I am very interested in having that figure.

Mr. McEachern: I would be interested in having it on the record for the purpose of questioning, which will be directed to witnesses who will be called before the Committee. I think I can hear a laugh from Mr. LaRue in the back there.

The Chairman: Before you say anything, I'm prepared to accept your answer.

Mr. McEachern: Let me say this. I resist answering this specific question for quite a few reasons.

First of all, when one publication starts comparing that figure with someone else's, you find that they do the bookkeeping differently.

Secondly, my friends at Time can bookkeep several different ways so no matter what I say figures can turn out in a very interesting fashion.

What I can tell you is, that among the publishing houses we know in North America, the big ones, the percentage of total revenue which we spend on editorials is very much higher by this same definition than is common in the United States.

Mr. Fortier: I still do not understand why you would not tell this Committee, and have it put on the record, what the percentage of your revenue is spent on editorial content.

Senator Everett: Mr. Chairman, I think the witness has given his reasons.

The Chairman: I was just going to let Mr. Fortier finish his sentence and then I was going to say that, not withstanding the fact that he is disappointed, I think the disappointment will have to stand because we do have the information, and if Mr. McEachern chooses not to put it on the record, then I think, for the reasons he has explained...

Mr. McEachern: Well, it is on your record.

The Chairman: Yes, in our files. Thank you very much.

I again say to you, Mr. McEachern, and to the others who joined you, Mr. Sisto and Mr. Gzowski, and Mr. Brander, you have been most patient, we are most grateful, and you have been most helpful. If I may say to the Senators, reminding them of the balance of the day—working backwards—nine o'clock tonight, Mr. Ken Lefolii is the witness; eight o'clock tonight, the International Typographical Union; at four-thirty today we will hear from the much-discussed Magazine Advertising Bureau, and at two-thirty this afternoon, we will hear from Chatelaine Magazine.

The Committee adjourned at 12:55 p.m.
... Upon resuming at 2:30 p.m.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, may I call this session to order.

This afternoon we are going to receive a brief from the Chatelaine group of Maclean-Hunter Limited.

Seated at the front—and perhaps you will allow ladies first—on my immediate right is Mrs. Doris McCubbin Anderson, who is Editor of Chatelaine. Sitting on Mrs. Anderson's right, is Madame Saint-Martin, Editor of Chatelaine. On my immediate left, is Mr. Lloyd M. Hodgkinson, Châtelaïne group publisher and who is also a Director of Maclean-Hunter. And of course, becoming a familiar face, Mr. McEachern. Is this your final appearance? He just congratulated me because it is his final appearance. We congratulate you. We are delighted you are here.

Now, Mr. Hodgkinson, the brief as requested was forwarded to us some three weeks in advance. The Senators have had an opportunity to read the brief, and I think have become familiar with its contents.

You now have fifteen minutes to make a statement amplifying, explaining or adding to it, or saying anything else you wish.

I know you have been here before, and are familiar with what I say. Once you are through with your statement, we will turn to the questioning. As we question you, I am sure you will realize that questions may be directed to other people in your group, and if you wish to direct questions to them please do so.

Mr. Lloyd M. Hodgkinson, Group Publisher and Director of Maclean-Hunter: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and honorable Senators.

You have received our written brief on behalf of Chatelaine, Châtelaïne and Miss Chatelaine which today comprises the Women's group of magazines published by Maclean-Hunter.

With me today are Mr. McEachern, The Executive Vice-President of Maclean-Hunter, who appeared last Thursday for Maclean-Hunter, Doris McCubbin Anderson—Editor of Chatelaine and Executive Editor, Miss Chatelaine, and Fernande Saint-Martin—Editor of Châtelaïne. I am the Publisher of these magazines.

The format of our oral presentation is as follows—a few remarks from me; Mrs.

Anderson plans to review some of the editorial objectives and the manner in which these are executed for the English edition; M^{me} Saint-Martin plans a similar review for the French edition. We will be pleased to try and answer any questions.

May I point out, that the English and French editions of Chatelaine are not the same in editorial content.

Each editor has the editorial responsibility for her magazine within a framework of policy as to the type of magazine to be published. The editors co-operate with each other on material they feel is suitable for their particular audience so that some common subjects are featured in both editions. This co-operation is a natural month to month understanding to develop broader editorial subject material and avoid unnecessary duplication of costs.

The role played by the Chatelaine Group of magazines in Canada is difficult to describe with precision or specific documentation. There is no way, to my knowledge, of measuring the impact or isolating the contribution of magazines from the cultures in which they are a force, of separating the effects of these magazines from those of other forms of communication.

There can be no doubt, however, that the Chatelaine Group of magazines, which are read month after month by more than half of all the women in Canada, have a profound effect on the individual and the society of which she is a part. These magazines introduce a continuing stream of new ideas, putting them up for critical examination, and if they have a merit, feeding them into the main stream of thought in Canada's society.

It is important that these ideas are conceived and distributed by thoughtful Canadian people who believe it is important for this country to nourish and develop a genuine Canadian identity.

I believe these magazines have been responsible, in some measure, for the social and political reforms made throughout Canada during the past 40 years. They have put forth a national point of view that has fostered a sense of national community. They have provided low cost instruction in daily living to millions of Canadian families. They have entertained and provided pleasure. They have been an educator in the cultural heritage of the people of this country.

Mrs. Anderson and M^{me} Saint-Martin will speak more specifically to some of the current articles and features to illustrate these points in a few moments.

Because, I feel these magazines are a constructive force in Canada, I also feel it is important they have a healthy climate in which to thrive, not just as magazines, but to thrive as a business.

Their revenues are received from two sources...the reader and the advertiser.

The historical pattern of obtaining revenues from the reader is by subscription and single copy sales. Because of the large sale of foreign magazines in Canada for a great many years, Canadian magazines must compete in the Canadian market-place by the rules of the game as established by U.S. publishers. And as a result, while our circulation provides a net surplus, our main revenues come from advertisers.

In the pursuit of advertising revenues, magazines have tremendous competition. During the 40 years of Chatelaine's publishing life, to date, we have seen radio and television reach into virtually every home. Much of the broadcast "editorial" product is created in other countries and used by domestic stations at relatively modest cost to them. This has given broadcast a cost advantage over magazines.

Similarly, we have seen newspapers, through wire services and syndicated columnists, obtain a fair share of their editorial product from outside of Canada. And also, we have seen newspapers introduce a network distribution of supplements, such as Weekend and The Canadian, through the newspapers as the carrier. All of these competing media have economies of either creative resource material or distribution not available to magazines. Let me assure you, I am not complaining about the good fortunes of other media, I am simply documenting the facts of magazines' competitive life. Add to this the tremendous overflow into Canada of foreign magazines and one readily realizes that the environment for publishing of Canadian magazines is not one for the faint hearted.

But these magazines have continued and the Chatelaine Group are stronger than they have ever been—and more than 50 per cent of all the women in this country over 15 years of age, read them. Today, with 980,000 paid circulation, Chatelaine English edition is the largest single Canadian magazine. Similarly, Châtelaine French with 270,000 circulation is the largest in French Canada. And their content is virtually 100 per cent Canadian.

Now some questions are being raised about the effectiveness of broadcast, and the advertisers are getting a little tired of dating the same girl. She's no longer new in town and they're beginning to look again at one of their old sweethearts—special interest women's magazines are looking better than ever.

With this background, perhaps it is easier to understand our sensitivity to drastic changes in postal rates or any other major cost area of our business. Particularly, do we find it difficult to recover from major cost increases in short periods of time.

The Maclean-Hunter position was made quite clear at a previous meeting. We do not ask for anything. We wish to be able to do our best and we are confident we can compete and grow because we know our business.

And now may I introduce Mrs. Anderson.

Mrs. Doris McCubbin Anderson, Editor of Chatelaine: Mr. Chairman, honourable senators, and distinguished guests.

The reason I am speaking today is that I am quite sure most of the people in this room are fairly unfamiliar with Chatelaine and the kind of material that we run. Naturally we are traditionally a woman's magazine, and we concern ourselves with women's affairs. We are kind of a "cope-kit" for women.

Month by month we tell them how to cook better, how to look better, how to raise their children better, and if possible how to make their husbands happier.

In addition to that, I think we have done a very solid job through the years, in a much broader spectrum and I think very often we don't get credit for this.

I think today if Canadian women are changing; that they are more urban, better educated, they are trendier; they are swifter; and interested in a very broad spectrum of ideas; I think that part of the reason for that is because such a large proportion over the years have read Chatelaine.

I think that Chatelaine takes a very hard focus on Canada. We are a Canadian magazine, it is really all we have to sell. We cannot claim certainly, and we don't claim, that we have been directly responsible for some big dramatic changes in Canadian life, but we certainly have prepared women for the way.

Edgar Allan Poe once said, "Magazines are the light artillery of the intellect." We think we have been the light artillery that has made it possible to effect some changes on the Canadian scene that, without a woman's magazine, might not have been possible.

I could go through, I think, about ten articles over the years on each of several areas that I am going to bring up very briefly now. I am really going to mention just one, and that is probably the first one that was published on this particular subject, to show you how long we have been talking about some of these things.

For example, pollution, which is now a very current and very big popular topic. We ran an article back in 1963 by Sheila Cairn called "Pesticides—They are destroying our World." We ran another article in 1966, "How We are Poisoning Canada." by Constance Mungle, and we have run several articles since then.

On the status of women, which is a very big and current topic now, and one of particular concern to the Chatelaine readers, we ran an article back in 1962 called "Are Women Second-Class Voters?" by Christina Newman.

We ran a very big questionnaire, there were 76 questions on it. If you are very nimble you could probably answer them in three hours, and it was directly on all sorts of things of interest to women in connection with the Status of Women survey. We got 13,000 replies from our readers. We compiled those replies and turned them over to the Status of Women Commission, and also prepared a brief for the Commission.

On nursing homes, another very current topic, we ran an article back in 1961 by Molly Gillen called "Are we Burying our Old Folks Alive?" Another very outstanding article on the same topic, which I will mention among others we have run on the same subject, a report on nursing homes by G. Tory Salter in 1965. In that case she was a nurse, and we put her into several nursing homes and she gave a first-hand report of the way people were being treated. As a result of that, an investigation was held, and three nursing homes were closed.

On divorce, in 1961 we ran an article "The Hypocrisy of Our Divorce Laws" by Christina Newman and we have been running I think at least one article on divorce ever since. We have given it a rest since the divorce laws have been changed.

On Indians we ran almost a whole chate-laine issue in November of 1968, on the Indian crisis.

On abortion—our abortion laws were just changed. We ran an abortion article back in 1960. It was called "Our Outdated Abortion Laws" by Dorothy Sangster. I had all kinds of phone calls and letters saying, "You are going to be forced out of business for running that particular article." Well, we didn't go out of business and last November we ran another article "Our New Abortion Law Already Outdated" by Molly Gillen, which ran in November, 1969. We are still banging away on that topic because we don't think the abortion law is good enough.

On battered babies—I don't remember any magazine on the North American continent, coming out with an article on this before we did. The first one we published was in 1960. It was called "Can't we Put a Stop to Cruelty to Children" by Dorothy Sangster. I had welfare agencies phoning me up and saying, "This is not really a problem. These instances are very isolated. It is not general." All I said was, "I read every week in the paper about some baby being battered to death and I think it is a problem."

So we ran the article and later it became a big issue and laws were passed about it.

On poverty we ran four articles last spring. One of them was called, "It is Hell to Live on Welfare" by Mrs. Alice Payne, a mother of six, living in Calgary. As a result of that article she was appointed to the Welfare Council set up by The Hon. John Munro. Another result of that series of articles, was that one of the authors, Ian Adams, went on to write a book which has just come out, published my McClelland and Stewart.

Housing—among the many other articles we have run on housing we sent a reporter, Constance Mungle, right across the country to do a two-part series on housing; one pointing out the problems, and the second one pointing out some of the possible solutions. That article ran in 1968.

The crisis in Quebec. I think the first time we ran an article on this, was in 1963, and the title was, "Is Canada Worth Saving?" and the author was Bruce Hutchison. Later on in 1964 we sent a reporter down to live in a Quebec home and we took a French-Canadian reporter and put her in a Toronto home, and we had them both report to both magazines on their results and how these two different parts of Canada felt about one another.

We held another survey on the Quebec question for our whole readership in 1968, called "How Far Will You Go for One Canada?" and published the results in the magazine.

These are just a few of a number of topics that I think are of very great and vital concern to both men and women in this country. Some of the other ones are on day nurseries, education, and a lot of other topics as well.

I think a lot has been said in front of these sessions about Canadian magazines being for Canadians, and we certainly think that is one of our functions. One of my first assignments on the magazine was to go all across Canada and report on women, outstanding women in various cities. Just before the Centennial year we sent a reporter again all across Canada and brought out what we called our Women of Canada series; a report not on outstanding women particularly, but just on ordinary women to tell Canadians in various parts of the country what we were like.

Right now we have a City Series going on called "How Would You Like to Live in Vancouver?" This is centered around the fastest-growing cities in Canada, and what it would be like for Canadian families to live there.

We are a Canadian magazine, we are Canadian from cover to cover.

People have objected this morning about some of the names mentioned that seemed to be sort of old. Well, we get old names and new names. I can give you a long list of either one. We have published Stephen Leacock, we have published Mazo De La Roche, we have published Gabrielle Roy, Hugh MacLennan, Dr. Blatz, Charlotte Whitton. If you want some new names—Margaret Laurence, I think you all recognize her as one of our outstanding fiction writers; and Ethel Wilson, another fiction writer.

We have developed a number of highly competent writers, some of whom I think you will be familiar with; June Caldwell, Christina Newman, Barbara Frum and many others.

We also have published works over the years of outstanding artists, and not just as examples of what they do in fine arts. We started a number of people giving them work, illustrations, long before they were well known. I think you might recognize some of these; Harold Town, James Hill, William Winter, Grant McDonald, just to mention a few.

On Chatelaine we only have one general staff writer, so 80 percent of our general articles are written by free-lance people. Over the past year I counted it up and we had 48 different by-lines by Canadians in Chatelaine. We develop writers, and we develop writers because we have to. We have sent four-page single spaced letters back to people, explaining how an article has to be re-written to come up to a magazine's standard. I think we are carrying on a kind of short article-writing course and we have been doing this for many, many years. In the United States I understand most large magazines don't even read their slush-pile, just send the material back.

We don't want to do that, we certainly can't afford to do that.

As for artists, over the last three years we have used 59 different illustrators in Chatelaine, and in the last year 12 appeared for the first time.

I forgot to mention that for the last year, eight of the writers that appeared in Chatelaine appeared for the first time in a national publication.

Over the past three years we have used 80 photographers and in the last year 18 of them appeared for the first time in a national publication. We are practically the only outlet left in Canada for short story fiction writing, aside from C.B.C. radio and literary magazines such as The Tamarac Review.

We have been accused of buying all our fiction in New York. I would like to buy none of it, but with the fiction market so sparse and so hard in Canada we do have to buy some in New York, but 50 per-cent of our fiction is Canadian fiction produced by Canadians.

We have heard a lot about carrying on a dialogue, and we do it—not only through the pages of our magazine, but in letters, in person—we go out to speak to them—we reply to their letters, we get phone calls, we get requests for information and requests about where to find information.

I kept track, since I knew I was going to be appearing before this Commission, of the various ways we make contact with our readers over a month, and it is something around 7,000 times. We have requests for booklets and information, phone calls to the various editors, letters that come to the editors, letters that come to the six service editors, speeches we make. We have contests we judge. I think we are doing a very solid job of keeping in touch with our readers.

I think that Chatelaine has also proved its usefulness in authenticity of our material, because we are frequently asked for permission to reprint articles in specialized bulletins, welfare agency material, material for study groups, and we are often asked for permission to re-print material for university study groups, as well.

I think that is about all I have to say.

The Chairman: I thank you very much, Mrs. Anderson. Madame Saint-Martin?

[Translation]

Mrs. Saint-Martin: The French edition of Chatelaine is just as concerned with the problems facing the woman of to-day. But, naturally, as a magazine published in Quebec, it is a magazine which appeals to a very different audience than the English one. As you learned from our brief, the French edition has been in existence since 1960. This is a date, as you know, which marked the beginning of the Quiet Revolution in Quebec. I do not know whether it was a "revolution" or "evolution", but Quebec, and certainly the female population of Quebec, experienced during those years, a fantastic evolution which astonished all observers. It developed in a positive manner—that is to say, Quebec at that time experienced an impetus and underwent such considerable change that a magazine published in Quebec cannot help but be both the support to it as well as its voice presenting comments as well as criticisms. Last year, in Quebec, nearly 400 books were published. This is a large number of books for a province with a population of five and a half million French-speaking people. As a result, the French edition of Chatelaine is a literary chronicle of the past six years. There is such an abundance of French books in Quebec and because we review Canadian books written by Quebecers (les Québécois), this does not mean that we suffer from xenophobia.

We continually have articles on all activities in Quebec in the fields of: movies (where some fifteen films are produced each year); folk-singers; novelists; art and theatre in particular, which is so popular. On the other hand, Quebec, and mainly the French-Canadian women has undergone a substantial evolution which we have influenced. During those years, let us say that we did not conduct campaigns. Nevertheless we systematically tried to inform the female readers in Quebec of the fundamental problems on which decisions should be made.

Thus, before and since Bill 16 was passed, giving equal legal status to the married woman, we have carried a very large number of articles which dealt with these problems—giving opinions of the women involved in all the aspects of this problem.

Likewise, we were extremely interested in the revision of the Civil Code in Quebec, which as you know was the Napoleonic Code, which is different from the Code used in English Canada. The revision of the Civil Code is underway, and certain areas have already been redefined which are completely changing the life of the Quebec woman. Obviously we wanted to inform our readers of the changes. We also asked them to speak out—to tell the governments what Quebec women really wanted in the way of change.

Likewise, the development of the Quebec woman is quite interesting. She is becoming increasingly a North American type of woman. But this is taking place at a different speed and in a different way. Problems like divorce, for example, arise in an entirely different way in Quebec. It was only last July that divorce courts were set up in Quebec. Within a few months, the number of divorces increased, I think, by 700 per cent. This represents a very sharp change about which women should be informed, in order that they may know exactly what is happening and where things are going.

Likewise, I think that the major boost to the Quiet Revolution was the great change in education in Quebec. With the establishment of a secondary school system open to all classes of society and to girls, a free system of education promoted changes in the traditional structure of education. Generally, we are interested in the same problems as our colleagues in Toronto, but viewed in the context of the province of Quebec, where the major fields, like welfare, family, health and education, are under provincial jurisdiction. Therefore, we must tackle the problem in the framework in which it arises in Quebec, and inform the readers of these changes which are taking place.

Without wanting to be boastful, I think that our role during these years has truly been unique, in the sense that we have reached a very large number of women—many men also (because for each issue we claim to have one male reader who reads the entire magazine). And we believe that this is essential since social change, emancipation and the liberation of women cannot take place without dialogue with men—the husband. Therefore our orientation is clear.

We also had an opportunity to play a major role in the development of Quebec literature. We were able to publish fully the works of French Canadian authors. Most of the great French-Canadian writers have appeared in our magazine, and can continue to do so. On the other hand, we have also published young writers for the first time, people like Anne Hébert or Yves Thériault, Marie-Claire Blais, Jacques Ferron, François Loranger, Marcel Dubé. Finally, all Canadian authors have been read in our magazine. Often they are authors who are not necessarily easy to read but who are able to express to our readers a sensitivity or point of view which is—if such a thing exists—Quebec's own. They have reached a public which is concerned, as we are in the development of Quebec literature. I could certainly discuss this area more fully but I do not want to take up too much of your time.

A magazine's importance is measured in many ways. For example, three years ago, we co-operated with Mr. Lévesque (who was then the Minister of Social Welfare and Family Services in Quebec) in the setting up of a poll. I think that he considered himself first as a Minister of Welfare, but fate had it that the Department of Family Services be joined to that department. At that time, he confessed that he was quite unaware of the problems which women are facing in society and in the family. We worked with him and conducted a poll among our readers in which they were asked what they wanted from the Department of Family Services with the view that the department would seriously consider the ideas. As you know, the government was defeated, but the influence of poll and the interests of the French women in Quebec can be seen in the changes, for example in the family allowance system.

Obviously, all these problems are very complex, as you know. There is the question of the involvement of the Federal Government. Should family allowances be repatriated? These are the things which we have to tackle because they are problems which have an immense effect on the lives of all women who read our magazine. We are one hundred per cent Canadian, but let us say that we see our magazine essentially as a magazine which is going to provide adequate information. We are convinced that in a democracy, it is extremely important that enlightened public opinion be shaped so as to permit the government to promote progressive policies. Thus, information is extremely important. At this moment, we are also trying to instruct our readers (since they are a part of a French-Canadian culture in Quebec) and we are using the information coming from the English edition of the magazine to do this.

I shall give examples. In the list given on page 3 of our brief, problems such as maternity care in Canadian hospitals, i.e., how medicine is practised in cases of women who are giving birth, pre-natal care and post-natal care were covered. In fact, Canada has a fairly high and dangerous infant mortality rate. This is to some extent how we co-operate with the English magazine. Many of those articles and much of the research are used by us as basic documentation on problems which arise throughout Canada. Here, apart from the questionnaires which had been sent to all Canadian hospitals, we found out what was happening in English-Canadian hospitals. In turn, from that, we sent questionnaires to some twenty hospitals in Quebec in order to find out what was happening in Quebec.

We feel that it is very important for women in Quebec to know what is happening elsewhere in Canada and to be aware of any problem areas in their environment. If such is the case, they should know what should be done, what should be demanded. On the other hand, if they are merely satisfied with what there is in Quebec, so much the better.

The same holds true for the problem of poverty which we call a facet of the feminine condition. Obviously, the problem is not just a national one here in Canada, but an international one. However, it is a very real problem in Canada. The working women are most certainly in an inferior position. This is especially so in Quebec as female wages in Quebec are the eighth in the country. Accordingly, we find it essential to use the best Canadian journalists from this "pool" of writers which the English Chatelaine uses: We are therefore anxious to use all material to give the women of Quebec a better understanding of their own situation and what should be done to change it.

And quite simply, as I wanted to add earlier, it happens fairly regularly that we order work from correspondents in France. For example, many articles, such as those dealing with the psychology of the development of the child from 1 to 5 years of age, have been based on the psychology of Piaget. He is a pioneer in the field of child psychology and he is, only just now, becoming well-known in America. So we have described his views.

Similarly, in November 1969, we published an article on the best contemporary French novelists. We share, both a bond of language with France as well as similar types of problems, and as a result we have developed a relationship. For example with regard to the problem of nurseries, we called upon a Montreal associate to conduct a survey in France regarding the organization of so-called "crèches" commonly known as day care centres in France. Therefore when we have special problems in our area, we do not only seek information from our English-speaking compatriots. Whenever it is beneficial to enable French Canadians to evolve in accordance with their own traditions, their own values and way of thought, we add to this information some observations from France.

I have said that I would not take up your time. But I think that I could go on indefinitely. However, I shall attempt to answer your questions, if you wish.

[Text]

The Chairman: Thank you very much. I think Senator McElman is going to begin the questioning, Mr. Hodgkinson. If you wish to direct a question to either of your editors, or Mr. McEachern, please do so by all means.

Senator McElman: Mr. Chairman, I would like to direct the first question to both Mrs. Anderson and Madame Saint-Martin.

Your magazines deal to a large extent with the problems of women in our nation, and there has recently been a good bit of foofarah about the problem of ladies in your profession not being able to obtain membership in the National Press Gallery.

Would you regard this as a down-grading by the male of the lady journalists?

The Chairman: A one-word answer will do.

Mrs. Anderson: I think they are being very foolish. I think they will have to let women in. I think from a financial point of view it would be something. No press club I have ever known ever has enough money. I don't think women are such a threat to them.

[Translation]

Mrs. Saint-Martin: For my part, I feel that it is absolutely unacceptable. It is an outmoded masculine idea which has absolutely no justification, whether professional or other.

[Text]

Senator McElman: Would you think this is something that Mr. Diefenbaker—and no one can accuse him at this point of seeking political advantage—did he receive some editorial support in the rather significant statement he has made recently, and the action he has taken?

Mrs. Anderson: I don't think it is important enough topic to really bother.

Senator McElman: It doesn't get to you, as a lady journalist?

Mrs. Anderson: Not really. If I want to talk to male journalists, usually I can. If there was a press club I could belong to, I might, or might not belong to it, whether it was male or co-educational. It is not important. I am really not going to concern myself very much with it at all.

Senator McElman: Do you feel ladies in journalism today are being accorded salary and other amenities by talent alone equal to that of the male?

Mrs. Anderson: I would have to have access to salary schedules, and I haven't, so it makes it very difficult to answer that question.

[Translation]

Mrs. Saint-Martin: However, personally, after conversations with colleagues in Quebec, I feel that generally speaking we are a union organization which has imposed wage parity. Generally, the salaries of female journalists are less than those of men and I might add that discrimination very definitely does exist with regard to promotion in the field of journalism. Nevertheless, the situation is changing although it is very clear that women, who are now doing general reporting but, who are specialized in technical areas, often are not given the same promotion opportunities within press organizations as men.

[Text]

Senator McElman: You feel there has been quite extensive improvement in recent years in this regard, do you?

[Translation]

Mrs. Saint-Martin: In Quebec, I would not say "extensive".

[Text]

There has been some change. When I started my own career at La Presse women were simply not accepted in other fields than the women's pages: There are women editorialists at La Presse, and they are efficient. The present lot of women reporters have proven quite able to work in the field, but this is not an extensive progress yet, just the barriers are broken.

Mrs. Anderson: On the Status of Women Commission, the Women's Press Club made a very extensive report on this, and I think in that they proved that women were not being paid equal salaries with men, but I don't know what the figures are.

I was also told, after this report was presented to the Status of Women Commission, several women in Toronto had their salaries raised. Again, that is just hearsay.

Senator McElman: It would be the normal thing. Mr. Hodgkinson, I don't recall ever having seen liquor advertising, at least not in recent times, in Chatelaine.

Is this a conscious policy?

Mr. Hodgkinson: No. We changed our policy about five or six years ago. We previously did not carry alcoholic beverage advertising of any kind. We thought it was a little hypocritical as we feature wines in our food spreads and so on, and in our recipes, and we believe wine has a very gracious place in family living. We opened the classification first to the wine classification.

We have carried a few advertisements on this, and we have had no complaints from our readers. About three years ago, we extended that, and opened the classification to "hard liquors", whiskies and so on. We have carried a few advertisements on the subject. We are very careful in that we want their copy to be a certain type of copy. We don't want to sell booze for booze sake. We want them to be showing alcoholic beverages as discriminating and tasteful beverage in normal life. We have had no complaints from our readers on accepting that, either.

We don't aggressively go and sell this type of advertising. We do accept it, if it is suggested to us, and if the copy conforms with the standard we lay down for them. We have turned several programs down we didn't feel suited to our particular market.

Senator McElman: You would feel that you would need an entirely different approach to the advertising of liquor than, for instance, Maclean's?

Mr. Hodgkinson: Not entirely. As a matter of fact I think as a result of many of our discussions with the alcoholic beverage people they have changed the copy approaches to some degree.

For instance, you will see the Hiram Walker advertising showing a food setting completely, and subordinating the product into a gracious living atmosphere. So this type of program will run in general magazines, and that type is suitable for our magazine too.

Senator McElman: Perhaps you are having a good influence on them.

Mr. Hodgkinson: I think we are. We have tried to approach it in an intelligent way, without being hypocritical. To exclude it is against our policy because I don't think this is our own personal position.

Senator McElman: Our research data suggests that Chatelaine is read by more fifteen to twenty year olds, than is Miss Chatelaine. I believe the order of percentages is something around thirty-five percent of that age group for Chatelaine and twenty-three to twenty-four percent for Miss Chatelaine.

Is this a duplication, and if so why do you publish the two?

Mr. Hodgkinson: I think there is some duplication. In the first place I think it is quite natural that Chatelaine would have more readers of that age than Miss Chatelaine, because Chatelaine publishes in the English language edition a million copies an issue, whereas Miss Chatelaine publishes one hundred and fifty thousand copies per issue, and it is going into that many more homes.

There would be some duplication because when we introduced Miss Chatelaine we introduced it in a very unusual way. We introduced it first as a section inside of Chatelaine, and then took the section out of Chatelaine and introduced it on the front cover of Chatelaine on the news stand copies only, in a piggy-back technique.

When it became identified on its own merit we spun it off the front cover, and sold it on its own. Now it is entirely on its own. So there would be some duplication. I think the important factor in the manner in which Miss Chatelaine communicates with the young person and the manner in which Chatelaine communicates with the young person which is entirely different.

The whole atmosphere of Miss Chatelaine is for the teenage girl, and others are trespassing. This is her product. In the other case, in the case of Chatelaine it is a general age magazine for women, so no one is trespassing as long as they are women. If you are reading it you are trespassing, but not as long as women are reading it.

Young people respond very, very aggressively to something which is theirs. You send a piece of mail to a young person and how many pieces do they get? When I open my mail at my own home—I have two boys and if there is a letter to one of my sons once in two months, that is it. I get about fifty thousand pieces every week. He is exhilarated to get this. This is his. Somebody finally recognized me as a person. It is not my mother's magazine, or my father's, but my magazine. I think that is the big difference. It is the method of communication.

Senator McElman: Do you ever reduce the combined rate for advertising in the two?

Mr. Hodgkinson: No.

Senator McElman: They are straight rates.

Mr. Hodgkinson: Yes. Costed on their own, sold on their own.

The Chairman: Senator Kinnear.

Senator Kinnear: Did you get the idea for Miss Chatelaine from Seventeen?

Mr. Hodgkinson: Yes. I would like to expand on that a little. There have been a lot of comments at the hearings here, regarding Senator O'Leary's report, and I think it is a fair statement to say that if Senator O'Leary's report had not been made, and there had not been subsequent action by the government there would be no Miss Chatelaine.

The fact that a magazine like Seventeen was not allowed to come to this country and sell advertising into its Canadian copies, permitted us an opportunity to develop a magazine, and a damn good magazine, for girls. Every bit as good as Seventeen; in fact far better than Seventeen for this market.

The Chairman: Was Seventeen getting ready to come into the market with a Canadian issue?

Mr. Hodgkinson: Yes, they certainly were.

The Chairman: You know that for a fact?

Mr. Hodgkinson: Yes. The section we started in our magazine was encouraged to me by the garment manufacturers, who are going to run sections in Seventeen.

Mr. Fortier: Supplementary?

The Chairman: Yes, Mr. Fortier.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: Mrs. Saint-Martin, has there been any need felt on the Quebec market to publish Miss Chatelaine in French?

Mrs. Saint-Martin: This is something we have considered as the development of secondary education has made the milieu of Quebec youth much more similar to the milieu of English Canadian youth—a situation which surely did not exist five or six years ago. From the publishing standpoint, I believe that this would meet a need on the part of young girls in Quebec. But there are other aspects to the problem here.

Mr. Fortier: Have you made any recommendations to this effect to your parent company in Toronto?

Mrs. Saint-Martin: It is a plan which has very often been suggested and is being discussed.

[Text]

Senator McElman: It was indicated your publication La Revue Moderne is not very profitable; as a matter of fact might be something other than profitable. Why do you publish it? Is it their wish to be national?

Mr. Hodgkinson: I think there are several reasons to this. I think the very broad spectrum of it—remember this magazine was started in 1960 and at that time The Ladies Home Journal and McCalls Magazine in the English language had circulations in excess of 300,000 copies per issue in Canada. There was no guarantee that The Ladies Home Journal and McCalls would not come into Canada with Canadian editions, if we had not reorganized the Chatelaine English language edition where it absorbed the unexpired subscriptions of The Canadian Home Journal in order to put Chatelaine in a stronger position, vis-à-vis any United States magazine contemplating this sort of idea.

To expand that further, we said that if we went into French Canada—and this is the business side of things—if we went into French Canada and established a comparable magazine in French Canada, we would make it damned difficult for McCalls or Ladies Home Journal to come into this country, because they would not only have to publish a very large circulation English language magazine, but also publish a French language magazine.

That was the selfish motive. There was a second motive, which I think was really more important. French Canada historically had not had strong magazines. It has been a newspaper and broadcast province. We felt that we had the capability of providing for the French language people and opportunity to establish a magazine of a North American standard for them to communicate with themselves. Really this was the key to it. We felt, if they are going to develop at the rate—and incidentally 1960 was the beginning of the Quiet Revolution down there, and I was perhaps a little more closely aligned with it than some others.

I had lived there and I was married to a French-speaking Canadian girl, and I was pretty well tuned into this thing.

I felt in making the recommendation to our company to get into this, that we would be serving the country very well, and serving the people of the Province of Quebec very well, and that has proven to be so. We have had a fine magazine.

Madame Saint-Martin was the original editor of this magazine, and we have helped the journalists of that province get a forum for their material, and I think we have played a very, very significant role in bringing women into a great many more areas of interest than would have been the case otherwise.

Incidentally, this is an ad lib—I was told not to ad lib, but I will—because I think the tying together of this country is a very important thing, and I think women are the ones who are going to make that most positive role. I don't hear many women saying they don't care if the country is Canadian or not. They are not involved in business, they are not working for U.S. organizations, or British, or anybody else. They are in a family environment, in their home, and they happen to be Canadian.

I think a very important factor in any of these proceedings is to consider that the heart and soul of the nationalism of this country really rests in the minds of women.

Senator McElman: Much more than economics. Do you feel your Group would be prepared to continue in even a minor loss position for those two purposes, for these two reasons?

Mr. Hodgkinson: My job at Maclean-Hunter is to try and publish the women's magazines as effectively as I possibly can. It is also to keep our company sold on the need to produce magazines. I cannot speak for the long-term aspects of this. I would certainly, with all my heart and vigor, try to persuade our company to continue them despite any adverse economics.

Senator McElman: I note that in 1968 La Revue Moderne had approximately forty editorial pages on the average, with ten editorial staff, and Chatelaine had on the average forty-nine to fifty editorial pages, and twenty-one editorial staff.

What does this indicate?

Mr. Hodgkinson: The major difference in this, is that in the one area in which we have a great deal of common editorial—and it has been economic more than any other reason—has been in the service areas of our magazines. In Toronto we have the Chatelaine Institute, which prepares all our food articles. Now it is just a matter of straight economics that a picture of a food setting looks the same in English, or in French. The recipes can be altered. In the service department we have built up a much larger staff in Toronto than we have had in Montreal for the French magazine.

Another thing is, we run some services which we don't handle at all in the French language magazines—areas of patterns and crafts, which is two people—one and a half, as one is only on part-time now. We don't run that type of service feature in the French language magazines. It is just because of economics, really. We hope some day to be able to have the same departments.

First and foremost, we thought the key was getting a forum for expression of their ideas and hopes and aspirations, and the service department in that sense are subordinated to the others. Then we have had to make economies, you have got the figures. We have done what we could to the capability of our resources. Again I think we turn out a wonderful magazine. To some degree it presents hardships to Madame Saint-Martin, but we understand, and I say, "we" collectively, we understand the difficulties in putting a strong magazine in French Canada and so we put up with the hardships and hope to continue to improve them.

Senator McElman: Is there any large measure of conversion of the stories from the English language edition to the French language?

Mr. Hodgkinson: There is a very real effort made to utilize the research material and the base subject material from quite a number of stories in the French language. They will expand the research to their particular milieu, and they will develop it perhaps a little differently, a little further. There is a very real effort, yes; and quite a few articles that appear in the English language magazine where a similar type article appears in the French language edition.

In the service areas there is a more substantial common editorial for the reasons I have mentioned, and also articles in the English language magazine that originate from the French language magazine. Not as many as we would like to see, but there is a different level of development in the market, or audiences, and there is not much point talking to people in English Canada about an educational article that appears in the French language magazine because they are at a different stage in their development educationally from the standpoint of the systems and the problems. It is difficult in those types of articles but we do have, I think, a very real co-operation between the editors in the development of material.

They discuss this long in advance of the article being completed. It is a programme sort of thing on a continuing basis.

The Chairman: Senator Quart, you have a supplementary question?

Senator Quart: Yes. Regarding handicrafts, I think particularly in the Province of Quebec that French Canadian women are probably more interested in some of these handicrafts than in the other provinces.

Mr. Hodgkinson: There is no question.

Senator Quart: I am sure Madame Saint-Martin would be very happy, you know, if you did add that service. Try it out.

Mr. Hodgkinson: I would be very happy. It is the cost factor.

Senator Quart: Yes, I realize that.

Mr. Hodgkinson: We are up to here right now in our costs. When we can afford it we will do it. I think the handicrafts in French speaking Canada are the best in the world.

Senator Quart: I do too. I think they are marvelous. I am not French, but I understand and appreciate my French Canadian citizens, and fully appreciate what you have said in your ad lib. My ad lib at the moment is out of line with the questioning.

Maybe you would find you would increase your membership in your magazine, if you did have that. I think that type of article would appeal especially to the type of readers you have.

Mr. Hodgkinson: Do you think it would appeal to the young?

Senator Quart: Yes, I do. I am just going back to the family, my own family. I have twenty-three grandchildren, and quite a number of them are girls. I think there is a resurgence, let's say, of interest in handicrafts and dressmaking and all this type of thing in Quebec just now, more than before.

Mr. Hodgkinson: I think if I could just speak very briefly on that subject. It is not that we don't treat handicrafts in our editorial. We don't develop our own handicrafts. In the English language magazine we have a crafts editor, who actually develops original handicrafts herself, and then we produce this in the magazine, and sell to our reader a kit so she can make this handicraft herself.

That is where it takes people. To produce information regarding handicrafts, we do this upon occasion, but your point is very well taken.

Senator Quart: I am perfectly sure that Cercle des Fermières would go along with it too.

Madame Saint-Martin: This is quite true. Certainly a lot of projects of this sort we would like to realize eventually. Naturally we have been hearing about the facts of life here, and it is a fact of life that our circulation is a little less than one-third of the English, and we cannot have the same editorial budget. That is not to be pessimistic; on the contrary, I think the situation is developing, and I am very confident that pretty soon we will be able to realize all these projects we feel also are important.

Senator Quart: It is just a thought I had.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: Mrs. Anderson, correct me if I'm wrong, I gained the impression that Chatelaine does not deal very extensively with outdoor activity of the family or the mother. Is this correct?

Mrs. Anderson: What do you mean... sports?

Senator McElman: Sports, winter activity.

Mrs. Anderson: No, that is not true, I don't think. We ran a series of articles on What Every Woman Should Know About Baseball; What Every Woman Should Know About Football; What Every Woman Should Know About Hockey; What Every Woman Should Know About Golf; so that she would be able to talk intelligently to her husband on the subjects. We ran articles on where you can get the best deals on ski facilities for families, and I think we pretty well cover all subjects of interest, that would be of interest to families, and that is one of them, of course.

We range far more broadly than that. We ran articles on off-beat activities that families can take part in, like rock collecting; many, many articles on camping, the best camping sites.

The Chairman: Do you have a supplementary question, Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Yes. I have seen figures somewhere to the effect that one sport which is most patronized by women is wrestling—from a spectators point of view.

Mrs. Anderson: We haven't covered that. I think we will let them figure that one out for themselves!

Senator McElman: What I had in mind, other than wrestling, is there seems to be a tremendous trend in the last few years in Canada, certainly in my part of Canada, the Maritimes, that cottages are no longer cottages; they are no longer summer cottages, let us put it that way. They have become year-round as a centre of family activity.

I personally regard it as a tremendous development. Families, instead of hibernating into the house in the winter in front of the "idiot box" are getting out as families—through the ski-doo largely. I haven't seen anything trending this way in your magazine. Am I wrong again?

Mrs. Anderson: Well, I don't know how many articles we have run on camping. There are certainly families that can afford to have a winterized home, but that is fairly expensive. I think that our audience, which is a very broad one, is more likely to have a tent, or to buy a camper. Anyway, I think this is even a better activity for them. They get around the country and they see the rest of Canada.

My own family, my husband and three sons, go down to Prince Edward Island every summer to a cottage, but I don't really know whether this is such a general thing.

What you are saying is we should say everyone should have a winterized cottage? I think that would be great, but, I am not too sure they could afford it.

Senator McElman: For a large part they are not winterized at all. However, this is getting aside from the main point.

Mr. Hodgkinson: In the April issue we have a story on women in unusual sporting activities. One is a parachutist, another a speed driver, and so on. We feature people like Nancy Greene and so on, and certainly the accomplishments of Betsy Clifford are tremendous. I think we get at it through the people who have done things along this line, rather than specific articles on the fact when it is available.

Senator Smith: Many I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that March is a bad month to do things outdoors. The table of contents I have read suggests a lot more interesting things indoors.

Mr. Fortier: There are.

Senator McElman: If you are young, they are just as interesting outdoors. Mr. Hodgkinson, do you, as a continuing practice, advertise your magazine in the other media? I have noted numerous comments about competition from the other media. Let's look at the electronic; do you in radio do promotional advertising of Chatelaine?

Mr. Hodgkinson: We have tried in radio, but it doesn't work very effectively for us. In French Canada I believe we are still using some radio, and it is working effectively there. Most of our promotion in the broadcast area is on a contra-account basis with the C.B.C.

We have a very extensive program in the major cities across the country. We don't do it in every city, but use seven major cities. It is a very substantial programme.

The Chairman: With the C.B.C.?

Mr. Hodgkinson: Yes.

The Chairman: What do you give the C.B.C. in return?

Mr. Hodgkinson: They run an equivalent amount in our magazine to promote their programs.

Senator Hays: I live in a house where I am the only male, and we have quite a few females. We are fortunate to have three bathrooms, and there is a Chatelaine in each one, like to old Eaton's Catalogue, so occasionally I get the opportunity to go through some of the Chatelaines.

The Prime Minister at Harrison Hot Springs made what I thought was a very significant statement as to the future of Canada, and some of the things we should be thinking about, which was quietly either ignored or criticized and so on.

You spoke quite a bit about the amount of space you do give in the paper to pollution, abortion, studies on women. You had a great deal about birth control in it, because I have read it. Why haven't you done some stories about selective breeding in people? It is a very important thing.

Mrs. Anderson: We have.

Senator Hays: It seems to me this is one of the great problems we have.

Mrs. Anderson: We ran an article about five years ago by Dr. Muller, the great geneticist, at the University of Wisconsin. The theme of the article was we were breeding ourselves out of existence. It was not a very popular article, I can tell you.

Senator Hays: None of these things are popular in the beginning. It seems to me men are not going to do this in their sort of magazines, because the males are pretty egotistic, but I think that a woman has the right to choose the sire of her child who may be entirely different from her lover.

Mrs. Anderson: I think women in general do choose the sire of their child.

Senator Hays: On what basis?

Mrs. Anderson: I think it is a wild myth that men decide who they are going to marry. I think women really decide who they are going to marry.

Senator Hays: Do you think they look upon them and say, "I am going to have an athlete or singer", or any of this sort of thing, "or an editor of a newspaper or a publisher?"

Mrs. Anderson: Well, if you can narrow it down that closely, you know,—I think it may be an interesting thing to think about, but I don't think science has accomplished this yet.

Senator Hays: Indeed we have. In the livestock world we would be all starving if we hadn't done it. I have a thousand head of cattle on my farm, and I haven't had a crazy calf in ten years, and I am pretty pleased about that.

Mr. Fortier: Tell us about the girls in your house now!

Senator Hays: You talk about everything else, and I think this is the place, I think it is coming.

Mrs. Anderson: Would you like to write an article for us? I would be very happy to print it... We Should Have Selective Breeding in Human Beings, by Senator Hays.

Senator Hays: Well I have a hard time speaking English.

Mrs. Anderson: I will provide you with a writer.

Senator Hays: I think it is important, I really do. Today you can have a pedigree to say that out of seven children you may have a hare-lipped child. It says in the first chapter of the Bible, that like begets like; what you see you get in return.

I think when the Prime Minister mentioned this he was talking over the heads of the people. I think it is much closer than 50 years.

Mrs. Anderson: I think it is very interesting.

The Chairman: Senator...

Senator Hays: You don't give me much time.

The Chairman: Sometimes it seems to me you stray from the focal point of the Committee.

Senator Hays: No, I am through. I wonder why we don't do this. I am quite concerned about this. We do it in everything else whether it is a rose or a tulip or a grain of wheat.

The Chairman: Or a Senator, Mme Saint-Martin says.

I would suggest that Mrs. Anderson may have been serious when she suggested you write something. Were you?

Mrs. Anderson: Certainly. Absolutely serious.

The Chairman: I would like to put a question to you. Mr. McEachern told us, he made an opening remark comparing the circulation of Canadian magazines to American and pointed out that by American standards Canadian magazines sell phenomenally well. We also know that by Canadian media standards that Chatelaine sells quite well indeed. I think the point was made that more than 50 percent of the women of Canada read Chatelaine. I think by the standards of any publications of any kind which has come before this Committee, I cannot recall any other publications thus far at least—and I stand to be corrected—that has been able to make a claim even approaching this.

Now the question I put to you, and I don't want you to give away trade secrets, what is the formula for this incredible success?

Mrs. Anderson: I don't think there are any trade secrets.

Mr. McEachern: Two very good editors. That is it.

The Chairman: Two magazines in the United States that I would compare are The Ladies Home Journal and McCalls, and yet by any standard Chatelaine is more successful than either of them.

Mr. Hodgkinson: It has been very interesting that up until about two months ago The Ladies Home Journal and McCalls were both edited by men. They have to be pretty smart men. They just cannot orient with the subject material in a ladies' magazine in the same way as a woman will in a woman's magazine. I think as Mr. McEachern pointed out we have had two very capable editors.

The Chairman: I agree. When I was putting the question to Mrs. Anderson I included certainly the French magazine in the same kind of approach, the same kind of domination. So let us concede Mr. McEachern's and Mr. Hodgkinson's point—two smart editors.

Is there a formula? Is there a secret? For example, could you do the same thing for a general interest magazine, Madame Saint-Martin?

Mrs. Saint-Martin: I think so.

Mr. Fortier: In view of this comment of Mr. McEachern's praise, Mrs. Anderson, back in 1969, not so long ago, September, 1969, Mr. McEachern asked you to examine Maclean's and spell out what was needed. Did you report? Did you carry out that study?

Mrs. Anderson: Yes, I did.

Mr. Fortier: Did you report?

Mrs. Anderson: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: What did you tell them was needed at Macleans?

Mrs. Anderson: Well, I think that would take a couple of hours to go into.

Mr. Fortier: Could you give us a resume.

Mrs. Anderson: I don't think it has got anything to do with this Committee, and I am not saying the answers were even possibly near to being correct, but at least they were my point of view.

Mr. Fortier: Was one of your suggestions the introduction of a woman editor?

Mrs. Anderson: No.

The Chairman: If the witness does not want to discuss what was presumably in a confidential memorandum, or a private memorandum, I don't think she should be asked; nor was that incidentally where my question was leading.

You said you could do the same thing for a general interest magazine. Could you go to New York and do the same thing for McCalls or The Ladies Home Journal?

Mrs. Saint-Martin: I don't think I could. I think it is my knowledge of my own milieu, of its evolution of the women there, of the sensibility of the people there. I feel I can talk to them of things that really interest them, and from this point of view I would have to be born in another milieu to be able to do so.

Mrs. Anderson: I think it would be harder. I think the fact that I was born in Canada and married a Maritimer, and know the country very well makes it very much easier for me to operate here. I think although there is a much closer relationship between the U.S. women's magazines and the Canadian women's magazines in English, I don't think that it would be easy.

The Chairman: I assume you differ with something Mr. Gzowski said here. He said he thinks the day of the personalized monthly magazine editorial has disappeared. Now you write each month in Chatelaine a very forthright article which I read every month, and you take some fairly strong positions.

Do you disagree with his suggestion this morning?

Mrs. Anderson: I think every editor has to edit a magazine the way he sees it. I find the editorial, the personalized editorial form, a very useful device for covering sharp controversial issues very quickly, and I would hate to give it up. I cannot see that I am going to give it up. I can't see that I am going to run out of topics, or that the country is going to have all its problems beautifully solved that I am going to have nothing to say.

The Chairman: In your oral statement you talked about big dramatic changes—your words which I have written down—which are beginning to take place in Canada, and as far as acceptance by women, Chatelaine has at least partially paved the way.

I wrote down to ask you for some examples, but you gave a number of examples. You talked about divorce laws and abortion and so on.

What are the things which concern you now in this area of big dramatic changes? What will you be editorializing upon in the foreseeable future?

Mrs. Anderson: I wish I had a crystal ball, but I can see a few of them. I think in the 1970s there are going to be many more women very much more actively and equally taking a place in society. We have had a sort of tokenism of women, token women on the Board, we have one woman sitting in our House of Commons. I think women, especially young women, are getting very determined that they are going to take a much more active and effective and less sort of token position in society in the future.

The Chairman: What is the Women's Liberation Movement?

Mrs. Anderson: You don't know?

The Chairman: I have an idea, but I want you to tell me.

Mrs. Anderson: Well, it is not just—that is one title for one particular group. In the United States I think there is something like ten and in Canada there are three. One of the problems women have is they cannot agree too closely on things, and tend to splinter up into all kinds of little groups. Basically all three groups are concerned about getting more representation of women in Parliament, in public bodies, and that women's voices are going to be heard and that women's opinions are going to be listened to, and women are going to have a much more equal chance at jobs, in business, in politics.

The Chairman: This is the thing you have been talking about and that is the direction in which you hope to lead your readership?

Mrs. Anderson: I don't know whether my readership all want to go in that direction. A substantial number do, so I think my position is to represent that, as well as the woman who is quite content to be a traditional homemaker.

The Chairman: Madame Saint-Martin, would you care to comment?

Mrs. Saint-Martin: On the question of the editorial itself in each issue, I also disagree with what Mr. Gzowski was saying. I feel in a general way the magazine—every free-lance person working for us tries to present the questions objectively, and most of the time they go to see different people, different opinions. Usually we give to the reader some kind of background information on problems so they can form their own opinion, but I think the individual editor on its own basis in the magazine can propose some kind of synthesis on all this divergent opinion given on those things.

We don't have enough people talking. I don't mean it is very important what I say, but I think there should be more people taking positions and expressing their views as rationally as possible, making a point, instead of keeping from taking any stands. The magazine itself cannot take stands. That is not the formula on which we work. For this reason, I think the editorial still has an important purpose, and the readers disagree, or agree, and discuss it. It is an individual who is writing. This person says such a thing for such and such a reason.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier, do you have a question?

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: An additional question. You state that it is an individual who is speaking through an editorial. I note that you sign your editorials...

In the French Canadian newspaper, the writer of the editorial signs it. Can you tell us, Mrs. Saint-Martin, whether you see any advantages to the editorial's being signed?

Mrs. Saint-Martin: Tremendous advantages. Under the cloak of anonymity, it is too simple. It is too easy to deal in generalities and even contradict oneself at six-month intervals. An editorialist is part of a group of four or five who give their opinions on a problem, but the situation evolves; there is something else to be added, or the position may be changed and the editorialist may encourage a lively dialogue with his readers. I find it extremely important that everyone knows who is speaking, what his past is, what position he took before. It is the only way to establish a lively dialogue between the publication and the public.

Mr. Fortier: How do you explain the fact that in English Canada, England and even the United States, editorials are not signed?

Mrs. Saint-Martin: I confess that I cannot explain it. I do not understand it because, in my opinion, I feel it has an additional advantage. When articles are signed, the publication concerned can even publish articles contrary to the position of the editor in chief or editor, thus providing varying viewpoints. I can see only advantages to a signature.

[Text]

Mr. Fortier: Mrs. Anderson also signed her own editorials. I am sure you know in English newspapers there are no editorials that I know of in Canada which are signed; whereas in the French...

Mrs. Anderson, would you care to comment?

Mrs. Anderson: Why editorials are not signed in the English press? First of all, there are often half a dozen people writing them. I think if you sign something it is certainly an opinionated thing, it is very definitely your own opinion. I think in daily newspapers today the trend is much more to subjective journalism, and signed articles, and a definite point of view.

Mr. Fortier: In-depth articles?

Mrs. Anderson: Yes, throughout the whole paper. I think the editorial page of any newspaper in my opinion, tends to reflect the editorial position of the paper and the publisher, and this is the reason it is not signed.

I think in a magazine it is a different situation, there is one editor.

Mr. Fortier: You do make a distinction?

Mrs. Anderson: Yes. I have had people phone me up and say, "Are you Doris Anderson?" and when I say I am, they say, "I am cancelling my subscription because of what you said in your last editorial" and I don't mind at all.

The Chairman: Do you mind, Mr. Hodgkinson

Mr. Hodgkinson: Not a bit.

Mr. Fortier: We know that Senator Davey and Senator Hays read Chatelaine. Have you ever conducted a study to ascertain what percentage of your readers were males?

Mrs. Anderson: I regret to say, no. I would like very much to know. One time we used to run a contest for the best family favourite recipes, and one year a man won, so there is no discrimination against males in Chatelaine, you can't say that if a man won the recipe contest.

Mr. Hodgkinson: We haven't conducted studies ourselves. The Magazine Advertising Bureau conducts an industry study, which shows the male and female readership of publications, so we have an idea of how many men read the publication through that particular study, and it is a surprisingly large number. Somewhere around eight or nine hundred thousand men read Chatelaine.

I think the same thing is true as the comment I made regarding Miss Chatelaine. They don't read it in the same way that women will; they don't read it for the same purposes. One of the areas they may read in Chatelaine is the major home features. We perhaps have done more...

The Chairman: Excuse me. Do you mean eight hundred or nine hundred thousand men read Chatelaine?

Mr. Hodgkinson: Yes.

The Chairman: And the total circulation is?

Mr. Hodgkinson: We have point seven male readers per copy. We have between the two magazines one million two hundred and fifty thousand copies, so if you multiply that out, I think it comes somewhere in that area. We don't talk about it, because it is not a selling factor as far as we are concerned.

I think, for instance, on our model home promotion, which normally is running in the September issue, and where we physically have a home designed for us, and physically have homes constructed in various areas throughout the country, now in this type of feature I think men are very significantly interested. We have homes open to the public, and get anywhere from fifty to one hundred and fifty thousand people going through them. We have had them in virtually every city in the country. Bob Campeau and Minto has built them here. I think that type of feature—men will pick up the magazine while they are in the washroom because their wife has left it there, and glance through it and become interested in that type of feature.

Mr. Fortier: My question, Mrs. Anderson and Madame Saint-Martin: do you take this very high percentage of male readers into consideration when you put together a magazine, an issue, or do you dismiss that silent minority?

Mrs. Anderson: I think the answer to that is very simple, that I don't think there is any great divide between male and female readers today. I think in the days of Edward Bok and Ladies' Goady's books, there was a female type of magazine and a definitely male type of magazine. I think today that women are interested in a very broad spectrum of subjects, and many of the subjects we run in Chatelaine could, I think, just as easily run in Macleans, or any other general interest magazine. They are not specially slanted to women.

I am delighted to know we have so many male readers. I had no idea we did. I will certainly hold it clearly in my mind.

Senator Hays: How else are they going to learn about women, if they don't read Chatelaine?

The Chairman: Madame Saint-Martin, would you like to comment on that?

Madame Saint-Martin: If each copy was read by one man it is a lot of men in Quebec. I don't think this influences us at all on the programming of the magazine. Every time we talk to women, or expose something to women, we know we are talking to her, but there is another voice in the house and society which is men, and how men see things, and how men react to situations.

Every time we discuss family problems or psychology or the evolution of women, we have to think about men and what is the position of men in our society towards everything we are talking about. That may be the way we are answering to some objections. We discuss them in articles. That may be why men are interested. From what I hear, the woman reads the magazine and she takes the magazine to him and says, "You have to read this article on psychology of women. I must talk about it." She wants him to know about it.

The Chairman: Senator Quart agrees with you.

Senator Quart: One hundred percent. While I have the floor, you will probably be very happy to know that when the austerity program struck the Senate Reading Room—I don't know who was responsible...

Senator Smith: I was. Committee expansion was the factor involved.

Senator Quart: Anyway, when so many of the publications were cancelled, subscriptions were cancelled, we were very happy to learn that Chatelaine had been left.

Senator Smith: Certainly. We left the choice magazines, also Macleans.

The Chairman: Senator Kinnear?

Senator Kinnear: Mr. Chairman, I noticed when Mrs. Anderson was going over some things they had been writing about, she covered so many of the subjects we have had great interest in, in the past ten years, and you mentioned pollution at the top, which you started quite a long time ago. I would like you very much to keep at it until the Great Lakes Basin is cleared up. And that is a very serious statement I am making.

I was going to talk on environmental quality, but so many things have been said today on articles that you have been writing it made me think of something you might do, and I hope you won't suggest I am trying to make some rules for your magazine.

I thought that laws pertaining to women and children would be a most interesting subject to write on occasionally pick a different topic each time. I know a great many women are asked to speak on these subjects and you have covered some of them; estate taxes, for instance, wills, nursing homes. Nursing homes have come under public scrutiny a great deal recently.

The Chairman: I think that Mrs. Anderson did speak about nursing homes in her opening comment.

Senator Kinnear: Yes, she did and I want to commend her for doing that, because it is very topical, all these things at the moment. I thought I might drop the idea if laws from time to time were discussed under a heading pertaining to women and children it would be read very widely, I know in Ontario. I am across the country too, and I know that is very much the subject that is asked about.

The Chairman: Would you care to comment on that?

Mrs. Anderson: We have touched on this in various ways. We did run a whole section "The Law and You" written by Robert Fulford some years ago, he is now the editor of Saturday Night. We touch on it all the time when it is a topic, for example, that concerns women; the Family Court for example, divorce laws, and all other topics.

We have not tied it all together in quite the way you are suggesting. I will keep that in mind.

Senator Kinnear: I would take them separately because women are anxious to know. I have another point that you could educate us in, is our household duties and public relations. For instance, a great many people don't know how to write cheques and they are puzzled when they are suddenly confronted with the fact they must run a household; not only older people who suddenly realize they no longer have a husband, either through death or being left without one, and they don't know how to carry on. It is quite a serious matter. They don't know how to pay the public utilities. They are always behind, and they say, "This is lovely. My husband will do this. I don't have to think about it." Suddenly they have no husband and there is a blank wall, and they don't know how to do anything. I think it would be great sometime if you could write these articles under separate headings, from time to time.

It surely is a fine magazine for women.

Mrs. Anderson: Thank you very much.

Senator Quart: Talking about that, and following along what Senator Kinnear said, there is a woman in Canada, Mrs. Chapman, who writes guidelines and sends you questionnaires. She is coming to Ontario, and she has been writing to me. May I suggest probably some type of articles that you could follow along, and I mean this seriously, although it may sound funny.

For instance, since so many men read your magazine in various places—I would like to tell you something a little later that maybe Senator Hays got the idea from a letter we got jointly—may I suggest it would not be a bad idea to write something to alleviate some, at least, of the worry that men are having now, and seeing they read the magazine, about matriarchal rule. You could bring it up in such a way that it seems more obvious now, but between ourselves there always has been matriarchal rule in some sense or other.

Senator Prowse: You will never make it popular.

Senator Quart: You will be surprised.

Mr. Hodgkinson: I thought you were a friend of mine. You are trying to put me out of business. The day this magazine starts to direct its editorial to men will be the day there will no longer be a Chatelaine in Canada.

Senator Quart: You are quite right. I apologize for that thought.

The Chairman: We have another brief that we are going to receive in a few minutes, but may I put two questions to you? There are two comments in your brief I want to ask you about.

At the bottom of page 6, you say "This has virtually eliminated competition for advertising revenue among the magazines themselves."

Mr. Hodgkinson: That is a little strong.

The Chairman: Would you comment?

Mr. Hodgkinson: I read this myself and felt it was stronger than I intended it to be. There is not a great deal of time spent competitively selling one magazine against the other today. That is relatively new. The dollars that are available to magazines have been spelled out here on two or three different occasions—2.4 or 2.5 percent of the total national advertising dollars in all media in Canada. I perhaps don't see as much as some others. There are no women's magazines in Canada with which I am competing actually. I certainly will compete with Time, Reader's Digest, Maclean's or anybody else for the advertising dollar out there, because if they get it, I may not. There is competition in that way. The big competition is really in this whole area. I am thinking of my field, which is dealing with package goods, toiletry products, household furnishings. You can look at the television any day in the week and you will see fifty, sixty, seventy advertising messages a day on these subjects. This is where my revenue goes and I have got to keep my eye on that ball, so when I am talking magazines I am probably talking more on Chatelaine than I am the others.

The Chairman: We had a somewhat similar discussion last week with the business press. I don't know whether you were here as that time, or not, but over a dinner recess some of our research people got, I think, the last two or three issues of Time and pulled out of there at least eight, maybe more, advertisements. I went over them with Mr. Gilmour and said, "Would that be one of your business press advertisers?" Now the answer in each case was, "Yes".

Would it not be equally true to say that the current issue of Time, if you went over to the Chateau and bought one, would contain twenty-five, to strike a figure—advertisers who could perhaps use Chatelaine?

Mr. Hodgkinson: I don't think there would be one an issue. The only ones you consider that would be subject in product classification areas such as travel, yes, women travel. Liquors, alcohol or beverages—but I don't think we are necessarily the first medium for those products. The day that I see in Time magazine a great deal of advertising on foundation garments, or a great deal of advertising on food products that are mass produced food products, then I will think they are competing with me and I will go and whip them right up the back. I think I have a better market than they have, and then I am not doing my job.

The Chairman: I am sure each one of us will look at Time and Chatelaine and remember the conversation. I may be high, and I think you may be low.

Perhaps I will preface this by asking you a question which may seem unrelated, but as far as newspapers are concerned would you make any comment on the trend toward concentrated ownership in the daily newspapers in this country.

Mr. Hodgkinson: I haven't had any strong views on this. I feel much the same as Senator O'Leary said about them—that the people who own and operate publishing business are people and first of all have to be judged on that basis.

If running a series of newspapers and a chain of newspapers is anything like running a magazine the publisher could not be intimately involved with every editorial feature, or every editorial point of view put forth in these. He has too many other things to worry about. I cannot see if a person is a serious citizen of this country whether he has one or ten newspapers—I don't really think it is that important.

The Chairman: You are not concerned about it, in other words.

Mr. Hodgkinson: No.

The Chairman: You are being consistent. I was going to ask you about your statement on page 9: "I believe the circumstances dictate a greater concentration of magazines in larger corporate hands."

You believe, as you say here, that it would be in the interests of the people of Canada to have even greater concentration of magazines in larger corporate hands. Do you think that is in the public interest?

Mr. Hodgkinson: Of mass media, yes.

The Chairman: You say magazines.

Mr. Hodgkinson: I am writing in the context here that we are appearing before a Committee on Mass Media. I think it is highly improbable anybody would start a mass circulation magazine.

The Chairman: I am not asking about probability. I am asking about desirability.

Mr. Hodgkinson: All right. I think a person who has the facility and has the resources and has the expertise can do a better job in the mass vehicle than can somebody who is operating from a shoe string. The greatest frustration in this business is if you are competing out there in the marketplace, competing with a lot of excellent products.

The Chairman: Mr. Gzowski said this morning he estimated you would need $450,000 to start a magazine.

Mr. Hodgkinson: It depends what circulation level he is aiming the magazine.

The Chairman: Do you think it would be desirable if someone with $450,000 in this country started a new magazine?

Mr. Hodgkinson: Yes.

The Chairman: You do?

Mr. Hodgkinson: Yes, sir. I believe that circumstances dictate a greater concentration, mainly economic circumstances and expertise.

Everybody in this country thinks they can publish a magazine. Everybody has an opinion on publishing of magazines.

The Chairman: Just a moment. If everyone has an opinion, why are not more magazine started all the time? I don't see that many new magazines.

Mr. Hodgkinson: Because only about ten people really know how to publish them. Any time anyone gets into it they end up going bankrupt because they don't know how to publish magazines. I believe there is an expertise that is very important here in addition to money. Since I have been with Maclean-Hunter in the women's magazines we have started Chatelaine and La Revue Moderne, started Miss Chatelaine and tried Hostess. We were bombed out on Hostess, not because we didn't have the expertise, but we just didn't have enough money to do what circumstances said we would have to have. I think a magazine is a very personal thing to a lot of people, and they read it and they say, "I don't think that article should be there." And they automatically start becoming editors or publishers.

They think some day they would like to have a magazine. This is the way most are started. I hope that continues.

The Chairman: Would you prefer circumstances to be different?

Mr. Hodgkinson: I certainly would, but they are not.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: You do not circulate outside the country any appreciable part of your circulation?

Mr. Hodgkinson: No. We have a few thousand copies that go to people in the United States, usually people who have lived here and who have gone to live in the United States or England. Sometimes there is a gift subscription to someone in another country to let them know what is going on in this country.

Senator McElman: Have you tried to enter?

Mr. Hodgkinson: No.

Senator McElman: Why not?

Mr. Hodgkinson: Too expensive, too expensive to get circulation to begin with, and there is no value to us from a business standpoint. An advertiser is not interested in us having 50,000 copies circulation of Chatelaine in England. His product is not interested in selling in England. The reverse is true in thinking of the United States and Canada. Maxwell House Coffee is sold in the United States and Maxwell House Coffee is sold in Canada. It is of interest to General Foods to see copies from the United States of their magazine flowing over here. Why not? It helps them.

The same is not true if you have the Canadian subsidiary paying for the advertising in Chatelaine and Chatelaine is flowing into the United States. They are just not interested in paying anything going that way. I would love to feel we could. I would like to see Canada promoted in those areas, but I am afraid that it is a job for someone with a lot more resources than Maclean-Hunter.

Senator McElman: To what extent do you farm out your subscription programme, that is to get new subscriptions?

Mr. Hodgkinson: Mr. Rungate spoke to this. He is the circulation director of Chatelaine as well as the whole Maclean-Hunter group, and the figures he gave you stand.

The Chairman: That was last week at the Maclean-Hunter presentation.

Senator McElman: I was present. It is quite all right, I will get it from the record.

The Chairman: It is in the transcript, I am sure.

Any other questions, Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: No.

The Chairman: Do any other Senators have questions? Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Mrs. Anderson and Madame Saint-Martin, given the evolution of taste and the mores in Canada, as we have heard expounded before this Committee, what are your views on the possible use of four-letter words in Chatelaine?

Mr. McEachern: Like "love"!

Mrs. Anderson: I can't recall that we have used them. We have run nudes in Chatelaine and the magazine is still in business. I think we would get a substantial amount of mail. I don't think the mail would be enough to trouble us. It is not something we purposely go out of our way to do.

Mr. Fortier: You don't think in the foreseeable future there will be a need for the use of four-letter words in articles in your magazine?

Mrs. Anderson: I think if it is a natural part, say, of a fiction story that this particular character might use a four-letter word. I think we would look pretty foolish if we put four dots in place.

Mr. Fortier: Would you produce excerpts from Portnoy's Complaint in your magazine?

Mrs. Anderson: It is not the kind of book I think would be—that we would particularly go out of our way to get, and we would never be able to compete with the American book for a piece of it.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: Mrs. Saint-Martin, is the use of...

[Text]

Mrs. Saint-Martin: We don't have in French exactly the same problem of vocabulary. We have others. We have on this level the problem of joul, the French Canadian way of using bilingualism at any level, French and English.

This is certainly an important problem, an acute problem in Quebec for many years. Naturally for all articles and features and everything our criteria are International French. When we come to short stories and fiction pieces and naturally when we have some author like Marcel Dubé or Françoise Loranger, who are very well known and who have produced programmes on T.V. for years, and have plays in the theatre and are very popular and everything, we feel then these people have a right to their own style, their own ways of saying things.

Naturally we don't want them to be vulgar to an extreme degree, and they certainly are not.

In regard to the problem of French, which is very, very acute in the Province of Quebec, we have sometimes to recognize the fact that T.V., the authors, the novelists, the drama writers do use a lot of joul, and we cannot in our area isolate ourselves completely with the main influences on literature and writing in Quebec. Certainly we would allow it in this section or sometimes in interviews with some writers like Robert Charlebois. He has one way of talking that you just cannot translate in French. It is what he is, why he is popular, how he expresses himself even in Paris. We try to tone down some expressions which are not essential, but on the whole there is a flavour to it which is definitely joulal.

Mr. Fortier: I was interested in noting in the M.A.B. 1970 Fact Book on Canadian consumer magazines that one hundred percent of your circulation was in the Province of Quebec, according to this little booklet here. Is this correct?

Mrs. Saint-Martin: I don't think this is correct.

Mr. Hodgkinson: It is not entirely correct, but the percentage outside is really very minimum.

Mr. Fortier: That was going to be my question: whether or not you sought to reach French Canadian readers in other provinces of Canada.

Mrs. Saint-Martin: Yes especially when the magazine was launched we tried to find methods to circulate the magazine outside Quebec. It seems the methods of distribution across Canada do not lend themselves very much to this possibility. I think Mr. Hodgkinson has more knowledge. I would like to see the magazine go all over the country to French speaking Canadians.

Mr. Fortier: Chatelaine goes to all ten provinces.

Mr. Hodgkinson: It is a matter of economics.

Mr. Fortier: Bilingualism is expensive.

Mr. Hodgkinson: It is not just that. There are no newsstand facilities to reach them—very few. In Toronto there are reportedly some seventy to one hundred thousand French speaking people in the city of Toronto, and we tried to find a newsstand—we don't know the names to begin with, and we got the copies back. You do that for a while, and you say, "Obviously we can't reach them that way," and finally you find yourself contracting.

We have done this in virtually every area across the country.

Mr. Fortier: What about New Brunswick, for example, where almost fifty percent of the population is French.

Mr. Hodgkinson: We do have a bit of circulation down there; I think around four or five thousand. We haven't made the same effort.

We felt first of all our content was essentially dealing with the evolution of the province itself, and our message was more direct to those people. We certainly will along the line. No reason why not. We are only ten years old and we have made pretty good strides in ten years.

The Chairman: Any questions, Senators?

We have another brief, Senators, which we are going to receive. If no one has any other questions I would like to ask Mr. Hodgkinson one final question.

When you made reference earlier to a comment which appealed to Senator Quart on national unity, you prefaced it by saying you had been told not to ad lib. I would like to make it clear it was not the Committee or its chairman who suggested that you should not ad lib.

Mr. Hodgkinson: I was told by my wife. She knows when I get going I never stop.

The Chairman: May I then thank you very much, Mr. Hodgkinson. I am sure I don't have to tell you that Chatelaine Group plays a most significant role in the overall structure of mass media in Canada, a role which will doubtless continue and hopefully expand. I think you should also be congratulated because through you we were able to give Mr. McEachern a relaxed afternoon.

I think it should be on the record that we are grateful to you for bringing two of the more charming witnesses we had, and I certainly don't refer to you and Mr. McEachern.

Mr. Hodgkinson: May I make one final statement?

One of the attributes to the quality of Chatelaine is demonstrated in this particular book I am going to give you. This book, Chatelaine Adventures in Cooking, was a manuscript developed by the staff of Chatelaine. The market in Canada was not sufficiently large that we could publish this book in this form, so we went to the United States and talked to the publishers in those very large circulation women's magazines in the United States. When they read the manuscript they found it so attractive they decided to publish over their name in the United States, upon which we get a royalty on every copy so we are taking the trend the other way around.

I think you and your family will find that very helpful.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. We will be about six minutes late starting with The Magazine Advertising Bureau. I will adjourn until a quarter to five, but I would like to start right at a quarter to five.

Again, thank you all.

Mr. Hodgkinson: Thank you very much.

BRIEF OF THE MAGAZINE ADVERTISING BUREAU OF CANADA, INC.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, seated with me is the next witness, Mr. John Crosbie, President of The Magazine Advertising Bureau.

Mr. Crosbie, the brief which you prepared was received some three weeks in advance as requested. I know you have been here for several of the hearings, so I don't think I need to repeat all the things I usually say.

Will you proceed with your statement and following that statement we would like to question you on the statement and perhaps some other matters as well.

Mr. John Crosbie, President of The Magazine Advertising Bureau: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Honourable Senators, ladies and gentlemen, at the outset Mr. Chairman, I would ask you to recognize the following people who have been kind enough to come to this hearing today, as observers, and are now in your audience:

Mr. A. J. Conduit and Mr. Ken Davey, Vice-President of Reader's Digest Association (Canada) Limited. Regrettably our 1970 chairman, Mr. Zimmerman of Reader's Digest is (as you know) prevented by illness from being in Ottawa at this time.

We also have with us, Mr. William Nobleman, President of Saturday Night, and our 1970 Vice-Chairman.

Mr. Lloyd M. Hodgkinson, Publisher of Chatelaine, Châteline, and Miss Chatelaine (our 1969 chairman) from who you have just heard.

Mr. S. S. LaRue, Managing Director of Time International of Canada Limited (our 1968 chairman).

Mr. S. G. Brander, Publisher of Macleans and le Magazine Maclean (our 1966-67 chairman).

Mr. Gregoire Ewing, Director of Public Relations of le Magazine Actualité.

You have already received our concise summary of the purpose and activities of our organization. We made it short, not only out of compassion for you, who are confronted by a wealth of material, but also because the purpose of our organization is a specific one and, we think, easily explicable. We exist only to help Canada's consumer magazines sell more advertising space.

We do this by researching the relative values of Canadian advertising media—with particular emphasis, of course, on our own—and then presenting the results of that research to advertisers and advertising agencies.

I cannot emphasize too strongly, we do not get involved in other areas of interest common to our members. Therefore, there is not probably a great deal that we can add to the knowledge you already have or are gaining.

As an example of how we operate, you may be interested in the fact that we have just returned on Saturday from showing to business audiences in New York, Chicago, Los Angeles, San Francisco and Vancouver, a film which we have just prepared on Canada and Canadian magazines. This two-week tour is the third such annual event we have put on. I am pleased to report that the interest shown in the United States on the West Coast is growing markedly. Our attendance this year was up over twenty-five percent from last year. And while our members do not expect to get business specifically from these presentations, as versus the work, of their own salesmen, yet this, I am told, actually does happen. At each of the meetings either the publishers themselves or their senior representatives attend. And, as in all things, they work together well as a team.

The theme of the film expresses well our philosophy, for it talks not just about our magazines and how significant they are, but also about Canada, and how important it is. In this sense, we believe that the investment we have made in this film and its tour, which is sizeable for us, typifies the collective attitude of all our members toward Canada, and the responsibility we have as publishers of an informative and opinion-moulding medium.

I am now at your mercy.

The Chairman: Thank you. Your brief was brief, your opening statement was brief, so perhaps we can turn to some questions. Perhaps I could ask a couple to begin with.

You mentioned seven illustrious members of the magazine community who are in the audience. These in effect, John, would be your bosses?

Mr. Crosbie: Yes. I am in the unusual position of being confronted by a great many bosses today.

The Chairman: How many do you have?

Mr. Crosbie: Twelve. That is to say, twelve magazines, and each one represents a man. The majority are here. I don't see anyone from T.V. Hebdo, or The Observer, regrettably. I guess that is the force of circumstances.

The Chairman: I hope you will not feel inhibited. May I remind you that everything you say here is privileged, so you should feel free to relax.

Mr. Crosbie: I welcome your assurance.

Senator Prowse: If they fire him, can we make them take him back?

The Chairman: I am sure that is a terribly academic observation, Senator Prowse.

May I ask you first of all, would you care to comment, or could I underline one point that you made: The Magazine Advertising Bureau is not concerned in any way with the promotion of magazine circulation in Canada.

Mr. Crosbie: Absolutely not.

The Chairman: Not at all?

Mr. Crosbie: I am handed a package which is a magazine which has a certain stature in the community, and this becomes part of my kit.

The Chairman: And similarly, am I correct in thinking, the Magazine Advertising Bureau has no role to play in magazine standards, editorial content, improvement of magazines and so on.

Mr. Crosbie: None whatever.

The Chairman: Is there any organization which does concern itself with these things, to your knowledge?

Mr. Crosbie: I think in the last analysis here, as in the United States, the responsibility rests with the individual publisher. I can't think of anyone that takes a continuing position on this.

The Chairman: I think that there are structures in some of the other media that are concerned with standards.

Mr. Crosbie: I would think, I would hope that the Periodical Press Association, which is a strong and continuing force in Canada, would express an opinion if something of overtly bad nature was seen. I also believe that one must look at the values of the Canadian Advertising Advisory Board when it comes to such things as truth in advertising, and therefore the emphasis is on the advertiser and not the publishers.

The Chairman: I was interested for the moment in standing aside from advertising and looking at the other aspects of magazine publishing, editorial content in particular, and you have made the point you have nothing to do with it.

Did The Magazine Advertising Bureau make any representation to the Postmaster General about postal rates?

Mr. Crosbie: None whatever.

The Chairman: You would not do that sort of thing.

Mr. Crosbie: I would not be in a position to do it. I am not aware of the financial structures of my members.

The Chairman: I said there were illustrious gentlemen here, and you have an illustrious career in the media in this country, one way or the other. You have been a very senior executive in the advertising agency business, and have a background in broadcasting, and now you know a great deal about the magazine business. Do you think that there is a role for a Committee like this to play?

Mr. Crosbie: Very definitely. I welcome the creation of the Committee, and I am impressed by the work I have seen you do during the time I have been in Ottawa. I think this particular industry is fortunate that the Senate of Canada can take time to examine it. I am sure that the outcome will be helpful to all of us involved.

The Chairman: Thank you, I hope so too.

Could you tell us how The Magazine Advertising Bureau came to be?

Mr. Crosbie: I can tell you the short-term history very easily. I was involved with that personally, almost from the outset. Historically over a number of years, there has been an on-going program of the assembly of data on advertising volume, lineage and pages. This has been going on for well over a decade and the results are published in quarterly reports put out by my office.

However, I am told that in 1966 the people who are now representing the majority of our membership realized that the opportunity existed to improve the lot of the Canadian consumer magazines, if they could work together. I personally returned to Canada early in 1967, and at that time was invited to join them as a paid employee.

On March 1st, 1967, we opened offices, and set up our shop, and have been working on this project trying to improve that lot ever since.

The Chairman: Were you the first Director of The Magazine Advertising Bureau?

Mr. Crosbie: I would not want to answer that question. I have a feeling there were some people, ten to fifteen years ago, that passed through a phase of trying to do this, and we have with us today people like Mr. Brander who can perhaps answer the question better than I.

The Chairman: Were you the first President of the re-structured Magazine Bureau.

Mr. Crosbie: Yes.

The Chairman: Do you know, Mr. Crosbie, who determined the re-structuring of The Magazine Advertising Bureau, or was this before you arrived on the scene.

Mr. Crosbie: I was greeted by a group of publishers with a fait accompli.

The Chairman: So you really couldn't say?

Mr. Crosbie: I couldn't speak for the period of time I was not present.

The Chairman: Is there anybody here who can, or who would like to volunteer about the re-structuring?

Mr. Brander, if you would not mind...

Mr. Brander, Publisher of Macleans Magazine: I could give you a little background, Senator.

The Chairman: I am sorry to call on you in this way, but I think it would be useful.

Mr. Brander: After the results of the O'Leary Commission were announced and some reasonable period of time had gone on, it became pretty clear to, I think, all of us operating in the magazine industry in Canada, that there was a great need to rebuild faith in magazines as an advertising medium in Canada.

During the period of the O'Leary inquiry, which from beginning to end went on for some considerable time, there was a great deal of confusion and lessening of belief in the solidarity and soundness of magazines as a long-term advertising medium.

This was our central problem. A practical solution appeared to be that the magazines which operated in Canada, which included Chatelaine, Macleans, Saturday Night, Reader's Digest, and Time—those were the magazines considered to be the magazine industry at that time—that that group get together and undertake a promotional and sales programme which would (a) reinforce faith in magazines as an effective advertising medium; and secondly, would actively sell advertising as an effective marketing tool.

The pattern for this kind of effort, was certainly known to us because it had taken place for instance in the United States, where magazines sold advertising together. It is done world-wide and there is nothing new in it.

Every medium within the country and certainly North America works together: the newspapers, the business papers, television, radio, and so on.

So we met together and we worked out a satisfactory working base on which we could effectively pool our resources and operate, as I say, to sell advertising in magazines.

It happened at the time that I suppose I should say I was the organizing chairman of the effort in the technical sense that somebody had to occupy the chair, but it was a mutual decision.

The Chairman: This was the calendar year 1966?

Mr. Brander: Yes.

The Chairman: May I put one other question to you? I appreciate you are not the witness and I am grateful to you for speaking in this way.

You said, and there have been other references made in the last several years that the O'Leary study did have a detrimental effect on the magazine industry.

Mr. Brander: In this way a kind of cloud hung over the magazines in Canada, particularly those Canadian owned. Month after month as it were statements and items appeared regularly that suggested the magazine industry had very serious difficulties and there was some doubt as to the long-term health and operation of the magazines.

So one by one, I suppose quite properly considering the climate of that time, advertisers were something less than enthusiastic to buy magazine programmes and as this kind of attitude developed it was noticeable that all magazines in Canada were affected. Time was affected equally along with the Canadian owned publications.

The Chairman: You were going to say something, Mr. Crosbie?

Mr. Crosbie: I could add to that a historical reflection of what Mr. Brander has just said.

I would like to read for you a series of figures which are millions of dollars and in doing so identify the year 1960 as being the year in the fall of which the Commission sat and 1961 as the year when in the late spring the report was issued.

Looking at 1959 the number of magazines had a total...

The Chairman: These are existing members' magazines?

Mr. Crosbie: Yes; with the exception of T.V. Hebdo and Actualité because I don't have the figures.

These are total dollar advertising income figures:

1959	20.8 million
1960	22.3, a very sizeable increase
1961	21.6
1962	19.2
1963	18.3
1964	18.2

So there were four years before recovery began to take place from whatever caused that drop.

1965	20.6
1966	23
1967	24.2
1968	24.1

Almost identical figures, really.

Then in 1969, 26 million.

So when I look at the records that I inherited in this new occupation I see evidence of something having been going on at the time that immediately followed that Commission and this would seem to support what Mr. Brander was saying.

The Chairman: Were there any other things going on at the same time?

Mr. Crosbie: There may well have been.

The Chairman: Notably the advent of commercial television?

Mr. Crosbie: The advent, I believe, had preceded that; had it not?

The Chairman: You think that the impact of commercial television had been felt by then?

Mr. Crosbie: Not fully; I am not too sure. I would not make that conjecture. I had to look at a situation within a given medium and see a decline and then an increase. Did I not see the increase following the decline then I would perhaps support your point.

The Chairman: Your brief contains a list of the membership of the Advertising Bureau. How much does it cost each one of the publications to belong to the Bureau?

Mr. Crosbie: The cost is their share of the budget which is set for each fiscal calendar year based on the individual magazine's percentage of the total income of all the member magazines.

Thus if a magazine has 20 per cent it would be expected to pay 20 per cent.

The Chairman: The total income from advertising?

Mr. Crosbie: I am speaking of advertising.

The Chairman: From national advertising.

Mr. Crosbie: Yes, national advertising.

The Chairman: From all sources?

Mr. Crosbie: Yes.

The Chairman: Probably doesn't cost the United Church Observer very much money to belong to the Magazine Advertising Bureau?

Mr. Crosbie: I would regard that as a reasonable conjecture.

The Chairman: You say in that somewhere, I think, that 90 per cent of the consumer magazines belong...

Mr. Crosbie: May I suggest another phrasing of that? The number of magazines represent slightly over 90 per cent of the ABC audited circulation in Canada.

The Chairman: What magazines are represented in the 10 per cent?

Mr. Crosbie: If you will look at the appendix to the brief they are listed as being in the first column of figures on the appendix, which is the final page of the brief.

Thus we see Au Grand Air, B.C. Outdoors, Canadian Boating, and so on, as being non-members.

The Chairman: Do these publications want to become members?

Mr. Crosbie: We have had conversations.

The Chairman: I will put it another way: do you go after them?

Mr. Crosbie: We have had conversations with some of these publications. We had a conversation when I first became involved with Actualité. Subsequently they approached us and we were very pleased when they applied for membership.

We have had a conversation just recently with the magazine listed here called Electron. They wanted to know about the criteria for membership and we told them and they have decided that they do not want to join quite yet but they will apparently. That is if they get their budget approved they apparently are very interested in joining.

We have had a conversation with The Legion and they say all things being equal they will apply for membership this year. We certainly will welcome them in. We welcome anyone who (A) wants to join; and (B) can meet our rather simple requirement for membership.

The Chairman: Of the magazines listed who do not belong the only one with a sizeable circulation is The Legion. Surely you would not be enthusiastic about the Free Mason becoming a member; would you?

Mr. Crosbie: Are you asking me as an individual?

The Chairman: I am asking as the M.A.B.

Mr. Crosbie: Why do you conjecture that, may I ask you, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: I usually do not answer questions but I will answer it.

Mr. Crosbie: You hypothesized, sir.

The Chairman: I think it would make the presentation, which is very impressive, enormously complicated. I think a magazine with such a small circulation might present difficulties for you in your sales approach. Is that not reasonable?

Mr. Crosbie: That is a very reasonable hypothesis. However, we are committed to supporting the consumer magazine industry in Canada.

The Chairman: That was the next question I was coming to. In fairness to these publications if they want to become members you must accept them, according to your own by-laws, but you do not seek them?

Mr. Crosbie: No. By the same token I feel we are already doing a great deal for them and if we are doing good at all it must be because of the percentage of circulation we already represent and it must be a good which extends out to those magazines.

This is frankly one of the reasons why we would not think of pressing a magazine of the size of Electron, which only has some 14,000 circulation, pressing or trying to coerce them into joining with us.

We need the help of every magazine we can get in order to ameliorate the cost of existing members, but by the same token we do not want to exert a hardship.

The Chairman: Presumably the amount of money which the Free Mason would contribute to the overall budget would be infinitesimally small?

Mr. Crosbie: One could assume that.

The Chairman: I shall assume that. I want to turn to some of the Senators. I have some other questions myself.

Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Crosbie, you say that the basic requirement of membership is that the magazine have its circulation audited and verified by the ABC. What are your other requirements?

Mr. Crosbie: One of the other principal requirements is that it be a magazine in the sense that people pay for it. A publication which is distributed without charge is not by our definition a magazine because it has not proven its need; not proven that people are willing to lay money on the line for it. To us this is a very vital difference.

Mr. Fortier: You say the qualified circulation magazine is not a magazine?

Mr. Crosbie: Not by our context. Anyone can hire a printer to put pages together and create something but until the consumers have proven that the editorial contents have sufficient merit and they are willing to spend money for it we don't regard it as being a true magazine.

Mr. Fortier: But it is well established that the advertisers do not agree with that statement. There are, as you well know, some qualified circulation magazines that are very well patronized by advertisers who know that the magazine will reach a particular market and consequently they can aim their advertising at that particular community.

Mr. Crosbie: Yes, Mr. Fortier. It is our belief, however, it is one of our selling strengths that we can say to such an advertiser the key difference between our magazines and that kind of publication is that we can prove the people really want it; they are not just receiving it at the door or throwing it out or whatever you do with the various magazines.

Mr. Fortier: We had a number of discussions on that subject with representatives of the business press whose publications, as you know, are for the large majority unsolicited, and I am very interested in hearing your comments. You feel that most unsolicited publications find their way to the waste paper basket?

Mr. Crosbie: I would not say "Yes" to that question because the context embraces the business press and I feel in the case of specialized magazines in the more esoteric aspects of industry they undoubtedly get very well read.

A magazine on inverse widgets is going to be of great interest to a man who cannot get his information anywhere else and whose profession is making inverse widgets.

We are talking within the framework of the broad public. Here one suspects that it is a valid statement to put forward that a magazine that you have not paid for is likely to be less well read by you than one for which you have laid out your after-tax money.

Mr. Fortier: In view of the distinction you have made, you seem to set aside the business presses from the other unsolicited magazines, would the Bureau consider receiving within its ranks magazines which belong to the so-called business press.

Mr. Crosbie: We have not contemplated doing so since our institution.

Senator Everett: Would you tell me what percentage of your circulation must be paid?

Mr. Crosbie: Yes. There is no stipulation by percentage. We say a major portion be paid. There is a stipulation in the ABC, not in our by-laws.

Senator Everett: You would accept the ABC regulation?

Mr. Crosbie: Yes.

The Chairman: On this qualified circulation business, there are magazines which perhaps would not qualify as business press. I think of Home makers Digest as one and Toronto Calendar as another. What would be your opinion of those publications as far as their value for national advertisers?

Mr. Crosbie: My professional opinion, sir, is the money should be spent elsewhere.

The Chairman: You should have a discussion with Mr. Nobleman. I saw a full page Saturday Night advertisement in the current issue of Toronto Calendar.

Mr. William Nobleman, President of Saturday Night (from back of room): They solicited it.

The Chairman: But you bought it. It is a contract deal? I am sorry.

Mr. Fortier: In paragraph 4 of the brief you refer to the informal relationship with the namesake organization in the United States that has proven beneficial to Canada. Would you care to expand on that?

Mr. Crosbie: Well there is the coincidence of name. There is in the United States an organization known as the Magazine Advertising Bureau.

Mr. Fortier: Coincidence?

Mr. Crosbie: It is, I believe, coincidence. I certainly know of no other source of this identity. It is the child of the Magazine Publishers Association in the States.

Now it happens that with fair frequency the people at the M.A.B. in the States will be doing research and preparing material for the promotion of advertising in magazines which is of interest to Canadian advertisers and because of this informal relationship, which falls in the area that could be best identified as friendship, it has been possible for us to borrow material from them and reproduce it in Canada and thereby, frankly, economise, and at the same time provide the advertisers of Canada with a service.

I have a phrase which I use rather whimsically, but which I sincerely believe has some merit, that in dealing with the United States in our discussions on Canada we are dealing with a sample which is larger than the whole. We frequently get information from them that certainly seems to have a great deal of validity in our economy particularly in relation to purchase of products and so on.

I hold out for you as an example a booklet called "Who Moved the Sand Pile?" We recently produced this in Canada and you will find it in the back of the brief. This was based on an American booklet which we thought they had done very well and we were able to borrow some of the art work and some of the other material and then convert this to our Canadian needs by inserting Canadian facts.

Mr. Fortier: Time and Reader's Digest represent approximately 30 per cent of your total circulation. Do you honestly believe you would have this sort of co-operation from the American Magazine Advertising Bureau if Time and Reader's Digest were not members of your Association?

Mr. Crosbie: To answer the question I must pay tribute to Mr. Gerald Brander, publisher of Maclean's magazine and Magazine Maclean, who long before my returning to my native land had set up the relationship I have sought to perpetuate with this organization.

The Chairman: Perhaps your question should be put to Mr. Brander.

Mr. Fortier: Perhaps it should.

The Chairman: Would you care to comment, Mr. Brander?

Mr. Brander: Yes. The fact is before the formation of the existing Magazine Advertising Bureau there was for many years a magazine organization in Canada with much the same aims and they had a relationship with the comparable, though larger, American organization.

We had a friendly relationship with many of the publishers in the United States where we received some assistance, who we would look to for guidelines in magazine publishing. This was mutual and again this is not unusual in industries.

Over the period of time that any occasion arose when material which they developed, which was very basic to the concept of the advantages and values of magazines, copies were available and they were gracious enough to allow us to use them in this country.

The Chairman: What year did you establish that liaison?

Mr. Brander: As far as I am concerned back somewhere around 1959 when I came into the magazine industry from another phase of publishing.

The Chairman: That was before the O'Leary Commission report?

Mr. Brander: Just before.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: This morning Mr. Brander spoke of a levelling-off level, if I may use that expression, of some 2.4 to 2.6 per cent of the Canadian advertising dollar in Canadian magazines.

I was interested in noting in paragraph 5 of your brief this compares with the figure of 7.3 per cent in the United States of dollars spent in the media each year.

Do you agree with Mr. Brander's view?

Mr. Crosbie: There has been a levelling off?

Mr. Fortier: Yes. I may have misunderstood Mr. Brander. I thought he prognosticated that this would remain fairly static.

Mr. Crosbie: If I may take that in two steps. Has there been a levelling off? I am quoting here from figures which have been supplied to me by a research organization that says that going back to, let us say, 1964 and reading forward the percentage figures shown are: 2.6, 2.6, 2.7, 2.6, 2.5, 2.6, 2.6.

This looks like a levelling off.

The Chairman: Do you have them from 1959?

Mr. Crosbie: Yes.

The Chairman: Would you give them to us?

Mr. Crosbie: Yes, I would be very happy to.

1958	—3.7
1959	—3.5
1960	—3.8
1961	—3.5
1962	—3.0
1963	—2.8
1964	—2.6

And from then on very little variation.

Senator Prowse: You couldn't tell us whether those big drops are associated with any particular magazine ceasing to publish in those years?

Mr. Crosbie: I would not relate the figures for those years to that. I would have to call on my associates to recall when Liberty ceased publication.

Mr. Brander: 1964.

Senator Prowse: So that the losses in the end of the 1950's and the beginning of the 1960's was before there was a dropping of the magazines?

The Chairman: Mr. Hutchinson?

Mr. Hutchinson, Publisher of Chatelaine Magazine: The Canadian Home Journal ceased publishing in June of 1958 and was merged into Chatelaine. In all fairness on that particular subject, all of the advertising that had been committed for the Canadian Home Journal was converted into Chatelaine and although the magazine disappeared, the advertising did not.

Mr. Crosbie: I would make an observation in passing. On those figures I quoted fortunately for us in the magazine industry we are talking about a total all-media investment by advertisers that has been growing.

So in 1969 when we say it is the largest year in our history we are not talking of percentage but dollar volume.

Now as to whether or not we will be able to increase that percentage—this is first of all our aim; secondly my personal hope; and thirdly, if there is a difference, our ambition. I think we can do it.

I think with all deference to any comments which have been made here earlier, I believe we can increase that and with the indications of this past year, the reception we have had from advertisers as we went around talking only about the concept of magazines, which is all I do, I don't sell individual magazines, I believe that we are beginning to have some effect. Otherwise I would not continue to do what I am doing.

Mr. Fortier: Is the figure of 7.3 Utopian as far as Canada is concerned?

Mr. Crosbie: It is my first target.

Mr. Fortier: It is a well known fact, we have seen it in the research material which has been prepared for this Committee, that the greatest gainer since formation of M.A.B. has been Time magazine. Is this likely to continue?

Mr. Crosbie: I can't answer that because I think that is a matter that lies in the hands of the very excellent sales force that each magazine provides.

All I can do to influence the situation is to try to improve the lot of Canadian consumers magazines. After that it becomes the job of the individual magazine to get out and sell.

Mr. Fortier: The total amount of dollars, as you have just recently pointed out, being spent on advertising in media is increasing in Canada. Do you see this as adding to Time's relative position at the expense of other existing magazines?

Mr. Crosbie: I cannot honestly see any concrete evidence of that; no.

Mr. Fortier: I don't think it is fair to push any further with my questions in this area. I will pass for now.

The Chairman: Do any of the Senators have any questions? Perhaps I could ask you one.

At page 2, paragraph 5, the 7.3% figure. That is almost three times as large as Canada. Why would that be, particularly given the fact that Mr. McEachern told us the other day that his magazines have a proportionately larger hold of the Canadian market than magazines like Life and Look and McCall's and so on on the American market.

Mr. Crosbie: I believe that Mr. McEachern was right in mentioning specific magazines as examples. In this counterpart organization, with which we have the friendly relationship, there are, I believe, 365 magazines contributing to that figure.

The second point that might be put forward here is that there is a great deal of international advertising in North America where the advertising agency, or the advertiser working for an American company, looks upon the overflow circulation of American magazines as being an adequate gesture toward the print media and invests money in Canada in the electronic field. That is one of the reasons why emphasis is placed on the electronic opponent for us.

The third point, which is conjecture on my part, if I may introduce personal experience, having worked in the advertising community in the United States and then returning to Canada, I believe that television in the United States is accepted in the advertising media evaluation in a slightly different way than it is in Canada.

There still seems to be in Canada on the part of some people concerned with the creation of advertising to regard it as a new and exciting medium. This is not to say it is not exciting but rather in the United States not quite as new, it has found its niche more so than in Canada.

The Chairman: Could you tell us on that subject, John—this is perhaps an unfair question as you may not have the statistics—the percentage of the overall national advertising budget in Canada which is spent on television advertising, how does that compare with the comparable figure in the United States?

Mr. Crosbie: I couldn't answer. I am not in a position to answer that.

The Chairman: That would validate your observation.

Mr. Fortier: A supplementary, Mr. Chairman, if I may.

You paraphrased the reaction of some of your potential advertisers: why should we advertise in Canadian magazines? Our United States magazines overflow into Canada. We thus reach a reasonable market.

How do you answer that when they reply to you in this way?

Mr. Crosbie: Our answer goes in this fashion: we believe that the Canadian public, while it does read American magazines, reads them with awareness of the fact they are in fact American magazines. By observation, if one looks at the newsstands of our major cities today, you can see a growing presence of publications from other countries—Germany, Sweden, France, England. Canada's interests are broadening, becoming much more global.

In this perspective we believe that Canadians do not necessarily assume when they see advertising in an American magazine that the product is available in Canada.

The Chairman: How do you relate that comment to Time?

Mr. Crosbie: Time in this context is, of course, a Canadian magazine because it is here. It is apparent from the content of the magazine, the excellent editorial preface on Canada, and from the sheer content of the ads where Canadian references are frequent that we are indeed talking about a magazine present in Canada and making an investment in the economy.

The Chairman: I am a subscriber to Time and are there any national advertisements appearing in the issue of Time that I receive at my home, advertising products which I cannot buy in Canada?

Mr. Crosbie: I would not expect to find any. I would think it would be a very foolish investment on the part of the Canadian advertiser to do that.

The Chairman: So there are none?

Mr. Crosbie: I have never seen any. I cannot conceive of it being done.

The Chairman: You expressed concern about the question of overflow American coverage. Has M.A.B. (Canada) discussed the matter with M.A.B. in the United States?

Mr. Crosbie: No. This would strain friendship, I am afraid.

The Chairman: It might be a friendship well worth straining.

Mr. Crosbie: The influence of the M.A.B. in the States, the American M.A.B. on their members in respect to—let us presume the point here is controlling overflow of circulation into Canada—I would not expect to be that great.

I do not believe that there is a great deal of profitability for the American magazine publishers in distributing copies in Canada. They cannot take a great deal of credit when it comes to charging for advertising space. They do not attempt to do so. They cannot claim a Canadian edition and therefore one notes a tendency for the major American magazines to decline in circulation.

One notes, for instance, in the past year that Life magazine has gone down 9.8 per cent; Look 1.9 per cent. These are figures that have recurred from year to year.

The Chairman: Will you give us that again?

Mr. Crosbie: Life magazine 9.8 per cent.

The Chairman: That is Life's...

Mr. Crosbie: Decrease in circulation 1969 over 1968.

The Chairman: In Canada?

Mr. Crosbie: Yes.

The Chairman: Would you have the figure for the decrease in circulation in the same period in the United States?

Mr. Crosbie: No, I don't have that.

Mr. Brander: A sharp increase.

The Chairman: Would you have that for me? The question I am asking is their figure, the percentage increase or decrease for Life comparable to the figure—which are the years you are giving us?

Mr. Crosbie: 1969 compared to 1968.

The Chairman: 1969 compared to 1968.

Mr. Brander: I think about 500,000. I think they went from 8 million to 8.5 million.

The Chairman: They went up from 8 million to 8.5 million. What was the other figure you were quoting.

Mr. Crosbie: I have a list here.

The Chairman: We would be interested.

Mr. Crosbie: Would you like me to read them all?

The Chairman: You don't need to read them but would you file them with us? We would find it very interesting.

Mr. Crosbie: Perhaps I could file this, too.

The Chairman: Back to this question of overflow. Do you think the overflow problem is becoming less serious in the consumer magazines? Obviously it is going down almost 10 percent a year.

Mr. Crosbie: In the case of that particular publication. There are others that are going up. I must say that the virility of Canada is endorsed by the increase of Playboy in Canada from year to year. Generally speaking the major books are going down. The books that are increasing, as I look at the list—this is a list that sends into Canada more than 40,000 copies per month—the books going up are by observation those that are specialized books.

This harks back to something said to you earlier.

The Chairman: And which you would agree are competitive with some of the Canadian magazines.

Mr. Crosbie: Well, to a degree, yes.

The Chairman: Mr. Gzowsky made the point this morning—we asked him who his competition was and he said "everybody."

Mr. Crosbie: In this sense it has to be true.

The Chairman: The Maclean-Hunter people said they came here seeking nothing and I am sure you seek nothing, but let me put a question to you: what do you think this Committee should recommend or should do about overflow circulation? What should we do in the interests of the magazine industry in Canada about this overflow circulation? Perhaps the answer is "Nothing", and if it is, say so.

Mr. Crosbie: As an ad lib suggestion to you I would certainly recommend you support Canadian Tariff Item 9921-1, which is the tariff item under which the use of American based magazines exempts the advertiser from protection on tax deduction.

I have found it to be my experience that the question most frequently asked in my office by advertising agencies in the United States is related to this question of whether or not the copy in a magazine coming into Canada would indeed penalize the advertiser.

So I regard it as a very vital bulwark of our Canadian magazine economy.

The Chairman: You listed three reasons and you related the overflow question to the term of electronic component. What do you think the Committee should recommend about the CBC?

Mr. Crosbie: I have no suggestion to make to you in that regard as a magazine man.

The Chairman: A lot of the magazine publishers who have been here have spoken—I hesitate as I was going to say all the publishers but that would be unfair—I don't say all but quite a number have spoken about the CBC.

Mr. Crosbie: If I may say as an individual citizen, I have this opinion: I invite you to look at the case of this particular citizen who derives his income from the welfare of the Canadian consumer magazines and is paid by them and out of that pay subscribes dollars through taxation to the maintenance of staff people to go out and sell against his source of income.

This seems to be an achronistic situation.

As an example, three weeks ago I had a telephone call from a young man who was employed by the CBC and who was building a presentation to persuade someone to buy time on the CBC and he wanted us at the Magazine Advertising Bureau to give him all the data he needed on magazines in order to make a case for television.

The Chairman: What did you tell him?

Mr. Crosbie: I drew an analogy that had to do with the First World War and running out of bullets.

The Chairman: Do you think that the CBC should get out of the commercial business completely.

Mr. Crosbie: It is my personal opinion that the CBC has no place in the living room of the nation in the commercial sense.

The Chairman: I think that is important to add—in the commercial sense. What about in the non-commercial sense?

Mr. Crosbie: I am a strong supporter of the CBC. My record shows that in my lifetime I was an employee and I found it to be a very satisfactory source of income and I believe it fills a very important function in our country at this time.

The Chairman: But you believe that it should be out of the commercial business altogether?

Mr. Crosbie: Absolutely.

The Chairman: Let me tell you the question I am not going to ask you: how would you finance the CBC? I think that would be perhaps straying a little off the subject at hand.

Mr. Crosbie: Well, since we are already financing the CBC with taxpayers, to so large a degree, surely it would not be inequitable to go along another step.

Senator Prowse: If you can't think of a supplemental, I can.

The Chairman: Well, this is not a CBC hearing, but if you wish to ask a supplementary, you may.

Senator Prowse: If the amount of money that is spent on electronic advertising on the CBC were not available to the CBC, is there not a good possibility that there would be independents dragged in to take up that; in other words, who would get the electronic money?

Mr. Crosbie: All I can say, Senator, is we would do our best.

Senator Prowse: You really don't expect to get much of it. If you took the CBC out you would have other TV people in there.

Mr. Crosbie: Absolutely.

Senator Prowse: And they would be going to people who must be already sold on the electronic media; otherwise they would not be putting money into it.

Mr. Crosbie: We would like to have the opportunity.

Senator Prowse: You can still try.

Mr. Crosbie: We do.

The Chairman: That is all I have on the CBC.

In your appendix at the back you list magazines. We have a magazine appearing tomorrow evening and I note that they are not listed, that is Toronto Life. Why are they not listed?

Mr. Crosbie: They are not listed simply because they have not yet been audited.

Mr. Fortier: The same question with Sept Jours.

Mr. Crosbie: Yes.

The Chairman: The same reason?

Mr. Crosbie: Yes.

The Chairman: Are there many magazines in Canada in that category?

Mr. Crosbie: Yes. If you will refer to the footnote number 3 in the Appendix in this publication from which we take the data, Canadian Advertising Rates and Data, there are some 210 magazines listed. Of these only those shown in the column above the footnote are audited by ABC.

The Chairman: I have only one other question. It relates to page 3, point number 6.

You talk about the magazine industry "as a medium of intra-personal exchange and relationship effecting the very fibre and composition of our nationality."

Would you comment on that "very fibre and composition of our nationality?" That is a very resounding phrase. How do magazines contribute to the "very fibre and composition" of our nationality?

Mr. Crosbie: First, by reason of their editorial position all of them, every one of our members contributes in this sense of exploring in greater depth than other media can provide, the issues that are of concern to the Canadian people.

I also believe very sincerely that there is a second level of contribution and that is the sometimes maligned area of advertising because through advertising we Canadians are made aware of the products that are available to us, the choices we have as people of free choice; economically the advertising stimulates the flow of dollars from hand to hand in our country.

In these two ways I believe the magazines are a very vital thing and do affect the fibre of our society.

The Chairman: Could you be more specific about the editorial? Your comment on advertising is an interesting one and it is one we will doubtless hear more about from the ICA representatives coming before the Committee.

You have made the point that the Magazine Advertising Bureau has no concern or relevancy in terms of editorial content. That does not preclude you making that kind of judgment but could you be more specific? Are all of the member magazines dedicated to an increased sense of Canadianism?

Mr. Crosbie: I would not say "Yes" to the latter question. However, I would like to answer this way, that the degree of dedication to Canadianism varies by magazine.

One has a magazine which looks at national issues solely; one has a magazine which looks at areas of interest having to do with the arts and music and politics and so on; one has on the other end of the spectrum a magazine which to a very great degree reaches out to all parts of the world and brings back to the Canadian reality, an awareness of what the world offers and enables the Canadian reader to position himself within that world.

The Chairman: I think that perhaps those are the only questions we need to ask you. I am sorry, Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: Why is the Atlantic Advocate not listed in your appendix?

Mr. Crosbie: For the very reason, Senator, I have had conversations with the good publisher and seen his plant. He is not at the present time, to the best of my knowledge, as of my last conversation, contemplating applying for audit of his circulation.

The Chairman: All I was going to say, Mr. Crosbie, was that this terminates the questions I think we have for you. If I could remove my Senatorial headgear for one second and revert to a role I played as advertising space salesman, I would say your statistics are most impressive. They are terribly well organized and I think you have a tough story to tell, but I think you tell it extremely well. Thank you for coming.

I would say to the Senators that the next session is with the ITU at 8 o'clock tonight. At 9 o'clock tonight Mr. Ken Lefolii will be with us.

The Committee adjourned at 6.00 p.m.

—Upon resuming at 8:00 p.m.

The Chairman: Fellow Senators, this evening we are receiving a brief from the International Typographical Union.

I perhaps should begin by introducing the four witnesses who are here.

On my immediate right, is Allan Heritage, a former president of the Toronto Mailers Union and Canadian Representative, I.T.U.; on Mr. Heritage's right is Mr. James P. Duffy, President of the Ottawa Typographical Union. On my left is Mr. Allan Histed, the President of the Hamilton Typographical Union, and sitting on Mr. Histed's left is Mr. Robert Earles, who is the President of the Toronto Mailers Union.

It is my understanding, Mr. Heritage, that you are going to be the spokesman for the group. The procedure which we follow here, is very simple. The brief which you were kind enough to send along some weeks in advance has been received, and studied by the Senators, and I think they are prepared to ask you some questions on the contents of the brief as well as on the oral comments which I am going to ask you to make now, and, indeed, there may be other matters which the Senators wish to discuss with you.

I would now like to put at your disposal, about fifteen minutes. You can amplify the contents of your brief, you can explain it, and anything else that may, or may not be on your mind. We will question you on what you say, and what you don't say, and on what's in the brief.

Thank you, and welcome, Mr. Heritage.

Mr. Heritage: Thank you Mr. Chairman, and Honourable Senators.

We appreciate this opportunity to appear before you this evening to give our views on the newspaper industry.

Originally we had no intention to appear because we have a good relationship in the news media industry that we cover.

However, because of remarks that have been made by previous presentations by publishers, we felt that those remarks had to be answered.

However, before I go into detail, or any comments on our brief, I feel there should be a slight correction in a typographical error.

The Chairman: Good heavens, yes.

Mr. Heritage: In the haste of preparing this brief, because, as I said, we were not actually planning to attend, page 2, paragraph 6, should read "61 newspapers", rather than "44 newspapers" that we have contracts with.

The Chairman: That is the top line of paragraph 6 on page 2. "At present, we have signed contracts with...". It should be 61 instead of 44.

Mr. Heritage: That is correct.

Senator Prowse: Does that include the two that were certified, or are those still pending as well?

Mr. Heritage: Those two are still pending.

Senator Prowse: That would make a total of 63.

Mr. Heritage: Yes.

Mr. Chairman, Honourable Senators, it was disturbing to us but I understand that this is the procedure, that our brief has already been put out to the public, and it seems that we have been tried already. There has been interest given to our brief before we even appear before this Committee. I think it's a good example in just looking at the news coverage of why we felt we had to appear.

We have no criticism of the reporting staff, but we happen to know better than most people what happens sometimes to a story. This usually happens to us when the news media is covering any type of labour dispute, or grievance concerning the I.T.U. and the newspaper industry.

For instance, in the clipping I have, the Ottawa Citizen, if you read the story, they give us very good coverage to start with on our brief until we get down to the last paragraph.

The Chairman: I think the Senators should be clear that you are quoting from today's issue of the Ottawa Citizen.

May I also say, for the benefit of the Senators, that we released the briefs of witnesses I think at 6:30 in the morning. That is a standard procedure which the witnesses are aware of. I know you are not suggesting that you weren't, but just so the Senators will be clear, the briefs are released the day the witnesses are coming, in time for the afternoon papers, and very often the afternoon papers run early stories simply on the contents of the brief prior to the actual hearing taking place.

Now, this is the story that you are quoting from, is it not?

Mr. Heritage: Yes, the point I am trying to make, and I imagine everyone in this room has gone through it, when you give a news release to the press, or you make a statement to a body of people and pick up a newspaper and read it, you sometimes can't recognize your own statements. Here we have presented a brief this evening that was released earlier. When it comes out in the press, it is almost the full text, but they leave out some of the most important parts that can mislead the public or any person reading the coverage.

In our brief on page 12, we started out talking about the effect of multiple-ownership and our concern of it. We have nothing against multiple-ownership any more than the public. We are concerned about it, in many ways, but as the public should be concerned. But there is one chief concern of ours, and we mention it in our brief.

However, when the newspaper reported it, they left out some important points—if you read their new coverage, it says:

"It is said that the management of the Ottawa Citizen, where the I.T.U. has been negotiating for a first contract since last July, shipped advertising to another Southam paper, The Winnipeg Tribune, for photo-engraving."

We do not say in the brief, "that it was shipped to Winnipeg for photo-engraving". If you look at our brief closely, we said on page 13, section 40,

"At this point, because it was impossible to produce all the advertising in one day without overtime, the management shipped all surplus advertising to another component, The Winnipeg Tribune, where enforced overtime is not illegal. The finished product was shipped back to Ottawa in the form of photo-engravings to be run in The Ottawa Citizen."

Now, the question comes up, why do they word it differently than in the brief? The way they worded it in their news coverage:

"It is said that the management of The Ottawa Citizen, where the I.T.U. has been negotiating for a first contract since last July, shipped advertising to another Southam paper, The Winnipeg Tribune, for photo-engraving."

They said they shipped it to Winnipeg for photo-engraving. That isn't what the brief says. We said they shipped the advertising, and we are not interested in the photo-engraving application. We are interested in the typesetting.

They sent it to Winnipeg for typesetting. But if you look further on management's statement, like I said, we have already been tried before we got before the Commission.

There is another paragraph here, where it says:

"In a statement today E. S. Leigh" but I won't read the whole statement.

The Chairman: Well, why don't you read the whole statement? Don't you want to read it into the record?

Mr. Heritage:

"In a statement today, E. S. Leigh, business manager of The Citizen, said: Without warning or discussion, the employees in the composing room of The Ottawa Citizen stopped working overtime during the busiest period of the year.

"The Ottawa Citizen, working completely within its agreement with its employees, sought other methods of typesetting advertising which could not be handled by its own employees.

"This can hardly be construed as 'frustrating normal and legal efforts of a union to sign a first contract'.

"The Ottawa Citizen does not possess photo-engraving facilities."

This leaves the impression that because they don't possess photo-engraving facilities, they had to ship it to Winnipeg for photo-engraving. But they also left out the important parts of the brief on the overtime. The employees did not refuse to work overtime, it was a case of the Ontario Law being invoked.

The provisions of the Act were invoked on the fact that The Ottawa Citizen was violating the Employment Standards Act of Ontario, but they did not put that in the paper.

The point I am trying to make is that it seems that when the newspaper unions are involved in some type of labour dispute, the way the coverage comes out in the newspaper is entirely different. It doesn't give us fair coverage.

If it had been some other industry, the newspapers would have condemned them for such actions.

I just thought I would mention that point at the outset because of the fact that we were a little perturbed that we were tried in public before we had a chance to answer the questions before the Committee.

Senator Prowse: Mr. Chairman, may I ask...

The Chairman: Well, you may ask—The witness is still making his oral statement—Well, if he doesn't mind having the question now...

Senator Prowse: You state that they shipped advertising which would run into overtime. This is, as I read your brief, to The Winnipeg Tribune, for setting.

Mr. Heritage: Right.

Senator Prowse: And you say they shipped it back in the form of photo-engravings.

Mr. Heritage: That's correct.

Senator Prowse: But you people are not interested in photo-engraving except insofar as it must have been set to make a photo-engraving.

Mr. Heritage: That is correct. You would have to have the type set someplace.

Senator Prowse: Has Southam a contract at The Tribune with the I.T.U.?

Mr. Heritage: No.

Senator Prowse: They shipped it to a non-union shop...

Mr. Heritage: Right.

Senator Prowse: ...had it set there and had it sent back, but they are leaving the impression, or, your argument is that they are leaving the impression that you have accused them of saying that they have shipped it out so it would not have to be set here.

Mr. Heritage: Yes, that is right. If you read the news story carefully, they have left the impression that the reason they had it done was because of the fact they did not have a photo-engraving department.

Senator Prowse: Which they don't.

Mr. Heritage: Which they don't, but this isn't the case. They shipped it there because of the fact of the invokement of the Industrial Employment Standards Act of Ontario, because of a grievance.

Senator Prowse: Ordinarily, it would have been set in type here?

Mr. Heritage: That's right.

Senator Prowse: They ship it to Winnipeg.

Mr. Heritage: As copy.

Senator Prowse: As copy. It is set in type in Winnipeg, photo-engraved, and they send it back so all they have to do is to make a mat of it here; is this correct?

Mr. Heritage: They would lock it up in a form, along with other type of news stories, etc., and then roll a mat.

Senator Prowse: Yes, the thing would come back.

Mr. Heritage: The point I am trying to make, though, is this is a real concern in multiple-ownership. I think other matters of news coverage and so on, the whole public is concerned about, and we are too. We have good relationship with group organizations, but we are concerned where you have multiple-ownership, and there is a good example, as we pointed out in our brief, that this could happen.

For instance, if we had a labour dispute, they would just ship the work out to one of their other plants, and have it set, and then ship it back air express or by arrangement with the airlines; and this does concern us as a method of economic pressure.

Senator Prowse: Anything that wasn't under a time pressure, like an immediate news story, could be handled in this way.

Mr. Heritage: Right.

The Chairman: May I say, Mr. Heritage, that we really haven't begun the question period. Have you other things you want to say in your oral statement? Then we can return to the question period. Senator Prowse. If you don't mind, I think we should return to the oral statement.

Senator Prowse: Sorry, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Heritage: The only point that I was trying to establish by my presentation was the fact that the news coverage is misleading in the case of unions who are involved with the newspaper industry.

The Chairman: You have some other things there you want to say.

Mr. Heritage: One of the reasons that we are appearing, Mr. Chairman, before your Committee is (as I said earlier, we had not intended to appear) is because of remarks of publishers. For instance, a publisher did make a statement here (I don't know whether it was in his presentation or not, but he was so quoted in the press) of his concern over the dues money of employees of his plant being sent to the United States.

I believe there have been other comments in the press since that statement was made, from other people.

I want to point out to the Committee here, that in case of the I.T.U., our money is all deposited in Canada. In fact in the fiscal year 1969, the sum of $817,275 in excess of dues that were paid by Canadian members, was actually brought in to pay fraternal benefits to our Canadian members. If I went back over a longer period of time, it was much higher, but I am just taking the last year, 1969. We wanted to clear the record.

Another reason why we feel we have to try to clear the air, and there is no reflection on the reporters, but it seems that when it comes out in the story, they seem to get mixed up with the International Typographical Union, and the local Typographical Union.

Our locals have complete autonomy. I want to stress that the International does not become involved in any type of negotiation or dispute until they are requested to do so by the membership—not by the officers, but by the membership. That is in our constitution. This is one of the democratic points in our union. Some of our people say it is too democratic, but this is the way we operate.

Unfortunately, when a local union gets into a labour dispute, the press plays it up as the International Typographical Union. We have, of course, some locals that get out of hand the same as we have some employers who get out of hand. You don't tar everybody with the same brush.

I want to stress that there is complete local autonomy, and we do not interfere, until such time as we are requested to step into the picture.

Also, on the point of stressing what we feel is poor coverage in the case of unions involved in the newspaper industry—for instance, in the Toronto situation a very unfortunate dispute was widely misunderstood. The newspapers did not stress the fact that, although an agreement was reached twenty days after the dispute occurred on the matter of the computer, it seemed to be the item that was played up throughout that dispute.

The employers themselves introduced twenty-three new items into the negotiations after that. Where was the news coverage on the fact that they brought up twenty-three new items?

It became a one-sided story about the International interfering in local autonomy here in Canada. This concerns us in the newspaper industry—that the newspapers can editorialize and condemn other industries for the way they treat their employees, but when it comes to the news media (I am not saying all the papers, we have some papers that give us coverage) but I am saying that unfortunately it is a general rule that they don't cover labour dispute with their own employees as accurately as they would cover labour disputes with another industry, and this bothers us.

For instance, in the Toronto newspaper dispute, they did not mention the fact that pensions were a very important item to the people. They had been covered under the contract, for many years for a non-contributory pension. One union, the Mailers Union, under the terms of the contract had the right to respect the picket line. Their contract was still in effect when the Ontario law came into effect saying pensions should be funded. The Mailers still have not received their pensions. They have lost their pensions and all the employees there, because they were involved in the dispute, lost their pensions.

Yet, if another industry had done this to their employees, they would be condemned by the newspapers for taking such action.

Again this points up what we feel is our concern with lack of coverage of labour disputes with their own employees.

There is another area we wish to stress—that we have good relationship with most of our employers across Canada. I say that in all seriousness that we had not intended to appear, but it seems that several of the publishers that have appeared have also stressed the fact of the union's failure to cooperate in automation, etc.

Well, I believe our brief has covered this area. I would like to point out to you, Honourable Senators and Mr. Chairman, that the I.T.U. has spent millions of dollars on re-training. We have a five-million dollar training centre in Colorado Springs; we have sent up instructors to help employers to get started where they wished to have our cooperation.

We presently are working with the Provincial Government of Ontario through Brown's College for re-training over 200 people involved in the labour dispute in Toronto and we have carried the program across the country because we know that the industry is changing fast, and we have got to have our people prepared to meet it.

We get a little perturbed when the newspapers continually condemn unions on disputes and sensationalism, where there is a strike, but when it comes to the good things they do when they are meeting the challenge of automation, re-training, you never see many stories on this.

I think the public should be made aware of the fact that unions do a lot of good, and especially in the newspaper industry. We are not fighting automation.

Sure, we still have our battles on other items and principles, and we fight hard on them, but I think we should get a better shake and a fairer shake from the newspapers when labour disputes with their own unions, and their own employees are involved.

I think that is about all I have to say. I believe I have covered all the points, and I appreciate this chance to appear before you, and certainly my colleagues and myself would be prepared to answer any questions you may have.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Heritage.

I would remind the Senators that we have Mr. Duffy on my extreme right, and on my left, Mr. Histed and Mr. Earles.

I think the questions, Mr. Heritage, we will put to you, and if you wish to perhaps enlist the help, or turn the question over to one of your colleagues, then you can by all means do so.

I think Senator Everett has the first question.

Senator Everett: Mr. Heritage, in your brief as you have just stated, you point out that the I.T.U. has spent a considerable amount of money on providing a training centre where members of the union can learn a new technology. Can you tell me who pays for that training.

Mr. Heritage: The dues for that training. Only the dues from the members—no member is charged for going to the I.T.U. training centre.

Senator Everett: Is any newspaper charged?

Mr. Heritage: No newspaper is charged one penny for that training.

Senator Everett: If a newspaper makes a request to the I.T.U., or local for training, is that request generally granted?

Mr. Heritage: It is always granted.

Senator Everett: Does the newspaper pay the cost of transportation and compensation of the employee?

Mr. Heritage: This has been done in various ways.

In fact, we have programs where sometimes the local union has picked up the complete cost of transportation, even the lost wages; sometimes it has been a combination—where the union and the individual and the company have shared the cost of transportation and wages; or we have also had cases where the company has picked up the cost of transportation and wages, depending on the circumstances.

We also have had a case where the Department of Manpower contributed—in the case of La Presse. It was a situation where the Provincial Government of Quebec, the Federal Department of Manpower, and La Presse sent down a team of investigators to our training centre, and found out it was the only place in North America they could get this specific training; so Manpower shared part of the cost, but they did not share any of the cost of the actual materials or the training itself, or instructors wages. This is all borne by the International Typographical Union.

Senator Everett: That is not charged to the local.

Mr. Heritage: It is not charged to the local.

Senator Everett: Just to move on—on page 6 of your brief, quoting from its story by Mr. R. W. Brown, vice-president in charge of production of the Montreal Star, in the second paragraph of it, he says: "Better working conditions, a shorter work week, reasonable ceilings on wages and increased productivity will result from management-labour co-operation in instituting plant automation . . ."

It is that phrase "reasonable ceiling on wages"; I would expect to see in a publisher's brief, but not necessarily in an I.T.U. brief.

Mr. Heritage: We are quoting from the Vice-President in charge of production on a statement he made to an Automation Seminar. We are certainly not going to be like the news media and edit his statement.

We just put them in as they are—factually.

Senator Everett: Touché. But you are not endorsing the statement.

Mr. Heritage: No, putting it in the brief doesn't mean we are endorsing his statement. We are just quoting verbatim.

Senator Everett: On page 12 of your brief, item 33, you make the point:

"It would appear that there might be a greater hope for expansion in the number of newspapers in Canada if it were not for restrictive nature of the wire service franchise."

I believe you were earlier quoting from the Ottawa Citizen. I suppose you read the point just after the item you were reading, headed CP membership. The article says:

"No applicant for membership in The Canadian Press has been turned down in the last 35 years, John Dauphinee, general manager of the national news co-operative, said today.

Dauphinee said:

"The CP bylaws state that membership in the co-operative shall be open to the widest extent compatible with the expectation that the newspaper to be represented can be established and maintained as a self-sustaining business enterprise."

Would you care to comment on that?

Mr. Heritage: Since my colleague, Mr. Duffy, has done the research on that, I will pass this question on to him.

Mr. Duffy: I think that our reason for placing this in the brief is in line with our thinking that we would rather see more newspapers than less, and hopefully that it might encourage people who have the wherewithall perhaps to get started in the newspaper industry, that is, the money to finance the equipment and the staff, and perhaps a place to produce the paper, that they should not be restricted by the terms of the franchise from the Canadian Press.

Canadian Press is a co-operative to the extent it belongs to the publishers of newspapers, and it is quite apparent that in any city where there is an existing publishing operation going on, that it's not always an open door to come and start a newspaper.

You have a closed shop to that extent, and perhaps they like to keep it that way. The suggestion in our brief is that it would take a long time. You just don't ask for a franchise from the Canadian Press.

In many cities, the existing franchises are owned by newspapers who do not operate the papers that they are entitled to operate, for instance a morning and evening newspaper in many cities. They own the morning paper franchise, but they don't use it. It is not the simplest thing in the world, as I understand it, for a publisher to secure a franchise in that city.

Senator Everett: So there is a difference of opinion there, between you and Mr. Dauphinee.

Mr. Duffy: I am not suggesting that anyone ever was refused, but if you take into consideration the cost, and the time required to earn this particular franchise, it might take a year to get this franchise, in our opinion anyway.

Senator Everett: Have you any evidence to support that contention?

Mr. Duffy: It is long ago and far away, but we did make an attempt to start a newspaper in Hamilton, and at that time...

The Chairman: When was that, Mr. Duffy?

Mr. Duffy: In 1946.

Senator Beaubien: Who tried to start the newspaper in Hamilton?

Mr. Duffy: The local union in Hamilton.

Senator Everett: The A.N.G.

Mr. Duffy: No, the Typographical Union local.

The Chairman: It was the I.T.U. that tried to get the franchise from CP?

Mr. Duffy: As I say, it is long ago and far away.

The Chairman: Mr. Histed, do you want to talk about it?

Mr. Histed: I happened to be president of the Hamilton News at one time, an honorary title with work with no pay, but we did start the Hamilton News as a three-time week paper. Eventually we sold it to Andy Peller, who had run Peller's Brewery and sold it, and then had some money. He bought the Hamilton News and started a daily.

It was true he was not denied Canadian Press, but what it would cost him to get it and pay for it three years in advance, as we understood, as he reported to us, would run about $200,000. This would make it prohibitive and he was unable to do so, and this was our understanding of how we could get Canadian Press.

We believe this is a deterrent against other people getting into the newspaper field who might desire to do so.

Senator Prowse: What about the Times in Vancouver. Wasn't there an attempt to carry on one of the papers there by the union in Vancouver.

Mr. Histed: No, I don't think so—not prior to that period. Roy Thomson, Lord Thomson of Fleet, owned the morning paper, and that was sold, but the Times was...

Senator Prowse: There was a new one.

Mr. Histed: That was the new off-set plant, yes, that ran for some months and then ran out of money because of lack of advertising.

Senator Prowse: But they did get C.P.?

Mr. Histed: Not to my knowledge.

Mr. Fortier: Our information is that they did.

Mr. Histed: All right.

Senator Everett: Was the Winnipeg Citizen—was the I.T.U. involved in that?

Mr. Histed: No, that was a sale of stock. I bought stock, and many union members throughout Canada bought stock, as well as business people.

Senator Everett: Were they able to get a CP franchise.

Mr. Histed: Not at that time, I do not believe. I think they got U.P.I. one of those small wire services. They could not afford the bigger ones.

Senator Everett: Mr. Heritage, you made the statement I think just recently, that your locals have complete autonomy.

I am referring to the Book of Laws of the International Typographical Union.

One of the sections on page 34:

"Subordinate unions are required to submit to the International President for review and approval, as complying with requirements of International Union laws, all proposals for a new contract, alteration, amendment or extension of an existing contract in duplicate before presentation to the employer."

"Section 4. No local union shall sign a contract guaranteeing its members to work for any proprietor, firm or corporation, unless such contract is in accordance with International law and policy and approved by the International President."

I won't bore you with any more clauses, but there are a series of clauses that appear to me, with my lack of knowledge of these matters, to derogate from the concept of local autonomy.

Mr. Heritage: These contract proposals of course, we have a very important function in that, and we feel that we have always in the 118 years tried to stabilize the industry and equalize conditions in the industry. So the convention, and the members voted on it, set conditions that all locals must follow, and therefore all contracts must be submitted, not on economics.

We don't touch economics, because this is strictly local economy according to the geographic location, and what they want to work for. But on matters of a general nature that affect the industry as a whole, the contract department advises the local on what is happening, what arbitration cases have happened on certain clauses, and advises them to change it.

It is the same when a contract is negotiated, it is submitted to the contract department to see that these rules and regulations have been met.

Senator Everett: But surely that is a form of interfering with local autonomy.

Mr. Heritage: We don't consider it an interference with local autonomy. You have rules in all associations that you go by, even the publishers follow A.N.P.A. suggestions, or CONPA suggestions.

If the local doesn't want to accept those, of course, they won't get an approved contract. It is as simple as that. Just not an approved contract.

Senator Everett: And what does that mean. What is the effect of not having an approved contract.

Mr. Heritage: The effect of not having an approved contract is that then they have made this decision on their own, and they have to live with the effects of that contract. This has happened occasionally where they agreed to a contract that couldn't be approved, and of course anything that would happen during the term of that contract, they would be responsible for.

Senator Everett: They would get no help then, from the International Union.

Mr. Heritage: It could get to the stage that they would not get any help under the law because they broke the very rules that they voted on, and accepted.

Senator Everett: We are not arguing about the acceptance of the rules by the union initially. We are talking about local autonomy. The sanction seems to be that if they break one of these rules the International Union does not then support them.

Mr. Heritage: This could happen, but this never has happened.

Senator Everett: I assume it has never happened because they have always submitted the contracts.

Mr. Heritage: Well, no, it has happened, and no one has been penalized, but you have to have some rules for an organization. You have to have some guidelines and if of course, they went completely out of line, you have to apply sanctions.

Otherwise, why have them affiliated?

Mr. Fortier: Doesn't in fact Colorado Springs have a right of veto over any contract that is submitted to them from any of the Canadian locals.

Mr. Heritage: Depends on what you mean when you say "veto".

Mr. Fortier: Don't they have, following the articles which Senator Everett read, is it not a fact that if, after submission of a proposed contract they see fit for any reason, and I would question whether economics would be excluded, if for any reason whatsoever they said "No, you should not accept those terms," can they not effectively veto the local's acceptance of the contract.

Mr. Heritage: How can they veto it except by lifting the charter.

Mr. Fortier: Well, they can refuse to approve the contract. That is tantamount to a veto, is it not?

Mr. Heritage: We have had local agreements in Canada before. We have local agreements with the Toronto Star for several years. We still have agreements where the union is treading on dangerous grounds if they get in trouble. They are living under conditions that are not equal in the industry, and the I.T.U. can veto it, but they haven't.

If you say "veto" it means that they tell them that they can't sign it. They have not said "you can't sign it", they say, "If you sign it you do not have our approval, and then you are taking a chance, you are on your own."

It's as simple as that.

The Chairman: Mr. Histed, were you going to add something, or were you not.

Mr. Histed: I didn't want to interrupt.

The Chairman: If you wish to add something, you may do so.

Mr. Histed: I think Mr. Heritage has answered the question. It is just simply a matter that it is a part of our laws, made by our members, that they must submit the proposal to the International for approval. It is done by the Bureau of Contracts under the name of the International President, and it is checked to see whether it is within our rules and regulations.

If it is not, then they are told that this should be changed to comply with it. But economically, no.

If they want to work for .80c. an hour, and it doesn't violate law, there is nothing the International can do to stop them.

Mr. Fortier: If the members of the local, say, in Ottawa are prepared to work, as you put it, for .80c. an hour as compared with the going rate of, say, $1.50 an hour...

Senator Beaubien: $1.50—$3.50.

Mr. Fortier: What would happen in Colorado Springs. Would they really approve it?

Mr. Histed: The International officers have no right to refuse to approve a contract negotiated proposal that is in compliance with our laws, and we have no laws as to the economics, that is, how much an hour.

Mr. Fortier: Not exactly, except that the booklet from which Senator Everett was reading does say that it has to be approved by the International, so that the International theoretically could choose any item and decide to refuse its consent.

Senator Prowse: Mr. Chairman, could we be specific about this so that we can get it into an area where we are not talking about hypothetical things, where nobody knows what we are talking about.

Could you give us a specific kind of an instance, something that might be included in a contract by local people where, in your opinion the headquarters would say "no". What kind of thing would they say "no" to.

Mr. Heritage: It would be an item in the case of where it would give one paper unfair competition over another newspaper.

Senator Prowse: There aren't any certain things, when you say "law"? Each case would be decided on its own merits in view of the competitive situation?

Mr. Heritage: No, we have a set standard form of checks.

For instance, check items which must be met which are set by the membership in convention every two or three years, or by referendum vote depending on the item, and the contract department under the executive council enforces this convention action. Our aim is to stabilize the industry and have equal conditions across the country, so that all employers are competing on the same restrictions as other employers, and our members are all enjoying the same basic working conditions in the area of five-day week, and things of this nature.

When it comes to economics, such as vacations, wages, this is left to the local union based on their geographical location and what those members are prepared to fight for. We can't tell them that they must fight for $5. an hour, or anything else.

Senator Prowse: Specifically, let's say you have a situation where you have a city with two newspapers. You had an agreement with one that provided three weeks holiday with pay, after an appropriate period, and then the second contract came in and they were going to provide two-weeks holidays, with pay.

Would that be the type of thing that they would disapprove.

Mr. Heritage: No, this is happening right now.

Senator Prowse: Well what I want to know, and I think I have to know, to understand what you are talking about, is what specific kind of item in a contract would give headquarters under your laws the right to say "no, we won't approve."

Mr. Heritage: For instance, "a full shift clause", where we say an employee can not be employed for less than a full shift. This is standard throughout our industry.

Senator Prowse: If you call them in, you have to pay them for eight hours.

Mr. Heritage: We say work—he must work—for eight hours.

Things of this nature to equalize conditions across the industry, or a restriction of, for instance, only allowing employers to use C.P.—Canadian Press—tape, rather than encourage another wire service to come into Canada such as the U.P.I. or A.P.

Why would we give it to one employer, if we were not going to give it to all employers, and things of this nature, that would restrict the conditions so all employers are treated the same.

Senator Prowse: This for the protection of the employers, or through the employers, for equality in the industry.

Mr. Heritage: And our people too, of course, not only with respect to employers.

It is equalizing conditions in the industry. Don't forget in the I.T.U., we have what we call the travel card system, where we supply the help, and when an apprentice finishes his time he usually goes on to another city. But it also equalizes the conditions so that he knows that he is going to move into the same basic conditions—not wages or economics, vacations, etc., but the basic working conditions of the span of hours between a certain time and the full shift clause and limited outside wire services—things like those.

Senator Everett: I have here a document that is called "Sample Contract—Canadian".

Are you aware of that document?

Mr. Heritage: Yes.

Senator Everett: I would like to read some clauses from it:

"Section 3, Unless otherwise specified in this agreement, all type setter tapes shall be perforated by journeymen, or apprentices covered by this agreement."

If I understand it correctly, this can be done, especially if there is a computer to justify, by an ordinary typist. Is that correct.

Mr. Heritage: No, we don't believe it can be, because we take the position that they have to be trained, and know type setting and have a background of printing to be able to do it properly.

You have to know the end result, with any computer, before you put the information in.

Senator Everett: Why?

Mr. Heritage: Because in the newspaper industry it is a case of depending on the copy you are handling. If you are coding, you have to know the coding. The computer can't just take the tape unless you are going to code the tape.

It has to be coded to tell the computer what to do, and the printer knows this.

Senator Everett: Doesn't the coding take place by the very act of typing.

Mr. Heritage: Yes.

Senator Everett: It is an ordinary typewriting keyboard, isn't it.

Mr. Heritage: It is an ordinary typewriting keyboard.

Senator Everett: If you punch those keys in the way you operate an ordinary typewriter, the tape comes out and then it goes into a justifying computer, and is justified.

Mr. Heritage: Yes, provided the codes are on, and, like I say, a printer knows better in our experience, than an ordinary typist.

Senator Everett: Isn't this part of the problem in the Ottawa Citizen, dispute.

As I understand it, the perforated tape operators there are part of the American Newspaper Guild.

Mr. Heritage: That is correct.

Senator Everett: Would they be journeymen compositors.

Mr. Heritage: No.

Senator Everett: What would they be, Mr. Heritage, just ordinary typists.

Mr. Heritage: Well, they got some of their people from Canadian Press. They have some ex-telegrapher operators. I don't know what all their people are.

Senator Everett: But they would not be compositors?

Mr. Heritage: No, I think you are missing the point, too. It goes beyond just perforating for news. News matter is different than when you get into ads.

When you get into ads, it is more complicated because you have different codes and you have to know ads to do it, and this is the area that we are basically concerned with in the Ottawa Citizen.

Senator Prowse: In other words, an untrained person could do the news column while he couldn't to the ads.

Mr. Heritage: Not entirely untrained. You still have to train these people. You just can't bring a typist out and sit her at the typewriter and even although they have sixty or seventy words a minute expect them to be able to perforate tape.

Senator Prowse: The machine isn't that good yet.

Mr. Heritage: It isn't that good.

Senator Everett: What about classified advertising.

Mr. Heritage: Classified advertising comes in the same line as the news matter.

Senator Everett: And you say you are not concerned with those employees who are involved in that.

Mr. Heritage: Oh, yes, we are very concerned. Of course, we have a problem, the fact that the Newspaper Guild some years ago, while we had our dispute on at the Citizen, organized the perforator operators and the proof readers. Of course when you apply to the Labour Relations Board, even though we had a history of these people being a part of our unit, they would not allow us to carve out this unit out of an already existing industrial unit, so this is a problem.

I think, however, it is going to be a problem for the newspaper when they go into ads too, if it still exists.

Senator Everett: The Labour Relations Board has made the decision on this case.

Mr. Heritage: Only on the basis of the present employees and the work they are presently doing, which is news matter and classified ads. They have not gone into ad setting yet.

Senator Everett: Presumably those employees don't do ad setting.

Mr. Heritage: Not at the present time.

Senator Everett: What is the position of the I.T.U. in relation to the Ontario Labour Relations Board's decision. You are not accepting it.

Mr. Heritage: We have not taken a position actually on it. We are trying to find a solution to it in negotiation. This is what we are trying to do at the bargaining table.

Senator Everett: If you succeeded in having these people being part of the ideal bargaining unit, would you replace them with compositors.

Mr. Heritage: This is something I can't say.

We certainly would not intend to replace anybody if they became part of the bargaining unit, they would probably be up-dated on training so they can perforate ads.

Senator Everett: To bring them up to...

Mr. Heritage: To bring them up to the standard required for the setting of ads, but we can't comment on that because of the fact that the Labour Relations Board has made a decision and the only way we can probably work it out is at the bargaining table.

Senator Everett: Well, you are free to comment in here. There is nothing to prevent you.

Mr. Heritage: When you are bargaining, you don't comment on what you are going to do at the bargaining table.

Senator Everett: Would they become apprentices, then.

Mr. Heritage: Again, I say, this is something that if I tell you what they will become, even though this is confidential in here, there is enough people who will take it back to the company and tell them what our position is going to be, or our solutions to the problem.

The Chairman: Well, you should be clear, it is not confidential in here. It is privileged.

Mr. Heritage: I mean, it is not confidential, it is privileged.

Senator Everett: The clause goes on to say:

"No tape perforated by the employer under this contract shall be transmitted by wire, or sent elsewhere."

Why do you insist on that?

Mr. Heritage: Well, the whole point is that if we allowed them to transmit it elsewhere, then you would be reducing the number of jobs in the industry, because you would have one employer sending stories to the rest of his chain of newspapers.

We allow them the Canadian Press tape, and we feel that that is sufficient to allow them to set up more tape operations where they could, possibly the group newspapers would have an advantage over the independent newspapers because they would perforate their stories here in Ottawa, and send them over a private wire on the group basis.

We don't want to encourage more tape operation. Otherwise, it is going to eliminate our job opportunities.

Senator Prowse: In other words, you could have one fellow sit and type...

Mr. Heritage: That's right, and how about the independent newspapers. They would not have this advantage. That is a big problem too.

Senator Everett: What about the wire service coming into the newspapers, then. Do you permit the tapes there to go on the composing machine.

Mr. Heritage: Canadian Press, we do. We recognize all the employers who use Canadian press.

Senator Beaubien: No other tapes they can use?

Mr. Heritage: They don't use any other tapes.

Senator Beaubien: You don't allow them to use any other tapes.

Mr. Heritage: Not under our contract.

Senator Everett: What about, say, Washington Post Service?

Mr. Heritage: This usually comes over Canadian Press.

Senator Everett: Can you think of any situation where there is a tape produced by the Service that you don't allow the employer to use directly.

Mr. Heritage: There might be a sports wire, or a stock market wire on the stock exchange that has been used.

Senator Everett: The U.P.I.?

Mr. Heritage: No, I believe most of that comes over Canadian Press too. I believe the Toronto papers have a direct wire from the stock exchange.

Senator Everett: The Herald Tribune Service?

Mr. Heritage: No, not in tape form, they get it in hard copy—telex.

Senator Everett: But if there were, you would only allow the Canadian Press service to be used.

Mr. Histed: I don't want to interfere with Mr. Heritage's description here, but there are some cases where, the Montreal Star has the contract right to use U.P.I. wire tapes on the New York Stock Exchange.

We negotiate that in.

Of course, the big thing in this matter is—this question of teletypesetter tape is—after all, we are representing our members and their jobs, and we naturally are not anxious to try and give away our members' jobs and put them out of work. But there are, to be specific on that point, cases where if the local union will agree, the International has permitted the local union to agree in the case of the Montreal Star to use this U.P.I. stock market from New York, and in other cases for the Canadian Stock Exchange over the Canadian Press.

Senator Everett: But if they don't agree, then they would have to re-set it.

Mr. Histed: If the local union won't agree, if they are concerned that it will cost them a lot of jobs, they have a perfect right to refuse to agree to it.

Mr. Heritage: On that point, on the stock exchange, we have a lot of it, because in Montreal there was the particular problem, they couldn't get the stock markets over the Canadian Press.

Senator Everett: What is the concern of the I.T.U. in a situation like this. You say it is to protect the jobs of your members.

Mr. Heritage: And also to equalize the industry. I think I gave an example that if we allowed unlimited use of tape, imagine what the group organizations could do to the independent papers.

They would have this advantage, and the independent papers would not have this advantage, would they?

Senator Beaubien: The independents could buy it—they could buy a tape just as well as anybody else.

Mr. Heritage: Buy it from the group organization, could they, if the group organization didn't want to sell it to them.

Senator Everett: I think we are more concerned about your protection of your members than the protection of the publishers, so if we can deal with that, because I am interested in this, you use the word "job protection" and I notice in resolution 19:

"Local unions give special consideration to the following contract proposals as an essential part of the program for protecting these jobs and security of our members".

And in item (B) of the resolution "Job protection clauses to protect jobs of members employed at time of introduction of computers, other labour saving processes, and the use of outside tape";

Tell me, are you concerned about the protection of the job, or the protection of the employees' job.

In other words, is it the continuation of the function that you are worried about, or the individual employee, so long as he lives or works for that particular journal.

Mr. Heritage: I think both, actually, because we certainly don't agree attrition is the answer to automation, if this is what you are getting at.

We believe in both the protection of the job, and stabilization of the industry, and we feel that this does stabilize it.

We have gradually modified our position as we feel in the industry it requires modification. We have changed many of our traditions on the matters that were sort of called "sacred cows" of I.T.U., or this is what they were called in the press.

We have changed these as changes in the industry and evolutions in the industry have come about, and we have realized we have had to change it.

We are not against it, provided it is going to affect the industry as a whole, but we are not going to give consensus to one employer that we aren't prepared to give to the other.

Senator Everett: So if an efficiency came into the industry that all journals could take advantage of, you would be only concerned with protecting the employees who were there at the time, not concerned at that point with protecting the job.

Mr. Heritage: We would have to take a very hard look at it, the same as we have with any other type of evolution that came into our industry.

Senator Everett: How would you decide that?

The Chairman: Mr. Earles, do you want to say something?

Mr. Earles: If I may, my answer to the specific question would be, if the work is being done, regardless of the way it was being done, was traditionally the jurisdiction of the International Typographical Union, or the local union, if that work was continued to be done, we would be concerned about that work.

If the work disappeared—we have not fought this anywhere in automation, but whether it is on tape, or whether it is on copy, or whether it is on type, it is being set by somebody, and if it comes in on a television camera, or whatever, it is still setting type for printing, which is traditionally work we have had jurisdiction over.

But if that work disappears completely, then I would say—no, we are not concerned. We have not fought it anywhere down the line.

Senator Everett: I am referring now to Section 22 of the contract which says:

“The interchanging, exchanging, borrowing, lending or buying of matter, either in the form of type of matrices, between newspapers, between job offices, or between newspaper and job offices, or vice versa, not owned by the same individual, firm or corporation, and published in the same establishment shall not be allowed unless such type or matrices are reset as nearly like the original as possible, made up, read and corrected and a proof submitted to the chairman of the office.

“Matrices, plates, cuts or type of local advertisements, or other local matter furnished to newspaper offices, may be used by such offices, provided such matter shall be reproduced as nearly like the original as possible within the time limit specified herein.

“The time limit within which borrowed or purchased matter, or matrices, are to be reset shall be — days from date of use.”

Could you comment on that?

Mr. Heritage: I expected that question to be asked.

Senator Everett: Incidentally, I have taken it out of context.

Mr. Heritage: This has been a subject that has been bandied around in the press, and the terminology, I believe, was used was “feather-bedding” in our industry.

This reproduction was started back in 1871, and it was a mutual agreement between the I.T.U. and the employers, to allow them to borrow type of an ad that was set by another employer for a case of expediency, so they would not have to set it themselves and they charged the advertiser the full price for the ad, even though they didn't have any labour costs involved.

In fact, we have a brochure on this that was put before the Supreme Court in the United States where it was challenged, and it was upheld that it was legal for it to continue.

Now, I would like to say, in this area this was a source of job protection. After all, we contract to do all of their composing room work, all their typesetting. The employers wanted the right to borrow tape for expediency sake, to use that ad immediately, and they agreed in return for this so we would not lose our job opportunities, and after all, they were not charging any labour costs for it, but they were still charging the full cost of the ad, in return for this they said that it would be re-set by our members at a later date, so in that way there were still job opportunities.

Rather than laying people off, our people would re-set these reproductions.

Now, this has not been carried on since the war years because of a shortage of help in our industry. This has got to the point where in 1960, (and I was part of the committee that investigated this) the convention recommended changing it, but after all it was an emotional issue; this was a deterrent to employers laying people off. After all they were getting ads in the form of mats rather than type, with no labour costs involved and they would use them.

Two newspapers would exchange it between each other, taking turns. There was no labour cost involved and they were getting the advantage of a mat put in the other paper.

In this investigation, we found out that less affected by it, and of that ten per cent, very than ten per cent of our newspapers were few of them—in the United States and Canada—very few of them were hardly that much affected. It was mostly used as a deterrent.

At our recent convention just last year, in fact, we have given the option, and because it is an emotional issue with our members because it is a deterrent to job losses and lay-offs, and advertising time, however, the convention approved that the local union has an option now to negotiate on reproduction.

If they can get something in return that is equal in security, either in the way of a combination of pensions for the older people so that it will induce them to retire earlier, because of automation coming in, or in the way of jurisdiction over new processes that will provide job opportunities, and this has been relegated to the local union to negotiate.

This is what I said earlier. When it becomes necessary to meet a change in conditions and items that have been called "sacred cows" by the press and by newspaper publishers, we try to meet it, but the membership have to approve this.

In fact, reproduction went to a referendum vote of our members, and if you understand our laws, since you have read them, you will understand when we say a referendum vote, it doesn't mean that they go out to a meeting to vote. The ballots are taken into the shop, so we almost get a 95 per cent vote on our elections on any items of this sort.

It was rejected after the 1960 convention, but at the last convention it was passed that this is now subject to local negotiations as long as they can get something in return that is equal in security, or deterrent to lay-off, or pensions, or a combination formula.

So, does that answer your question?

Senator Everett: It does indeed.

The Chairman: Senator Everett, I don't want to terminate the questions, and I know Senator Beaubien has a question, but we have another witness waiting.

Senator Beaubien: You say you re-set the type at a later date?

Mr. Heritage: This was the practice.

Senator Beaubien: What would you do with it then—throw it away?

Mr. Heritage: Yes.

Senator Prowse: This was to measure the amount of compensation.

Mr. Heritage: Don't forget, and this is what people seem to forget, that this was an agreement between the employers years ago, and a practice accepted in the industry to allow the employers to do something that wasn't allowed under the terms of the agreement. In other words, to use type from another employer.

In other words, they are charging the advertisers the full price, so the point is they should pay the full price in labour costs.

Senator Prowse: Otherwise, they could have the whole paper printed over there.

Mr. Heritage: With the modern techniques, this could happen.

Senator Everett: I will be as quick as possible, Mr. Chairman.

Section 5:

"The operation, authority, and control of each composing room shall be vested exclusively in the office through its representative, the foreman, who shall be a journeyman member of the Union, etc. etc."

Doesn't that run counter to most labour relations Acts. Isn't the foreman excluded from the bargaining unit?

Mr. Heritage: In industrial unions, yes, but not in many craft unions, and the history, if you read the history of the I.T.U., foremen have always been a member of the union because they are protected.

If they lose their job as foremen they still retain their priority in the composing room, and they just go back on the floor.

In fact, we still have publishers who retain their I.T.U. membership, production managers who retain their I.T.U. membership.

It also helps too, many times a foreman who has been an I.T.U. member (and many foremen have been past-presidents of local unions) understands the contract better, and understands the I.T.U. regulations better.

Of course, for some people it is hard to accept, because they are used to the industrial contract.

Senator Everett: Do you think that contributes to efficiency, or inefficiency?

Mr. Heritage: It contributes to efficiency for the simple reason that we also put in the laws that no foreman can be disciplined by the union for any action taken under the instructions of the publisher.

In other words, if the foreman does something against a fellow member, and they take charges against him, any appeal that has gone into our International has been upheld on the part of the foreman because after all the grievance is with his employer, not with the foreman. Therefore we have found it has worked out.

Senator Everett: Is that in every I.T.U. contract, that clause.

Mr. Heritage: Yes, it is.

Senator Everett: I am reading from the Financial Post of March the 8th, 1969. I will just read a very short part of it:

"Productivity per employee in Canada's printing and publishing industry was 27 to 30 per cent lower than that in the United States industry in 1961 to 1965. "Newspaper publishing and printing have a much greater weight in the Canadian industry than in the U.S. "More than three-quarters of industry output in Canada consists of newspapers against roughly fifty per cent in the U.S."

So it would seem, if the statement is true, the lack of productivity is in the newspaper area.

Would you care to comment on that?

Mr. Heritage: Yes, Senator Everett.

Don't forget, in the United States they have gone into new processes much more quickly than the Canadian newspaper industry, and I think the Canadian newspaper industry, rightly so, has taken a "wait and see" attitude because our industry is changing so fast, and the equipment today, say, this year, is out-moded tomorrow.

But I think you will see the picture change because of the changes in the Canadian newspaper industry in the last year. We have been told of some of the plans that are on the drawing board. You are going to see a complete evolution in the Canadian newspaper industry in the way of computerized type setting and photo-composition—so this could be the explanation for it.

Senator Everett: The publishers suggest it is the I.T.U.

Mr. Heritage: I don't know what publisher is suggesting that. I would like to see some proof of that.

Senator Everett: Do you dispute that statement?

Mr. Heritage: I definitely dispute it, and there are other publishers that will, and I think you could check with some of them.

Senator Everett: You have some in your brief here.

Mr. Heritage: Le Soleil is a good example where they found that through re-training and co-operation with the union that they have got a very efficient operation, and many of the employers across the country and from the United States have gone down and viewed it.

Senator Everett: The last question, which I am sure you expected, is to ask you for comments on the Pacific Press dispute.

Mr. Heritage: As I said earlier, we have local autonomy, and I want to make it clear that the International has not been involved in the Vancouver situation except to the extent of trying to find a way to get the thing back on the rails.

There are five unions involved in Vancouver, and it has been a local situation. We have advised our people there that we do not condone any alleged actions that have taken place, or any actions that they are charged with, and we could not be a party to it, and we have made it very clear to the men.

The employers know this too, and the employers have not, in the Vancouver situation, held the International responsible for it.

Senator Everett: If the alleged actions—do you propose to investigate—I assume you are talking about the slow down.

Mr. Heritage: Well, I understand that they have said that there have been slow downs, etc.

Senator Everett: But I assumed that is what you were referring to.

Mr. Heritage: That is right. This is a very delicate situation for the simple reason when the International steps into the picture we are damned by the press that we are interfering in Canadian affairs. Even if we are requested in by the employer, we are damned by the labour movement, so the most important thing to us is not to comment too greatly on it.

The most important thing is, how can we find a solution. How can we bring them back to the bargaining table, and try and get the matter settled.

There might have to be drastic action taken by the International—but you hesitate. We have not been asked by the company to intervene. We hesitate for this very reason.

You are going to be damned right off the bat with the fact that you are an International union, and you are dictating to a Canadian local.

Senator Everett: Would you intervene if the companies asked you to?

Mr. Heritage: We certainly would; no question about it.

Senator Everett: Thank you.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Heritage, you say in your brief, item 26, "that tremendous changes are yet to come". That is the official position of I.T.U. and that is with respect to technological changes.

You go on and say:

"That our members should be prepared to accept these changes and trained to perform in a new era that will see the printed word continuing to be the chief means of disseminating news in the mass media."

Bearing in mind this statement, and also the explanation which was given by Mr. Earles, that as long as it is setting it doesn't matter if it's type, tape or copy, you claim jurisdiction over the person performing that job.

Mr. Heritage: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Is the International Union in Colorado Springs taking any means of meeting head on the advent in the foreseeable future of a facsimile press?

Mr. Heritage: Yes, we are already involved, I believe the Wall Street Journal has this operation, and we are involved in this field.

For instance, we are very much aware of the speed of setting type; for instance, in the commercial industry, the video computer set the complete Manhattan telephone book in one hour from a by-product from telephone records.

We are aware of all these new sophisticated pieces of equipment. Facsimile transmission—of course, we are very much aware that this is coming in a very short period of time. Mind you, the cost is prohibitive in many areas.

Mr. Fortier: Your position is that the setting element will not disappear.

Mr. Heritage: No, we don't believe it will. It will be done through the electronic methods but it still has to be done.

You still have to have something to transmit.

You have got to have a page to have the electronic process pick up the characters on the page and transmit it.

Senator Macdonald: Back to your original statement, Mr. Heritage, I believe it was when you were reading from the report of the Ottawa Citizen, you mentioned you did not blame the reporters for not giving a wholly accurate account of what went on.

Now, if you didn't blame the reporters, do you mean to say that it was after they put in their story that the copy was changed by someone?

Mr. Heritage: Just going from my understanding of the newspaper industry, which I have been in approximately 18 years, any story probably has to meet the approval of the editor before it goes in, and I am not blaming the reporters entirely.

I am just saying that this is a fact that the story came out this way. Maybe it was the reporter's interpretation of it, but it was a written brief and surely the reporter could not go wrong in a written brief.

Someone must have edited it, and where would it be edited?

I just made the statement, we are not blaming the reporters, but possibly it was the policy of the paper that they felt this was the way it should come out.

Senator Prowse: Maybe someone said, "what will we do with this?"

Mr. Heritage: I don't know the answer, but I don't want to blame the reporters because I feel they are trying to do a job, and they write as they see the news.

But, in a written brief, the news was there, so someone must have instructed someone to edit it.

Senator Macdonald: Perhaps the reporter did it on his own.

Mr. Heritage: I don't think the reporters do that. They might interpret the news different, or the facts different from other reporters, but I am sure when the story is in print and it goes back, someone else instructs the editing of it.

Senator Macdonald: So you think there was someone along the way.

Mr. Heritage: There must have been, because it did not come out the way it is in the printed brief.

The Chairman: Mr. Heritage, on behalf of the committee, I would like to thank you for asking to come.

We had considered earlier, in drawing up our schedule, asking you here.

Our problem, of course, living in real world, is to hear as many viewpoints as we possibly can, and in a reasonably limited amount of time, but in a study of this kind we really do a disservice to ourselves unless we have a balanced presentation. We want to hear of course from publishers, and owners, and other people in the media. We want to hear, as we are, from communicators with national reputation, and certainly from the public. But as well, I think it is important that we hear from producers, if I may use that term, like yourself—the people who are really on the action line, as it were, and we are grateful to you for preparing the brief and for coming.

As I said to so many other groups, not just union groups, but publishers and others, having been here and having seen the committee, now that you are leaving, if in the course of the balance of our deliberations, or if indeed in deliberations you are going to subsequently have, if there is additional information you would like to send us which you think might be useful, we would like to hear from you. It may be that we will have further questions for you which we may want to put to you—perhaps privately, in a letter.

Mr. Heritage: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and Honourable Senators.

It is certainly a pleasure for us to appear. As it was said earlier, we had not intended to appear except that we felt that when we had been mentioned in presentations we perhaps should appear to clear the record, and answer any questions the senators might have.

We do not have many booklets which we have brought. In fact, in the United States free and competitive press situation, we wrote a complete submission entitled "Federal Responsibility for a Free and Competitive Press." It was presented before the Antitrust Subcommittee of the House Committee on the Judiciary Investigation of Monopoly Practices in the Newspaper Industry.

Unfortunately we haven't one on Canada, but possibly because of your special Senate Committee here we may have to go into the Canadian aspect too.

The Chairman: Could you leave those with us.

Mr. Heritage: Yes, and also we have, in answer to comments of the newspaper industry, graphic arts unions against automation, our former president, Elmer Brown wrote the booklet "Graphic Arts Unions and Automation—a pamphlet that faces up to the changes and evolutions of the industry and we would be prepared to leave a copy of it as well.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. May I again thank you all.

Honourable Senators, if I may call this session to order. The next witness is another one in a series—a phrase I have used, in any event, Ken, is "nationally known communicators", which includes such illustrious people who have been here as Doug Fisher, Charles Templeton, and people who are yet to come like Dalton Camp and Pierre Berton and others I could name.

I would say to the Senators it is perhaps not necessary for me to read the biography of Mr. Lefolli, which has been supplied, and which I think most Senators have probably studied.

Perhaps I need only say that he is one of those remarkable Canadians who have in-depth experience in various branches of the mass media.

He has been, as the Senators know, an editor of Maclean's. He has been a television producer and a commentator on both the private network and on the CBC. He has done a great many things which will interest us greatly, including most recently, of course, a month, from which he has just returned, spent in Vietnam.

He is also writing a book, with which I think the Senators are familiar, not just on the communications industry but more specifically on the press.

In short he is the kind of person that I think has a great deal to offer a Committee like this and this is why I am so delighted, Ken, you could find the time and we appreciate you coming down.

You have no formal brief and may I suggest this procedure. I suspect you do have some notes and perhaps you can make an oral statement of whatever is on your mind and then we would like to question you on your statement and other things.

Mr. Ken Lefolii: Senators, if it feels as late in the evening to you as it does to me you may be glad to know that my notes occupy one page in this small book.

I come here wearing two hats: as a working journalist I come to respond to questions you might have. I come here also as a critic of the press.

I put myself forward in this capacity only because there are next to none of them in this country and there are few in the English-speaking world.

It has always struck me that journalists take themselves far too seriously and their trade far too lightly.

My daughter speaks of people who go on "ego trips" and it seems to me that most of what we hear about freedom of the press is said by people who speak for their own egos, their prerogatives and positions and public stature in their capacity as something called a publisher or producer or journalist. They are not speaking with concern for whatever the function in a democracy of a free press might be.

Now I have written a book about my notions, my understanding of the difference between the press we have today and what in classic democratic theory has been regarded as free press. I think these are two completely different things. If you would like an expansion of that thesis I refer you to the book.

The press is indistinguishable now, it seems to me, from the media; and the media are not the collection of pop names and trivia that most discussions of the media, as I have heard them, suggests to us they are.

One of the few theorists of the media, for whom I have a great deal of respect, is a man named Ivan Illitch, who is an educator. He works in Mexico City trying to understand the processes of education for this purpose.

He is convinced, as indeed I think anyone who studies economics must be, that Latin America will not in our time generate a large enough economic surplus to install a school system as we in North America know. There are more people living in Latin America than in North America and he is looking for ways, devices, institutions, methods, means to educate the generation or generations of Latin Americans who in the ordinary economic fact will never get a chance to go to school.

He asks the hard question: If you have not got schools, how do you teach? If there are no schools to go to, how do kids learn?

It is his understanding—and this is one of the important thinkers in the world today—it is his understanding that what we call the media offer a solution if ways can be found to use these media.

Central to his position is this understanding in cultural terms of what the media are. They have replaced, as the main stream of transmitting cultural and social values, the church, which did this for us in the Middle Ages and before; and the schools which have done it in what we call the modern era, 19th and 20th centuries.

Now that is an intellectual's theoretical understanding.

In the last year I have been getting letters from ordinary audiences from very ordinary, believe me, television programmes. They say the same things to me from where they sit.

If the Committee has any use for them I will be glad to give you copies. The people who write me say "I never got to university and I learned from watching public affairs on the television. I learn from reading the newspapers."

This same thing is apparent to some editors, some publishers, some broadcasters, some newspapers, daily newspapers. They are turning themselves from recorders of fires and how many people died in crashes on the highways, to a platform for carrying the written understanding of the way our society works.

Not all of them are doing this and none are doing it very successfully but this is what the good publishers are doing.

That is why I think you here are dealing with a question a good deal more important than perhaps you would say.

I think when the Prime Minister speaks of inflation and even pollution as being the essential problems for Canada, that there is a much more essential one and this is the issue of the institutions which carry the cultural tradition from generation to generation.

The ones you are examining I believe do this.

All right. My criticisms I will pass because you have heard a lot of criticism. I come here as a critic to speak of alternatives. The media as a function right now has been condemned by the liveliest people in an entire generation.

I don't know a kid, including my own daughters, who believes a word he or she reads in the conventional daily newspapers or hears on network television. To tell you the damn truth, I don't blame them.

Any defence, or set of rationalizations in defence of their performance that the media put forward in the face of that condemnation strikes me as rationalization. Who cares? And maybe they are right. The fact is the people who will lead the moulds of thought in the next generation don't believe them.

Therefore since their trade is language it doesn't matter if they are right or wrong; their language has not communicated their rightness if they are right.

So what are the alternatives? Well, access is a central problem. The kids have concluded that the media are wrong because they have no access to them. They have concluded that this is a one-party press. I use "press" to stand for "media" here because the word, although it applied to a set of cogs and wheels and printed on paper, seems to be the best and shortest and most Anglo-Saxon word we have got for the business of putting ideas into circulation. So when I say "press" I mean television as well as the printing of newspapers.

This is a one-party press and inside the dynamics of the contemporary corporation it is going to stay a one-party press whether or not the publishers say it is open to everybody and indeed whether they practice this. Here is the important thing.

Five years ago I thought the Toronto Telegram was a lousy newspaper. I now tend to think it is a pretty good one; not because I have changed my mind but because the Telegram has changed its practices. It, like many of the good large city newspapers in the world, has been making itself into a platform.

It is almost like what the military men call a platform for weapons launching. They don't speak of aeroplanes or boats any more, they say "How stable is that platform for launching weapons?"

A good big city newspaper is a platform for carrying various kinds of contention, various kinds of understanding of the community that the newspaper seeks to serve. The Toronto Telegram has done a really extraordinary thing. It has transformed itself from what seemed to me a simple-minded spokesman for simple-minded understanding—a "Board of Trade" understanding of the society it purported to serve, into a pretty good platform. Nevertheless, the Telegram is a large corporation, a large aggregation of capital and subject, as a corporation, to all the dynamics of corporate capital.

It is a member of a community which is very narrow and has very special interests and has one dynamic—growth. The contemporary corporation, as I understand it, and I have done a good deal of reading and a good deal of thinking on the subject and talked to a lot of people, particularly in the United States—the contemporary corporation is not in business primarily for making a large profit this year. It is not in business primarily to do any of the things the corporate statesman speaks of, like serving their community. It is in business to grow and economically that is a good thing for all of us.

But it makes any large corporation, whose product is one of the off-throws of the so-called media, it makes that corporation a member of a very special community; not ours, but the community of large aggregations of corporate capital.

The kids know this. They don't necessarily know it in the terms I am using but they know it. They know it is a one-party press.

The point is that it is not the Liberal Party, the Conservative Party or the NDP Party but the party of capital aggregate.

So the first proposition I have for you is to say (instead of trying to fight this organism which has grown up for good reasons) how can you adopt it or adjust it to its shortcomings as a producer of ideas, of communicated ideas?

It seems to me in precisely the same way that ownership is separated from control in the financial make-up of most large corporations that ownership could be separated from editorial control in the make-up of the media corporations.

In the conspicuous or spectacular fights that have been waged in Canada over such particular manifestations of the media as the television programme "This Hour Has Seven Days", as at the end of the period when I was editor of a magazine called Maclean's the issue has been management's right to manage (in the phrase of management) which they interpreted as meaning management's right to control the news or control ideas that were that management's product.

I put it to you that this Committee might well consider all of the precedents for separating ownership from effective control in corporations which are the model for these press corporations, whether that separation might not be installed as an institutional change in these media corporations. Not because the publisher or the owner is an evil man but because he belongs by nature to that one party and his exigencies are the exigencies of that party. If he says they are not, he is a liar. If indeed he rejects them, he is a loser and his corporation is going to go up the flue.

One man cannot direct himself to the difficulties of balancing the books and showing a profit, showing corporate growth, while he simultaneously directs himself to all those interests that the broader community has a right to expect from the media, if they are as centrally important as I say, if they are the central institutions for transmitting cultural values in our society.

That is one alternative I put to you.

Another one: I see no particular reason why we should accept the proposition that broadcasting programming initiatives can be placed very largely and safely in the hands of one corporation which is a public corporation responsible to Parliament, the CBC; but that for reasons which come closer to taboo or superstition, in my understanding, reasons that exclude the printed word.

If we can entrust the broadcast word to a public corporation then I see no reason in in principle why a Crown corporation could the printed word to a nationalized institution.

Canada has not had a national press. The CBC showed signs of becoming a national press in the 1930's and the early 1940's on radio. The pressures and the seductions of the show business aspects of television seem to destroy that potential.

A country like Canada, under the shadow of the United States, needs a national press, it would seem to me, a good deal more than the United Kingdom which has had a national press.

I would urge you to ask yourselves on this Committee whether there is any reason at all in principle why a Crown corporation could not publish a national newspaper or national revue; or indeed ignore the distinction, because I think it is apparent to all of you that the daily newspapers are less and less something distinct from revues.

The daily newspaper, where it is a good one, becomes a daily magazine more and more every day.

The third alternative to the present state of the media, that I urge you to direct attention to, is the set of questions raised by changing technology. I am struck and almost stunned by our lack of foresight, our almost total obscurity of vision in being able to foresee the changes that technology is going to bring about in the media.

In 1946, the FCC in Washington made a decision that drastically changed the cultural history of this continent during the oncoming years, when it let General Sarnoff persuade it that commercial broadcast television should be carried in the high-frequency band.

That restricted the possible number of national networks to three or at the most four. It restricted the possible number of local television broadcasting outlets to six or at the most seven.

If General Sarnoff had not been quite so persuasive and the decision had gone the other way then the numbers would have been much higher, the range of selection much higher, the ability of the media to be responsive much higher, and a completely different set of cultural initiatives and responses would have been initiated.

The same thing, it seems to me, the same kind of decision on the same matters of quality is being made right now in the set of instructions under which cable television will be regulated by government and the CRTC. They could, it seems to me, profit by guidance from Parliament well beyond the really vague provisions of the Broadcasting Act which tends to be an act endorsing motherhood and all the Christian virtues but offering very little guidance to the commissioners in doing a critically important and very difficult job.

Cable television does, if it follows one line of direction, offer a radical opportunity to return or to install broadcasting at almost the same point that high speed presses installed publishing at the end of the 19th century with the capacity—not immediately, not tomorrow, but within a very short time—to amplify for 27 channels, 44 channels, 86 channels. The capacity of the amplifiers really depends on the ability of the market to pay the engineers to produce the equipment. It does not depend on the inherent limitation of the equipment itself.

If you look at a cable television system that can carry 87 channels you look at a system that can do for you or me sitting at home most of the things a library can do; not most of the things a broadcasting station can do which has one signal to put in one screen.

The alternatives raised by technology are much more important than most of the institutional alternatives we could devise if this Committee sat for ten years.

Finally I would urge the Committee to give consideration, pretty well irrespective of the accepted practices or conventions of regulatory bodies or legislative bodies in dealing with the media, to give consideration to some simple measures: banning chains of newspapers or television or radio stations.

There are anti-monopoly laws in most Western countries. Any newspaper that buys a newspaper in another town is extending a partial monopoly; and if it buys a newspaper that is the only newspaper in the second town or if in going in a town it puts the other newspapers out of business, that is extending a total monopoly.

The cross-media monopolies are equally important. Last week a deal was completed in Toronto by which one of Canada's largest newspapers bought one of Canada's largest cable television systems. This is an instance of an organization that is unsatisfied with the range of economic opportunity in its own field buying the technology to extend its profit to another field.

I am not necessarily sure that this opportunity needs to be available to it inside this set of institutions called the media.

Finally, as a general proposition, I would put it to you that we seem to have been seduced ever since the O'Leary Commission, which I remember testifying before some eight or nine years ago, seriously seduced in Canada by concern for dying publications, many of which richly deserved to die and many of which had paved the road to their own grave; rather than being concerned with whether or not conditions in this country exist for new enterprises to spring up.

I really don't think that an existing enterprise that is dying has much claim on the public purse or public concern for its livelihood, but I do think we all as a society need to have a concern that the voices in the community that want to be raised beyond the range of the larynx to the ear have as much access to capital and market as they can be given.

I would be glad to answer questions to which I know the answers.

The Chairman: That, Senators, was from one page of notes. I am impressed. I am sure the Senators are impressed.

Senator Prowse has a question.

Senator Prowse: Do you feel, Mr. Lefolli, that the press we depend on for all of our information today is entirely a corporate press and subject to all the vices of a soulless corporation. Is that correct?

Mr. Lefolli: Not exactly. I admire corporations and some of their manifestations I think economically they are one of the most brilliant devices of the human mind. I believe they belong naturally by nature to one party. Their exigencies are the same for virtually all large corporations and therefore when a generation or an individual or an interest group says "Look, they have disenfranchised me" we have to listen to them.

You know the price of a press. Since the time Lilburne began publishing pamphlets, the pamphlets that started the Levellers' Movement, the price of a press has become 80 or 100 million dollars. The individual doesn't have access.

William Lyon McKenzie packed his press on his back, when he was no longer welcome in Toronto, and went down across the Niagara frontier.

I am not against the corporation. I simply put it to you that the corporation is restricted, regulated, controlled, adapted and adjusted every day in the public interest by legislation, by the decision of regulatory bodies, and that the corporations that own the media should be the first subjects not the last to the kind of scrutiny in the public interest that corporations are subject to.

Senator Prowse: All of our corporations today, and this would apply with exceptions of the small ones, the ones on which you and I depend and which all Canada depends for pretty nearly everything we buy, are big corporations which are run by a new breed of cat who is the professional trained manager. Is that not true?

Mr. Lefolli: Yes. That is precisely what I mean when I say ownership is separate from control. The trained managers control; the owners go to lunch.

Senator Prowse: They can yell and if they get really upset they can exchange one group of professional managers, who have really a very small personal stake in that business, for another set of professional managers.

Mr. Lefolli: Yes. The court of last resort, and it is almost the court of first resort, is to fire them.

I have always been amazed at the reluctance of publishers to fire editors; in other words to fire producers. They seem to prefer to get into enormous hassels with them. It seems to me that a very clean situation is to fire a man if you don't like him.

Senator Prowse: Well, the fellow who is firing is increasingly himself hired help, except he is the person who set the rules by which you got hired. Is that correct?

Mr. Lefolli: I agree.

Senator Prowse: Does the solution to this lie with the people who are involved in the editorial end, and I include the wide sense of it, themselves developing the same kind of professional competence and recognition which the managerial group have managed to do and hi-jacked all these companies away from everybody?

Mr. Lefolli: Well, perhaps. I wonder... Max Aiken, who became Lord Beaverbrook, was a brilliant manipulator of corporations. He was also, what many people tend to forget, a brilliant journalist.

I think the best war correspondence ever written by a Canadian, or by anyone in the English Language for that matter was written by Lord Beaverbrook in World War I. I don't know why some publisher does not reissue his World War I correspondence. It was brilliant.

But the exceptional individual you cannot legislate for and you don't need to convene a Parliamentary inquiry to look to the exceptional individual. If you get one you are lucky. For the rest it seems two separate sets of distinctions, two separate sets of professional responses and bodies of professional knowledge are involved in managing corporations.

A guy says "I am a manager" and that seems to stand for somebody who can manage well.

A guy says "I am an editor" and everyone in the country thinks he can edit as well if not better than that fellow.

If I understand your question I don't think my answer is to agree with the tendency. I would rather see an institutional separation by which a manager would be directed to manage and not to second-guess the editor, while the editor is left free to respond to his constituency.

I don't really think you can worry about pleasing advertisers and being responsive to interests and needs of your readers at the same time.

Senator Prowse: That brings us to a point I wanted to get to. The business we are in is different than General Motors because all General Motors have to please is the people who buy automobiles in the final result.

Mr. Lefolli: They don't necessarily have to do that.

Senator Prowse: They can leave them in the position that is all you buy.

Mr. Lefolli: That is right. That is how much choice most television and newspaper readers have. That is centrally important to this discussion—the concentration of the press is where I believe this Committee started and that is a centrally important point.

Senator Prowse: You have concentration of the press but you have something else. You have a built-in schizophrenia arising, as you pointed out, from the fact that they have two people they have to please.

One, to get their growth they have to please the advertiser, which is where the corporation stuff comes into it and all their interests.

Then to stay in business they have to find an audience so they have to please the readers. So there is this schizophrenic approach which may cause all this hysteria we get of firing editors and things that seem to arise with such distressing frequency.

Mr. Lefolli: No, it doesn't cause it all. Sometimes it is caused by a lousy editor. I am the first to agree "That guy should be fired."

Senator Prowse: How do we assure the independence, the freedom and the excellence of editing, which the readers and the public need? How do we assure that and still leave the present corporation with its money in there, the right to protect its investment and to get the growth which everybody seems crazy for today?

Mr. Lefolii: Here I think you touch on a superstition. The managers would maintain, would hold that only a manager understands the requirements of the product. An editor might understand the requirements of the readership but the management understands the requirement of the product.

I disagree completely. Most of the decisions, as I see them carried out, have involved degradation of the products in any terms other than a bookkeeper whose job is to sell advertising.

Advertisers have not flocked to those publications or those broadcasters who have gone out to pander to them. It is that simple. They have not done it.

Quite possibly the most critically independent commentator on commercial values in the United States today is The Wall Street Journal. Advertisers have not deserted The Wall Street Journal for that reason although General Motors on at least one occasion cancelled all its advertising in The Wall Street Journal and it came back three weeks later.

The assumption at various times in my experience made by organizations like Maclean-Hunter, a private corporation, and the CBC, a public corporation, both subject to the same sets of bureaucratic dynamics is that displeasing an advertiser is counter to the proper management of a press corporation. This is just a false assumption. You know the pay-off is in the paper and we have a tendency to believe that you measure editors, writers, broadcasters by what people say about them—the personality gimmick.

The truth is that is nonsense. You measure them by what they put out on paper or what they put out on the air and by and large the successful editorial enterprises—broadcast, printed, or whatever—have been enterprises that spoke to the needs, interests, requirements, the relative concerns of their audiences, not to the short-run self-interest of their advertisers.

Senator Prowse: Why is it I have never read anything in any publication or newspaper—it may be different now but was not a short time ago—that whether I buy a Chev, Pontiac or Oldsmobile I have been right up until the present buying the same car in Canada, while on the other side of the line I was buying an entirely different automobile?

I have never seen that in any publication, newspaper or magazine.

For instance you see in Canadian ads “wide-track Pontiac” with exactly the same chassis as everyone of the General Motors Products within that general price range.

Mr. Lefolii: I think General Motors would let you come to the plant in Oshawa and see the same unpainted numbers come down on a hook on a long line and get a certain amount of things with a different nameplate on the front. That is not particularly a secret.

Tougher stuff than that has been carried by the media in Canada. By coincidence I was the first television producer to invite Ralph Nader to speak to any wider audience than the people who bought his book in 1965.

Nader's history, if you are interested in consumer journalism, is interesting because Time magazine had a review of his book written in 1965, it was put in type and it sat for six months and they killed it. They never reviewed that book.

In 1970 or the last half of 1969 they carried an adulatory story with a portrait on the cover.

Five years of evolution have changed in some respects the media we are talking about and many of them are getting better but they are still getting better within the framework of the one-party press. That is my central point.

Senator Prowse: Let's go back. We won't go quite as far as Wilburn. The argument in favour of the chain is that the chain—except where obviously they admit they don't try to do that—the two serious chains in Canada, or three, have come and told us that their people are now able to provide, particularly in the smaller one-newspaper communities, a much better paper than they ever got with the poor struggling owner-publisher whose one idea was to print the news and raise hell.

Now is it that we are expecting too much from these newspapers today and that we should be letting them perform that simple, honest function and then getting our in-depth and explanations and interpretations from perhaps national magazines that could just move in?

To illustrate what I have in mind: every paper today is trying to interpret everything I read for me. Damn it all, I would like them to give me a few facts, I am old-fashioned enough, I will interpret it myself. I want to be sure that what I am getting is the fact and not what somebody thinks I ought to have.

On the other hand, I am impressed by the fact we have both the CBC and CTV who have public affairs programmes and I think you would agree with me they are hard put to come up with a really good documentary once a month. They do some half good ones the rest of the time but a really good one once a month is a pretty good average.

Mr. Lefolii: I am not sure your estimate is not high.

Senator Prowse: It may be high. Now, if we have the honest little local newspaper just printing what he saw and raising hell locally and then leaving this other field to the magazines, might not we in total be served better than we are now?

Mr. Lefolii: Deal with the question in two halves. Whether or not magazines could clean up Oshawa I don't know but I do know that the Thomson people will come here and tell you precisely what you have just repeated to me that because of the corporate strength they can serve the local audience much better.

I would urge the Commission to send somebody to Oshawa to ask the people of Oshawa how well they are served by the local paper.

I see no sign that anyone but the publisher or the shareholders in the corporation is well served by chain newspapers in Oshawa or in Toronto.

The Globe and Mail, whatever its excellencies or deficiencies—and sometimes it is really a lousy newspaper, in other respects it is a pretty good one. The Globe and Mail is no better or no worse in chain ownership than it was as an independent. No one has ever pleaded as an independent it was losing money. All it is is a component in a profit-making system where doubtless the net return is a little higher because it is a component because it can write off some costs against the system instead of against individual unit.

Senator Prowse: It might even be an insurance policy in the profit making system?

Mr. Lefolii: It could very easily be. In fact I suspect it is.

If I may take a second here, let me elaborate on an alternative to the chains as the underwritings of the expense and of some journalistic initiative that local publishers, local broadcasters find it very hard to carry.

This year CTV—not nearly as rich a network as CBC or CBS—have given me a free hand to go where I want, when I want, to cover what I want. That has been fairly rare in Canadian journalism.

And I would say a good thing and particularly because it is good for me. I like it. I think a good thing in general too.

I see no reason, however, why if I can do a good job under these circumstances that I cannot create or the material that I produce cannot create its own network for that purpose only. So on cable television and newspapers, I think we have chosen the least effective of two possible routes to get the kind of extensive coverage that the chains come in and talk about.

There is no reason why a good reporter cannot create his own chain for the purpose of carrying his own reports, not for generating profits for a corporation that wants to grow or wants to aggrandize other enterprises; but the people who are carrying those reports.

There is no reason why cable television has to throw up a network in which all of the participants, all the subscribing stations or systems are committed to carrying every minute of time that that network produces.

There is another way of creating networks and that is in response to the quality of the material.

Now, Foster Hewitt creates a radio network to carry his play-by-play commentary of the hockey game. The reason he can create this is that he does it very well and has for a long long time. The same thing can happen. Networks can be called into existence in response to the quality of what it is proposed for them to carry so if I, a journalist, have done a lousy piece, I cannot get anybody to carry it. However, if I have done a good job then I can get perhaps even more papers than Roy Thomson owns to carry it.

We tend to think that because a system is in place, it is the only system and I am suggesting to you that you give thought to alternative systems.

The Chairman: Are there any other questions? Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: I asked this question yesterday of Senator O'Leary, Mr. Lefolii. I did not get a complete answer but in view of your verbal remarks before you submitted yourself to questioning, I think the door is open. I would like to try this one on you.

What are the ingredients of a good journalist today in Canada, in 1970?

Mr. Lefolii: You invite a speech. You know, I was dismayed to realize yet again on reading the newspaper this morning that the most vivacious practitioner of my profession in Canada is 81 years old, is it, or 87 years old?

The Chairman: 81.

Mr. Lefolii: 81 years old.

The Chairman: 81 today, I think. It is Senator O'Leary's birthday.

Mr. Lefolii: The classic qualification of a good journalist is a curiosity and energy and a kind of stubborn, almost stupid, insistence of reducing events, particular events having a large framework of theory, rational and justification around them; on reducing them to the components that matter to his constituency and this question of constituency is vital to any consideration of the press.

The mass media and the publications that will matter in the next 10 years may very well be two separate things. A good reporter for The Financial Post does not have a set of instincts to reduce rationalized matter to the components that are important to his constituency but a good reporter for The Toronto Star does. It is a kind of stubborn stupidity to my mind.

Not necessarily do I agree with Senator O'Leary—not necessarily a string of university degrees. I suspect a trade school is a bad idea for a journalist and when kids ask me "Should I go to a journalistic school like the University of Western Ontario"? I usually say "If you want to".

If you go and enroll in law or political science or history or some discipline that teaches you how the world works, you will come out a lot farther ahead than you will if you go into a school and enroll in a course that teaches you how a newspaper works because you can find that out very fast and very easily and at some slight profit by not going to university.

Mr. Fortier: This is essentially a curious animal that you have described. Is there room for him in the corporate press which you have described here today in Canada?

Mr. Lefolii: Yes. He indeed often does work for this corporate press. The corporate press, as I say, is not all bad. The one-party press is not all bad.

Some newspapers are turning themselves into platforms. The Toronto Star and The Toronto Telegram are good newspapers. They are, however, restricted by being still one-party newspapers because the corporate response, the organic corporate response is still to the corporate dynamic, which is for growth of profit.

I think Ron Haggart is one of the best journalists operating in the English language. For some years Pierre Berton wrote a column for The Toronto Star which was a model for a later development of a variety of plans of daily journalism in the English language, just in Canada.

In the periodical press Robert Fulford would be an important journalist in any country in the English language.

There is certainly room for that now.

Mr. Fortier: Is this not what CTV has attempted to do with the "By Ken Lefolii Column"?

Mr. Lefolii: In a sense, yes. And I am grateful.

Mr. Fortier: I do not know that this was ever done before in North America, was it, as applied to the electronic medium?

Mr. Lefolii: No. Do you want me to tell you why I did it?

Mr. Fortier: Yes, I wish you would.

Mr. Lefolii: I did it because the Broadcast Committee of the House of Commons had gone into session across the country over the issue of a television program called "Air of Death" to try once again to define the permissive limits of comment, of subjectivity if you like, in broadcasting.

It seemed to me that this attempt to define a word has been going on in backrooms for generations with no perceptible result, no result that anybody can find useful.

I wrote a memorandum to CBC saying "Look, why don't we give them a little help, not by submitting our definition, but by doing an on the air subjective thing that everybody understands". In other words, something which anybody in the country can read who does not know what a column is. So let us put a column on the television and we do not have to explain because they already know what that is, so you will have a guy on the television who is speaking for himself. You have a working model for permissive subjectivity.

If I take that licence too far they will fire me and so they should.

Mr. Fortier: What is the limit to which you can carry your mandate?

Mr. Lefolii: My own good common sense. Theoretically...

Mr. Fortier: Or the viewers taste?

Mr. Lefolii: Yes. My own good sense is really the limit until I have overstepped the limit at which point I get fired. That happens, if I assault the taste and sensibility of a majority of the viewers. But it also happens if I make myself and the network vulnerable under the libel laws. It also happens if I am grossly in error about important things and insist everybody else is wrong and I am right.

I say my own good sense because the network has honoured its verbal contract with me in a way that has not happened very often, in my experience, with publishers.

Having said "Okay, we will accept your qualifications as a journalist and we will put you on the air, under the exigencies of a deadline which are pretty extreme in television,—a columnist has sometimes gone on the air without being pre-screened and that, I think, really honours an editorial contract of the kind the public should insist a journalist have with their publishers. Good editors, good columnists, try to get here and in the United States and the United Kingdom an understanding by which they are subject to subsequent disagreement but not prior censorship.

The Chairman: Who are your employers in this case?

Mr. Lefolii: CTV, the network.

The Chairman: Are you attributing to the CTV a special sense of enlightenment that makes this possible?

Mr. Lefolii: No, but I think that to the extent I can, I would say that an intention to provide within their limitations, which are extreme and many, as you know, a useful network service in this field of news and public affairs, should be recognized.

The Chairman: You talked about assaulting the sense and taste of the viewers. What if you were to assault the sense and taste of the directors of CTV?

Mr. Lefolii: Well, I would imagine they would throw me out too, but they have that right.

You see, the important thing is that they are not frightened by their responsibilities and I believe the corporate masters of the CBC often have been.

The corporate executive is interested as well as in the growth of the corporation, in his own survival and that plus a sense of his acute responsibility to the community. I think the two things are co-equal, at least, if they are not, I am not competent to distinguish which is the greater in the mind of say an executive of the CBC, but the two things tend to constipate the expression of the network.

The CBC is far-far too delicate; far, far too concerned about some breach of its responsibility. Its responsibility is to open a channel of communication, not to protect the country against some guy who might say the wrong word at the wrong time. If he says the wrong word at the wrong time, throw him out but the country is not going to go down the drain because some guy got on the air and said something injudicious. Hell, we are all tough enough to be able to live after we hear somebody say something injudicious, I would hope.

Yet the CBC has often acted as if we were not, as though we needed to be protected by very wise men and very judicious men and very careful men as though we needed to be protected against any injudicious statement, whether it was on the grounds of taste or whatever.

Mr. Fortier: Would you take issue with Senator O'Leary's statement that there was no such thing as electronic journalism?

Mr. Lefolii: Oh yes. He put this before this Committee was formed or at least at the time the Committee was being formed.

The Chairman: He said it in the Senate in the light of my original speech.

Mr. Lefolii: Yes. He said television is not journalism.

Mr. Fortier: He said it yesterday also.

The Chairman: I am sure he did and I am sure he believes it.

Mr. Lefolii: It is nonsense. Journalism does not reside in the mind again of a guy on a Committee defining a word. It is out there in the country where people are responding or being informed by or being educated by or having the cultural tradition defined by something and what is doing it now is really more television than the printed word; by which I mean to introduce no contract to Marshall McLuhan, because I do not understand it either.

The Chairman: Before you put your question, Mr. Fortier, may I say the hour is moving on. May I say I am prepared to stay here quite a long time. I am not sure all of the Senators are and I am not at all sure the witness is. I am not saying this by way of concluding the session, but pointing out that the Senators should perhaps be organizing their questions.

I have Senator McElman to ask questions. I have Senator Everett to ask questions.

Mr. Fortier: All right. This will be my last question.

The Chairman: No, it need not be.

Mr. Fortier: You referred earlier, Mr. Lefolii, to lousy editors of newspapers in Canada. I am certainly not going to ask you to be more explicit, but who should decide whether or not an editor is lousy; a sort of super editor?

Mr. Lefolii: The readers.

Mr. Fortier: How would you relate the reader's decision to the firing or continued employment of the editor?

Mr. Lefolii: Generally by the health of the circulation. I always try to measure my performance by my clients; for example, by the health of the circulation and when we reduce the average age of the readership and increase the profit from the circulation operations I feel I am doing my job, and that if they had a guy who could go out and peddle ads he would be doing his job. And that we had two separate jobs.

There are exceptions to it but I do believe it is generally speaking truth. The case of the Toronto Telegram fascinates me because it really was in my mind—and I speak now as a critic, not as anybody with absolute knowledge—but just in my view as a critic of the press; the Telegram was really a dumb, simple-minded newspaper and it has become an effective one and its general health, its circulation and its revenues have increased as it became a better newspaper.

Mr. Fortier: Reader interest would be a pretty difficult yardstick to use in a one newspaper city, would it not?

Mr. Lefolii: In a monopoly city you are in trouble, yes, but even in a monopoly city, they go on reaping high profits still knowing damn well that the readers do not regard the newspaper as a vital part of community life.

It is very easy to slop off any responsibility in a monopoly town.

Lord Beaverbrook when he testified before the Royal Commission on Newspapers in the United Kingdom, of which there were two in the 1940's and 1930's, said on both occasions that in his view what the Commission should be concerned about was not so much change, although he was not much in favour of change—but what they should really be concerned about was what he called the solace position by which he meant the monopoly newspaper.

You really can be unbearably arrogant if you are the only game in town.

Mr. Fortier: My last question: now, writing in Saturday Night in June of 1969, Mr. Lefolii, you said and I quote:

"I no longer believe in the power of a parliamentary committee or parliament itself for that matter to bring about any significant change in the control or quality of newspapers."

Are you not banging your head against a stone wall here today?

Mr. Lefolii: I am a hopeless atomic age optimist.

Mr. Fortier: All right. I will pass.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier, I will come back to you for further questions. I did not mean to inhibit you as I obviously have done.

Mr. Fortier: I will ask them of Mr. Lefolii later on this evening.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: Mr. Lefolii, there has been considerable discussion before this Committee on credibility. You have touched on it to a degree. Senator O'Leary touched on it to a degree. One of the references he made to bring it home was the very recent example of was the end of hostilities in the war in Biafra. He said there were the official people in there, the observers for government and I believe he said there were 72 journalists and the reports came out completely different. One said there was no genocide. One said there was nothing more than the normal degree of rape that associates with such circumstances.

Great hunger, yes, but not great starvation and so on and the media were saying just the opposite.

Can you comment on this? You are one who travels in the world.

Mr. Lefolii: I will try to say something illuminating. The first observation I would make is that it is very hard to be a good reporter. Mr. Fortier asked me about the qualifications of a good reporter. I said a kind of almost stubborn or almost stupid insistence on reducing rationalizations to those components that matter to individual people.

You get in a situation like this: enormous difficulty in the way of getting ordinary information. You get off a plane in Lagos. In these circumstances you cannot move unless you get government permission. Somebody will kill you if you do and even if you are very brave, you are not going to be a very good reporter if you are dead.

You get shown what they want to show you. You get usually to talk to people through an interpreter and you need an enormous amount of initiative really. I am not, I do not think, overstressing the difficulties of my trade because I am too aware of them and too aware of the shortfalls that they build into the work I do to do that but I am saying it is hard, very hard and sometimes impossible to report more than impressions; and one of the troubles with the press is that various forms of competition have forced reporters to speak about tentative conclusions as though they were facts, to get their story out in the front page where it can be sold in a few sentences that tell the reader something he did not know but which in fact the reporter does not know either.

I would doubt very much whether at this stage anybody knows the answer to these questions about Biafra. I doubt very much whether anybody knows the answer to the question of whether or not genocide is now being carried out by the Indians on the Upper Amazon of Brazil. Nobody really knows what is going on in Angola, Mozambique.

Reporters will over-write in order to sell a story. I do not know a salesman who does not oversell in order to peddle his product and reporters are subject to that human failing.

Beyond that I can only say that you buy a reporter the same way that you buy a pair of socks or a brand car. If he has not taught you over a period of time he is a fairly careful observer and you have, in the light of what has happened later, some respect for what he has told you in the past, you have no reason at all to believe him in the present.

Senator McElman: In the circumstances to which you have referred, these reporters for the most part at least would be travelling under the aegis of the Nigerian Government, would they not, the winners of the war.

Mr. Lefolii: Yes, they are there by sufferance, yes.

Mind you, I should qualify my responses to you by saying I did not go to Biafra. When the war ended I was on a plane to Vietnam. Under the terms of which I did this, I probably should have gone to Biafra, but I was on my way to Vietnam.

Senator McElman: I saw your very good show on Vietnam.

Mr. Lefolii: Thank you.

Senator McElman: In those circumstances where they would be guided by the Nigerians, would they not see the best of what was to be seen; yet how could they come out with what apparently was the worst in total opposition to the story given by the official representatives who were in there on behalf of the Red Cross and on behalf of International teams of observers on how in this protective situation...

Mr. Lefolii: I can only suggest one partial conditional answer and that is that despite the fact the auspices—because the auspices would be the same for both groups—despite the fact that the reporters are there under the auspices of the government, they have no particular responsibility in their own minds to preserve whatever there might be of political stability or to do what they can to retain as much cool on the part of the government as the information will let them.

A reporter will often be told "Well, all right, you know this or that inflammatory fact but your larger responsibility is to suppress it because it will lead to unrest, instability, economic recession or whatever".

I have been told this a dozen times. Nobody has ever offered to bribe me even with a cigar in my work as a reporter, but I have been told dozens of times to under-play understate or ignore some discreditable or inflammatory fact, because it would have a bad result of some sort.

Now, in Nigeria and as a general principle I would say that is nonsense, but in Nigeria if you are a representative of the Red Cross you would have to give some thought to whether you wanted to stir up or heat up a cool situation. And I do not know how cool it was.

But, that would be a factor weighing upon the minds of people representing church groups, international Red Cross, similar international aid agencies. That would not necessarily weigh as seriously on reporters.

The other half of only a partial and as I said conditional answer is that reporters and indeed publishers are the victims more than most people of fashion cycles.

You know, one of the real drug addicts of the press is that it gets hot about some subjects and it tends to adopt a pretty firm consensus of understanding. It got hot about Pierre Trudeau in Canada a couple of years ago. It is hot now about pollution. You name it. The examples are endless. When the fashion cycle is up for a subject or the prevailing mode of thought about a subject, there are not many reporters who can break it.

Biafra, in the minds of most proper, decently brought up, God-fearing Canadian boys who grew up to be reporters, has been an international crime and the reporter who belongs to that school of thought, that fashion cycle, if you like, that mode of thinking, is more apt to report crime than a man whose training formation and professional instincts has been to try to extract and then build up and support the cool, the rational and the constructive solution.

It does not do that much good, you know, to identify the criminal if you cannot punish him or indeed if his victim is going to go on suffering after you have punished him.

So, the moral view the "Where is the criminal" and "Let us indict him view" is not necessarily the most constructive one and people who work for organizations like the Red Cross tend to know that.

Senator McElman: In this hot atmosphere, to use your term, let us swing this over to the young people today. We agree that for the most part they do not believe the press. I am not subjecting the Committee to this but I think you suggested that.

Mr. Lefolii: Yes, I did.

Senator McElman: Over the period of the terrible months of this unfortunate war—perhaps that is not strong enough—the media, I believe, led the people to believe that there was a terrible thing going on. The young people did believe that, I suggest, very strongly and when the thing was over they were being told there is this thing going on and here we are supposedly the establishment on the other side saying "No, this thing is not going on." So here again we have credibility. Who do we believe; what do we believe?

I want to carry this over into another area, if I may. This four letter word and the underground press and so on, obviously all these people feel there is need for such a thing as an underground press, or it would not be there.

Do you believe that the use of the four letter word so often or so continuously in many or most of the underground newspapers is simply a shock treatment which they have been taught? Is this the only way they can get the so-called establishment to listen; that if you put it in terms of what the establishment considers to be smut and dirt that they perhaps will read it behind the door; that it will get through as shock treatment and that they can finally get their messages through to the older generations?

Do you believe this is part of the four letter word deal, to break through?

Mr. Lefolii: No, Senator, I do not. I believe that the people who put out this so-called underground press, which covers really a wider variety of people and a wide variety of interests and levels on intellectual accomplishment. I believe most of them are rather smarter than that. If that were their intention, it would not work and I think most of them are smart enough to know that.

The four letter word doesn't mean much to anybody. Really it is a mild insult to some.

Senator McElman: Except in print.

Mr. Lefolii: I do not think it means much to most people in print either. I do believe it is a mild insult to many middle-aged ladies in print. It doesn't really mean much to anybody one way or the other.

Print is full of these words but under a different convention, under a convention that if you have got a small package of print that is thicker than a newspaper or a magazine, then the print is full of it.

I think the underground press uses the four letter words to crowd out other and more meaningful words because the underground press has a real problem and that is it is not very good, partly because it grew up as a response or a rejection of or an attack against this establishment of the one-party press.

It itself is a one-party press. That is its tragedy and that is really one of the great weaknesses of the spectrum of the press on our continent, that the underground press is not very good.

It is the kind of one-party press that does not listen to the opposing case, has no interest in anything that might contradict its conclusions and convictions, that speaks of shared assumptions among its readers as facts; that preaches exclusively to the converted, in other words and because it has all those defects and deficiencies, it uses four letter words as a kind of stamp of approval as between writer or editor, the publisher, the underground newsreel which is exactly the same kind of thing.

The man putting it out and the man who is getting it both agree that the four letter words are part of their ordinary language—they are not part of the ordinary language of the conventional press—and therefore they identify themselves. They crowd out other useful words and study their output with this sort of stamp of approval.

But I do not think they intend to shock or somehow frighten into awareness the conventional press or the conventional audience by using these words because it is too simple-minded. It would not work.

Senator McElman: You do not believe that this is any attempt to reach the older generations, the establishment at all?

Mr. Lefolii: No.

Senator McElman: It is really their own communication, is that all?

Mr. Lefolii: Yes, I think their problem is that they preach only to the converted. There is no room for fact or argument that contradicts the conventional assumptions of the radical left, just as for a long, long time there was no room for assumptions that contradicted or facts that negated the assumptions of the Chamber of Commerce and most of the conventional press.

Now, that has changed in the conventional press but the underground press still has that weakness. It is a bad press for that reason.

I wish it was better because I think it might offer one of the alternatives of which I spoke earlier. The underground press has this great virtue that you do not have a million dollars to participate in it but as long as you speak only to people who agree with you already, you are not a factor, are you? It is just like writing home.

Senator McElman: Yes. I have become amused when I have heard quite a few witnesses suggest that people do not like our paper. People do not like our approach, particularly in the monopoly areas. All they have to do is start another newspaper.

I assume they are talking about an underground press. That is the only thing you could afford to start today.

Mr. Lefolii: Yes.

Senator McElman: Like you, Mr. Chairman, I would like to spend another two hours but I will pass on.

The Chairman: All right. We will have Senator Everett and perhaps we will come back.

Senator Everett: Can you tell me what sort of corporate vehicle you might be suggesting that would guarantee this sort of separation between the owner-managers and the editorialists?

Mr. Lefolii: I am not an expert on corporate design. I am not a lawyer. I think Mr. Fortier, who has an original turn of mind as a lawyer and I have a great respect for him, may be a better consultant than I am on this question but I have given it some consideration.

The by-laws of a corporation include not only what the directors have chosen to include but some matter that is included because of legal requirement.

I see no reason why the by-laws of a press corporation should not include a requirement that editorial control of the enterprise be vested in the editorial director, whether you call him editor, editorial vice-president or whatever—it doesn't matter—and that the operating control of the corporation as a commercial entity be vested in another director. They can both be responsible to a president who can fire the editorial director but cannot tell him what to print.

Again I return to his really very simple-minded issue. Press corporations for some reason—whether they are public like the CBC or private like The Telegram, do not seem to fire people very often and I do not know why, but as long as the corporation can fire an editor who is running the interest of his publication into the ground by bad judgment or bad practice, I do not see that they are in much danger.

The profits, as you know, in commercial broadcasting and in many forms of commercial publishing, have been enormous in our generation. The fact that some few publications and some few broadcasters, for that matter, have gone broke, seem to me a very ordinary commercial fact. The rate of bankruptcy is very high and hell, if freedom of the press means that you are free from any responsibility to run your enterprise to make a profit, that somehow or other the public will guarantee you make a profit as long as you are in business, then it means something quite different.

Senator Everett: If you have a by-law which guarantees this freedom or separation and yet you say you have the right to fire, does that not derogate the whole effect of the by-law?

Mr. Lefolii: It tempers it. I do not think it derogates it because, you see, there is a subtle process at work here.

The corporation, as long as its purpose is unitary, the growth of the corporation, will select from among its young people or from among the available pool of talent outside itself, those people who look like good servants of the corporation for employment in the first place and advancement in the second place.

Talent and various forms of performance which editorially are real factors—not every reporter is as good as every other reporter, but talent will tend to be subordinate in making those decisions to the considerations of whether or not this man will be a good corporate servant.

If that man is required to address himself to editorial concern and the rest of the corporation is required to stay out of his hair in those concerns, then I think the chances that right from the top down the editor enterprise will direct itself to the proper concern of journalists is much higher.

I do not think the ideal solution exists and I think that we have all abused ourselves and our own patience and our own time and our own prospects for getting anything done if we look for a perfect system.

Insulation in our society against other pressing concerns is impossible for anybody. School teachers are not insulated from the often silly concerns and the often justified concerns of parents. You know, you cannot get total insulation but I think you would get the kind of channelling to important matters all the journalists in the editorial enterprise or the media if that separation were installed formally and institutionally rather than conversationally.

Senator Everett: So you would not concern yourself then with the concentration of ownership within a particular form of media?

Mr. Lefolii: Yes. I think monopolies are bad.

Senator Everett: I am talking about the corporate vehicle itself.

Mr. Lefolii: No, I do not think it matters.

Senator Everett: It does not matter whether it is public or employee-owned?

Mr. Lefolii: Not a bit. I would not think it would matter, if the corporation I have described could be set up and this device could be made to work, and I do not see why it could not.

I think there are some models already in other kinds of corporations for that kind of division. If that institution were installed, then I do not think it would matter who owned it. I really do not.

There have been times, you know, when editors have had precisely this licence because they were part-owners. The classic example is Harold Ross of the New Yorker who would not allow advertising people on his floor. There have been various other times.

There was a period in Maclean's where Maclean's was highly profitable and when, under the direction of a very good editor, Arthur Irwin, a set of operating rules was worked out under which I believe a great editor, Ralph Allen, made his own decisions about the editorial content of that magazine.

Now, that was a de facto situation. When the profit cycle turned down then corporate directors who, as Ralph once told me had only wanted to pat him on the back as he passed in the hall, started asking hard questions and eventually made it physically impossible for him to continue in the job. So the job passed to other people.

As long as the thing was profitable everybody was happy. I do not see why they should not be just as happy while it is unprofitable, because—I will tell you—the chances for survival of the corporation might well be enhanced by that corporation, because businessmen tend to make the wrong decisions under adverse business conditions in editorial enterprises. There is a kind of syndrome present, if you are interested in this subject, that shows up in all floundering editorial enterprises, the sort of convulsion that The Saturday Evening Post went through which is almost identical with the sort of convulsions that Collier's went through and is almost identical with the sort of convulsions that everybody goes through and all the general magazines in England that died, all went through the same sort of convulsion.

Canada is not unique in this respect. We have no unique problems in Canada. We do have an odd market in which dumping is much easier than it is in other countries but we have no unique problems.

I do not think we need concern ourselves to the exclusion of everything else with keeping bad ones alive.

To return to the question, it does not seem to me to offer any particular insoluble problems for the corporation to achieve that separation.

Senator Everett: Did I understand you to indicate you believed that there should not be any sort of chain ownership.

Mr. Lefolii: Yes. I think that monopolies are bad and that chain ownership is bad.

Senator Everett: I am talking not of monopolies. I am talking about chain ownership.

Mr. Lefolii: Yes. I see no reason why we should tolerate it.

Senator Everett: And you feel the same way about cross-ownership?

Mr. Lefolii: Yes.

Now, those are absolute decisions. I guess I would argue, if I were a legislator, that anything I could do to reduce their incidence would be good but as a general proposition I feel they are all bad.

You see, a publication or a broadcasting enterprise is a form of voice and a chain is simply not responsive to the community that it publishes in. It is a voice that comes from somewhere else.

Roy Thomson says, and he is quite right, he does not care particularly and he certainly would not impose—he argues this as a virtue—upon say an editor of his paper, I think, in St. Petersburg, Florida. He has a big Florida paper and a very good one and the policy of that paper is or was the last time I spoke to him personally, is in support of racial segregation. And he claims as a virtue his editorial reticence or rectitude in not imposing on that editor a policy of integration. What all that really means is he is going to make more money with a separatist paper than with an integrationist paper.

Senator Everett: Could that not be the sort of thing you are looking for?

Mr. Lefolii: I do not follow that.

Senator Everett: The complete separation?

Mr. Lefolii: Yes, but you see a separation is not complete. That is why I warned against searching for a foolproof, completely effective device because I do not think it exists.

That separation in an enterprise in which the owner is responsive to the community to the extent he lives there and his editor is responsive to the community to the extent he works there, will be more effective than one in which the owner lives in Toronto or as, in the case of The Globe and Mail, in Calgary, wherever it is that Max Bell lives now, Roy Thomson in London, Ken Thomson in the Mid-Atlantic—these people are not responsive in any human sense to their constituents.

I do not think that there are any ideal or perfect solutions to any of these questions but I think there are better solutions than the ones we have at the moment.

Senator Everett: You were talking about—I forget how many dozens of UHF channels and cable channels and so forth. I am not sure I understand the technology.

Mr. Lefolii: I am not sure I do either.

Senator Everett: If we achieve this, is there any guarantee that the quality of programs—I admit the competition would increase—but would the quality increase as a result of this?

Mr. Lefolii: It depends what you mean by quality. The responsiveness of the media to its audience would increase.

Senator Everett: One of the things we have been told is the fact that corporate publishers are not that responsive in that in one sense they cannot be pressured. They achieve a form of financial independence that allows them to allow their editors to comment as they see fit; so if you are talking about responsiveness, that is a scared responsiveness.

Mr. Lefolii: No. I am talking about the responsiveness to the interests of the audience rather than responsiveness to a computer or a gross-measuring system.

You see, we are told by the automobile industry that we have a choice among cars. In fact, we have not. As Senator Prowse pointed out it is not just Chevrolets and Pontiacs that are produced. Chevrolets, Pontiacs, Fords, Chryslers and some others, whatever.

Senator Prowse: That even look the same.

Mr. Lefolii: By and large. These forms of competition by duplication...

Senator Everett: I think I can ascertain that point.

Mr. Lefolii: Well, yes, I am sure you do.

The Chairman: Senator Everett is in the car business.

Mr. Lefolii: I am sure you could and I am sure that the fine print of your argument would be valid but I think that the large print of mine is equally valid. Competition by duplication is a form of competition.

Network television puts it to you that ABC's cowboy show is better than NBC's cowboy show, and it may be, or CBS's cowboy show. Lorne Green may be a better cowboy than some other guy. But the audience is not being offered a choice beyond the choice of a duplication, beyond the fine print choice of who is a better cowboy because they are getting cowboys on all three channels at that hour, and they are getting news at that hour and they are getting sports at that hour. It is a competition of duplication.

What I suggest with cable television and with all UHF broadcasting is that there can be a competition of kind—that the broadcaster can become responsive to the actual expressed interest of his audience so you can have a stamp collecting show. Can you imagine a stamp collecting show on network television?

It may be an excellent stamp collecting show but the ratings it would get on broadcasting television would be .000—you name it.

This question of quality is very interesting.

When the chairman of the CRTC held a press conference after its announcement last week about the increased requirement for Canadian content in broadcast programming in Canada, I asked him at the press conference whether he believed or whether it was the belief or philosophy of the Commission that you could improve the quality by raising a quota for quantity and his answer was much what mine would have been if I had been asked. He did not know.

It is perfectly true from my experience as a broadcaster that some kind of quality can only be bought for money. It sounds like pure empty rhetoric to me for some guy to say "Well, all you need to do is apply a little more imagination or a little more hard work, a little more creativity."

That is the kind of thing you can only say from outside. It is rhetoric. It bears no relationship to reality.

I can go to Vietnam for $5,000 or I can go to Mimico for $5 but there are measures of quality that do not necessarily apply to this criteria—not this criteria—that do not necessarily apply to these considerations.

Senator Everett: It is your belief then that when the time comes that the CRTC should open the dam, licence as many channels as possible but not licence them to chains and not permit cross-ownership?

Mr. Lefolii: The technology doesn't actually work that way or at least the area within which the regulation works is not precisely that area.

The Commission is not, and I do not think will be, concerned with how many channels the cable system opens up.

Senator Everett: But you are, though?

Mr. Lefolii: Yes. Well, in the sense I am, so is the Commission. In other words, the more the better. The Commission is not concerned to limit the number of channels the cable system can carry.

If the cable system can devise a way to carry 70, I think nothing would please the Commission more.

What the Commission may well regulate is how many American sources it will allow a cable system to put on the air or somehow pipe in for free or at a small cost and feed out to Canadians, and what it should be concerned with, I think—this is a personal opinion and again as a critic of the press—what it should be concerned with is how much cross-media monopoly it licences.

Is it really in the public interest? This is a question I urge this Committee to direct its attention to. Is it in the public interest for newspapers which have an effective monopoly or semi-monopoly, either no competition or limited competition in the community, for that one kind of voice to be given a vocal monopoly, a complete monopoly over this other kind of voice?

That is a good question and I am not sure I know the answer because I think it would be an intolerable penalty to impose on a newspaper if indeed this technology is going to drive newspapers out of business.

At the moment I do not believe that but a lot of people do. You know, they tell you about recall systems in which you feed a matter into the storage tube, and you let the guy at home call it back and he can call it back out in printed form. I could punch up a print out of my next edition of today's news rather than leaving it to some editor downtown to decide what it should be.

Well, that strikes me a little bit like science fiction. I think one of the pleasures of getting a newspaper is that pattern that is given to you to look at and the richness of texture on the page, which is often as rewarding as what the words say. I do not really think that cable television will just drive newspapers into the ground and bury them.

If I did, then I would think that the Commission would have to be awfully careful about not allowing newspapers to evolve into this new technology. However history, and it is really history, not a rational decision, has laid out the local monopolies that these cable companies are being given. The Bell Telephone and the Transport Commission at a time. That is what I mean about the shortness of our forethought.

At a time a couple of years ago when nobody could see any future in cable television, other than being a kind of super antenna for everybody—you know, no creative content at all.

Now, all of a sudden it is the monster that is going to gobble up everything else.

The Chairman: I have only one question and I would like to somewhat change the line of questioning. I will be brief, however.

You appeared before the O'Leary Commission, I think you said. Is that correct?

Mr. Lefolii: Yes.

The Chairman: What was your professional status at that time?

Mr. Lefolii: I was managing editor of Maclean's.

The Chairman: What did you advocate? What were you advocating or do you recall?

Mr. Lefolii: In a sentence I was advocating—what was the word I used? I can't remember. I said "Let us throw the so-called Canadian edition of Time and Reader's Digest out of the country".

The Chairman: Well, I am sure you are as familiar as I am with all the intervening events. Are you familiar—perhaps you are—with the stance now taken by Maclean-Hunter and by Saturday Night and by other Canadian publications which is that we need Time and Reader's Digest to survive.

Can you comment on that stance they have now taken?

Mr. Lefolii: Yes. I can even clear up perhaps a misunderstanding. That stance is not something that has developed between that time and this time. Maclean-Hunter changed its advice to the O'Leary Commission during the light of the Commission, as I recall.

Certainly at the time the Commission was appointed Maclean-Hunter's position was that Time and Reader's Digest should be removed in that special gimmick role from Canadian publishing and before the Commission made its report Maclean-Hunter had changed its advice to the Commission and was urging the Commission to retain the very special licence to print money that Time and Reader's Digest had.

That was a result of an understanding of its own self-interest on the part of Maclean-Hunter executives which changed. I thought at the time and I said so privately—I do not see why I should not say so publicly—that Maclean-Hunter through the men who made those decisions was making a blunder that Time particularly and to a lesser extent Reader's Digest, but mainly Time—had conned them and I still believe that to be the case.

I have not looked at the figures. I have in my bag a piece that I wrote for the Toronto Star, which the publisher of the Toronto Star said he could not run out of a gentlemanly interest because the Star had a stake in the magazine business in Canada, but in which I did cite the figures for the share of the periodical advertising market that Time had in 1961 and the share it has now. That share has risen by at least 50 per cent. I cannot remember exactly—and the share of Reader's Digest has risen to a lesser extent.

The fact seem to be self-evident to me and here is where I believe the public interest lies. Maclean-Hunter pleads a case for the survival of a magazine called Maclean's. At the moment Chatelaine does not seem to be in danger.

I do not think that the public interest need concern itself with insuring the survival of a magazine simply because the magazine exists, because there is a name "Maclean's".

It seems to me in the last five years Maclean's has done very little to ensure its own survival. And I do not think public policy needs to ensure it.

What I think public policy needs to be concerned with is whether or not anybody can start a new magazine in this country and while Time and Reader's Digest have that share of the revenues nobody can; not with the kind of capital accumulation that a professional magazine needs.

The Chairman: Would it be fair to say that much as the way television is competing with magazines for audience and for advertising dollars, it is also competing with magazine industry for journalists? I perhaps would suggest Exhibit A might be yourself. I think of you still for some reason as a magazine man and yet here you are. Are you alienated towards magazines?

Mr. Lefolii: No. I still think of myself in the same way. I am the kind of guy who stumbled into a television station one day and will soon stumble out because it is not really my business.

However, I will not stumble out unless something happens to make it possible to start a magazine.

You know, there is nothing more pathetic than maybe a guy with a Christmas tree lot who has still some for sale on December 26—there is nothing more pathetic than an editor without a paper or more useless.

The Chairman: Well, it is very late and you have been very patient. I think I should tell you that you have probably broken our record for staying here late at night. I think we could guarantee the record by staying even longer, but I will not ask you to stay later. I hope you will forgive us.

I have only one last question and it is facetious but it is also serious.

I remember talking to you, about a year ago now, at which time we discussed your book called "The Bad Press".

Mr. Lefolii: "The Bad News".

The Chairman: "The Bad News". Well, the fact that I called it "The Bad Press" really makes the point I am going to make. You promised to send me a copy, which you never did. I was fortunate enough to obtain a copy.

Senator McElman: You got mine and you did not return it.

The Chairman: I was fortunate enough to obtain a copy from a Member of the House of Commons, I thought. Maybe it was yours. In any event...

Senator McElman: I should have put my name in it.

The Chairman: In any event, I loaned the copy to one of our colleagues—who shall remain nameless but is not on this Committee—he either lost it or refuses to return it.

Meanwhile, I have been trying all over to get a copy. Where on earth can we get a copy of this? I would like the Senators to read it.

Mr. Lefolii: I will get you one. There are just a few...

The Chairman: When is it going to be for sale?

Mr. Lefolii: There are just a few somewhere in the back corridors of McClelland and Stewart. It is not going to be for sale until I finish the hard cover edition which will be published in New York and London as well as Toronto. It is hard to write a book about the press in the English language and about the Canadian Press and I must confess to you that the concluding chapter which bears on some of the points I have raised here tonight but not others, is the chapter that interests me.

It is the one I wrote the book about and it is "What are the Alternatives to the Real Condition that we are in Today?" And this question of cable television had not even occurred to me. That is how shortsighted I was at the time I originally drafted that chapter. I keep rewriting that chapter. When I am satisfied I have covered the range of possible alternatives of possible solutions that are in sight, the book will be published.

The Chairman: The project has not been abandoned?

Mr. Lefolii: No, not by any means.

The Chairman: If you could send us a copy...

Mr. Lefolii: I really will.

The Chairman: You really will.

Mr. Lefolii: This time I will keep the promise.

The Chairman: Well, Senators, on your behalf and on my own I will thank the witness. He did suggest he had received some letters which we might find interesting. If you would forward them to us, we would like to look at them and return them to you.

I would like to thank you for an insight which has been invaluable and if I do not embarrass you, I would think inspiring.

Senators, we meet tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock in this room for Time Magazine.

Thank you.

The Committee adjourned at 11:10 p.m.

Second Session—Twenty-eighth Parliament
1969-70

THE SENATE OF CANADA

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE

ON

MASS MEDIA

The Honourable KEITH DAVEY, Chairman

INDEX ★

OF PROCEEDINGS

(Issues Nos 1 to 43 inclusive)

Prepared by the Reference Branch

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

INDEX

- ABC
See
 Audit Bureau of Circulations
- ACTRA
See
 Association of Canadian Television and Radio Artists
- Acadia Broadcasting Company Limited
 Advertising
 Content, regulations 39:39-40
 Group One Radio Limited 39:35-37
 Bridgewater, coverage 39:34
 Personnel, working conditions 39:40-42
 Political stand 39:44
 Programming 39:33-34
- Actualité
 Brouillé, Jean-Louis, statement 22:37-39
 Circulation 22:39, 22:41, 22:51
 Competition 22:43-48
 Les Editions de l'Homme, co-operation 22:42
 Magazine Advertising Bureau, affiliation 22:50
 Postal rates, recommendations 22:41-42, 22:45
 Role, specialization 22:38, 22:42-43
- The Advertiser (Kentville, Nova Scotia)
 Role and revenue 29:37-39
- Advertising
 Agencies, special fees 39:87-88
 Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, amount 30:37
 Department stores 13:69-70
 Expenditures, per capita, Canada, United States 19:33, 40:62
 Government, support, amount 18:19, 20:58, 29:58
 "Group One Atlantic", operations 39:35-37
 Influences
 Advertising agents 1:24, 1:26, 2:25-26, 7:34-35, 11:31-32, 13:79-80, 21:18-21, 21:102
 Children, criticism 27:16-17
 Life style 39:99-102
 Programming 7:34-35
 United States 40:16-20, 40:46-47
 MacLaren Advertising Agency, operations 18:20
 Media
 Electronic, public interest 35:28-29, 39:83-84
 National, proportion 33:10-11, 33:19-20
 "News" 37:19
 Newspapers
 Ads, cost of setting 11:56
 Circulation, effect 11:28-29, 13:71, 22:53
 Ratio to news content 5:58, 13:43-44
 Rates
 Business publications 19:26
 Mill line 11:27-28
 Proposal by Council, control in single newspaper markets 10:36
 Retail and national, difference 1:19-20
 Revenue
 Canadian advertising dollar, percent 21:75-76
See also
 Audit Bureau of Circulations Canadian Advertising Advisory Board
- Agnew, Spiro, Vice-President, United States of America
 Criticism, American television 18:86, 32:16
- Agricultural Institute of Canada
 Recommendations, mass media for rural population 20:8-10, 20:17-20
- The Albertan (Calgary, Alberta)
 Advertising, mill line rate 11:27
 Circulation, comparison, Calgary Herald 11:27
 Survival if independent 11:37
- Albuquerque Model
 Explanation 11:39

All-Canada Radio and Television Limited

Board of directors 35:20-21

Relationships

Member stations 35:20

Selkirk Holdings Limited 35:20-21

Alliston Herald (Ontario)

Administration 29:87-88

Altona Red River Valley Echo (Manitoba)

Administration 29:85-87

American Newspaper Guild

Atlantic Provinces, Quebec, contracts 1:43-44

Admission, conditions 1:40-41

Awards, Heywood Broun 1:35

Canada

Dues 1:39

Failure, reasons 15:20,15:21,16:30

Members, number 1:34,1:40

Canadian District Council, participation 1:39

Craft unions, degree of cooperation 1:41

Membership 1:30,1:31,1:34,1:40

Negotiations, contracts

The Brantford Expositor 10:42

Canadian Broadcasting Corporation 1:30

Instruction, newsmen 1:36

International Union, function 1:46-47

Monopolies, difficulties 1:43

Ottawa newspapers 1:46

Publications, alterations 3:23

"New Lead", Eaton's lay-off of employees, coverage 11:79-80

Ownership, concentration, comments 1:42-43

Personnel, turn-over 1:35-36

Peterborough Examiner strike 1:36-39, 1:41, 1:46, 1:47, 7:82, 7:83, 7:85-87

Recommendations

Journalism, improvements 1:30-32, 1:35-36, 1:38-39

Journalists, protection 1:32-34, 1:38-39

Statements

Ogilvie, Glen 1:29-32

Thomson Newspapers Limited refutation 7:53

Toronto

Journalism, beneficial effects 8:25-26

Members 1:34, 8:25

Wage scales 1:34, 1:44

American Newspaper Publishers Association

Information committee, research 1:11

Anderson, Mrs. Doris McCubbin Editor, Chatelaine Group, Editor-in-Chief, Miss Chatelaine

Content, articles, statement 21:49-51

Armada Company Limited

Advertising 3:60-61

"Conglomerate", definition 3:46-47

Editors, right to disagree with company 3:38, 3:48-49

Goals, objectives 3:36-37

Journalists, right to protect sources 3:39

Media, freedom to react to technological changes 3:43-44

Newspapers

Political stand 3:56-57

Responsibilities of one only in community 3:51-52

Ownership, Canadian 3:36

Personnel, projects 3:37

Police court news, publishing 3:63-64

Press council proposed 3:61-62

Pressure groups, threats of reprisal 3:44

Publications, power to expose abuses 3:42-43

Readers, measurement of 3:64-65

Recommendations on ownership and controlling interests of media 3:36, 3:57-58

Revenue 3:42

Sifton, Michael, statement 3:35-37

Toronto Life, financing 22:81

See also

The Leader-Post (Regina, Saskatchewan)

Association of Canadian Television and Radio Artists

Broadcasters, contracts, salaries 42:51-52, 42:60-61

Membership, qualifications 42:43, 42:51

Association of English-Media Journalists of Quebec

Code of ethics 6:59-60

Freedom of the press

Dangers in Quebec 6:53

Definition 6:45

French journalists association, relations 6:44, 6:52-53, 6:65-66

Functions and responsibilities of mass media 6:45

Journalists

Difficulties with middle management 6:46, 6:72

Education 6:46, 6:64, 6:65

Protection of sources 6:45, 6:49-52

Recruitment policies 6:46

Salaries 6:46

Working conditions 6:46

Membership, lack of television people 6:66-67

News affected by commercial pressures 6:45, 6:54-57

Ownership concentration 6:45-46, 6:68-71

Plans and purposes 6:44

Press council proposed 6:46, 6:52

Recommendations to Senate Mass Media Committee 6:48-49

Reliability of media 6:46-48, 6:67-68

Stern, West Germany, editorial charter 6:48, 6:67
 Structure 6:43-44
 Summary of results of questionnaires sent to members 6:45, 6:46
 Water, David, statement 6:43-49

Atlantic Media

Canadian Press, office 2:27, 2:57
 Communication block 15:28
 Newspapers
 Chain ownership, absence of 15:54-55, 15:66
 Establishment, possibility 15:42, 15:50-51, 15:64
 News, unreported, undebated 15:44-45
 Situation, causes 15:64-65
 University radio stations 15:47-48

Audit Bureau of Circulations

Function 2:14
 Weekly newspapers, relations 29:62-66

Auger, Fred, Publisher, Province, (Vancouver)

Brief, statement 13:63-66
 Pacific Press, comments 13:64

BPEA

See
 Business Press Editors' Association

Bagdikian, Ben, National Editor, Washington Post

United States, mass media, statement 35:51-57

Bagnell, Ken, Correspondent, The Globe and Mail (Toronto)

Irving, K. C., concentration of ownership, comments 1:42-43

Balfour, St. Clair, President, Southam Press Limited

Excessive ownership concentration, suggestions for investigating criteria 13:10
 Raymond Nixon's article, concentration in United States, comments 13:23-26
 Statement 13:8-10

Bassett, J.W.H., Chairman and Publisher, The Toronto Telegram

Ownership, comments 8:7, 8:18-28
 Sherbrooke Record, interest 8:24-25
 Television, community antenna, investment 8:22

Baton Broadcasting Limited

Advertising, Canadian, American 40:15-16, 40:21
 Canadian Radio-Television Commission, "fear" of control, comments 40:32, 40:40-41
 Windsor, agreement, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation 40:38-39
See also
 CFTO (Toronto)

Beattie, Earle, Professor of Journalism, University of Western Ontario

Election survey of Toronto Telegram 14:47, 14:51
 John Dickin's case 14:45-46, 14:49
 London Free Press
 Criticism 14:45-47
 Lack of objectivity in coverage of demonstrations 14:46-47, 14:50-51
 Ownership concentration, comments 14:47
 Summary of brief 14:45-49

Beaverbrook, Lord

Canadian newspapers, interest 5:66

Bédard, Simon, Vice-President, General Manager, Actualité Incorporated

Magazines, future, statement 22:52-53

Beddoes, Richard, Sports Writer, The Globe and Mail (Toronto)

Sports writers, comments 24:64-66

Berton, Pierre, Broadcaster and Author

Maclean's Magazine, dismissal 36:66
 Mass media, statement 36:48-56

Biafra

War, coverage 20:64, 21:108-109, 25:14-15, 25:22-25

Blackburn, Walter J., Chairman, CFPL Broadcasting Limited, President and Publisher, The London Free Press

Brief, statement 10:7-10
 Newspaper ownership, individual, chain, conglomerate and multimedia, views 10:16-19

Books

Canadian, best sellers 26:19, 40:40-41
 Production, value per capita 26:17
 Textbooks, educational material, competition American 26:10-18, 26:20-21

Boucher, C.R., President, Canadian Cable Television Association

Television, community antenna, function, future, statement 41:42-43

Boyle, Harry J., Vice-Chairman, Canadian Radio-Television Commission

Comments on speech (December 29, 1969, San Francisco) 26:54-55

Brantford Expositor (Ontario)

Advertising 10:40-41
 American Newspaper Guild, contract 10:42

- Broadcasting business, interest 10:40
 - Canadian Press, use of copy 10:36
 - Chain membership, advantages 10:38
 - Investigations in community, role of newspaper in reporting 10:42-43
 - National and international coverage 10:45
 - "Newspaper-in-the-classroom" program 10:44
 - Personnel, merit increases 10:42
 - Press council proposed, comments 10:47
 - Printing of publishers on masthead 10:38
 - Purchase offers
 - American companies 10:37
 - Canadian chains 10:37-38, 11:15
 - Sale of paper, possibilities for ownership 10:39-40, 10:48
 - Technological improvements, craft union co-operation 10:49
- Bridge River-Lillooet News (British Columbia)
- Role, contents 29:64-69
- British Columbia
- Newspaper situation, comments, Murray, Mrs. Margaret 29:65-67
- Broadcast News Limited
- Canadian Press contract 2:11, 2:13
 - Competitors 2:22
 - Development 2:10
 - French Language service 2:10, 2:21-22
 - News
 - Gathering 2:29-30
 - Selection 2:31-32
 - Services, Non-exclusive 2:21
 - Speers, W.A., Statement 2:9-10
 - Voice reports, operations 2:22-23
- Broadcasting
- Advertising, net revenue 30:37-38
 - Audience, middle class, influences (Professor J. Tebbel) 31:10, 31:30-31
 - Canadian artists
 - Records, market 38:33-35, 38:37-38
 - United States, attraction 38:33-35, 38:37-38
 - "Canadianized" 42:20
 - Committee, House of Commons, report 31:41
 - Competition 31:11, 31:15, 31:17, 31:30 38:57, 39:48-50
 - Copyright Act, problems for broadcasters 42:57-59
 - Government, assistance
 - Canada 41:18-19
 - France and Sweden 31:23
 - Licences 31:41-42, 35:32
 - National unity, contribution 26:47-48, 31:17-18
 - News
 - Canadian Press, use 2:31-32
 - Coverage 10:25, 31:37, 38, 37:41-42
 - Regional network 31:40
 - Ownership
 - Concentration, advantages 6:70, 26:41, 31:39
 - Shareholders, divulgence 35:17-19
 - Politicians, attitude, coverage revolutionized 5:29
 - Politics, position 39:44-45
 - Prime time 31:25, 35:47, 36:36-37, 37:43-44, 38:69-71
 - Private
 - Programming, problems 37:18, 42:20
 - Responsibilities, comparison
 - Canadian Broadcasting Corporation 30:32-33, 30:47
 - Radio stations
 - AM-FM
 - Programming, comparison 26:40, 38:50-51, 38:61
 - Role, future 35:38-39, 35:49, 39:55-56
 - Private 5:2-8, 15:63-64
 - University 15:47-48
 - Religious 25:20-21
 - Role 39:14
 - Self-criticism 37-22
 - Small enterprises, viability 39:50-52, 39:72-73
 - Statement, Mackay, J. Stuart 35:10-12
 - Technology, perspectives 38:32, 39:53-55, 42:45
 - See also*
 - Association of Canadian Television and Radio Artists
 - Canadian Association of Broadcasters
 - Canadian Broadcasting Corporation
 - Television
 - United States
- Broadcasting Act
- See*
 - Canadian Radio-Television Commission
- Bushnell Communications Limited
- Board of Directors, membership 39:67
 - Canadian Radio-Television Commission, regulations,
 - Canadian content, comments 39:56-57
 - Censure, "four-letter" words 39:60-62
 - Programs
 - Experimental, Laurier LaPierre and Patrick Watson, news format 39:64-65
 - Specials, audience reaction 39:58-59
- Business Press
- See*
 - Business Press Editors' Association
 - Canadian Business Press
- Business Press Editors' Association
- Advertising, editorials, comparison of content 18:76-77
 - American Newspaper Guild, attempt to organize 18:75-76

- Canadian identity, promotion 18:69-70
- Freedom of expression 18:66-69, 18:77
- Grants 18:67
- Maclean-Hunter Limited, affiliation 19:75
- Salaries, editors, advertising managers, comparison 18:64, 18:74
- Surveys, availability 18:50
- See also*
- Canadian Business Press

- CAB
- See*
- Canadian Association of Broadcasters

- CBC
- See*
- Canadian Broadcasting Corporation

- CBP
- See*
- Canadian Business Press

- CCR
- See*
- Canadian Central Registry

- CCTA
- See*
- Canadian Cable Television Association

- CDNPA
- See*
- Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association

- CHAT
- See*
- Monarch Broadcasting

- CJOH
- See*
- Bushell Communications Limited

- CKNW (Vancouver)
- See*
- Western Broadcasting Limited

- CKTM-TV
- See*
- Télévision Saint-Maurice Inc.

- CLC
- See*
- Canadian Labour Congress

- CP
- See*
- Canadian Press

- CRTC
- See*
- Canadian Radio-Television Commission

- CUP
- See*
- Canadian University Press

- CWNA
- See*
- Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association

- Cable Television
- See*
- Television Community antenna

- Calgary Herald (Alberta)
- Advertisement "Palliser Square" 13:59-60
- Advertising code of ethics 13:63
- Bureaus and news services, money spent 13:52
- By-line
- Articles 13:59
- Mixup 13:34-35, 13:59
- Chamber of Commerce, amount of coverage 13:62
- Circulation compared with Calgary Albertan 11:27
- Columns, Bobby Orr 13:57-58
- Copy, percentage used, Southam News Service Canadian Press 13:54-55
- Editorial autonomy 13:52-53
- Letters to the editor 13:58-59
- News staff 13:61
- Quebec coverage 13:55-57
- Reason for success 13:60-61

- Cameron, Professor Donald, Contributing Editor, The Mysterious East
- Brief, statement 15:40-44
- Daily Gleaner, criticism 15:40-41, 15:45, 15:51-52, 15:55
- Government help, methods in establishing new Maritime papers 15:42, 15:50-51, 15:54

- Camp, Dalton, Syndicated Columnist, Freelance Broadcaster
- Mass media, statement 25:52-60

- Campbell, Donald G., Executive Vice-President, Maclean-Hunter Limited
- Brief, introduction 19:33
- Maclean Hunter Cable TV Limited, relations 41:63

- Canada Ethnic Press Federation
- Assistance
- English-language press 18:30
- Government, financial 18:21
- Centennial project 18:28

- Citizenship, Immigration
 - Departments, liaison 18:25
- Comments
 - Mokrzycki, Lech 18:14-15
 - Press council 18:11-12
 - Time Magazine, function 18:26
- Financing 18:10
- Function, mission 18:10-11, 18:21, 18:26-27, 18:40-42
- Ideological polarization 18:11, 18:21
- Kirschbaum, Dr. J.M., statement 18:9-12
- Members 18:13, 18:24
- Newspapers
 - Circulation 18:12
 - English-language 18:13
 - Publication, prior 1940 18:27
 - Readership 18:10, 18:12
- Postal rates, increase, effect 18:23-24
- Press clubs 18:12, 18:13, 18:30
- Publishers, association, newspaper associations 18:13
- Studies 18:13-14
 - See also*
 - Canadian scene
 - Ethnic Press
- "The Canadian"
 - Publications, policy 10:27
- Canadian Advertising Advisory Board
 - Aim 1:8
 - Code of ethics 1:20-21, 39:92
- Canadian Association of Broadcasters
 - Advertising 31:34
 - Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, criticism 31:15, 31:19
 - Canadian content 31:19, 31:23-24, 31:28
 - CFTO (Toronto), withdrawal 40:20-22
 - Comments concerning Association
 - Brief to Canadian Radio-Television Commission 41:34-35, 41:39, 42:25-26
 - Davidson, G., inquiries 30:14-15
 - Johnson, Commissioner N., witness, testimony 35:9-10
 - Crépault, Raymond, statement 31:9-12
 - Members, fees 31:9, 31:26, 31:32
 - Organization 31:31-32
 - Ownership, group, "multiple" 31:35-37, 31:39
 - Programming, public affairs 31:31
 - Radio Sales Bureau, purpose 31:33
 - Recommendations to Mass Media Committee 31:11-12
- Canadian Broadcasting Corporation
 - Advertising
 - Chatelaine, Miss Chatelaine 21:59
 - Commercials, comments of Association of Canadian Television and Radio Artists, response, George Davidson 42:44-47
 - Farm press, competition 20:24-25, 20:35
 - Suppression, recommendations 21:79, 24:35-36, 26:56, 27:17-18, 29:92, 30:33, 30:40, 31:20-21, 36:41, 36:59, 39:52, 41:11-12, 41:14-15, 43:24-25
 - Atlantic Provinces, French language stations, personnel 26:54, 30:24-26, 30:62-63
 - Budgets, operation expense, capital expense 30:20-24, 30:26-27
 - Comparison
 - BBC 15:55-56
 - Networks, English and French 30:60-63
 - Competition
 - CTV Television Network 30:37, 30:40-41, 30:56, 30:58-60, 31:16, 31:29-30, 40:60-61, 40:71-72
 - Télé-Métropole Corporation 41:11-12, 41:14-16
 - Critical comments
 - Canadian Association of Broadcasters 31:15
 - Letters 30:16-19, 30:42
 - Thomson Papers 5:29-30
 - Governor in Council, appeal right recommended 30:15-16
 - Montreal, consolidation 30:21-22
 - National Unity contribution 20:48, 27:19, 30:64-65, 31:18, 31:21-22, 43:25
 - Personnel
 - Nominations, choice 30:13-14
 - Political opinions 30:62-64, 30:72-73
 - Popularity, national, local 30:50-51, 30:56-57, 31:19-21, 42:49-50
 - Programming
 - Approval "most Canadians" 30:26-27, 30:42-49, 30:53-54, 30:59-60
 - Canadian Radio-Television Commission, Regulations, Canadian content, influences 30:57-58, 30:60-61
 - France, Great Britain 30:61
 - Programs
 - Agriculture, Radio Farm Forum 7:10-11, 7:18-19, 20:10-11
 - American, purchased 30:36, 30:40-41, 30:68, 31:16, 31:29-30
 - Consumers 27:16
 - Edmonton, municipal activities 25:85
 - Information 30:68-71, 38:57-58
 - Public affairs, American influence 25:58-59, 25:76-77, 30:68-69
 - Radio stations
 - Quality, audience 30:51-52, 30:54, 42:53-54
 - University assistance 15:48
 - Role, responsibilities 21:106, 30:32-33, 30:45-49, 36:55, 36:71, 39:51-52, 39:79, 40:38, 41:15
 - Rural Canadians, portrayal of image 20:11-12
 - Satellites 30:75

Services

- Minority groups 6:33-34, 30:66
- National 30:28-29, 30:31, 30:51
- Northwest Territories 30:19-20, 30:31-32, 30:65-66
- Overseas 30:28
- Toronto 30:30-31
- Statement, Davidson, George, nature, structure 30:9-12
- Stations, affiliated 30:35, 36:39-41
- Unions, affiliation 30:59

Canadian Business Press

- Advertising
 - Position 18:51-52
 - United States, competition 18:59
- British journalists 18:66
- Business Press Editors' Association, conflicting points of view 19:10
- Competition 18:50-51, 18:59, 19:79-80
- Credibility
 - Sources of information 18:48-49
 - Surveys 18:71-72
- Function, role 18:44, 19:61-63
- Journalism, differences 18:73, 18:79
- Ownership, Canadian 18:44, 18:46
- Postal rates
 - Foreign publications 18:55-57
 - Increase, comments 18:54-55, 18:61
 - Kierans, Hon. Eric, comments 18:107-108
- Publications
 - Circulation 18:43, 19:78, 19:80
 - Number, sale 18:43, 19:72
- Quebec 18:72
- Specialists, use 18:46-47
- Statements
 - Joel, Aubrey 18:44-45
 - Marchand, Gabriel 18:43-44
- Women, absence, reasons 18:78-79
- See also*
- Business Press Editors' Association

Canadian Cable Television Association

- Boucher, C.R., Statement 41:42-43
- Canadian Radio-Television Commission regulations, television community antenna, comments 41:42-48, 41:51, 41:57-58
- Profits 51:56-57
- Programming
 - American 41:58-59
 - Production, costs 41:50-51
- Role 41:42-43, 41:47, 41:49-50

Canadian Central Registry

- Members 19:41
- Salesmen, licensing, jurisdiction 19:38-39

Canadian Church Press

- Advertising, code of ethics, contents 25:10-11, 25:18-21
- Biafra, reports 25:14-15, 25:22-25
- Media, criticism, quality 25:13, 25:20-21
- Membership, circulation 25:9, 25:11, 25:20
- Recommendations
 - Press council proposed 25:15-18'
 - Publication, united 25:21
- Role 25:9, 25:15, 25:23-24, 25:29, 25:46
- See also*
- Presbyterian Record
- United Church Observer

Canadian Circulations Audit Bureau

- Questionnaire, 1967, paid versus controlled circulation 19:23, 19:25

Canadian Consumer

- Circulation, distribution 27:11-12, 27:23
- Content, advertising refused 27:18-19
- Staff, pay 27:12-13
- See also*
- Consumers' Association of Canada

Canadian Contemporary News System

- Ownership 35:31, 35:47

Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association

- Advertising, rates, retail, national 1:19-20
- Advertising agencies
 - Directory 1:18, 1:25, 1:26
 - Franchise 1:12-13, 1:18-19
 - Research and promotion 1:28
- Budget, expenditures 1968 1:29
- Classroom programme 1:27
- Committees
 - Freedom of the press 1:20, 1:25
 - Labour relations 1:10
 - Public relations 1:29
- Meetings, annual 1:15
- Membership, fee structure 1:11-12, 1:21-23
- Newspapers, ownership restricted by Income Tax Act 1:17, 1:25-26
- Organization, goals 1:8-9, 1:12-15, 2:94
- Research, audience measurement 1:23-24
- Thomson papers membership 1:12, 7:62-63

Canadian Ethnic Press Federation

- See*
- Canada Ethnic Press Federation

Canadian Home and School and Parent-Teacher Federation (Incorporated)

- Membership 9:32, 9:34, 9:37, 9:41
- Newspapers, influence on children 9:39

Television

- Involvement 9:33
- Recommendations 9:38

Canadian Homes

- Content, circulation 24:41

Canadian Labour Congress

- Brief, summary 11:90-91
- Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, position towards 11:117-118
- Electronic media, views 11:116-118
- New Democratic Party, affiliation and contribution 11:111-112
- Ownership
 - Concentration, suggestions for diversification of control 11:104, 11:116
 - Multiple media, government intervention proposed 11:102, 11:119
- Press releases
 - Carrying by papers 11:92-94
 - Distribution 11:93
- Trade union papers 11:91-92

The Canadian Magazine

- Content
 - Canadian 24:33-34
 - Editorial, advertising 24:34-36, 24:40
- Letters to the editor 24:31-32
- Member papers, articles, refusal 24:37
- Weekend Magazine, comparison, conflict 24:40, 24:42-44

Canadian Managing Editors Conference

- Conference, annual 1:48, 1:50-51, 1:53, 1:55
- Financing 1:51, 1:60
- Membership 1:48, 1:55
- Organization 1:47-48, 1:60
- Staff, recruitment 1:50

Canadian Postmaster

- Publication ceased 18:89

Canadian Press

- Bilingual system proposed 10:52, 11:66, 14:30
- British Columbia news, flow to rest of Canada 13:66
- Broadcast News, contract 2:11
- Budget 2:9, 2:35-36
- Comments
 - Bassett, J.W.H. 8:15
 - Farrell, Mark 2:43-44
 - McCabe, St. Clair 7:67
 - Preston, P.M. 10:45
- Correspondents 2:34-35, 4:15, 5:7, 14:48, 14:54-55
- Corriere Canadese, membership, relationship 6:13, 6:17

- Cost of services, differences 7:97-98, 21:86, 23:25-26

Criticisms 2:33-34, 2:39, 2:43-44, 7:67, 20:73

- Directors, French Canadian, Quebec 2:23-24, 2:26-27

Editor, news exchanges, responsibility 2:28

International agencies, relationship 2:16-17, 2:33-34

International Typographical Union, affiliation 21:86-87, 21:91

Membership

- Application 2:13-15, 2:36
- Fee Structure 2:14, 2:36-37, 2:43, 23:25-26, 23:58-59
- French Canadian newspapers, handicaps 2:25-26, 2:72, 2:80-81, 10:52, 10:61

National unity, contribution 2:40-41, 10:45

News

- Interpretation 2:19-21, 2:33, 14:42
- Parliamentary coverage 11:64-65
- Selection, sources 2:11, 2:16-17, 2:19
- Verification 2:28, 2:38-39

Quality of service provided 10:45, 13:55, 36:72, 43:14

Releases, holding 11:88

Services

- National, international 2:16, 2:34-35, 13:34
- Utilization 2:28, 2:20-31, 2:38-39, 2:57, 7:66-67, 10:36, 11:64-65

Staff 2:9, 2:12, 2:40

Strikes, Vancouver, Peterborough

- Examiner, use of services 7:89, 34:16, 34:23

Style books 2:18, 7:68

Technological developments 2:29

Thomson Newspapers Limited services, cost 7:66-68

Wire services 2:17-18

Canadian Public Relations Society

- Admission, conditions, qualifications 24:50-53, 24:58

Freedom of the press, ownership concentration, comments 24:60-63

Membership, application, recruitment 24:51-52, 24:54-55, 24:60

Press releases 24:58-59

Public Relations

Media, opinion 24:56-57

Role, influence 24:49-50, 24:53, 24:56

Statement, Wood, David 24:46-48

Terminology, "image", "reputation" 24:55-56

Canadian Radio-Television Commission

Bilingualism 26:57

Broadcasters

Hearings 26:55

Rapport 38:74-75

Broadcasting Act

Infractions, penalties 31:28-29

Regulations

Canadian content 19:35-36

Censorship 26:49-51

National unity, contribution 2:40, 26:46-48, 31:22-23

Ownership concentration 26:36-38, 26:43

Television, community antenna

Advertising 26:60, 42:36-37, 42:39

Role 42:29-30

Canadian content, regulations

American programs, dubbed in French 41:24

Canadian artists, scarcity 42:21-22, 42:24

Comments

Canadian Association of Broadcasters 31:11, 31:33-34

Berton, Pierre 36:55, 36:60-61

Bushnell Communications Limited 39:57-58

Jarmain Cable Systems Limited 42:38-39

McPhail, Professor Thomas L. 26:24-25

Monarch Broadcasting Company Limited 39:73-79

O'Leary, Senator M. Grattan 20:75-76

Rogers Broadcasting Limited 42:19-24

Selkirk Holdings Limited 35:29-30

Standard Broadcasting Corporation Limited 38:48-50

Télé-Métropole Corporation 41:10-13, 41:22

Télévision Saint-Maurice, Inc. 41:34-36, 41:39-40

Western Broadcasting Limited 37:34-41

Quality, influence 26:51-52, 36:21-22, 36:55

Composition, nominations, functions 26:34-35

Licences, issuance 38:20-21, 38:23-25, 38:46, 40:31, 40:40-41

Minority groups, services 26:46

Ownership, limitation criteria 26:37-45

Technology, position 26:57-59

Telesat, future 26:60-61

Television, closed circuit

Regulations 41:46

Television, community antenna, regulations

Comments

Bushnell Communications Limited 39:56

CFPL Broadcasting Limited 36:23

Canadian Cable Television Association 41:42-48, 41:50, 41:57-58

Maclean-Hunter Cable TV Limited 41:75

Monarch Broadcasting Company Limited 39:73

Télé-Métropole Corporation 41:16-17

Télévision Saint-Maurice, Inc. 41:32

Selkirk's policy, decision regarding extension 13:14-16

United States, Federal Communications Commission, comparison 23:36

See also

Canadian Association of Broadcasters, Canadian content

"Canadian Scene"

Alert Service, use 18:37-38

Articles published 18:30-31

Budget 18:32-33, 18:38-39

Caccia, Charles, M.P., comments 18:39-40

Ethnic press support 18:37

French-Canadian writers, material 18:42

Funds, source 18:32-35

Government, industry, support, assistance 18:32-35

Government information, pamphlets, rewriting 18:29

Haidasz, Dr. Stanley, M.P., comments 18:40

Labour unions, information 18:33-34

Osler, Mrs B.B., statement 18:29-31

Picture service 18:30

Projects, special 18:31

Purpose, functions, structure 18:29-30, 18:38-39, 18:40

Readership 18:12, 18:15

Services, public awareness 18:31-32, 18:34-35

Translation, translators 18:17, 18:32-33, 18:39

Usage report 18:31, 18:39

Canadian Society of Professional Journalists

Central office desired 15:22-23, 15:25

Finances 15:22, 15:28-29

Mass Media Special Committee, criticism of approach 15:9-12, 15:18-19, 15:33

Membership 15:22-23, 15:26-28

News suppressing and tampering with, comments 15:9-11, 15:32-33

Professionalism, possibility of improvement through other organizations 15:36

Purpose 15:7-8

Canadian University Press

Co-operative advertising bureau 17:23-24, 17:30, 17:32

Structure 17:8-9

See also

Student press

Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association

Advertising, national 29:13, 29:18, 29:23-24, 29:75-76

Membership, conditions 29:12-13, 29:17-19

Press council proposed 29:14, 29:16

Provincial associations, Les Hebdomas du Canada, relationship 29:19, 29:30

Statements

Craven, Gerald C. 29:12-13

McIntosh, C. Irwin 29:14-15

McLean, Andrew Y. 29:13-14

Cardinal, Harold, "The Unjust Society"

Goodis, J., comments 21:11, 21:13, 21:21

Carradine, William, Vice-President and General Manager, The London Free Press

Brief, statement 10:12-14

CFPL Broadcasting Limited (London, Ont.)

Advertising 36:18

American stations, conflict 36:15, 36:18, 36:24

Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, affiliation 36:11-15

CFPL radio

Audience reach 10:27-28

Competition from other stations 10:27-28

CFPL-TV, advertising 10:33

John Dickins case 10:77-84, 14:45-46, 14:49, 14:52-53

Programming

French 36:24

News, radio, television 36:17

Shares 10:29-30

Staff, selection to serve media industry in various capacities 10:10-11

Television, community antenna, interests 10:86-87

CFRA—CFMO (Ottawa)

CHUM Limited, programming changes 39:22-23

CFRB (Toronto)

Coverage, Templeton, Berton 7:37-38

Popularity 36:71

CFTO-TV (Toronto)

Canadian Association of Broadcasters, withdrawal 40:20-22

Competition 40:11, 40:25-26

Editorial position, lack of technique 8:22

Programming

CTV network, influence 40:22-24, 40:81

Quality, popularity 40:12, 40:25-26

The Telegram, interrelationship 40:10-11, 40:26-27, 40:34-37

Chatelaine, Miss Chatelaine

Advertising

Canadian Broadcasting Corporation 21:59

Policy 21:54-55, 21:65

Canadian Home Journal, merger 21:76

Circulation 19:35, 21:27, 21:48, 21:66, 21:68

Comparison 21:55

Competition 21:48, 21:55-56

Editorial content, English, French, difference 21:48-53, 21:57-58, 21:62-64

Readers, male 21:63-65

Staff 21:51

Statements

Anderson, Mrs. Doris McCubbin 21:49-51

Hodgkinson, Lloyd M. 21:47-49

Saint-Martin, Mrs. Fernande 21:51-53

Chatelaine Adventures in Cooking

Publishing 21:68

Chenoweth, David, Managing Editor, McGill Daily

Comments on media 17:59-60

Student press, arrogance, potential 17:13-14, 17:59

Chercover, Murray, President and Managing Director, CTV Television Network

Network, statement 40:42-47

CHFI (Toronto)

Aim 42:25

The Chronicle-Herald (Halifax)

See

Halifax Herald Limited

CHUM Limited (Toronto)

Expansion, Canadian Radio-Television Commission, disallowance, reasons 39:24-26

History, structure, functions 39:12-14

Information, sources 39:28-30

Listeners 39:17

Open line shows 39:19-22

Ownership, concentration 39:23-24

Programming

CFRA (Ottawa), changes 39:22-23

Consultants 39:18

Music 39:14-19

CKCK (Regina)

Broadcasting 3:51, 3:58-59

CKCW-TV (Moncton)

Irving, K.C., shares 5:38

CKLW (Windsor, Ontario)

Audience, sale 2:55

Collister, Ron, Parliamentary Correspondent, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation

Parliamentary Press Gallery statement 3:11-12

The Columbian (New Westminster)

Circulation, distribution 34:23-24

Combines Investigation Act

Advertising rates, monopoly control, offence under Act 9:20-21

American anti-combines legislation, differences 9:26-27

Canadian Breweries case 9:10, 9:22-23

Criminal law jurisdiction, problems 9:9

Henry, D.H.W., Q.C., statement 9:7-13

Investigations, procedure 9:27-28

Legislation, areas 9:8-9

Limitations 9:11

Mass media inquiries in past decade 9:12

Merger provision 9:9-11

Mergers and monopolies, differences 9:24

Newspapers

Lakehead merger 9:12, 9:19, 9:22

Monopoly, competition element 9:19, 9:24-25

Monopoly situation, areas assessed in investigation 9:15-19

Vancouver case 9:20-21

Object 9:7-8

Programme of compliance 9:11-12

Pure services, lack of control 9:9-10

Western sugar case 9:10-11

Conglomerates

See

Ownership Concentration

Communications

Electronic Industries Association, United States, study 42:41

Satellites 18:87, 40:45-46

Sloan, Tom, statement 3:67-71

Consumers' Association of Canada

Advertising, false, misleading 27:10, 27:16-21, 27:26

Information, control, comments 27:12

News coverage, consumer information 27:11, 27:13, 27:16

Objectives 27:9-10, 27:26

Press council, comments 24:25

See also

Canadian Consumer

Cooper, James L., President and Publisher, The Globe and Mail (Toronto)

Chair of journalism proposed 11:89

Press council proposed, comments 11:89

Copyright Act

Broadcasters, regulations, problems 42:57-59

Correspondents

Canadian, foreign 2:34-35, 4:11-13, 4:15-16, 4:20

Corriere Canadese (Toronto)

Advertising 6:8-10, 6:13-14, 6:19, 6:25-26

Canadian Press, membership, relationship 6:13, 6:17

Changes 6:12-13

Circulation 6:10, 6:13-14, 6:18

English content 6:12-13

Format 6:11-12

Immigrants, transition, function 6:12, 6:23

News

Emphasis 6:11

Italian, Canadian, percentage 6:11-12

Personnel, problems 6:8

Research 6:9, 6:17-18, 6:20

Sir George Williams incident, treatment 6:18-19

Toronto newspapers, relationship 6:14

Costello, Ralph, President and Publisher, The Telegraph-Journal (Saint John, N.B.)

McElman, Senator, criticism, withdrawal from committee requested 5:47, 5:50-51

Newspaper publishing, difficulties 5:47-50

Press council proposed, objections 5:50, 5:52

Recommendations 5:50-51

Statement on the press of Canada—growth, development, professionalism, freedom 1:7-8, 1:13

Countryside Holdings Limited

Listeners 38:10-11

Ownership, comments 38:17-19

Programming, quality 38:21-24

Radio stations, shareholders 38:13-16, 38:19

Craig, J.L., Executive Vice-President, Business Publications Division, Maclean-Hunter limited

Business press, ownership concentration 19:62-63

Trade shows, explanation 19:34

Cran, W.C. Thornton, President, Standard Broadcasting Corporation Limited

Corporation, statement 38:43-45

Craven, Gerald C., President, Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association, Publisher, The Ridgetown Dominion (Ontario)

Association, statement 29:12-13

Crépault, R. President, Canadian Association of Broadcasters; President, Radio-Mutuelle Limitée (Montreal)

Association, statement 31:9-12

CTV Television Network Limited

Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, competition 30:37, 30:40-41, 30:56, 30:58-60, 31:16, 31:29-30, 40:60-61, 40:71-72

Canadian content, Canadian Radio-Television Commission regulations, reaction 40:40, 40:56-57, 40:74-78

Chercover, Murray, CTV Network, statement 40:42-49

Evaluation 40:82

Extension of service 26:45

Freedom of expression 40:53

Journalists, training 40:54-55

- Lefolii, Ken, contract 21:105-106
 Mutually-owned 10:18
 Ownership, consortium 40:44, 40:57
 Press council proposed, comments 40:48
 Production, costs, advantages 40:57-59
 Programming
 CFTO (Toronto), influence 40:22-24, 40:81
 Cost, Prime Time 40:80-81
 Orientation, quality 40:42-43, 40:48-51, 40:72-73
- Cuthand, Rev. Adam, President, Canadian Metis Society
 Summary of brief 6:27-28
- Daily Gleaner (Fredericton)
 Advertisements, censure 5:76-77
 Cameron, Donald
 Criticism by 15:40-41, 15:45, 15:51-52, 15:55
 Publication of letters 15:46
 Camp, Dalton, comments 25:56
 Competition, possible, Fredericton 5:76
 Editorial policy 5:73
 Irving, K.C., acquisition 5:37-38, 5:69
 LaPierre, Laurier, story 15:41-42
 Police, attitude towards 15:55
 Pornography, campaign against 5:74-75, 15:46
 University demonstration, coverage 15:45
 Welfare story 15:40, 15:51-52
- Daley, L.F., Vice-President and Solicitor, Halifax Herald Limited
 Past president, New Brunswick Broadcasting, testimony at hearings of CRTC September 1968 12:31-32
- Daly, James A., Vice-Chairman of the Board, Southam Business Publications Limited
 Company structure, operations 19:7-9
 Postal rates, effect 19:9
- "Dangerous Estate", Williams, Lord Francis
 Comments, Evans, Mrs. Una MacLean 25:82-83, 25:86
- Dansereau, Pierre, President, La Presse (Montreal)
 Brief, mass media 23:45-46
- Dauphinee, John, General Manager, Canadian Press
 Statement, news, transmission 2:17-18
- Davidson, George, President, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation
 Corporation, structure, statement 30:9-12
- Denhoff, J. W., Publisher, Prince Albert Daily Herald
 Biographical Data 7:80
- Minority groups coverage 7:81-82
 Peterborough Examiner strike, comments 7:88
- Dennis, G.W., President and Publisher, Chronicle Herald and Mail Star
 Brief, statement 12:7-8
 Ownership, comments 12:7-8, 12:35-38
- Deschênes, Jules, Solicitor, Gelco Enterprises Limited
 Gelco functions, statement 22:33-36
- Le Devoir, (Montreal)
 Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association relations 2:94
 Canadian Press, services, problems 2:72, 2:80-81
 Character 2:71
 Circulation 2:86
 Competition 2:86
 Financing 2:85-86
 Improvements desired 2:87
 Legal structure 2:83-85
 Postal regulations changes, effect on costs 2:74-77
 Québecor Incorporated, agreement 2:77, 2:86, 23:29-30
 Staff 2:87
- Dimanche-Matin (Montreal)
 Perspectives-Dimanche, publication 24:28-29
 Success, reasons 23:69-70
- Downey, John, Manager and Editor, "Home Goods Retailing", Business Publications Division, Maclean-Hunter Limited
 Biographical data 19:59
 Business press, function 19:61-62
- Drea, Frank, President, Canadian Society of Professional Journalists
 Statement on brief 15:7-9
- Le Droit (Hull-Ottawa)
 Advertisements
 Checking content 10:51, 10:64-65
 Translation 10:61
 Advertising
 Code of ethics 10:51, 10:66
 Ratio 10:51
 Canadian Press, problems with dispatches 10:52, 10:61
 Circulation 10:60
 CKCH, decision to sell shares 10:58-59
 Commercial printing 10:57
 Competitors 10:60
 Editorial comment, purchase of property by Archbishop of Ottawa 10:65
 Editorials 10:51

- French-language Ontario residents, concern with problems 10:50, 10:53-54
- French language service, promotion 10:52
- Government aid to newspapers, opposition 10:50
- Newspapers, duties 10:51
- Oblates
- Contribution 10:55-56
 - Degree of control 10:55, 10:57-58
- Ownership 10:50, 10:54
- Postal regulations changes, effect on circulation 10:61-64
- Press Council proposed, comments 10:52
- Publication of ownership in paper 10:56-57
- Shares 10:50, 10:53-55
- Staff recruitment 10:51-52
- Syndicat d'Oeuvres Sociales Limitée
- Change of name 10:56
 - Control 10:54-55
- Drugs
- Reports 3:39-40, 3:43, 26:22, 30:48-49, 35:43-44, 36:62
- L'Éclaireur-Progress (St-Georges-de-Beauce)
- Administration 29:82-91
- Edmonton Journal (Alberta)
- Content, comments, Evans, Mrs. Una MacLean 25:86
 - Dissent, handling 8:33, 13:46-48
 - Editorial meetings 13:47
 - Newsprint costs 13:20-22
 - Scarth, Allan, comments 17:48, 17:49
- Espie, Dr. Tom, Executive Director, Canadian Council on Rural Development
- Purpose of Council 7:7
 - Rural Canadians
 - Media's role 7:8-9
 - Problems 7:8
- The Estevan Mercury (Saskatchewan)
- Role, contents 29:49-51
- Ethnic Groups
- Activities, news media coverage, awareness 18:27, 18:36
 - Federal Government, communication, "lack" 18:27-28
 - Italian culture, promotion 6:24-25
 - Native language, learning 6:24
 - See also* - Ethnic Press
- Ethnic Press
- Advertising 18:14-15, 18:17
 - American competition 18:25-26
 - Canadian content 18:31, 18:37
 - Circulation, readership 18:10, 18:14-15, 18:30
 - Correspondents 18:10-11, 18:19, 18:21
 - Kirschbaum, Dr. J. M., comments 18:9-12
 - Problems 18:10-11
 - Purpose, mission, function 18:10, 18:26-27
 - Toronto 18:15
 - Ukrainian 18:24
 - See also* - Canada Ethnic Press Federation
 - Canadian Scene
 - Corriere Canadese
- Evans, Mrs. Una MacLean, Alderman, Edmonton
- "Dangerous Estate--The Anatomy of Newspapers", Lord F. Williams, comments 25:82-83, 25:86
 - Statement, municipal affairs, coverage 25:80-83
- The Evening Telegram (St. John's, Newfoundland)
- Advertising 2:58, 2:67
 - Canadian Press, use of services 2:57
 - Circulation 2:61-62, 2:64, 2:66
 - Code of ethics, national 2:62
 - "Cornerbrook Western Star", relationship 2:65, 2:68-69
 - Freedom of the press, explanation 2:56
 - Headlines 2:61
 - Journalist, right to comment 2:59-60
 - Libel suits 2:64-65
 - Newfoundland, problems of publishing 2:64, 2:66
 - Ownership, comment 2:58
 - Police court news, publishing 2:60
 - Postal regulations changes, effect on circulation 2:58-59, 2:62
 - Press council, proposed 2:71
 - Press, self-criticism 2:64-65
 - Staff recruitment and training 2:62-63, 2:69
 - Taxation White Paper, effect 2:63
 - Television, effect on journalism 2:67
 - Trade unions 2:60
- Evening Times Globe (Saint John, New Brunswick)
- Advertising rates, differences with Telegraph-Journal 5:54-56
- FCC
- See*
 - United States. Federal Communications Commission
- Farm and Rural Press
- Agriculture Department, publication 20:15
 - Canadian Broadcasting corporation, advertising competition 20:24-25
 - Content, orientation 14:24, 20:8-9
 - Family Herald, reasons for failure 14:22-24
 - Financing 20:19-22

Postal rates, increase, effect 11:48-53, 20:25-26
 Role, importance 7:9-10, 11:48, 20:12, 20:18,
 20:19, 20:22
 Suburban weeklies, comparison 29:42, 29:46,
 29:59-60, 29:78
 Viability 11:8, 20:39

Fédération Professionnelle des Journalistes du Québec

History 38:76
 Quebec, media, ownership concentration 38:90-94
 Recommendations
 Commission for freedom of the press 28:88-90
 Journalists, judicial authorities, problems 38:77-90
 Press council, Quebec province 38:95

Film Industry

Canada, difficulties, distribution 42:45

The Financial Post (Toronto)

Annual publications 19:52
 National weekly 20:53

Fisher, Douglas, Broadcaster and Columnist, The Telegram (Toronto)

Statement on brief 5:8-12

Forbes, R.E., Principal, Agricultural Extension Centre, Brandon, Manitoba

Agricultural Institute of Canada, statement on brief
 20:7-10

Forrest, Rev. A.C., Editor, The United Church Observer

Middle East situation, reporting 25:33-40

FP Publications Limited

Advertising rates for department stores 11:54-55
 Areas, influence 11:13, 11:30-31
 Board of directors 11:12
 Competition, Ottawa, Winnipeg and Calgary 11:37
 Correspondents 3:22, 11:9-10, 11:61
 Eaton's lay off of employees, coverage 11: 31-32
 Economies of scale 11:15
 Editorial contents of member papers, services 11:12,
 11:33

Editors

Change in philosophy, repercussions 11:18-20
 Political considerations in hiring 11:17-18
 Edmonton Bulletin, termination 11:29-30
 Features, interchange basis 11:33-35
 Globe and Mail, membership, benefits 11:78-79, 11:81
 Media interest 11:47
 Multiple media ownership, attitude 11:21-22
 Newspapers, acquisition, motivation 11:13-14,
 11:16
 Reporting, permissive 11:9, 11:43, 11:46

Shares

Structure 11:12-13
 Sun Publishing Company Limited 11:46
 Staff, recruitment 11:35-36

France

"Hachette", newspaper 2:91-92

Free Press Prairie Farmer

Circulation 11:51
 Postal regulations changes, effect 11:48-53
 Subscription rates 11:50-51

Free Press Weekly

Delivery 20:28-29
 Circulation 20:29-31, 20:36
 Information, sources 20:38-39
 Postal regulations 18:84, 18:99-102, 20:25-34
 Revenue 20:29

Freedom of the Press

Comments

Association of Canadian Television and Radio
 Artists 42:46
 Berton, Pierre 36:48-49, 36:62-63
 Carradine, William 10:12
 McCabe, St. Clair 7:42, 7:56
 Smith, Norman 11:62, 11:71, 11:73-74
 Europe, Canada, comparison 6:22-23
 "Guarded freedom" 2:89, 3:31

Interference

Government

Grants 18:98, 18:107, 20:50, 24:38
 Press council proposed 11:70-71
 Income Tax Act 1:17
 Inquiry of Mass Media Senate Committee 5:70-72
 News services, controlled 25:17
 Newspapers, public ownership 2:52, 2:76
 Ownership concentration 2:47, 2:74, 2:78, 2:89,
 3:25-27, 3:33, 24:60-62
 Trade unions 2:71-72

Interpretation

Association of English Media Journalists of Quebec 6:45
 Camp, Dalton 25:63-64
 Canadian Association of Broadcasters 31:10
 Collister, Ron 3:21
 Costello, Ralph 1:8-9, 1:13, 1:16-17, 5:62
 Derksen, G. 29:49
 Le Droit, (Hull-Ottawa) 10:52
 Fairbairn, Miss Joyce 3:21
 Farran, R. 29:56
 Farrell, Mark 2:41, 2:48
 Fédération professionnelle des journalistes du Québec, recommendations 38:85-87
 Herder, H. C. 2:56
 Honderich, Beland 16:8

- Hutchins Report 2:47, 31:10
 Iannuzzi, D. A. 6:23
 Lefolij, Ken 21:98, 21:111
 Maclean-Hunter Limited, revenue 19:56
 Malone, R. S. 11:24
 Miller, Dr. A. I. 29:60
 Nichols, T. E. 13:79
 O'Leary, Senator M. Grattan 20:63-66, 20:72, 20:76
 Pelletier, Hon. Gérard 43:9-10
 Québecor Incorporated 23:23-24, 23:32
 Ryan, Claude 2:71
 Sifton, Michael 3:63
 Sloan, Tom 3:71
 Swanson, Frank 13:53
 Underground press 28:22-23, 28:59-60
 Wardell, Brigadier Michael 5:66, 5:75
- Gagnon, Yves, Président, Les Hebdomadaires du Canada; Publisher, Le Canada Français (St-Jean, Québec); Professor of Journalism, Laval University
 Les Hebdomadaires du Canada, statement 29:26-30
- Gariépy, Gilles, Président, La Fédération Professionnelle des Journalistes du Québec, Reporter, La Presse
 Journalists, judicial problems, recommendations 38:73-76
- Garner, William J., Publisher and General Manager, Peterborough Examiner
 Peterborough Examiner strike 7:80
- The Gateway (University of Alberta)
See
 Student Press
- Gauthier, Jean-Robert, Director of Personnel, La Presse (Montréal)
 Trade union, role, statement 23:54-55
- The Gazette, (Montréal)
 Southam Press Limited, publishers appointed 13:44-45
- The Gazette (University of Western Ontario)
See
 Student Press
- Gelco Enterprises Limited
 Deschênes, Jules, statement 23:33-36
 Editorial policy 23:36-37, 23:42-44
 Expansion, interests 23:39-40
 Shares, sales 23:34, 23:36
See also
 La Presse (Montreal)
- Gellner, John, Vice-President, Canadian Scene
 Ethnic press, comments 18:40-41
- Georgia Straight (Vancouver)
 Reasons for publication 13:74-75
- Giguère, Roland, President and Director General, Télé-Métropole Corporation
 Brief, statement 41:9-13
- Gillespie, Dr. Edgar D., Chairman, Audio-Visual Committee, Canadian Home and School and Parent-Teacher Federation (Incorporated)
 Mass media, criticism 9:31-32
 Television, effect on children, research 9:29-31
- Gilmour, George, Vice-President, Business Publications Division, Maclean-Hunter Limited
 Brief, presentation 19:59
- Glasse Commission
See
 Royal Commission on Government Organization
- Globe and Mail (Toronto)
 Circulation 11:79, 11:87
 Columnists
 George Bain 11:34-35
 Use in other papers, attitude 11:77, 24:75
 Eaton's lay off of employees, coverage 11:79-80
 Edition delivery in Ottawa 11:86-87
 Editorial
 Board 11:83-85
 Policy 11:84-85, 24:69 24:74
 Position, comparison with other Toronto newspapers 11:14-15, 11:77
 Writers 11:84-85
 Editorials, signed 11:85
 FP Publications Limited membership, benefits 11:78-79, 11:81
 Journalism standards 19:66-67
 Labour coverage 11:92
 News, opinions and interpretation 11:82
 Ownership, publication on masthead 11:38, 11:77-78
 Political tendencies 11:82, 11:84
 Press release deadlines, policy 11:87-88
 Report on Business 11:79
 Staff recruitment, training 11:81-82
 Weeklies, interest 11:88
- Goodis, Jerry, Advertising Executive
 Brief, mass media, functions 21:9-14
- Goodman, Edwin A., Q.C., Counsel and Director, Baton Broadcasting Limited
 Brief, broadcasting, Toronto 40:9-13

Graham, J.W., Q.C., Chairman of the Board, Rogers Broadcasting Limited

Shares, Rogers Broadcasting Limited, statement 42:9-10

Graphic Arts Industries Association

Recommendations, Canadian educational materials 26:9-10

Gratton, Aurèle, Vice-President and Director General, Le Droit (Hull-Ottawa)

Competition, comments 10:65-66
Reading of brief 10:50-52

Gray, Walter, Vice-President, Hopkins, Hedlin Limited (Toronto)

Study for Mass Media Special Senate Committee, Vancouver newspaper strike, effects 34:9-21

Great Britain

National press council structure, function 3:22, 3:61, 7:93, 7:95, 8:26, 11:89, 13:53, 16:34
Newspapers, national, reasons for success 24:39

Griffiths, Stuart W., President and Managing Director, Bushnell Communications Limited

Competition, American stations, statement 39:48-50

Grosart, Senator Allister

Canadian Press reporters 14:42
Chain ownership, danger 14:43
Media as effective government opposition 14:33-34
Newspapers
Credibility 14:41
Profit motive 14:42-43
Press Council proposed, comment 14:44
Reporting
Balanced 14:35, 14:37-38
Factual 14:35, 14:40-42
Television and newspaper media, comparison of political impact 14:35-37, 14:38-40

Gzowski, Peter, Editor, MacLean's Magazine

"Canadian Forum" (October 1964), article, comments 21:28-29

Halifax Chronicle Herald

See
Halifax Herald Limited

Halifax Herald Limited

Chains, approach to purchase newspaper 12:17-18
Chronicle Herald
Circulation 12:8-9
Fourth Estate's accusation of censorship of writers 12:30

Coverage, contents 12:17, 12:20-21, 12:27-29, 12:33-34

Editorial comment

Endorsement of political candidates 12:13-14, 12:23

Heavy water situation 12:23-25

Public opinion, moulding 12:18-19, 12:22

Freedom of the press 12:12, 12:19-20

Halifax, dominant position 12:16

Letters to the editor 12:11

Maritime union stand 12:32

Newspaper edition

Advertising 12:15-16

Circulation combined 12:8

Competition 12:16

Editorial boards 12:10

Editorial opinions 12:12-13

Editorials, separate 12:10, 12:12

Services, overlap 12:9-10

Provincial government policies, criticism 12:29-30

Shares 12:31

Staff

Negroes 12:14-15

Resignations resulting from disagreement with policy 12:25-27

Salaries, difference with Toronto 12:34-35

Smith, Robert, covering of political events 12:38-39

Weekend sections 12:32-33

The Haney Gazette (British Columbia)

Administration 29:84-85

Harbinger (Toronto)

Content, role, success 21:11, 28:13, 28:23

Les Hebdomas du Canada (Montreal)

Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association, relationship 29:19, 29:32

Gagnon, Yves, statement 29:26-30

Press council proposed, comments 29:30

Services 29:27-29

Heine, William, Editor, London Free Press

Mass media, needs, statement 10:67-68

Henry, D.H.W., Q.C., Director of Investigation and Research, Combines Investigation Act

Explanation of Act 9:7-12

Mass media, concentration, competition 9:12-14, 9:21-22

Heritage, Allan, Past President, Toronto Mailers' UnionStatements

"Ottawa Citizen", coverage, International Typographical Union 21:81-82, 21:96-97

- Reproduction, printed matter 21:93-94
- Typographical unions, confusion 21:83-85
- Hockey News (Québecor Incorporated)
 - Circulation 23:14
- Hodgkinson, Lloyd, Director, Maclean-Hunter Limited: Publisher, The Chatelaine Group
 - Activities, position 21:47-49
- Hoffman, Jack, President, Bureau of Advertising of American Newspaper Publishers Association
 - Information, newspaper committee 1:11
- Holmes, John, Director General of The Canadian Institute of International Affairs
 - International affairs, Canadian news coverage 4:7-13
- "Home Goods Retailing"
 - See*
 - Maclean-Hunter Limited. Business Publications Division
- Honderich, Beland, President and Publisher, The Toronto Star Limited
 - Canadian Association of Professional Journalists, comment on testimony 16:23-25
 - Statement on brief 16:7-11
- "How To Talk Back To Your Television Set", Johnson, Nicholas
 - Extracts 32:9, 32:22, 32:29, 32:34, 32:36, 32:44
- Hull, Robert, President, Parliamentary Press Gallery
 - Press Gallery, statement 3:7-8
- Hunco Limited
 - Shareholders 19:58
- Hutchins Report
 - Freedom of the press 2:47, 31:10
- ITU
 - See*
 - International Typographical Union
- Iannuzzi, D.A., Publisher, Corriere Canadese
 - Ethnic press, problems 6:8-9
- International Postal Union
 - Mail deficit, agreement 19:9, 19:20
- Infocor Limited
 - The Montreal Star (1968) Limited, relations 14:13
 - Ownership of electronic media desired 14:14-17
- Information Canada
 - Objectivity 20:15, 20:68-69
- Information Task Force
 - Parliamentary Press Gallery, monopoly on information 3:14-16, 3:35
 - Recommendation 3:35
- Inland Publishing Company Limited (Toronto)
 - Function, revenue 29:72-73
- International Typographical Union
 - Canadian Press, services 21:86-87, 21:91
 - Contracts, approved 21:87
 - Foremen, affiliation 21:94-95
 - "Graphic Arts Unions and Automation" 21:97
 - Ottawa Citizen, negotiations 21:90-91, 21:96
 - Pacific Press Limited, relations 21:95-96
 - Protection, employee, employer 21:92-93
 - Statement, Heritage, Allan 21:84-85
 - Tapes, use 21:91-94
 - Technology, adaptation 21:96
 - Toronto, conflict 21:84
 - Training centre 21:85
 - Unions, local, autonomy 21:84, 21:87-88, 21:93
- Institute of Canadian Advertising
 - Advertising
 - Credibility 39:103-104
 - Ownership concentration, influences 39:94-96
 - Advertising associations, agreement 39:94
 - Code of ethics 39:92-93, 39:105-106
 - Financial objectives 39:93-94
 - Franchising, agency consensus 39:85-87
 - Membership 39:88-91
- Irving, K.C., President, K.C. Irving Limited
 - Criticism of Senator McElman 5:31-32
 - Pressure groups, political 5:32
- K.C. Irving Limited
 - Daily Gleaner, Fredericton, acquisition 5:37-38, 5:69
 - Media
 - Editorial policy, interference 5:33
 - Investments, motivations 5:33-34, 5:36-41, 5:45-46, 36:42
 - New Brunswick Publishing Company, financial activity 5:34-36, 36:35, 36:43, 36:45
 - Ownership, local 5:40, 5:42-43, 25:56-57
- Jarmain, W. Edwin, President, Jarmain Cable Systems Limited
 - Television, community antenna, future, statement 42:28-30

Jarmain Cable Systems Limited

- Advertising, local, national, position 42:33-37, 42:39
- Areas covered, number of channels 42:31-32
- CFPL-TV, relations 42:34-35
- Jarmain, W. Edwin, President, statement 42:28-30
- Ownership concentration, comments 42:40
- Programming 42:33
- Stations, UHF 42:32

Joel, Aubrey, Vice-President, Business Press Association; President, Southam Business Publications

- Business press, current conditions 18:45

Johnson, Nicholas, Commissioner, Federal Communications Commission, Washington, D.C.

- American mass media, statement 32:9-20
- Comments
 - Canadian Association of Broadcasters 35:9
 - "How To Talk Back To Your Television Set" 32:9, 32:22, 32:29, 32:34, 32:36, 32:44

Jones, Lawrence, Assistant Director of Information Services, University of Toronto

- Function, Information Department 17:18-19

The Journal (St. Mary's University, Halifax)

- See
- Student Press

Le Journal de Montréal

- Canadian Press, cost of services, negotiations 23:25-26, 23:58
- Circulation 23:9, 23:28
- Competition 23:15-16, 23:22, 23:28
- Content 23:13-15, 23:18-19
- History 23:12-13
- Personnel 23:17
- Success, reasons 21:34-35

Journalism

- Definition 25:69
- French Canadian-English Canadian differences 5:25-26
- Lynch, Charles, situation, statement 3:8-11
- "Middle class" 25:77
- Schools
 - Comments, Fulford, R., "Saturday Night" 20:57-58
 - Federal government, support, recommendation 29:62
 - French-speaking persons, promotion 10:51-52
 - Functions 36:51
 - Laval University 3:70-71, 3:82
 - Spoken 40:53

- Standards, professional 3:10, 5:10, 7:25-27, 15:18-20, 15:37-38, 19:60, 19:65-67, 25:55, 25:75, 36:50, 40:54
- Underground 25:73

Journalists

- Associations 5:21-23
- Bilingual 3:33, 10:51-52
- Education 1:28, 1:50, 3:71, 5:22-23, 6:46, 6:64-65, 7:27, 15:8, 15:25-26, 16:35, 21:105, 22:59-60, 25:75, 35:61-62, 43:20
- Fellowships 16:37-38, 35:62
- Hiring criteria 16:35-37, 35:62
- Licence 6:63
- Middle management, difficulties, communication 6:46, 6:72, 7:29-30, 15:33-34
- Objectivity 3:19-20, 3:32, 7:25, 7:30, 10:70, 14:35, 14:39, 14:52, 16:8, 16:13
- Politics
 - Commentators, difficulties 3:19-21, 3:32, 5:16
 - Involvement 1:32, 1:38-39, 1:45, 1:61-62, 3:19-20, 3:26, 7:25, 7:31, 8:19, 10:71-72
- Pressure 36:67
- Quality, comments
 - Berton, Pierre 36:59, 36:69
 - Lefolli, Ken 21:105-107
 - O'Leary, Senator M. Grattan 20:67, 20:70-71
- Sources of information
 - Protection 1:32-34, 1:38-39, 1:47, 1:58, 3:33, 3:38-41, 6:45, 6:49-52, 7:44-45, 10:85, 11:71-72, 16:32, 20:65-66, 25:54-55, 35:63-64, 36:69, 38:77-89, 39:28-30, 43:18-19
 - Speculative, factual 3:14-16, 5:17, 15:16-17
- Wages 1:34, 3:81, 5:19, 6:46
- Working conditions 1:31-32, 1:36, 2:72, 3:8-9, 6:36, 21:53-54, 25:55
- See also
- Association of English-Media Journalists of Quebec
- Canadian Society of Professional Journalists
- Individual newspapers
- Newspapers

Les Journaux Trans-Canada Limitée

- Competition, diversification 23:74
- Editorial policy 23:69, 23:71-72
- Freedom of the press 23:69-70
- Trois-Rivières, Sherbrooke, shares 23:34-35

Juneau, Pierre, Chairman, Canadian Radio-Television Commission

- Introductory statement 26:34

Kierans, Hon. Eric, Postmaster General and Minister of Communications

- Communications technology, information media 18:86-88

- Publications, postal rates 18:80-109
- Refutations, declarations
Baetz, Reuben C. "Weekend Magazine" 18:84-85
Malone, R. S. 18:84, 18:99-102
- Kings County Record (Sussex, New Brunswick)
Revenue 29:69-70
- Kirschbaum, Dr. J. M., President, Canada Ethnic Press Federation
Ethnic press, comments 18:9-12, 18:22, 18:26
- Kope, Orv, General Manager, Monarch Broadcasting Company Limited, CHAT Radio, CHAT-TV (Medicine Hat, Alberta)
Monarch Broadcasting Company Limited, history, functions 39:67-69
- Labour Unions
See
Trade Unions
- Laval University (Quebec)
School of journalism 3:70-71, 3:82
- The Leader-Post (Regina, Saskatchewan)
Agriculture, coverage 3:53
Circulation 3:51, 3:58
Staff 3:55-56
See also
Armada Company Limited
- Lefolii, Ken, Broadcaster and Commentator
Comments
Biafra, reports 21:108-109
Underground press 21:109-110
Journalists, qualifications 21:105, 21:107-108
Mass media, future, statement 21:98-101
- Lethbridge Herald (Alberta)
Benefits of belonging to FP Publications 11:33-34
- Life Magazine
Circulation, 1968, 1969, Canada, United States 21:78
- Lions Gate Times (West Vancouver, British Columbia)
Role, revenue 29:44-45, 29:78
- Lippmann, Walter, "Public Opinion"
Pelletier, Hon. Gérard, comments 43:11-13
- Logos
Reasons for growth in Montreal 14:18-19
- London Free Press
Advertising, differences in national and local rates 10:33
American Newspaper Guild, contract 10:76
Canadian Code of Advertising Standards, publication 10:85-86
"Canadian" magazine, influence on editorial or advertising policies 10:27
Circulation 10:24, 10:26
Comments, David Scott 17:49, 17:55-56
Computers, use 10:14
Coverage
Demonstrations 14:46-47, 14:50-51
Municipal election 10:73-74
Quebec events 10:88
Crank calls 10:86
Dickins, John, case 10:77-84, 14:45-46, 14:49, 14:52-53
Function in the community 10:13, 10:84-85
Letters to the editor 10:14, 10:83
London market, dominant position 10:23-26
News, use by radio stations and neighbouring papers 10:25-26
Personnel, qualifications 10:10-11, 10:33-34
Postal regulations changes, effect 10:31-32
Southam Press, nature of interest 10:29, 10:75-76
- London Free Press Printing Company Limited
Shares, number and holders 10:29-30
- Lynch, Charles, Chief, Southam News Services, Member, Parliamentary Press Gallery
Journalism, situation, statement 3:8-11
- M.P.'s
See
Members of Parliament
- MAB
See
Magazine Advertising Bureau
- McCabe, St. Clair, Executive President and Managing Director, Thomson Newspapers Limited
Freedom of the press, comments 7:42
- McCormack, Mrs. Thelma H., Professor of Sociology, York University
Mass media, terminology, organization, needs, comments 25:69-75
- MacDonald, Donald, President, Canadian Labour Congress
Summary of brief 11:90-91
- MacDonald, M.D., Editor, Star-Phoenix (Saskatoon)
Sources of information, rights of protection 3:39-40

McEachern, Ronald A., Executive Vice-President, Maclean-Hunter Limited

- Consumer magazines, importance 19:34-35
- Maclean's magazine, comments 21:27-28

McElman, Senator Charles, Member, Mass Media Senate Committee

- Criticism by witnesses 5:31-32, 5:47, 5:50-51, 5:70-72

MacGregor, A. Ross, General Manager, Maclean-Hunter Cable TV Limited

- Programming, comments 41:64-65

McIntosh, C. Irwin, Past President, Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association

- Weeklies, future, observations 29:14-15

MacKay, J. Stuart, President, Selkirk Holdings Limited

- Broadcasting, Canadian, history, functions, statement 35:10-12

McLean, Andrew Y., Chairman, Postal and Parliamentary Committee, Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association; Publisher, The News-Optimist (North Battleford, Saskatchewan)

- Comments, advertising, press council proposed 29:13-14

Maclean-Hunter Cable TV Limited

- Channels, transmission, number 41:72
- Expansion, projects 41:69-70, 41:74
- History 41:64, 41:68
- Maclean-Hunter Limited, relations 41:63-64, 41:67, 41:76-77
- Programming 41:65, 41:78
- Shares 41:63
- Technology, role 41:65-66, 41:73-74

Maclean-Hunter Limited

- Broadcasting, programming, control 19:54-55
- Business Publications Division Advertising
 - News content, ratio 19:74-75
 - "Time" competition 19:49-50, 19:76-77
- Canadian Business Press Association, relationship 19:75-76
- Circulation 19:76
- Competition 19:71-73, 19:75, 19:79
- Distribution, qualified 19:64-65
- Editorial stands 19:78-79
- English, French parallel publications, co-operation 19:70
- "Home Goods Retailing" 19:59, 19:75
- Magazines, general interest 19:45-46
- Ottawa bureau 19:59, 19:62
- Publications, commencement, termination, reasons 19:73-74

Statements

- Craig, J.L. 19:34
- Downey, John 19:61-62
- Subscriptions, sales
 - Canadian Central Registry, control 19:38-40
 - Companies, competitive 19:40, 19:43-44
 - Percentage, Canadian 19:39
 - Price 19:41-42
 - Publishers Clearing House, services 19:41-42
 - Refunds 19:39, 19:43
 - Southam Business Publications Limited, agreement 19:29, 19:72
 - Trans Canada Readers Service, relationship 19:39, 19:45
 - Wallace Publishing Company, refusal to buy 19:73
- Canadian Radio-Television Commission, advertising time reduced, consequences 19:36
- Co-production 19:36-37
- "Editorial Manual and Style Guide" 19:52-54
- Freedom of expression
 - Experiences, comments
 - Berton, Pierre 36:66
 - Cardinal, Mario 24:9-12
 - Sykes P. and Marshall O. 22:37
 - Templeton, Charles D. 7:25, 7:33-34, 19:55-56

Interests, shares

- Countryside Holdings Limited 38:15-16
- Subsidiaries, American 19:58
- Television, community antenna 19:57-58

Journalists

- Mobility, turnover 19:69
- Recruitment, training 19:60-61, 19:66, 19:68-70
- Newspaper publishing interest 19:37
- Ownership, mixed media 19:37
- Postal rates, effect 19:50-52
- Printing division 19:53-54
- Revenue 19:35
- Shares 19:57
- Structure 19:33
- Television, competition 19:34-35
- "Time", "Readers' Digest", competition, exemption 19:47-50, 19:76
- Trade shows 19:34

Maclean's Magazine

Comments

- Berton, Pierre, dismissal 36:66
- Gzowski, Peter, "Canadian Forum" (October 1964), article 21:28-29
- O'Leary, Senator M. Grattan 21:35-36
- Competition 21:35-36
- Freedom of expression 21:28-31
- Role 21:27, 21:30-31, 21:39, 21:43
- Statements
 - Brander, F.G. 21:26-27
 - McEachern, R.A. 21:27-28

"Time", comparison 21:35-38

See also

Le Magazine Maclean

McPhail, Thomas L., Professor, Department of Sociology and Communication Arts, Loyola College

Comments, mass media and social problems 26:21-24

Magazine Advertising Bureau

American Magazine Advertising

Bureau, relations 21:74-75

History 21:71

Members

Cost, conditions 21:72-74, 21:79-80

Maclean's Magazine 21:41

Saturday Night 20:42-43

Time 20:43, 21:41

Role 20:62, 21:41, 21:70

Le Magazine Maclean

Cardinal, M. letter to Mass Media Committee 24:9-12

Competition 21:34, 21:41-42

Freedom of expression 21:32-33

Translation of articles from English 19:70-71, 21:32-33, 24:9-12

Magazines

Advertising

Advantages 33:10-11, 33:19

Canadian advertising dollar, percent 21:75-76

Revenue 1959-69 21:72

Business

Advertising, annual cost 19:26

Circulation 19:25-27

Disappearance, reasons 20:74

Future 22:23, 22:52-53, 22:75, 22:77-78, 24:30-31, 36:65, 39:96-98, 42:56

Government subsidies, recommendations 20:49-51

National 20:53, 24:37, 39:96

Permit to sell, jurisdiction, Canadian Central Registry 19:38-39

Postal rates 18:57

Quality 20:52, 24:18

United States

Canada

Competition 19:13-16, 21:77-78, 24:32-33

Editions 16:10, 16:32-33, 18:70

Future 19:46, 35:68

Number, statistics 18:55

Sales

Cowles 19:44-45

Federal inquiries 19:45

Publishers Clearing House 19:41-42

Specialized

Capital, cost 19:27

Electronic devices, problems, copyright 19:10-11

Public relations, superficial articles 19:10

Viability 21:40

Magna Media

Shares 24:41

Malone, R.S., General Manager and President, FP Publications Limited; Publisher and Editor-in-Chief, Winnipeg Free Press

Postal rates, refutations, declarations, comments

Kierans, Hon. E. 18:84, 18:99-102

Statement on brief 11:7-11

Mannion, E.J., President, and Publisher, Canadian Magazine; President, Southstar Publishers Limited

Statement, "The Canadian" and "Star Weekly" Magazines 24:29-31

Marchand, Gabriel, President, Canadian Business Press

Business press, publications, comments 18:43-44

Maritime Media

See

Atlantic Media

Mass Media Special Senate Committee

Newspapers

Canadian Society of Professional Journalists, criticism 15:9-12, 15:18-19, 15:33

Editorializing 10:21, 10:67

Freedom of the press, attacked 1:8, 5:70-72

Purpose, Dalton Camp 25:52, 25:65

University, reasons for choosing 17:68-69

Media

Audience measurement, methods 1:23-24

British infiltration 5:10

Combines Investigation Act, inquiries 9:12

Communication, comparison of ability 7:36

Communications theory 17:39-42, 17:45-48, 17:51

Competition

Benefits 7:25, 7:27-29

Duplication 21:113

Co-production 19:36

Coverage

Global 16:29

Labour 11:90, 11:92-101, 11:104-113

Religion 25:47-48

Credibility gap 7:38, 21:99, 30:74, 36:25

Criticism, Gillespie, Edgar D. 9:31-32

Death duties, majority shareholders, suggestion 41:19-20

Electronic 9:13, 11:116-118, 13:14, 13:49, 14:14-17, 18:87-88, 21:100, 41:73
 "Establishment", control 17:9-10, 43:12
 Functions 7:11-12, 25:71-72
 Government
 Co-operation, attitude 3:11-12
 Inquiries 37:15, 37:20-21
 Groups
 Ethnic, lack of interest 18:27-28, 18:34
 Pressure 5:32
 Influence, needs 25:60, 25:70-71
 Information, accessibility 3:11-12
 "Mass media of communication",
 definition 25:69-70
 Middle East, biased reports 25:33-40
 National unity, role 1:21-22, 2:40-41, 3:69, 3:70, 6:63-64, 26:47-48
 O'Leary, Senator M. Grattan,
 statement, commented on by Ken Lefolli 21:106-107
 "Power potential" 10:15, 10:20, 10:67-68, 10:72-73
 Quebec coverage of rest of Canada 12:28
 Regulatory bodies, threat 3:46-47
 Sensationalism 6:29-30, 25:13, 43:16
 Social problems, concern generated 26:22
 Statements
 Berton, Pierre 36:48-55
 Goodis, Jerry 21:9-14
 Kierans, Hon. Eric 18:86-88
 Lefolli, Ken 21:98-101
 McCormack, Mrs. Thelma 25:69-74
 McPhail, T.L. 26:21-23
 Subsidization 3:74-76, 3:80
 Technological changes, reactions, research 3:43-44, 21:100, 35:57
 Words, four letter 20:69, 21:109, 26:50
 See also
 Advertising
 Minority Groups
 Ownership

Members of Parliament

Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, lack of remuneration for services 5:18
 Columns, ability to write, reason for writing 5:17-18
 Press treatment, attitude 5:20
 Salary increase, press criticism 5:19
 See also
 Politicians

Memorial University (St. John's, Newfoundland)

Conferences on journalism 2:63

Metcalf, Frederick T., President, Maclean-Hunter

Cable TV Limited

History 41:64

Middle East

Coverage, biased 25:33-40

Minority Groups

Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, services 6:33-34, 6:36
 Culture, promotion 6:24-25, 6:31-33, 6:42
 Media
 Advertising 6:37-38
 Community-owned stations 6:30, 6:33-35, 6:38
 Cuthand, Rev. A., recommendations 6:27-28
 Information, void 6:39-40
 Sensationalism, pre-occupation 6:29-30, 6:35-36, 6:41-43, 21:11

See also

Ethnic Press

The Mirror (Don Mills, Ontario)

Role, content 29:40-41

Miss Chatelaine

See

Chatelaine, Miss Chatelaine

Moffat Broadcasting Limited

Canadian Contemporary News Service, ownership 35:31, 35:47
 Competition 35:36, 35:41
 CTV, affiliation 35:48-49
 Holdings 35:31, 35:35
 Ownership concentrated, comments, Randall Moffat 35:31-33
 Position
 Advertising 35:33-35
 Programming 35:37-39, 35:42-46
 Vancouver, news services 35:39-40

Mokrzycki, Lech W., President, New Canadian Publications; Advertising Consultant to Canada Ethnic Press Federation

Advertising, statement 18:14-16

Monarch Broadcasting Company Limited

Advertising, local, national, competition 39:71-72, 39:73
 Canadian content, Canadian Radio-Television Commission, regulations, comments 39:73-79
 History, activities, Kope, Orv 39:67-69
 National unity, contribution 39:80-81
 Personnel, recruitment, problems 39:70-71

Le Monde (Paris, France)

Information, quality, content 43:13, 43:19

The Monitor (Montreal)

Function, activities 29:54-56

Monopolies*See*

Ownership concentration

Montreal

Newspapers 23:12-13, 23:49

Montreal Journalists' Union

Affiliation, activities 23:54-55

Montréal-Matin

Information, sources 2:25-26

Montreal Standard Publishing Company Limited

Activities 24:13

Advertising revenue 24:13-14

See also

Weekend Magazine

Montreal Star

Attitudes, current, reflection 14:19-21

Competition 14:25

Editor's influence 14:10

Ethnic community, service 14:31-32

French Canadian news, coverage and interpretation 14:25-27

French-speaking readers, percentage, estimate 14:25

Labour reporting 14:30-31

"Life Styles" section 14:19-20

News handling 14:21-22

Purchase offers 14:22

Reporters 14:28

St. Lawrence Sugar Refineries, common ownership 14:25

Unions 14:18

The Montreal Star (1968) Limited

Infocor, relations 14:13

Multiple Ownership*See*

Ownership Concentration

Munro, Ross, Vice-President and Publisher, The Edmonton Journal; Director, Southam Press Limited

Criticism of American newspapers, comparison with Canadian 13:40-41

Murray, Mrs. Margaret, Publisher, Bridge River-Lillooet News (British Columbia)

Canadian newspapers, comments 29:64-69

Mysterious East

Broadcasting 15:66-67

Goals 15:42-43, 15:45

Magazine treatment of subjects 15:56-57

Projects, essay contest and Rubber Duck Awards 15:43-44

National Broadcasting Company

Activities 2:22

New Brunswick

Newspapers

Dailies, number, quality 2:94, 25:57

Editorial situation 10:21-22

Ownership, concentration 16:16-17

Television, French 26:54

New Brunswick Broadcasting Limited

Audience, measurement 36:36-37, 36:40-41

Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, affiliation 36:39-41

New Brunswick Publishing Limited, financial involvement 36:35, 36:43, 36:45

Ownership concentration, advantages 36:42-43

Programming 36:28-32

Television, community antenna, competition 36:38-39

New Brunswick Publishing Company Limited*See*

(K.C.) Irving Limited

New Democratic Party

Canadian Labour Congress, affiliation 11:111-112

Support, coverage 5:15, 7:75, 8:18-19, 16:41-42, 36:57

New York Times

Readers, type 25:77, 43:21

Newfoundland

Freedom of the press 2:64

Newman, Peter, Editor-in-Chief, Toronto Star

Bias in books "Renegade in Power" and "Distemper of our Times" 16:13-14

Parliamentary Press Gallery improvements needed 16:11

Newspapers

Advertising

Ads, cost of setting 11:56

Circulation, effect 11:28-29, 13:71, 22:53

Ratio to news content 5:58, 13:43-44

Business press, differences 18:73, 18:79

Carrier-boy organizations 13:65

Censorship 36:50, 36:62-63

Circulation, controlled, paid, comparison 29:72-75

City size able to support competition 3:54-55, 7:55

Community role 10:13, 20:68, 20:72, 23:10, 23:13, 23:16, 23:22, 25:55-56, 29:50, 39:56, 42:54

Competition

- Absence of, disadvantages 7:39-40, 8:33-34, 13:17, 15:14-15
- Electronic media 9:13, 18:89, 20:62

Concentration of small "I" liberals 7:25, 7:31, 8:19, 10:71-72

Content, foreign 4:10

Coverage

- Edmonton, municipal affairs 25:80-84, 25:87
- International affairs 4:11-21
- Interpretation 1:57, 1:61, 2:19-21, 14:9-10, 14:35, 16:30-31, 19:62, 20:68, 25:76, 35:61
- Quality 1:13, 1:35-36, 1:52-54, 3:10
- Religion 25:12-13, 25:32-33
- Sports, statement, Dick Beddoes 24:64-66
- University affairs 17:60-61, 17:66-68

Credibility 7:24, 8:33-34, 14:41, 43:15-16

Criticism 36:51-52

Editorials

- Editor, reflection, influence 36:69-70
- Independence 16:38-40
- Influences, control 1:25, 7:29-30, 43:10-12
- Quality 1:14
- Signed 2:79-80, 3:23, 11:85, 20:68-69, 21:62, 23:52, 23:57, 25:53, 25:62
- "Establishment", control 24:65-66, 24:69-70, 29:63-64, 35:58
- Farm publications 11:8, 11:47, 11:53, 14:24
- Financial returns 8:20-21, 13:52

French-English

- Differences 2:81-82, 3:77, 6:61-62, 14:27-28
- Verbal war 13:66-67

Future 40:73-74, 43:13-14

Headlines 4:19-20, 25:53, 36:52-53

Labour questions, coverage 5:15-16, 11:90, 11:92-101, 11:104-108, 15:33-34

Mass Media Senate Committee, lack of editorials on activities 10:21, 10:67

Material, selection, independence 3:30-31, 15:19-20, 15:37-38

Mistakes

- Judgment 15:35
- Public encouragement to expose 11:70
- Murray, Mrs. Margaret, comments 29:59-63
- National newspaper proposed 3:85-87, 4:8-9, 4:21, 14:45, 14:48, 16:34-35, 21:100
- National unity, contribution 2:40-41, 3:69-70, 6:63-64
- New Brunswick situation, lack of editorials 10:21-22
- New Democratic Party, coverage, support 5:15, 7:75, 36:57
- Ownership, publication on mastheads 10:38, 16:34
- Party press, comments
- Lefolli, Ken 21:99-100
- O'Leary, Senator, M. Grattan 20:71-72
- Policies 25:62-63, 25:74, 25:85, 29:47

Postal regulations, effect 2:74-77, 3:70, 3:74-76, 18:80-109, 23:45

Power, potential 13:65-66, 13:71-72

Printers, pressure 15:59-60

Printing, technology, quality 26:20

Professionalism 1:7, 1:27, 5:27-28, 15:14-15, 15:37

Quality 19:66, 25:65, 36:57, 43:13-14

Recommendations

- Court of Appeal 36:53
- Public services, information 2:76-77

Self-criticism 2:64, 13:75

Shareholders, general public, responsibility 7:77, 8:20

"Soul media" 25:77-79

Sports coverage 5:30, 23:14, 43:11-13

Statements, printing of full texts 4:9, 4:13, 4:19-20

Stern Publication, Germany 6:48, 6:67, 7:35-36

Style books 2:18-19, 7:68

Subsidization

- Competition, monopolistic areas 15:50-51, 15:54
- Federal government 1:13, 1:27, 10:20, 15:60-62, 20:49-50, 23:10
- Provincial governments 2:91-92, 18:99

Suburban papers growth 6:71

Technology, research and advancement 1:9-11, 1:62, 2:29, 2:49, 18:87, 21:95

Television

Advertising competition 2:71, 20:42, 20:45

Comparison

- Political impact 14:35-40
- Recording and interpreting events 16:17, 20:64-65, 22:53, 25:83-84, 43:12-13
- Differences 20:64-65, 21:17
- Influence 1:56, 1:63, 2:52, 16:18, 20:51-52, 23:50, 25:64-65, 26:11, 36:54
- Trade unions 1:10, 2:71-72, 11:8-9, 11:22-24
- Weekend supplements, competition 13:50

See also

- Atlantic Media
- Names of newspapers
- Ownership
- Press
- Quebec
- Student Press
- Underground Press
- Weeklies

Newsprint

Cost, difference, American, Canadian publishers 8:9-14, 13:20-21, 13:28-30, 16:25-26

Newsprint Information Committee (New York)

"Newsprint Facts", comments 1:11

Newsweek (New York)

Canada, circulation, competition 22:23-24, 22:34, 22:78

Nichols, T.E., Vice-President and Publisher, The Hamilton Spectator
Statement on brief 13:78-80

Nobleman, William, President, Saturday Night Publications Limited
Objectives, statement 20:40-42

North Bay Nugget (Ontario)
Ownership 1:57-58

North Hill News (Calgary, Alberta)
Functions 29:56-57
Ownership 13:57

North Renfrew Times (Ontario)
Functions 29:59-60

Le Nouveau Journal (Montréal)
Canadian Press, cost of service 23:25-26
Failure, reasons 2:25, 23:13, 23:20, 43:20

Le Nouveau Progrès (St-Jérôme, Québec)
Functions, advertising 29:57-59

Nova Scotia
Halifax, printed media, comments, Ozard, Bill 39:31-32
Newspapers 12:11-12, 12:16

L'Observateur (Laval, Québec)
Revenue 29:75-77

Octopus (Ottawa)
Objectives 28:12

Ogilvie, Glen, Vice-President for Canada, American Newspaper Guild
Statement on Guild 1:30-32

O'Leary, Senator M. Grattan, Chairman, Royal Commission on Publications (1961)
Comments
Canadian periodicals, report 20:66, 20:69, 20:73-75, 21:46
Freedom of the press 20:63-64, 20:65-67
Information office, government 20:64, 20:67-69
Mass media 20:64-67
Party press 20:71-72

O'Leary Report
See
Royal Commission on Publications

Omphalos (Winnipeg, Manitoba)
Functions 28:12

Orr, Bobby
Toronto Daily Star, syndicated column 13:57-58, 24:64-65, 24:67-68

Osler, Mrs. B.B., President, "Canadian Scene"
"Canadian Scene", description 18:29-31

Ottawa Citizen
Competition, Ottawa Journal 11:29, 11:67-68
Coverage, International Typographical Union, brief 21:81-82
Criticism of Lawrence Freiman 3:26
Labour coverage 11:92-93
Labour dispute, Ontario Labour Relations Board, decision, reactions 21:90-91, 21:96-97
Trade unions 1:46, 13:36

Ottawa Journal
Canadian Press, use of dispatches 11:64-65
Competition, Ottawa Citizen 11:29, 11:67-68
FP Publications
Decision to sell 11:29, 11:61-62, 11:68-69, 20:71
Editorial services available 11:69
French-Canadian community, sympathy 11:66-67
Letters to the editor 11:70
Parliamentary reporting 11:63-65
Reporters assignments 11:64-65, 11:67
Trade unions 1:46

Ownership
Albuquerque model, means of controlling chains 11:39-40
Canadian, American 2:76-77, 21:22
Comments, Johnson, Nicholas 32:10, 32:22-23, 32:29, 32:34, 32:36, 32:44
Foreign, restrictions 1:17, 1:25, 5:12-13
Newspapers, selling, reasons 7:41, 13:8-9, 14:22
Recommendations
Community participation 2:77-78, 2:90-91, 2:93, 3:28, 5:39, 17:53-54, 38:19
Fiscal policy, concessions, small papers 10:9-10, 10:30-31
Journalists, collective control 14:56-57, 15:39, 16:39-40, 23:32-33, 23:44, 25:20-21
Taxes, effect 1:17, 1:25-26, 2:49, 7:72-73, 11:54-55, 13:8-19
See also
Combines Investigation Act
Ownership Concentration

Ownership Concentration
Advantages 2:73-74, 3:28, 6:46, 7:31, 10:16, 11:14, 23:31
Advertising, influence 39:94-96
Annual reports, publishing 5:26-27

Chains

- Growth, dangers 16:8-9
- Independent newspapers, reasons for joining 10:60, 10:65-66, 11:72-73, 23:28
- Publishers freedom to determine policies 16:9
- Southam Newspapers 2:90
- Thomson Newspapers 2:90
- United States 14:47, 14:56

Comments

- Bassett, J.W.H. 8:7, 8:18, 8:20
- Beattie, Professor Earle 14:47
- Berton, Pierre 36:67-68
- Blackburn, Walter J. 10:16
- Canadian Public Relations Society 24:60-62
- CHUM Limited 39:23-24
- Countryside Holdings Limited 38:12-14
- Dennis, G.W. 12:7-8, 12:35-38
- Goodman, Edwin A. 40:33, 40:39
- Hodgkinson, Lloyd M. 21:66
- Jarman Cable Systems Limited 42:40
- Lefolli, Ken 21:101, 21:111-112
- Members of student press 17:49-53
- Moffat, Randall L. 35:31-33
- O'Leary, Senator M. Grattan 20:77-78
- Sifton, Michael 3:57
- Standard Broadcasting Corporation Limited 38:64-65

Conglomerates

- Comments, Malone R.S. 11:40
- Definition 3:46-47, 32:10-11
- Problems 7:35, 36:42-43

Control 11:104, 17:46-47, 17:53-54

- Dangers, inconveniences 1:32, 1:42, 2:74, 2:87, 3:25, 3:28-29, 6:46, 7:47-48, 11:104

Definition 6:69-70

- Freedom of the press, affected 2:47, 2:78, 16:10, 23:32, 24:60-62

French culture, guaranteed continuation 2:88

- Government intervention 10:19, 11:40-41, 11:89, 11:102, 13:10, 13:13-14, 16:27, 17:46-47

Growth 9:12-13

- Investigating criteria, suggestions 13:10, 26:39

Local, regional 10:59-60, 15:53-54Multi-media

- Advantages 40:10-11, 40:26-27, 40:34-37
- Camp, Dalton, opposition 25:68
- Comments
 - Ferguson, David 14:13-14
 - Hirtle, J. 39:42
 - Honderich, Beland 16:9, 16:21, 16:42-43

Party press 21:99-100Power potential 5:9-10*Public interest, acceptable limits 10:17-18, 13:10*Arrangement

- Public consternation 13:68
- Recommendation for other cities 13:64, 13:67-68
- Decision making 13:25
- International Typographical Union, intervention 21:95-96
- Labour, practices, problems 13:76-78
- Operations 11:57-60, 13:26-27, 13:31
- Profits, distribution policy 13:25
- Publishers sharing of responsibility 13:75-76

"Parallèle"

- "Saturday Night", purchaser 20:60

Parliament

- Press criticism 5:20-21
- See also*
- Members of Parliament
- Politicians

Parliamentary Press Gallery

- Admission, basis 3:13, 3:15-16
- Conflict-of-interest 3:14, 3:29-30
- Criticism
 - Government, consequences 3:17-19, 14:33-34, 16:12
 - O'Leary, Senator M. Grattan 20:67
- Freedom of the press, definition 3:21
- Information
 - Control, exclusive 3:14-15, 3:35
 - Sources 2:11-12, 3:15-16, 5:28-29
- Information Task Force, report 3:14-16, 3:35
- Members
 - Information, exchanged 3:16
 - Privileges 3:13, 3:16, 39:31
 - Quality 3:11, 25:61
- Newman, Peter, improvements, comments 16:11-12
- Object, aim 3:7-8
- Objectivity 3:19-20, 3:32, 5:23, 20:67
- Parliamentary coverage, balanced stories 14:34
- President, functions 3:7-8
- Press coverage patterns — J. Diefenbaker, P. E. Trudeau, government of the day 3:18-19, 16:14

Statements

- Collister, Ron 3:11
- Hull, Robert 3:7-8
- Lynch, Charles 3:8-10

Structure 3:7-8Trudeaumania, role 3:19*Unethical practices, dealings 3:13-14*Working conditions 3:9, 5:18-20*Pacific Press Limited

- Advertising 11:56-57, 11:60, 13:27

Pembina, North Dakota, Radio Station

- Winnipeg broadcasting 35:36-37, 40:13

Periodicals*See*

Magazines

Peterborough Examiner (Ontario)

Canadian Press levy, difference, 1967 and 1968 7:97-98

Editorial writer, salary 1:46

Editorializing, responsibility 7:96-97

Letters to the editor 7:90, 7:94

News publication, policy 7:91, 7:98-102

Strike of American Newspaper Guild 1:36-39, 1:41, 1:46-47, 7:52-54, 7:82-89

Thomson newspapers membership, effect on paper 7:90-91

The Picton Gazette (Ontario)

Content, functions 29:53, 29:82

Politicians

Columns, reasons for writing 5:17-18

Objectivity as columnists 5:17

Privacy, invasion by press 5:23-24, 16:16

Pollack, Richard, Writer, Harper's, New York

Comments on "Time after Luce" 22:10, 22:25-27, 22:35

Post Office Department

Classification

Mail 18:103-104

Weeklies, semi-weeklies 18:105-106

Criticism

Canadian Business Press 18:61-62

"Saturday Night", Nobleman W. 20:40-41

Crown Corporation, creation suggested 18:98, 18:103, 29:33

Deficit

Mail

Canada, United States, solutions 18:109, 19:9, 19:20

Second-class 18:81-82, 18:83, 18:92, 18:94

Projection 1968-70 18:95-98

Subsidy 18:106-107

Kierans, Hon. Eric

Presentation, comments by Shelford,

R.H., Free Press Weekly 20:26-34

Statement 18:80-86

Mail bags, pounds, classification quantity 18:82-83

Postal rates

Increase

Attempts 1951, 1964, 1967 18:106-107

Newspapers, reactions 18:80

Publications discontinued 18:89-91, 18:96

United States, comparison 23:60-61

Winnipeg Free Press, comment,

Maurice Western 18:81-82

Publications

Foreign 18:55-57

1969-70 18:83, 18:92-95

United States 18:81, 23:60

Third class 18:56-58

Publications

Second class, number 18:94-95

Subsidies, government, problems 18:91-92, 18:95, 18:98, 19:21-22

Recommendations

Royal Commission on Government Organization 18:85, 19:9

Statutory rates 18:67, 19:22

Revenue, cost of delivery 19:11, 19:21

Rural zones, delivery, six-day week 18:107-108

Power Corporation

Consortium 23:40-41

Gelco Enterprises Limited, shares 23:34, 23:36, 23:40

Télémedia (Québec) Limitée

Interests, participation 37:10-13, 37:28

Sale, forthcoming 23:38, 23:39

La Tribune (Sherbrooke), purchased 2:88-89, 23:40

Presbyterian Record

Advertising, content, revenue 25:26, 25:28

Freedom of expression, position 25:24, 25:26-27, 25:29-31

Postal rates, increase, effect 25:25

Role 25:22-23, 25:28

Press Council

British 3:61, 7:93, 7:95, 8:26, 11:89, 13:53, 16:34, 18:63

United States 35:55, 35:67-68

Press Council Proposed

Comments

Allard, Robert 22:68-69

Armada Company Limited 3:61-62

Balfour, St. Clair 13:39-40

Bassett, J.W.H. 8:26

Blackburn, Walter J. 10:8-9

Brantford Expositor 10:46-47

Camp, Dalton C. 25:55

Canadian Business Press 18:63

Canadian Church Press 25:16

Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association 1:13

Canadian Managing Editors Conference 1:59

Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association 29:14, 29:16

Collister, Ron 3:22

Consumers' Association of Canada 27:24-25

Cooper, James L. 11:89

Costello, Ralph 5:50, 5:52, 5:61

- CTV Television Network Limited 40:48
 Denhoff, J.W. 7:92-93
 Le Droit (Hull-Ottawa) 10:52
 The Evening Telegram (St. John's, Nfld.) 2:70
 Fisher, Douglas 5:23
 Garner, William J. 7:94, 7:96
 Gelco Enterprises Limited 23:35-36
 Goodis, Jerry 21:15
 Grosart, Senator Allister 14:44
 Les Hebdomas du Canada 29:30, 29:50-51, 29:61
 Honderich, Beland 16:9-10, 16:25, 16:34, 16:40
 Iannuzzi, D.A. 6:10
 Kirschbaum, Dr. J.M. 18:11-12
 La Presse (Montréal) 23:46, 23:72-73
 Lynch, Charles 3:22-23
 Malone, R.S. 11:10-11, 11:41-42
 O'Neil, Pierre 3:24
 Saxe, Stewart 17:10
 Smith, Norman 11:62
 Swanson, Frank 13:53-54
 Thomson Newspapers Limited 7:43-44
 The Windsor Star (Ontario) 2:41-42
 Purposes 10:8-9, 16:10
 Quebec, role 38:95, 41:24-25
 Representation 23:72-73
 Western Press Council proposed, Ross Munro 13:39
- La Presse (Montreal)
 Articles, signed 23:52, 23:57-58
 Canadian Press services 23:59
 Circulation, postal rates increase, effect 23:61
 Comic strips, translation 23:58
 Competition 23:49
 Correspondents, Ottawa, Quebec 23:48, 23:53
 Editorial policy, information 23:37-38, 23:46-47, 23:51-54 23:55
 Gelco Enterprises Limited, sales, judicial procedures 23:62-63
 Morality, public responsibility 23:57, 23:59-60
 Readers, type, interests 23:47-48
 Reorganization, administrative, financial 23:64-65
 "Spec", publication 23:50
 Unions
 Statement, Gauthier, J.R. 23:54-55
 Technology, reactions 23:56-57
- Preston, Jack, President and General Manager, The Brantford Expositor
 Statement on brief 10:36
 Succession duties, comments 10:37, 10:39
- Price, Derek A., President, The Montreal Star
 Statement on brief 14:7-8
- Prince Albert Daily Herald
 Letters to the editor 7:94
 Minority groups coverage 7:81-82
- Municipal dissent reporting 7:91-92
 National unity, contribution 7:100
 News publication, policy 7:98
 Readers
 Measurement 7:99
 Quebec, information available 7:101
 Sifton papers, Regina, Saskatoon, comparison 7:89-90
 Thomson Newspapers Limited
 Membership, improvements since takeover 7:102
 Use of services 7:99-100
- Prince Edward Island
 Mass media, service 7:12-14, 7:76-77
- Printers
 Ownership concentration, problems 29:34
 Production difficulties 15:59-60
- Le Progrès l'évangéline (Moncton, New Brunswick)
 Financial difficulties, assistance 2:94-95, 3:82-83
- The Province (Vancouver, British Columbia)
 Advertising
 Department stores 13:69-70
 Vancouver Sun, combined rate 11:55-57, 11:60, 11:74-75
- Georgia Straight, reporting 13:75
 News content 13:64
 Quebec news used from wire services 13:66
 Staff 13:65, 13:72
See also
 Pacific Press Limited
- "Public Opinion", Walter Lippmann
 Information, impact 43:11-13
- Publishers
 Disparities 7:31-32
 Material, selection 3:32-33
 Newspapers, control 10:68-69
 Profit motive 5:8-9
- Quart, Senator Josie D.
 Alert Service, Marjorie Lamb (Toronto) explanation 18:37-38
- Quebec Province
 Artistic activities 21:51-52
 Broadcasting, public opinion, influence 41:25-27
 Magazines
 Foreign 22:44, 22:46, 22:48
 "Playboy", "Life", "Look", circulation 22:46-47
 Postal rates, increase, effects 22:40
 Viability 22:51, 23:17-18, 23:51
 National network, viability 41:31-32

Newspapers

- Advertising 23:27
- Comparison with English dailies 23:67, 29:31-32, 43:15
- Coverage 2:81-82, 2:95-96, 23:59
- Ownership concentration, dangers 2:73-74, 2:90
- Responsibility, Francophones, New Brunswick 2:94-95, 3:82-84
- Services, fusion suggested 23:29
- Sports, coverage difficulties, reasons 23:14-15
- Student 17:19-20
- Weeklies, dailies 2:92
- Press council proposed 29:29, 38:91-92, 41:24-25
- Textbooks from France 26:15-16

Québecor Incorporated

- Advertising 23:19-21, 23:23, 23:26
- Le Devoir, agreement 23:29-30
- Freedom of the press, interpretation 23:23-24
- Media, electronic, interest 23:30-31
- "Le Nouveau Samedi", role 23:19
- "Photo Vedettes" 23:19
- Printing 23:28-29, 23:33
- Revenue 23:28-29
- Shareholders 23:33
- Statement, Péladeau, Pierre 23:9-13
- United Press International Services 23:26-27
- See also*
- Le Journal de Montréal

Racism

- Sir George Williams University, event, coverage 25:75-76

Radio Futura Limited

- CKVL (Vancouver) success, reasons 38:29-31
- Total news concept 38:27-29

Reader's Digest Association (Canada) Limited

- Activities 33:22
- Advertising 16:32, 16:34-35, 19:15-16, 19:49, 33:10, 33:19-23, 33:25
- Assets "fixed" in Canada 33:27-28
- Books, Canadian articles 33:12, 33:22
- Canadian interest 33:10, 33:29-30, 33:39-40
- Circulation, methods 33:12-18, 33:20
- Editions, English, French 33:37-38
- Editorial policy 5:12-13, 33:11-12, 33:22, 33:34-37, 33:40-41
- Printing 33:28-29
- Readers 33:16-17
- Revenue 33:23, 33:25
- Shareholders 33:26-27, 33:29-31
- Statement, Zimmerman, E. Paul 33:9-12
- See also*
- Time-Reader's Digest

Reporters*See*

Journalists

Le Réveil (Jonquière, Quebec)

Role 29:38-39

Rogers, Edward S., President, Rogers Cable TV Limited

History 42:10-11

Statement, Canadian programming 42:11-13

Rogers Broadcasting Limited

Advertising, policy 42:17

Canadian Association of Broadcasters attitude to Canadian Radio-Television Commission, comments 42:25-26

CHFI, advertising campaign 42:25

Information

Ottawa service 42:14-16

The Telegram (Toronto) agreement 42:13-14

Operations 42:9-10

Programming, Canadian, problems 42:12

Television, community, antenna, function 42:15

Royal Commission on Government Organization

Postal rates, recommendations 19:9

Royal Commission on Publications

Canadian identity, promotion 20:66, 20:69

Farm papers 18:84

Magazines, study, detrimental effect 21:71-72

Recommendations

Periodicals

Foreign, Canadian advertising regulations 18:53-54, 19:77, 20:74

Government assistance 22:39

Postal rates 18:60, 19:22

Specialized publications, competition 19:79-80

Time International of Canada Limited editorial advantages 22:12-13

Rural Canadians

Aspirational levels, problems 7:8, 7:14, 7:22

Farm press 7:12, 11:8, 11:47-53, 14:24

Hutterites 7:15-16, 7:21

Information Canada, role 20:14-15

Media

Recommendations, Forbes, R.E. 20:8-10, 20:17-20

Role, importance 7:8-9, 7:11, 7:15-18, 14:23-24, 20:8, 20:12, 20:17

Newspapers, false image 20:13

Organization membership 7:14-15

Rural communities, viability 20:10, 20:12, 20:14

See also

Canadian Broadcasting Corporation
Farm and Rural Press

Rural Press

See

Farm and Rural Press

Russell, George, Bureau Chief, Canadian University Press

Criticism of media 17:38-41

Ryan, Claude, Editor and Publisher of le Devoir

Ownership, concentration 2:73-74

Postal regulations, change 2:74-77

Saint-Martin, Mrs. Fernande, Editor, Chatelaine

Statement, activities, policy 21:51-53

St. Paul Journal (Alberta)

Role, advertising 29:42-44

Saskatchewan

Media into community, penetration 3:51, 3:61

Saturday Evening Post

Publication ceased 19:46

Saturday Night

Advertising

Content 20:58, 20:61-62

Time Magazine 20:44, 21:38

Article "About a Cry of Outrage", R. Fulford 2:33
Competition 20:44-46

Function, "public opinion" guide 20:49, 20:51

Language, standards 20:54-56

Magazine Advertising Bureau, services 20:42-43

National unity, contribution 20:41-42

"Parallèle", edition 20:60

Politics, national, position 20:56-57

Postal rates, increase, effect 20:47-48, 20:59

Specialized magazine 20:46

Statement, Nobleman, W. 20:40-42

Subscriptions, number 20:59

Saxe, Stewart, President, Canadian University Press

"Establishment" control of mass media 17:9-10

Scarth, Allan, Editor "The Gateway", University of Alberta

"The Gateway", comments 17:17-18

Scott, David, Editor The Gazette, University of Western Ontario

"The Gazette", comments 17:14-16

Selkirk Holdings Limited

Investments

Canastel, Castleton Investments, British Columbia
Television 35:16, 37:46

Southam Press Limited 13:24, 13:37-39, 13:49,
35:13-16

Personnel, quality, promotion 35:25-27

Shareholders, board of directors 35:12-17

Television stations

Affiliation, CTV, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, preference 35:21

Autonomy 35:22-23

See also

All-Canada Radio and Television

Sept-Jours (Montréal)

Circulation, weekly 22:54-55

Deficit, cost 22:55, 22:57, 22:63

Distribution 22:64-65

English edition, discussion 22:56-57

Objectives 22:56, 22:67

Personnel, correspondents 22:58-59, 22:61-63

Statement, Allard, Robert 22:54-55

Shelford, R.H., General Manager, Free Press Weekly

Statement, farm press, situation 20:24-26

Sherbrooke Record (Quebec)

Basset, J.W.H., investment 8:24-25

Sifton, Michael, President, Armadale Company Limited

Statement, Armadale Company Limited 3:35-37

Simon, Norm, Director, Public Relations, Canadian Union of Public Employees

Memos received from management while working for Toronto Telegram 11:106, 11:114-115, 13:8

Sloan, Tom, Chairman of Communications and Journalism, Faculty of Arts, Laval University

Communications, Canada 3:67-71

Smith, Michael, Editor, The Journal, St. Mary's University, Halifax

Student press, purpose 17:16-17

Smith, Norman, Editor, Ottawa Journal

Brief, statement 11:61-63

Le Soleil (Quebec)

Postal rates, increase, effect 23:61

Saguenay Lake St. John area, editorial, organization
2:92

Southam Business Publications Limited

Advertising

Competition "Time" 19:15-16, 19:19-20

Revenue 19:27

"Beam" program, liaison 19:11

Circulation

Annual 19:26

Qualified, paid 19:12, 19:23-25

Daly, James A., statement 19:7-9

Data retrieval 19:10-12

Journalists

Recruitment sources 19:17-18

Travel expenses, payment 19:17

MacLean-Hunter, arrangement 19:29, 19:72

"Master photographer" 19:18-19

Opinions, conflicting, presentation 19:16, 19:32

Postal rates 19:1, 19:11-12, 19:20-23

Services, operations 19:8, 19:31-32

Southam Press Limited, relationship 19:8

Trade shows 19:27

"Water and Pollution Control", "Eutrophication" article 19:30-31Southam Press Limited

Advertising

Annual revenue 19:26

Sales organization 13:71

Advisory boards, feasibility 13:22-23

Alberta, concentration of circulation 13:46

Board of directors 13:45

Editorial freedom of papers 13:9-10, 13:41-42,
13:72

Electronic media, policy 13:14, 13:37, 13:49

"Group", "chain" preference 13:11

"London Free Press" investment 10:29, 10:75-76

Magna Media Limited 13:50-51

"Montreal Gazette", weekly paper 13:44

Publishers, appointment 13:44-45

Selkirk Holdings Limited, investment 13:24,
13:37-39, 13:49, 35:13-16

Shares 13:19

Southam News Services

Administration 3:10-11

Agreement, Canadian Press 3:10

Member papers, selection of material 3:30-31

Monopolies, advantages 3:29

Statement, Charles Lynch 3:10-11

Southstar Publishers Limited, administration
13:49-50, 13:53

Statement, Swanson, Frank G. 13:51-53

Trade unions, relations with newspapers 13:36

Wage negotiations 13:20

Working agreements, Winnipeg, Ottawa, Calgary papers 13:30-32South Side Mirror (Calgary, Alberta)

Advertising, local, circulation 13:57

Southstar Publishers Limited

"Canadian Homes" content, circulation 24:41

Southam Press Limited, administration 13:49-50,
13:53

Star Weekly, circulation 24:30, 24:45-46

Statement, Mannion J. 24:29-31

See also

The Canadian Magazine

The Spectator (Hamilton, Ontario)

Advertisement, CFRB (Toronto) 21:10

Editorial content 13:81

Local news content 13:79-81

McMurrich court case 13:81-87

Staff, specialists, wages 13:87-88

Statement, Nichols. T.E. 13:78-80

Speers, W. A., President, Broadcast News Limited

Statement function 2:9-10

Standard Broadcasting Corporation Limited

Advertising, return 38:57-58

Audience 39:70

Canadian content, music 38:49-51

Editorial policy 38:47-48

History, activities, statement, Cran, W. C. Thornton
38:43-45

Investments 38:63

Ownership concentration, comments 38:61-63

Programming

Comparison, French, English 38:53-55

Syndicated 38:55-56

Standard Broadcast News, services, Canada, United States 2:22, 38:68-70, 38:74-75Standard Radio News Network

Western Broadcasting Limited, services 37:30, 37:42

Star-Phoenix (Saskatoon)

Articles, selection 3:48-50

Indians, Metis, coverage 3:43

See also

Armada Company Limited

Star Weekly

Circulation 24:29-30, 24:45

Stern Publication (Germany)

Charter 6:48, 6:67, 7:35-36

Student Press

Advertising 17:24-27, 17:30, 17:32, 17:69

"Campus Magazine", attitude towards 17:27-29

Community penetration 17:63-64

Criticism 17:13-14, 17:37-38

Financing 17:24, 17:29, 17:59

- "The Gateway" (University of Alberta)
 Cartoon on Vietnam war, publication 17:18, 17:30-33
 Editorials 17:16, 17:33
 Statement on activities, Allan Scarth 17:17-18
- "Gazette" (University of Western Ontario)
 Advertising 17:22-23
 Comments, Scott, D. 17:14-16
 Content, presentation, orientation 17:15-16
 Financing 17:15-16, 17:22-23
- "The Journal" (St. Mary's University, Halifax)
 Advertising 17:25-26
 "Dalhousie Gazette", co-operation 17:64
 Influence on campus revolutions 17:57-58
- "McGill Daily" (McGill University)
 Advertising 17:26-27
 Content, justification 17:37-38
- "McGill Reporter" (McGill University), function 17:20-21
- Mass Media Special Senate Committee, choice of university papers 17:68-69
- Newspapers, checks and balances 17:64-65
- Political 17:71
- Purpose, role, future 17:16-17, 17:70-71, 26:27-28
- Quebec situation 17:19-20, 17:34-35
- Statement, Stewart Saxe 17:11
- Student unions, decline, effect 17:34-37
See also
 Canadian University Press
- The Sun (Vancouver)
 Advertising
 Mill line rate 11:28
 Vancouver Province, combined rate 11:55-57, 11:60, 11:74-75
- Strike, socio-economic consequences, report, Gray, W. A. 34:9-20, 34:22-23
See also
 Pacific Press Limited
- Sutherland, J.R.H., President, Canadian Press
 Statement on role, activities 2:7-9
- Swanson, Frank, Publisher, Calgary Herald, Vice-President, Southam Press Limited
 Statement on brief 13:51-53
- Sweeney (Oakville, Ontario)
 Content, role 28:11-12, 28:26-27, 28:60
- Switzer, Israel, Chief Technical Officer, Maclean-Hunter Cable TV Limited
 Statement, technical aspects 41:65-66
- Syndicat d'Oeuvres Sociales Limitée
See
 Le Droit
- Task Force on Information
See
 Information, Task Force
- The Telegram (Toronto)
 American Newspaper Guild, contracts 8:25
 CFTO-TV, advantage co-ownership 40:10-11, 40:26-27, 40:34-37
 Code of ethics 8:27-28
 Columnists 8:26-27, 8:32
 Content 22:21
 Coverage
 Boroughs 8:17
 Elections provincial 1967, municipal 1969 8:17, 14:47, 14:51, 24:71-72
 Foreign 8:14
 Middle East, partiality 25:38
 National news 8:14
 Quebec 8:30-31
 Craft unions, relations 8:25
 T. Eaton Company, influence 8:24
 Editorials, responsibility 8:21-22, 8:27
 Entertainment section 8:15
 Freedom of expression 8:26-27
 Letters to the editor 8:27
 Liberal support, 1963 election, consequences 8:19
 New Democratic Party, support 8:19
 Newsprint, supplies, delivery methods 8:10-11
 Quality, comments, Ken Lefolli 21:99, 21:105, 21:107
 Research facilities 8:29-30
 Shareholders 8:20
 Simon, Norm, memos received from management 11:106, 11:114-115, 13:8
 Suburban weeklies, involvement 8:16, 8:18
 Sunday paper, attempt to publish 8:31-32
 Technological changes, research 8:22-23
 Toronto Daily Star
 Comparison, J. W. H. Bassett 8:14-15
 Co-operation 8:28-29
 Competition in delivery 8:29
 Wages 1:45
- The Telegraph-Journal (Saint John, New Brunswick)
 Advertising
 News content, ratio 5:58
 Rates 5:54-56, 5:59
 Competition, Saint John and Moncton 5:59-60
 Correspondent, Ottawa 5:60
 Delivery system 5:57
 Dissent handling 5:53
 Pollution, lack of coverage 5:49-50, 5:61
 Postal rates, increase, effect 5:52-53, 5:57-58
 Public relations material, treatment 5:63
 Quality, comments, Dalton Camp 25:56-57
 Robichaud Government, editorial policy, attitude towards 5:64-65

Télémedia (Québec)

- Canadian content 37:17, 37:21, 37:23-24
- Competition 37:14, 37:17
- Editorial Policy 37:27
- Power Corporation, interests, representatives 37:10-13, 37:28
- Quality of services 37:16-17, 37:25-26

Télé-Métropole Corporation

- Advertising, cost 41:20-21
- Audience 41:21
- Canadian Association of Broadcasters, Membership 41:23
- Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, Competition 41:11-12, 41:14-16
- Canadian content 41:10-13, 41:22
- Expansion 41:14, 41:17-18
- Freedom of expression 41:25
- Personnel 41:9-10
- Press Council, Quebec 41:24-25
- Programmes, American, dubbing 41:24
- Shareholders 41:19
- Statement, Giguère, Roland 41:9-13
- Stations, affiliated 41:13-14

Telesat

- Future 26:60-61

Television

- American influence 25:58-59
- Audience 40:69
- Biculturalism 3:69, 3:72-74
- Broadcasters, views and interpretation to public 7:37, 40:70-71
- Broadcasting waves UHF and VHF, differences 41:71
- Canadian Home and School and Parent-Teacher Federation (Incorporated), involvement 9:33
- Children
 - Research regarding influence on 9:29-31, 9:33, 26:54
 - Restriction of programmes 9:39-40
 - United States, comments, Spiro Agnew 18:86
- Committee, "Clean up, TV campaign" 1967 26:52
- Credibility 7:24, 30:74, 43:15-16
- Diversity of opinion 40:28-31
- Educational 9:29, 9:36-37, 26:11 36:70
- International affairs, coverage 4:8, 4:17-19
- Life style, effect on audience under poverty line 39:100-103
- Newspapers
 - Advertising, competition 2:71, 20:42, 23:45
 - Effect on 1:56, 1:63, 2:52, 2:67, 16:18, 20:51-52, 23:50, 25:64-65, 26:11, 36:54
 - Political impact, comparison 14:35-40
 - Recording and interpreting events, comparison 16:17, 20:64-65, 22:50, 25:83-84, 43:12-13

- Obscenity, government control 9:38-39
- O'Leary, Senator M. Grattan, comments 20:64
- Parliamentary coverage 14:44, 20:84
- Programming, foreign, Canadian 3:69, 20:75-76, 21:12-13, 21:15, 42:43-45, 42:61-62
- Rural Canadians, effect 7:8-9, 7:15, 20:17
- Self-regulatory code 9:31, 9:36
- Video tapes, use 36:54
- Violence 9:30, 9:34-36, 36:70-71
- See also*
 - Canadian Broadcasting Corporation
 - Canadian Radio-Television Commission
 - Television, Community Antenna

Television, Community Antenna

- Advertising
 - Canadian Radio-Television Commission, regulations 20:60-61, 42:36-37, 42:39
 - Local, national 38:19-20, 42:17
- Broadcasters
 - Co-operation 42:29-30
 - Local stations, disappearance 26:57-58
- Definitions "cable system", "cable company" 42:31
- Future perspectives 21:100-101, 35:49, 35:56, 35:62, 35:33-34, 39:63, 40:45, 41:18, 41:43, 41:59-60, 41:74, 42:29-30
- Montreal, reception "simple antenna" 41:18, 41:52
- National identity, contribution 42:24, 42:26-27
- Network system 26:60-61
- Programming
 - Public participation 36:53, 42:28
 - Regional 41:50-53, 42:39
- Regulations
 - American programs 13:17-19, 36:19-21, 41:44-45
 - Importance 41:16-17, 41:45
- Revenue 41:47, 41:64, 41:68
- Role 41:42-43, 41:52-53, 41:68, 42:28-30
- Technical problems 41:72-73
- The Telegram, Toronto, investments 8:22
- Television, conventional, conflict 36:19-21, 41:17-18, 41:50, 41:60-61, 41:70, 42:29-31
- Territory, exclusive 41:47-49
- See also*
 - Canadian Cable Television Association
 - Canadian Cable Television Commission-Community Antenna
 - Jarmain Cable Systems Limited
 - Maclean Hunter Cable TV Limited
 - Rogers Broadcasting Limited

Télévision Saint Maurice, Inc.

- Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, affiliation 41:33, 41:37-38
- Canadian content 41:33-36, 41:38-41
- United States, competition 41:32-33, 41:39

Templeton, Charles, Journalist and Broadcaster
CFRB, radio program with Pierre Berton 7:37-38

- MacLean's magazine editorial interference 7:33-34, 21:29, 22:37
- Media, information, comments 7:24-25
- Thomas, Harry, Editor, "McGill Reporter", McGill University
 Comments on "McGill Reporter", "McGill Daily" 17:20-21
- Thomson, Corey, Vice-President, Radio Futura Limited
 Comments, media, inequality 33:41-42
- Thomson Newspapers Limited
 Activities 7:39
 Advertising
 News ratio 7:71-72, 7:78
 Rates, local, national, reducing diversity 7:49-50, 7:72
 American Newspaper Guild brief, refutation 7:53
 Broadcasting
 Divestment of interests 7:45
 Government control 7:45-46
 Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, criticism 5:29-30
 Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association membership 1:12, 7:62-63
 Canadian management group 7:57-58
 Canadian Press
 Criticism 7:67
 Use of services, cost 7:66-68
 Code of ethics 7:44
 Editorial content, degree of interference 7:58-59
 Editorial support, political candidates 7:74-75
 Equipment, depreciation 7:65, 7:70
 Fisher, Douglas, comments on quality 5:9-10, 7:73, 7:78
 Journalism
 Dishonest 7:79
 Protection of sources 7:44-45
 Schools, Ontario community colleges, relations 7:78
 Labour contracts 7:52
 Newspapers
 Buying, factors considered 7:55, 29:18-21
 Circulations, small 7:61-62
 Monthly statements 7:63-64
 Opinionated 7:76
 Quality diminishing, method of action 7:57-58
 Services 7:40, 7:66-67, 7:69, 7:99
 Suburban 7:61, 7:70-71
 Supervision 7:63-65
 Thunder Bay, Ontario, fusion possible 7:55-56, 7:73
 Personnel 7:40-41, 7:44, 7:50-51, 7:78-79
 "Peterborough Examiner" strike 1:32, 1:37-38, 1:41, 1:47, 7:52-54, 7:83-89
- Press Council proposed, comments 7:43-44
 "Prince Albert Daily Herald", improvements 7:102
 Publishers, relations 7:43, 7:63, 7:66, 7:102
 Publishing rights, increase, 1967 statement 7:70
 Quebec Chronicle-Telegraph 7:56-57, 7:62
 Quebec, news coverage 7:77, 7:100-101
 Salaries, United States, comparison 7:51
 Statement, Tory, John A. 7:39-42
 Success, ingredients 7:40
 Television, community antenna, interests 7:46
 Technology, facsimile press 7:48-49
- Time Incorporated (New York)
 American edition
 Canadian content 22:16-17, 22:19-20
 Printing, restriction 22:24
 Commentaries, article by R. Pollack, "Time after Luce" 22:10, 22:25-27, 22:35
 Publications, world-wide 22:10
 Revenue, annual 19:27, 22:10-11
 Success, reasons 21:45, 22:11
- Time International of Canada Limited
 Advertising
 Competition 19:76, 22:22-24, 22:32-33
 French 22:20-21
 Rates 19:19
 Sources, presentation 16:32, 19:76, 22:30, 22:31-32
 "Canadian magazine?" 20:42, 22:14, 22:18-19, 22:35, 22:56, 22:78, 25:65
 Circulation 22:11, 22:17, 22:21, 22:28, 22:33
 Editorials
 Content, comparison, United States 5:13, 21:36, 22:14, 22:18, 22:29-31
 Costs, advantages 22:12-13, 22:14
 Government, American, representation 22:25-26
 Magazine Advertising Bureau, participation, importance 20:43
 New York bureau, relations 22:15
 O'Leary, report 22:12-13
 Personnel, offices 22:30
See also
 Time-Reader's Digest
- Time-Reader's Digest
 Canadian magazines
 Advertising, competition 16:32, 19:15-16, 20:70, 24:16-17, 24:38, 25:57-58
 Publications ceased 21:38-39, 21:114-115, 22:12, 22:51, 33:24, 39:96-97, 39:107-108
 Substitution, possibilities 5:13, 16:34-35
 Commentaries
 Income Tax Act, exemption 16:34-35, 18:108, 19:48-50, 20:42, 20:44, 22:12, 22:14, 22:38, 36:64-65, 40:14-15

- O'Leary, Senator, recommendations, report 1961
 20:69-70, 20:73-74, 24:17-18
 Postal rates 18:45, 18:108, 19:11-12, 19:50

Trade Unions

- American Newspaper Guild 1:30-47
 Media
 Efforts made to present issues to public 11:95-97,
 11:108-111
 Labour coverage 11:90, 11:92-101, 11:104-113,
 14:30-31, 15:33-34
 New Brunswick strikes, problems 11:113
 Quebec, northwestern, newspapers control by Nor-anda Mines 11:100-101
 Technological changes, resistance attitude 1:10,
 11:103-104, 11:108
 Wage rates, publication 11:96-97

Toronto Daily Star

- Advertising standards 16:44
 Biafra coverage, balanced report 16:27-28
 Broadcasting, Infocor relationship 14:14-15, 16:43-44
 Correspondents 16:19-20
 Editorial freedom, publisher's constraint 16:39
 Editorial policy 16:14-15
 Entertainment section 8:15
 Foreign coverage 8:14, 16:41, 25:36-38
 Four-letter words, use 16:26-27
 National news coverage 8:14
 New Democratic Party, support 16:41-42
 Publication, memoirs, Christine Keeler, Gerda Munsinger 16:15-16
 Quebec situation, coverage 16:44
 Re-write section 16:28, 16:29
 Sales, relation to other Toronto papers 6:21-22
 Staff 16:35-36
 Syndicate, Bobby Orr's column 13:57-58, 16:22-23, 24:64-65, 24:67-68
 Travel policy 16:20
 Weeklies 16:40, 16:42
 Youth, approach 16:26
See also
 The Telegram (Toronto)

Toronto Life

- Advertising, competition, content 22:73-75,
 22:77-78, 22:83-84
 Armadale Publishers Limited, ownership 22:81
 Centre of interest 22:70-71, 22:84-85
 Readers 22:73, 22:80, 22:85-86
 Statement, Balmer, Preston 22:70-72

Toronto Newspaper Guild

- See*
 American Newspaper Guild

Toronto Newspapers

- Comments, Stephen La Rue 22:21-22
 Comparison
 Dailies, local 8:14-15, 19:66-67, 23:28, 40:27
 Montreal newspapers 23:49
 Competitive papers, support 8:15-16
 Quebec, popular music, coverage 26:47-48
 Sunday edition, proposed 8:31-32
 Weeklies 8:15-16

Toronto Telegram

- See*
 The Telegram (Toronto)

Tory, John A., Q.C., General Counsel, Thomson Newspapers Limited

- Statement on brief 7:39-42

Trans-Canada Readers Service

- Activities, control 19:39, 19:43

Turner, Frank, Manager, Editorial Services and Edi- torial Art Department, Business Publications Division, Maclean-Hunter Limited

- Biographical data 19:59
 Journalists, recruitment, training 19:60-61

UPI

- See*
 United Press International

Underground Press

- Advertising, refusals 28:26-32, 28:49
 Content, selection criteria, influences 28:50-52,
 28:55, 28:60, 36:62
 Circulation, readers 28:27, 28:55
 Definition 28:10, 28:20, 28:59-60
 "Establishment" newspapers, criticisms, differences
 28:49-60
 "Georgia Straight" (Vancouver)
 Circulation, financing 28:20-21
 Judicial processes 28:36-44, 28:47-48, 36:49-50, 36:63
 Newspapers, dailies on strike, effect 28:48-49
 Obscenities 28:21-28
 Success, reasons 13:74-75
 "Harbinger" (Toronto), content, role, success 8:27,
 21:11, 28:13, 28:23
 Nationalism, American influence 28:14-15,
 28:16-19
 Obscenities 21:110, 28:21-22, 28:43-44, 28:47
 "Octopus" (Ottawa) objectives 28:12
 "Omphalos" (Winnipeg) role 28:12
 Printers, problems 28:21-23, 28:24-26
 Radio stations, underground, licences 28:33-35
 Recommendations to Committee 28:59-61

- Selling in the streets, freedom 28:45-46, 36:48-49
 Success, reasons 1:16, 1:22-23, 5:26, 6:62
 "Sweeney" (Oakville, Ontario) content, role
 28:11-12, 28:26-27, 28:60
 United States 1:16, 28:13-14, 28:15-19
 Viability 21:23-24
- Unions
See
 Trade Unions
- United Church Observer
 Advertising 25:41-42, 25:48-49, 25:50-51
 Circulation, distribution 25:32, 25:50
 Financing 25:43
 Magazine Advertising Bureau, services 25:48-49
 Middle East controversy 25:33-40
 Postal rates, increase, effects 25:42-43
 Vatican Council, articles concerning, readers reactions 25:40
- United Press International
 Québecor Incorporated, services 23:25
- United States
 Broadcasting, Canadian
 Competition, Griffiths, S.W., statement 35:48-50
 Influence 31:13, 31:17
 Programs imported 26:55-56, 37:34-41
 Federal Communications Commission
 Canadian Radio-Television Commission, comparison 26:36
 History, function 32:30
 "Pastore Bill" 32:13
 Influence on Canadian life 32:40-41, 42:44, 42:62-63
 Journalists
 Information sources, protection 35:63-64
 Training, selection criteria 35:61-62
 "Washington newspaper men" 5:14
 Journals of opinion, comment 20:41
 Mass media
 Bagdikian, Ben, statement 35:51-57
 O'Leary, Senator M. Grattan, comment 20:75
 Newspapers
 The American Newspaper Guild, research 1:11
 Bagdikian, Ben, statement 35:51-57
 Coverage, types 35:59-61
 Ethnic Press 18:26
 Number, dailies, weeklies 35:58
 Ownership concentration, comments 13:23-26, 14:47, 14:56, 35:51-52
 Politics, influence 10:20, 10:69
 Printing technology, influences 35:66-67
 "Qualities of greatness" 35:68
 Readership 1:11
 Reproduction, technique, quality 26:20
 Suburban 29:40-41
 Underground 1:16, 28:13-19
 Unions, penetration, percentage 1:46
 Ownership concentration
 Anti-trust laws 32:36
 Bibliography 32:20-22
 Johnson, Nicholas, statement 32:11-20, 32:34
 Regulations 26:38-39, 26:51
 Postal rates, system 18:81, 20:25-26, 20:33
 Press councils, local 35:55, 35:67-68
 Radio stations
 Pembina, North Dakota 35:36-37, 40:13-14
 Underground 28:35-36
 Technology, new, future 32:28-29
 Television
 Controversial programmes 32:49
 Doctrine 32:42
 Image projected, false 32:25, 32:27-28
 Programming
 Advertising, influence 32:24-26, 32:32
 Production, calibre 32:32-33, 32:44-50, 35:53-56, 35:65-66
 Textbooks, educational material, influence in Canada 26:9-16, 26:18-19, 26:20-21
See also
 Magazines. United States
- University, Newspapers
See
 Student press
- University of Toronto
 Information Department, functions 17:18-19
- "The Unjust Society", Harold Cardinal
 Comments, J. Goodis 21:11, 21:13, 21:21
- Vancouver
 Newspapers
 Situation 29:65-67
 Strike
 Effects, socio-economic, Gray, Walter, comments 34:9-20, 34:22-23
 Radio news, comments 35:28, 35:39-40, 37:31-34, 38:28
- Vancouver Express
 Newspaper strike, influences 34:17-18
- The Vancouver Province
See
 The Province (Vancouver, British Columbia)
- The Vancouver Sun
See
 The Sun (Vancouver, British Columbia)

Vancouver Times

Reasons for failure 13:68, 13:71, 13:73-74

Villeneuve, André, Information attaché of Laval University, Editor of "Au fil des Événements"

French student newspapers in Quebec, situation 17:19-20

La Voix de l'Est (Sherbrooke, Québec)

Radio station CHEF, association, advantages 23:67-68

Wallaceburg News

Operation facsimile 2:49

Wardell, Brigadier Michael, Publisher, Daily Gleaner Fredericton

Criticism of Senator McElman's charges 5:70-72

Irving, K. C., contributions to New Brunswick 5:68-69

Robichaud Government, political pressure 5:32, 5:51, 5:67-68

Waters, Allan, President and director, CHUM Limited

History, activities 39:11-13

Waters, David, President, Association of English Media Journalists of Quebec

Brief, explanation 6:45-49

Structure, plans and purposes of association 6:43-44

Weekend Magazine

The Canadian Magazine, comparison, competition 24:40, 24:42-44

Circulation 24:34, 24:40

Competition 24:12-13, 24:14, 24:26

"Counter Attack" column, content, writers 24:18-19

Distribution 24:25-27

Masthead, absence 24:14

Newspapers, affiliation, agreement 24:20-21, 24:22-25

O'Leary, Senator M. Grattan, comments 20:68, 20:76-77

Revenue, rotogravure sections 24:15

See also

Perspectives

WeekliesAdvertising

Audit Bureau of Circulations 29:73, 29:75, 29:79

National, local 29:13, 29:23-24, 29:27, 29:39, 29:43, 29:45, 29:54-55, 29:66-67, 29:69-70, 29:73-79, 29:86

Costs, expenses 29:79-92

Journalists, quality, recruitment 29:13, 29:16-17, 29:27, 29:55-56, 29:81

Ownership concentration 29:20-21, 29:29, 29:51

Postal regulations, effect 29:33, 29:43, 29:75-76, 29:82, 29:86, 29:89-90

Reproduction "off-set" 29:15, 29:28 29:34, 29:84

Role, content 29:12, 29:15, 29:35-39, 29:42-44, 29:52, 29:54-56, 29:59-60, 29:72-73, 29:76

Success, reasons 2:93-94, 3:26, 10:16-17, 23:48-49, 29:44-45

Suburban, rural, differences 29:40-42, 29:57, 29:77

Viability 29:14, 29:32, 29:34-35, 29:41

See also

Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association

Les Hebdomas du Canada

Western Broadcasting Limited

Advertising, policy 37:47

Canadian content, musical programming 37:34-41

Canastel, shareholders, board representation 37:46-47

CKNW (Vancouver)

Newspaper strike 37:31-34, 37:45-46

Programming 37:30-31, 37:44, 37:48-49

Recording equipment 37:46-47

Standard Radio News Network, services 37:30, 37:42

Western Regional Newspapers Limited

Group, role, revenue 20:73-75

The Western Star (Corner Brook, Newfoundland)

Shareholders 2:65, 2:69

The Evening Telegram (St. John's) relations 2:65, 2:68-69

Williams, Lord Francis, Journalists, Broadcaster, Great Britain

"Dangerous Estate" comments, Evans, Mrs. Una MacLean 25:82-83

"Windsor Star" (Ontario)

Advertising, rates 2:47-48

Canadian viewpoint, adequate expression 2:44

Competition, income 2:47

Coverage, topics 2:44-46, 2:50, 2:53

Freedom of the press, explanation 2:41, 2:48, 2:53-54

Press council, proposed 2:41-42

Readers, statistics 2:54

Staff 2:45-46

Taxes, estate 2:42, 2:46-47

Trade unions, views 2:43

Winnipeg

Radio stations, American competition 35:36

"Winnipeg Free Press" (Manitoba)

Advertising rates 11:26, 11:53-54

Circulation 11:25-26
 Correspondents 11:9-10
 Reactionary 28:19
 Unionized departments 11:27-28

"Winnipeg Tribune" (Manitoba)

Advertising rates 11:26
 Circulation 11:25-26

Wood, David G., Chairman, Canadian Public Relations Society, Incorporated

Statement, public relations, activities 24:46-48

Woodmount Investments Limited

Shareholders 35:48

Zimmerman, E. Paul, President, The Reader's Digest Association (Canada) Limited

Statement, Canadian publication 33:9-12

Briefs

May be consulted at the National Library or the Library of Parliament

Witnesses

—Abell, Dr. Helen, Professor of Sociology, University of Waterloo 7:9-23
 —Agnew, Arnold H., Vice-President and Editor-in-Chief, Toronto Telegram 8:27-28
 —Akehurst, Paul, General Manager, Canadian Contemporary News System 39:28-31
 —Allard, G. A., Past President, Canadian Cable Television Association 41:44-57
 —Allard, Robert, President, Sept-Jours, Inc. 22:54-69
 —Allard, T. J., Executive Vice-President, Canadian Association of Broadcasters 31:24-26, 31:39
 —Alloway, Donald Miller, Senior Vice-President, Graphic Arts Industries Association 26:12-21
 —Anderson, Mrs. Doris McCubbin, Chatelaine Group; Editor-in-Chief, Miss Chatelaine 21:49-67
 —Anderson, Len, Editor, Omphalos (Winnipeg) 28:12-24, 28:33, 28:60
 —Andras, Andy, Director of Legislation and Government Employees, Canadian Labour Congress 11:98-99, 11:112, 11:119
 —Audet, Henri P. Eng., President, Télévision St. Maurice, Incorporated; CKTM-TV (Trois-Rivières) 41:27-41
 —Auger, Fred S., First Vice-President, Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association; Publisher, Vancouver Province 1:9-10, 1:14, 1:18-20, 1:24, 1:29, 13:63-78
 —Bagdikian, Ben, National Editor, The Washington Post 35:51-69

—Bailey, Rev. T. Melville, Acting Editor, The Presbyterian Record 25:22-31
 —Baker, George C., Publisher, Kentville Advertiser (Nova Scotia) 29:37-38, 29:96-97
 —Balcer, Jean, President, Quebec Society, The Canadian Public Relations Society, Incorporated 24:59-63
 —Balfour, St. Clair, President, Southam Press Limited 13:8-53
 —Balls, Mrs. B. D., Executive Secretary, Consumers' Association of Canada 27:10-26
 —Balmer, Preston, Vice-President, Toronto Life 22:69-87
 —Balmer, Preston W., Vice-President, Regina Leader-Post 3:50-52, 3:61
 —Bannerman, Donald, Advertising Sales Manager, Toronto Daily Star 16:44-45
 —Barker, Warren, News Director, CKNW, Western Broadcasting Company Limited (Vancouver) 37:32, 37:41-45
 —Barr, Dan, Bugle Gazette-Times (Woodstock, New Brunswick) 29:94
 —Bassett, Douglas G., Director, Toronto Telegram 8:10-11, 8:23, 8:28-29
 —Bassett, Douglas G., Vice-President and General Manager, Inland Publishing Company Limited 29:71-72, 29:77
 —Bassett, J. W. H., Chairman and Publisher, Toronto Telegram 8:7-36
 —Beattie, Earle, Professor of Journalism, University of Western Ontario 14:45-57
 —Beaubien, Philippe de Gaspé, President, Télémedia (Québec) Limitée 37:9-28
 —Bédard, Simon, Vice-President and General Manager, Magazine Actualité, Incorporated 22:39-53
 —Beddoes, Richard, Sports Writer, Globe and Mail (Toronto) 24:64-76
 —Bélanger, Gaston, Vice-President, Sales and Promotion, Télé-Métropole Corporation, CFTM-TV (Montreal) 41:20-22
 —Bélanger, Jean-Robert, Treasurer, Le Droit, (Hull—Ottawa) 10:53, 10:60
 —Berton, Pierre, Broadcaster and Author 36:48-72
 —Bingle, G.A., Program Manager, CFPL-Radio (London, Ontario) 36:15-16
 —Bjerre, Vaughn, Vice-President and Manager, Rogers Broadcasting Limited 42:13-14, 42:20-22
 —Blackburn, Walter J., Chairman, CFPL Broadcasting Limited; President and Publisher, The London Free Press 10:7-11, 10:14-35, 10:67, 10:72-88
 —Blaker, Rod, Director of Public Affairs, Radio Station CJAD (Montreal) 6:51, 6:55, 6:57, 6:60-72

- Bonneau, Robert, Manager, Télévision Saint-Maurice, Inc., CKTM-TV (Trois-Rivières) 41:33-34
- Botterill, Norm, Vice-President, Stations Operations, Selkirk Holdings Limited 35:17-19, 35:22-27
- Bouchard, Robert, Staff Representative, National Association of Broadcast Employees and Technicians 11:100-102, 11:114
- Boucher, C.R., President, Canadian Cable Television Association 41:42-62
- Boyle, Harry J., Vice-Chairman, Canada Radio-Television Commission 26:54-56, 26:60-61
- Bradley, Keith, Member, Agricultural Institute of Canada 20:13-14, 20:22
- Brander, F. Gerald, Publisher, Macleans Magazine and Le Magazine Maclean 21:26-46, 21:71, 21:75
- Brechtin, Mrs. W.A., Chairman, Consumers' Association of Canada 27:9-26
- Bremner, T. H., News Editor, CFPL-Radio, CFPL Broadcasting Limited 36:17
- Brisebois, Maurice, Director of The Institute of Canadian Advertising; Executive Vice-President, Vickers and Benson Limited (Montreal) 39:83, 39:99-102, 39:107
- Brouillé, Jean-Louis, Editor-in-Chief, Magazine Actualité, Incorporated 22:37-52
- Brown, Murray, President and General Manager, CFPL Broadcasting Limited 10:18, 10:27-28, 10:78-81, 36:9-26
- Bureau, André, Executive Vice-President, La Presse Limitée (Montreal) 23:48-65, 23:73
- Bushnell, Ernest, Chairman of the Board, Bushnell Communications Limited, 39:61-62, 39:66-67
- Caccia, Charles, MP, Davenport 18:39-40
- Cain, Richard, Co-Editor, Octopus (Ottawa) 28:18, 28:28, 28:33-35, 28:51, 28:57
- Cadogan, George, Editor and Publisher, Pictou Advocate (Nova Scotia) 29:96
- Calnan, Lindley B., President and Magazine Editor, The Pictou Gazette (Ontario) 29:53-54, 29:82-83, 29:91
- Cameron, Professor Donald, Contributing Editor, The Mysterious East (Saint John, New Brunswick) 15:40-68
- Camp, Dalton, Syndicated Columnist and Freelance Broadcaster 25:52-68
- Campbell, Donald G., Executive Vice-President, Maclean-Hunter Limited 19:33, 19:36-37, 19:44, 19:48, 19:52-58, 19:68
- Campbell, F.W.D., Trustee of the Institute of Canadian Advertising; Partner of Campbell, Lawless and Punchard, Chartered Accountants (Toronto) 39:88, 39:93, 39:99
- Campbell, Keith, Vice-President, Marketing, CTV Television Network Limited 40:61-69
- Carabine, Ronald, General Manager, CKVN (Vancouver) 38:26-27, 38:36
- Carradine, William, Vice-President and General Manager, The London Free Press 10:12-14, 10:16-17, 10:22-28, 10:31-35, 10:72, 10:74, 10:76, 10:82, 10:84
- Carruthers, Jeff, Member, Canadian Society of Professional Journalists Executive Board 15:12-13, 15:16, 15:18, 15:20, 15:23, 15:25-27, 15:32-33
- Chafe, Frank, Assistant Director of Legislation, Government Employees' Department, Canadian Labour Congress 11:112
- Chaston, R.C., Director, Canadian Cable Television Association 41:48-62
- Chenoweth, David, Managing Editor, McGill Daily 17:12-14, 17:26-31, 17:37-38, 17:58-62, 17:65-68
- Chercover, Murray, President and Managing Director, CTV Television Network Limited 40:41-83
- Coleman, Gordon, Barrister and Solicitor 7:86-91, 7:95
- Collister, Ron, Parliamentary Correspondent, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation 3:11-16, 3:19-26, 3:29-35
- Conduit, A. J., Vice-President And Advertising Director, The Reader's Digest Association (Canada) Limited 33:20
- Cooper, James L., President and Publisher, The Globe and Mail (Toronto) 11:76-90
- Corelli, Rae, Member, Canadian Society of Professional Journalists 15:12-16, 15:19-37
- Costello, Ralph, President, Canadian Daily Newspapers Publishers Association; President and Publisher, St. John Telegraph-Journal (New Brunswick) 1:7-29, 5:47-65
- Costello, Ralph, President, New Brunswick Broadcasting Company 36:26-47
- Cotterill, Murray, Publicity Director for Canada, United Automobile Workers 11:95-97, 11:102, 11:110, 11:117
- Craig, Jacques, Managing Director, Québecor Incorporated 23:14, 23:17-27
- Craig, J. L., Executive Vice-President, Business Publications Division, Maclean-Hunter Limited 19:34, 19:50-53, 19:58, 19:62-65, 19:68, 19:71-75, 19:78-80
- Cran, W. C., Thornton, President, Standard Broadcasting Corporation Limited 38:43-73
- Craven, Gerald C., President, Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association; Publisher, The Ridgetown Dominion (Ridgetown, Ontario) 29:12-25, 29:47-48, 29:94
- Crépault, R., President, Canadian Association of Broadcasters; President, Radio-Mutuelle Limitée 31:9-42

- Crittenden, H. A., Vice-President and Managing Director, Trans Canada Communications Ltd. 3:45, 3:48-55, 3:58-60
- Cromwell, George A., General Manager, New Brunswick Broadcasting Company Limited 36:27-46
- Crosbie, J., President, Magazine Advertising Bureau 21:69-80, 22:45-48
- Crowther, Thomas, Vice-President, General Manager, The Telegraph-Journal (Saint John, New Brunswick) 5:54-59
- Culley, C. Alex, Business Manager, The Presbyterian Record 25:23-31
- Cuthand, Rev. Adam, President, Canadian Metis Society 6:27-31, 6:36-38
- Cyr, Gerald, President and Director, Le Nouveau Progrès, St. Jérôme, (Québec) 29:57-59
- Daley, L. F., Vice-President and Solicitor, Halifax Herald Ltd. 12:13-18, 12:22-25, 12:29-33, 12:36-38
- Daly, James A., Vice-Chairman of the Board, Southam Business Publications Limited 19:7-32
- D'Amour, Charles, President, Le Nouvelliste (Trois Rivières) 23:67-72
- Dansereau, Maurice, Vice-President, Radio Division, Télémedia (Québec) Limitée 37:17-20, 37:25-27
- Dansereau, Pierre, President, La Presse Limitée (Montreal) 23:45-52, 23:58-60
- Dauphinee, John, General Manager, Canadian Press 2:7, 2:12-23, 12:26-40
- Davey, Tom, Editor, "Water and Pollution Control" 19:7, 19:28, 19:30-31
- David, Raymond, Vice-President and General Manager (French Network) Canadian Broadcasting Corporation 30:18-19, 30:22, 30:25, 30:37-38, 30:45, 30:48, 30:60-62, 30:65, 30:73
- Davidson, George, President, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation 30:9-75
- Davidson, Roy M., Director, Merger and Monopoly Branch, Combines Investigation Act 9:16-17
- Dawson, Jack, Vice-President and Station Manager, CFRB Limited (Toronto), Standard Broadcasting Corporation Limited 38:46-47, 38:55, 38:60, 38:63-64
- Deiter, Walter, President, National Indian Brotherhood of Canada 6:26-42
- Delaney, E. J., Vice-President, Programming, Baton Broadcasting Limited 40:13, 40:15-25, 40:34-36
- Delorme, Roger, L'Observateur (Laval) 29:75-77
- Denhoff, J. W., Publisher, Prince Albert Daily Herald 7:80-82, 7:88-102
- Dennis, G. W., President and Publisher, Chronicle-Herald and Mail Star 12:7-39
- Deragon, J., Committee Member, Canadian Business Press; Vice-President, Marketing, National Business Publications 18:53, 18:63-64
- Derksen, George, Publisher and Editor, Estevan Mercury; Chairman, Saskatchewan Weekly Newspapers Association 29:49-52, 29:92
- Deschênes, Jules, Solicitor, Gelco Enterprises Limited 23:33-36, 23:62-63
- Desjarlais, Gilles, Member American Newspaper Guild; C.B.C. French News Service, Toronto; Guild Local (CBC) Past President 1:33-34, 1:36, 1:40
- Desmarais, Paul G., President, Gelco Enterprises Limited 23:33-44, 23:62
- DesMarais, Pierre, Vice-President, Graphic Arts Industries Association 26:12-16
- Dojack, Charles E., Immediate Past President, Canada Ethnic Press Federation 18:12-13, 18:19-28, 18:42
- Donovan, W. K., Managing Editor, News, CHSJ-TV and CHSJ-Radio, New Brunswick Broadcasting Company Limited 36:30-31, 36:41
- Downey, John, manager and Editor, "Home Goods Retailing", Business Publications Division, Maclean-Hunter Limited 19:61-62, 19:71, 19:75, 19:78
- Doyle, Richard J., Editor, The Globe and Mail (Toronto) 11:77, 11:80, 11:83-88
- Drea, Frank, President of the Canadian Society of Professional Journalists 15:7-39
- Drouin, L. H., Publisher, St. Paul Journal (Alberta) 29:42-44
- Dubé, Yvon, President, La Tribune (Sherbrooke) 23:70-75
- Duffy, James P., President, Ottawa Typographical Union 21:86
- Dunning, W. Eric, Publisher and Editor, Maple Ridge - Pitt Meadows Gazette (Haney), Coquitlam Herald and Coquitlam - Moody Advance (British Columbia) 29:84-85
- Eady, Francis, Assistant to the President, Canadian Union of Public Employees 11:97, 11:102-103, 11:112, 11:116
- Earles, Robert, President, Toronto Mailers' Union 21:92-93
- Edwardh, Dr. Melvin O., Member, Graphic Arts Industries Association 26:11-17
- Edwards, Charles B., General Manager, Broadcast News Limited 2:21-23, 2:29-32
- Elie, Jean-Claude, Assistant to the President, Québecor Incorporated 23:11, 23:32
- Espie, Dr. Tom, Executive Director, Canadian Council on Rural Development 7:7-12, 7:18-23
- Evans, Mrs. Una Maclean, Alderman, City of Edmonton 25:80-88

- Ewing, Grégoire, Director of Public Relations, Magazine Actualité, Incorporated 22:37, 22:42
- Fairbairn, Miss Joyce, F.P. Publications 3:16, 3:21, 3:31, 3:32
- Farran, Roy, President, North Hill News Limited; Publisher, North Hill News; Publisher, Market Examiner (Alberta) 29:56-57, 29:61-62, 29:79-81, 29:97
- Farrell, Mark, Publisher, Windsor Star (Ontario) 2:41-55
- Fellman, C. M., Managing Editor, North Bay Nugget, North Bay, (Ontario) 1:50, 1:57-61
- Fenety, J., Vice-President, Radio Section, Canadian Association of Broadcasters; Vice-President and General Manager, Radio-Atlantic Limited, Station CFNB, Fredericton 31:19-20, 31:24-26, 31:39-40
- Fenn, Charles, Marketing Manager, The London Free Press 10:21, 10:33
- Ferguson, David, President, Infocor Limited 14:13-18
- Fisher, Douglas, Broadcaster and Columnist, Toronto Telegram 5:7-30
- Fisher, Gordon, Vice-President and Managing Director, Southam Press Limited 13:11-20, 13:24, 13:26, 13:31-33, 13:37-41, 13:44, 13:49-51
- Fontaine, Lucien, Honorary Secretary, Les Hebdomas du Canada; Publisher, L'Echo (Malartic); L'Abitibien (Val d'Or); Le Portage (L'Assomption); L'Echo, (Amos, Quebec) 29:31, 29:36
- Forbes, R. E., Principal, Agricultural Extension Centre, Brandon, Manitoba 20:7-24
- Forrest, Alfred C., Editor, The United Church Observer 25:32-51
- Francoeur, Jacques-G., President, les Journaux Trans-Canada Limitée 23:65-74
- Fraser, Miss Joan, Reporter, Financial Times of Canada 6:52-56, 6:59-65, 6:68-73
- Fraser, Ronald, Vice-President, Corporate Affairs, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation 30:17, 30:42
- Friesen, David K., Publisher, Altona Red River Valley Echo (Manitoba) 29:85-87, 29:92, 29:95
- Fry, David, Secretary, "Saturday Night" 20:51
- Fulford, Robert, Editor and Director, "Saturday Night" 20:42, 20:45-58
- Gagné, Aimé, Director, National Council, Canadian Public Relations Society, Incorporated; Director, Public Relations, Aluminium Company of Canada Limited 24:48-63
- Gagnon, Mrs. Lysianne, Vice-President (Dailies), La Fédération Professionnelle des Journalistes du Québec, and Reporter, La Presse 38:77-78, 38:84, 38:93-95
- Gagnon, Yves, Président, Les Hebdomas du Canada; Publisher, Le Canada Français (St. Jean); Professor of Journalism, Laval University 29:26-36, 29:51-52, 29:63-64
- Gariépy, Gilles, Président, La Fédération Professionnelle des Journalistes du Québec, Reporter, La Presse 38:76-95
- Garner, William J., Publisher and General Manager, Peterborough Examiner 7:79-80, 7:82-91, 7:94-102
- Gauthier, Jean-Louis, President, CHLT Télé 7 Limitée, Sherbrooke, Télémedia (Québec) Limitée 37:17
- Gauthier, Jean-Robert, Director of Personnel, La Presse (Montréal) 23:54-55, 23:64-65
- Gellner, John, Vice-President, "Canadian Scene" 18:35-37, 18:40-41
- Giguère, Roland, President and Director General, Télé-Métropole Corporation, CFTM-TV (Montréal) 41:9-27
- Gilbert, Gabriel, Executive Member C.D.N.P.A., Member Executive Committee Canadian Press; Publisher "Le Soleil" 1:10, 1:20, 2:24-26
- Gillespie, Dr. Edgar D., Chairman, Audio-Visual Committee, The Canadian Home and School and Parent-Teacher Federation (Incorporated) 9:29-42
- Gilmour, George, Vice-President, Business Publications Division, Maclean-Hunter Limited 19:59-80
- Gingras, Marcel, Chief Editor, Le Droit (Ottawa-Hull) 10:53-54, 10:58, 10:65
- Glassford, W. B., President, Business Press Editors' Association; Editor, "Modern Power and Engineering" 18:66-77
- Goodis, Jerry, Advertising Executive 21:9-26
- Goodman, Edwin A., Q.C., Counsel and Director, Baton Broadcasting Limited 40:9-41
- Goodman, Martin, Vice-President, Canadian Society of Professional Journalists: Managing Editor, Toronto Daily Star 15:10, 15:18-20, 15:27-28, 15:35-38, 16:20, 16:23, 16:28-29, 16:36-38
- Goodson, William, President, Montreal Standard Publishing Company Limited 24:12-27, 24:45
- Gordon, Ruth, Editor, "Canadian Scene" 18:33-38
- Graham, John W., Q.C., Chairman of the Board, Rogers Broadcasting Limited 42:9-10, 42:16-20, 42:25
- Gratton, Aurèle, Vice-President and Director General, Le Droit 10:50-66
- Gray, Jack, Director, Association of Canadian Television and Radio Artists 42:45-63
- Gray, Walter, Vice-President, Hopkins, Hedlin Limited, Economics and Communications Consultants, Toronto 34:9-28
- Griffiths, Frank, C.A., President, Western Broadcasting Company Limited 37:29, 37:45-46

- Griffiths, Stuart W., President and Managing Director, Bushnell Communications Limited 39:48-66
- Grosart, Senator Allister 14:32-44
- Gzowski, Peter, Editor, Maclean's Magazine 21:28-46
- Hacker, Cliff, President, The Western Regional Newspapers Group; Publisher, Abbotsford Sumas and Matsqui News (Abbotsford and Matsqui, British Columbia) 29:73-75, 29:83-84
- Haidasz, Dr. Stanley, MP, (Parkdale) 18:40
- Hallman, Eugene, Vice-President and General Manager (English Network) Canadian Broadcasting Corporation 30:18, 30:39-41, 30:45, 30:48-49, 30:51-60, 30:65, 30:69-72
- Hamill, Trevor, Director, "Canadian Scene" 18:37-39
- Hamilton, Don, Vice-President, Moffat Broadcasting Limited; Manager, CKLG and CKLG-FM (Vancouver) 35:40-42
- Hamilton, Miss Margaret, Vice-President and Publishing Executive, Thomson Newspapers Limited 7:44, 7:49-53, 7:57-63, 7:68-69, 7:72-79
- Hancox, Ralph, Editor, The Reader's Digest 33:29-30, 33:33-41
- Hanlon, Michael, Editor, Canadian Magazine and the Star Weekly 24:32-33, 24:38-46
- Harrington, Michael, Editor St. John's Evening Telegram, Newfoundland 2:56-69
- Hartford, Donald, President, CFRB Limited (Toronto), Standard Broadcasting Corporation Limited 38:50-52, 38:57-74
- Harris, Charles A., Second Vice-President, Canadian Public Relations Society, Incorporated; Director of Public Relations, Canadian National Railways 24:51-63
- Harris, Stephen, Co-Editor, Octopus (Ottawa) 28:12-13, 28:25-36, 28:43-61
- Hazel, Fred, Managing Editor, The Telegraph-Journal (Saint John, New Brunswick) 5:63
- Heal, Douglas W., National Secretary, The Canadian Public Relations Society, Incorporated; Vice-President, Public Relations Division, James Lovick Limited 28:55-61
- Heine, William, Editor, The London Free Press (Ontario) 10:25, 10:67-76, 10:82-88
- Henderson, W. E., General Manager, Agricultural Institute of Canada 20:11-23
- Henry, D. H. W., Q.C., Director of Investigation and Research, Combines Investigation Act 9:7-28
- Herder, Hubert C., President, St. John's Evening Telegram, Newfoundland 2:56-70
- Herder, Stephen P., Vice-President and General Manager, "St. John's Evening Telegram", Newfoundland 2:57-69
- Heritage, Allan, Former President, Toronto Mailers' Union 21:81-97
- Hewittson, Allan, Director, Business Press Editors' Association; Managing Editor, "Canadian Consulting Engineer" 18:76
- Hirtle, John, Vice-President, Acadia Broadcasting Company Limited; General Manager, CKBW (Bridgewater) 39:32-47
- Histed, Allan, President, Hamilton Typographical Union 21:86-88, 21:91-92
- Hodgkinson, Lloyd M., Director, Maclean-Hunter Limited; Publisher, Chatelaine Group 19:47-49, 21:54-68
- Holmes, John, Director General, Canadian Institute of International Affairs 4:7-21
- Homewood, Ernest, Assistant Publisher and General Manager, The United Church Observer 25:11, 25:17-21, 25:42, 25:46-49
- Honderich, Beland, President and Publisher, Toronto Star 16:7-11, 16:15-44
- Honey, Terrence W., Editorial Page Editor, London Free Press (Ontario) 10:33-34, 10:73
- Hoodspith, C. S. Q., Publisher, Squamish Howe-Sound Times, West Vancouver Lions Gate Times, representative, B.C. Weekly Newspapers Association 29:44-46, 29:62, 29:78-79
- Houle, Wilfrid, President, Postal Workers' Union 18:90, 18:100
- Hughes, William, Executive Vice-President, Western Broadcasting Company Limited 37:29-30
- Hull, Norman, Editor, Windsor Star 2:42-54
- Hull, Robert, President, Parliamentary Press Gallery, 1969 3:7-8, 3:13-15, 3:24, 3:26, 3:29-30, 3:33-35
- Hutton, William M., News Director, CKWX Radio Limited (Vancouver) 35:27-29
- Iannuzzi, D. A., Publisher, Corriere Canadese 6:7-26
- Irving, K. C., President, K.C. Irving Limited 5:31-46
- James, Melbourne V., President, Toronto Society, Canadian Public Relations Society, Incorporated; Public Relations Manager, Toronto Area, Bell Canada 24:51-52, 24:58-61
- Jarmain, Edwin R., Chairman of the Board, Jarmain Cable Systems Limited 42:32-42
- Jarmain, W. Edwin, President, Jarmain Cable Systems Limited 42:28-42
- Jennings, Mrs. Douglas, Vice-President, "Canadian Scene" 18:35, 18:38, 18:42
- Joel, Aubrey, Vice-President, Canadian Business Press; President, Southam Business Publications 18:44-66, 19:11, 19:14, 19:21, 19:25-26, 19:29, 19:32
- Johnson, Chris, Editor, Cabal 6 (Sudbury) 28:11, 28:14, 28:28-30, 28:47, 28:54, 28:58-60

- Johnson, Nicholas, Commissioner, Federal Communications Commission, (Washington, DC) 32:9-50
- Jones, Lawrence, Assistant Director of Information Services, University of Toronto 17:18-19
- Jotcham, T. Denis, Secretary Treasurer, The Institute of Canadian Advertising; Vice-President, Eastern Division, Manager (Montreal), Foster Advertising Limited 39:85-86, 39:91-107
- Juneau, Pierre, Chairman, Canadian Radio-Television Commission 26:34-61
- Kay, Barry, Chairman, Toronto Chapter, Business Press Editors' Association; Editor, "Canadian Paint and Finishing" 18:78-79
- Keefe, George, First Vice-President, Business Press Editors' Association; Editor, "Canadian Industrial Equipment News" 18:70, 18:73-78
- Kelly, Fraser, Political Editor, The Telegram, Toronto 8:19, 8:30-31
- Kielty, Terry, General Manager, CFRA-CFMO (Ottawa) 39:22-23
- Kierans, Hon. Eric, Minister of Communications and Postmaster General 18:80-110
- Kirschbaum, Dr. J. M., President, Canada Ethnic Press Federation 18:9-28, 18:36, 18:40-41
- Knight, C. N., Station Manager, CFPL-Radio 36:11-12, 36:15, 36:24
- Knight, Victor, National President, Association of Canadian Television and Radio Artists 42:43-64
- Knox, James, Business Manager, Toronto Life 22:74, 22:77-86
- Kope, Orv, General Manager, CHAT Radio and CHAT-TV, (Mecicine Hat) 39:67-82
- LaFrance, Pierre, News Director, La Presse (Montreal) 23:47-60
- Laidlaw, W. R., News Director, CFLP-TV, CFLP Broadcasting Limited (London, Ontario) 36:25
- Lanning, Beverly E., Vice-President, Finance, and Treasurer, The London Free Press 10:29-30
- Larone, Ken, Metro-Mirror Publishing Limited, The Mirror (Don Mills, Ontario) 29:40-42
- LaRue, Stephen R., Vice-President and Managing Director, Time International of Canada Limited 22:9-34
- Laurin, Jean, Advertising Broker, Les Hebdo A-1 Incorporated 29:62
- Laxton, John, Legal Counsel, Georgia Straight (Vancouver) 28:16-28, 28:36-48, 28:59-60
- Lefolii, Ken, Broadcaster and Commentor 21:98-116
- Légaré, Jean, Permanent Secretary, Les Hebdo du Canada 29:33, 29:48-49
- Lind, Philip B., Director of Public Affairs, Rogers Cable T.V. Limited 42:15-16, 42:26-27
- Louthood, Lewis, Vice-President, Newspaper Relations, Montreal Standard Publishing Co. Ltd. 24:15, 24:20-27
- Lowe, Frank, Editor, Weekend Magazine 24:18-20, 24:23
- Lynch, Charles, Chief of Southam News Services 3:8-12, 3:16-34
- MacBeth, Mrs. C. I., Editor and Publisher, Milverton Sun (Ontario) 29:52-53
- McCabe, St. Clair, Executive-President and Managing Director, Thomson Newspapers Limited 7:42-79
- McCaffrey, Gordon, Assistant Director of Legislation Department, Canadian Labour Congress 11:106-107
- McCormack, Thelma H., Professor of Sociology, York University 25:69-79
- McCreath, Ross A., Vice-President and General manager, All-Canada Radio and Television Limited 35:19-20
- McCullum, Hugh, President, Canadian Church Press; Editor, Canadian Churchman 25:9-20
- McCurdy, H. T., President, CJAD Limited (Montreal), Standard Broadcasting Limited 38:47-48, 38:59-69
- McDonald, Clyde H., General Manager, Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association 1:12, 1:20, 1:23-24
- McDonald, Dick, Reporter, Montreal Star 6:50, 6:55-56, 6:59, 6:61, 6:64-68, 6:71, 6:73
- MacDonald, Donald, President, Canadian Labour Congress 11:90-95, 11:102-119
- Macdonald, M. D., Editor, The Saskatoon Star-Phoenix 3:38, 3:41-43, 3:48-49, 3:65
- McEachern, Ronald A., Executive Vice-President, Maclean-Hunter Limited 19:34-56, 21:27-28, 21:42-43, 21:47, 21:60
- MacGregor, A. Ross, General Manager, Maclean-Hunter Cable TV Limited 41:64-76
- MacGregor, W. D., Vice-President, Television Section, Canadian Association of Broadcasters 31:14-21, 31:29-30, 31:37-40
- McIntosh, C. Irwin, Immediate Past President, Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association; Publisher, The News-Optimist (North Battleford, Saskatchewan) 29:14-23, 29:90-91, 29:97
- McKenna, J. Louis, President and General Manager, Kings County Record (Sussex, New Brunswick) 29:69-71, 29:78-79, 29:93
- Mackenzie, G. Norris, President, Countryside Holdings Limited 38:9-25
- MacLean, Andrew Y., Chairman, Postal and Parliamentary Committee, Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association; Publisher, The Huron Expositor (Seaforth, Ontario) 29:13-15, 29:94
- MacLellan, Donald Miller, Senior Vice-President, Graphic Arts Industries Association 26:9-20
- McLeod, Dan, Editor, Georgia Straight (Vancouver) 28:15-32, 28:43-51, 28:56-60

- Macleod, James A., Secretary-Treasurer, Acadia Broadcasting Company Limited; Station Manager CKBW (Bridgewater, Nova Scotia) 39:33-47
- McPhail, Thomas L., Professor, Department of Sociology and Communication Arts, Loyola College 26:21-33
- MacPherson, William, Managing Editor, Ottawa Citizen 1:54, 1:59
- Malone, Richard S., General Manager and President of FP Publications Limited; Publisher and Editor-in-Chief of the Winnipeg Free Press 11:7-61
- Mannion, E. J., President and Publisher, Canadian Magazine; President, Southstar Publishers Limited 24:29-46
- Manol, John, General Manager, CKPT (Peterborough) 39:20
- Mansfield, George, General Manager, Canadian Business Press 18:46-51, 18:55-66, 19:26, 19:76, 19:78
- Marchand, Gabriel, President, Canadian Business Press 18:43-65
- Margles, Sidney, Head, Special Events, CJAD Limited (Montreal), Standard Broadcasting Corporation Limited 38:54, 38:61, 38:70-75
- Mauko, Vladimir, Secretary, Canada Ethnic Press Federation 18:17-18, 18:23, 18:27, 18:34
- Melville, Scotty, Editor, Regina Leader-Post 3:40, 3:43, 3:50, 3:53-56, 3:62, 3:64
- Ménard, Serge, Counsel, La Fédération Professionnelle des Journalistes du Québec 38:78-90
- Mercier, A. F., Editor, Perspectives 24:28-29
- Metcalf, Frederick T., President, Maclean-Hunter Cable TV Limited 41:64-77
- Metcalf, William H., Treasurer, Canadian Managing Editors Conference; Managing Editor, "Ottawa Journal" 1:55, 11:67
- Miller, Dr. Allister, Chairman of Editorial Board, Norht Renfrew Times (Deep River, Ontario) 29:59-61
- Miller, Lou, President-Publisher, The Monitor (Montreal); Provincial Director, Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association; Vice-President, Quebec Weekly Newspapers Association 29:54-56, 29:83
- Mitchell, J. R., Executive Vice-President, Moffat Broadcasting Limited 35:37-40, 35:44-49
- Moffat, Randall L., President, Moffat Broadcasting Limited 35:31-50
- Mokrzycki, Lech, Advertising Consultant, Canada Ethnic Press Federation 18:14-23, 18:34-35
- Morris, Joseph, Executive Vice-President, Canadian Labour Congress 11:99, 11:100, 11:112
- Mounce, Frederic, General Manager, Halifax Herald Limited 12:14-16, 12:33
- Munro, Ross, Vice-President and Publisher, The Edmonton Journal; Director, Southam Press Limited 13:15, 13:17, 13:20-24, 13:28, 13:33-36, 13:39-43, 13:46-48
- Murray, Mrs. Margaret, Publisher, Bridge River-Lillooet News (British Columbia) 29:64-69, 29:98
- Nash, Frank, Vice-President, Finance, Selkirk Holdings Limited 35:12, 35:16-17
- Nash, Knowlton, Director, Information Programmes, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation 30:68-74
- Neufeld, Ernie, Managing Editor, Weyburn Review (Saskatchewan) 29:91-92
- Newman, Peter, Editor-in-Chief, Toronto Star 16:11-18, 16:20, 16:36, 16:40, 16:42, 16:44
- Nichols, L. M., Vice-President, Finance, Baton Broadcasting Limited 40:14-23, 40:30-31, 40:37
- Nichols, T. E., Vice-President and Publisher, The Hamilton Spectator 13:78-88
- Nobleman, William, President, "Saturday Night" 20:41-63
- O'Brien, John L., Q.C., Director, The Reader's Digest Association (Canada) Limited 33:24, 33:26, 33:31
- Ogilvie, Glen, Vice-President for Canada, American Newspaper Guild 1:30-33, 1:37-40, 1:45, 1:47
- O'Hara, Terry, Editor, This Paper Belongs to the People (Kingston, Ontario) 28:25, 28:29, 28:35, 28:43-61
- O'Leary, Senator M. Grattan 20:63-78
- O'Neil, Pierre, Secretary, Parliamentary Press Gallery 3:12, 3:16, 3:24, 3:28, 3:33-34
- O'Regan, Brian, President, Ottawa Society, Canadian Public Relations Society, Incorporated 24:51-54, 24:57, 24:60
- Osler, Mrs. B. B., President, "Canadian Scene" 18:29-42
- Owen, Robert D., Past President, Canadian Managing Editors' Conference; Editor, The Whig-Standard, (Kingston) 1:53, 1:56-57, 1:60
- Ozard, Bill, Station CJCH (Halifax) 39:31-32
- Pageau, Fred, Director, Postal Rates and Classification Branch, Post Office Department 18:105-106
- Parisien, Jean, Vice-President, Gelco Enterprises Limited 23:41
- Péladeau, Pierre, President, Québecor Incorporated 23:9-33
- Pelletier, Hon. Gérard, Secretary of State 43:9-29
- Penn, David F., Vice-President and General Manager, CHCT-TV, Calgary Television Limited 35:22
- Picard, Laurent, Executive Vice-President, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation 30:23-27, 30:35-38, 30:59, 30:63
- Piché, Claude, Vice-President, (Radio and Television), La Fédération Professionnelle des Jour-

- nalistes du Québec; Reporter "Present" Radio-Canada 38:81, 38:86, 39:93
- Pinckney, John, Publisher, Rosetown Eagle (Saskatchewan) 29:48
- Plant, J.A., Production Manager, CFPL-TV (London, Ontario) 36:22-23
- Pollard, F.W., Director, The Brantford Expositor 10:42
- Potts, J. Lyman, President, Standard Broadcast Productions Limited 38:49-50, 38:52-75
- Preston, Jack, President and General Manager, The Brantford Expositor 10:35-49
- Preston, Peter, Vice-President, Publisher and Executive Editor, The Brantford Expositor 10:38-39, 10:43-48
- Price, Derek A., President, The Montreal Star 14:7-8, 14:11-31
- Pryor, James M., Chairman of the Board, Moffat Broadcasting Limited 35:34-39
- Purcell, Gillis, Retired General Manager, Canadian Press 2:29
- Quick, Donald, Editor, "Engineering and Contract Records" 19:16, 19:31
- Raley, Deane D. Jr., Printing Planning Manager, Corporate Products, Time Incorporated (New York) 22:36
- Ranger, Pierre, Managing Editor, Selection de Reader's Digest (Canada) Limitée 33:32-41
- Renaud, Rev. André, University of Saskatchewan 6:32, 6:33, 6:36-43
- Roche, Douglas, Vice-President, Canadian Church Press, Managing Editor, The United Church Observer 25:12-13, 25:16, 25:20-21
- Rodrigue, Vincent, First Vice-President, Les Hebdomadaires du Canada; Publisher L'Éclaireur-Progrès (St-Georges, Québec) 29:89-90
- Rogers, Allan, Secretary, Countryside Holdings Limited 38:11-24
- Rogers, Bruce, News Commentator, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation 6:28-42
- Rogers, Edward S., President, Rogers Cable TV Limited 42:10-27
- Rumgay, Gordon J., Manager, Magazine Circulation Division, Maclean-Hunter Limited 19:38-46
- Rupert, Robert J., International Representative, American Newspaper Guild 1:33, 11:108
- Russell, George, Bureau Chief, Canadian University Press 17:11
- Ryan, Claude, Editor and Publisher of Le Devoir 2:70-78
- Saint-Martin, Mrs. Fernande, Editor, Chatelaine 21:51-54, 21:61-63, 21:67-68
- Sanburn, Richard, Editor-in-Chief, Calgary Herald 13:54
- Sanders, Mrs. Doreen, Director, Business Press Editors' Association; Editor, Business Quarterly, School of Business Administration, University of Western Ontario 18:78-79
- Saxe, Stewart, President, Canadian University Press 17:8-11
- Scarth, Allan, Editor, The Gateway, University of Alberta 17:17-18
- Scott, David, Editor, The Gazette, University of Western Ontario 17:14-16
- Scott, John M., Editor, Time (Canada) 22:14-35
- Shea, Harold, Senior Member News Department, Halifax Herald Limited 12:9
- Shelford, R. H., Vice-President and General Manager, "Free Press Weekly" 20:24-40
- Sherman, Patrick, Editor, Vancouver Province 13:66
- Sherratt, Fred, Vice-President, (Programming and Operations), and Director of CHUM Limited 39:14-19
- Shoults, A. M., Second Vice-President, The Institute of Canadian Advertising; President, James Lovick Limited 39:88-91, 39:96-108
- Sifton, Michael, President, Armadale Company Limited 3:35-67
- Simon, Norm, Director, Public Relations, Canadian Union of Public Employees 11:106
- Sinclair, George G., Past President, The Institute of Canadian Advertising; President and Chairman of the Board, MacLaren Advertising Company Limited 39:88-91, 39:95, 39:100-106
- Siren, Paul, General Secretary, Association of Canadian Television and Radio Artists 42:48, 42:60-61
- Sisto, Jean, Editor, Le Magazine Maclean 21:32-35
- Sloan, Tom, Chairman of Communication and Journalism, Laval University 3:67-71
- Smith, Michael, Editor, The Journal, St. Mary's University, Halifax 17:16-17
- Smith, Norman, 2nd Vice-President, Canadian Press; Editor, Ottawa Journal 2:38, 11:61-63
- Snelgrove, Ralph, President, CKRV-TV, (Barrie), and Director of CHUM Limited 39:27-28
- Solway, Larry, Vice-President, (Creative Development), and Director of CHUM Limited 39:18-22, 39:27-28
- Somerville, Donald, Publisher, Oliver Chronicle (British Columbia) 29:82-83
- Speers, W. A., President, Broadcast News Limited 2:9-10, 2:13, 2:21, 2:23, 2:29
- Speers, W. A., Vice-President, Selkirk Holdings Limited 35:26-27
- Stevens, Paul, Editor, Sweeney (Oakville, Ontario) 28:11-18, 28:24-30, 28:46-60

- Stewart, W. A., Manager, CHSJ-TV, New Brunswick Broadcasting Company Limited 36:27-31, 36:40-41, 36:46-47
- Struthers, Jim, Manager, CKCK-TV, Regina 3:59, 3:66
- Sutherland, J. R., President, Canadian Press 2:7-41
- Swanson, Frank, Publisher, Calgary Herald; Vice-President, Southam Press Limited 13:51-53
- Switzer, Israel, Chief Technical Officer, Maclean-Hunter Cable TV Limited 41:65-75
- Templeton, Charles, Journalist and Broadcaster 7:23-38
- Thibault, Marc, Director, News and Public Affairs (French Network), Canadian Broadcasting Corporation 30:72
- Thomas, Barry, Media Director, McKim/Benton & Bowles Limited 39:89-90
- Thomas, Harry, Editor, McGill Reporter, McGill University 17:20-21
- Thompson, Ronald, Canadian University Press 17:31
- Thomson, Corey, Vice-President, Radio Futura Limited 38:26-42
- Thomson, W., Executive Vice-President, Regina Leader-Post 3:45, 3:51-59, 3:65, 3:67
- Tietolman, Jack, President, Radio Futura Limited 38:28-41
- Tory, John A., Q.C., General Counsel, Thomson Newspapers Limited 7:39-42
- Turner, Frank, Manager, Editorial Services and Editorial Art Department, Business Publications Division, Maclean-Hunter Limited 19:59-61, 19:65-69, 19:73
- Turner, Murray, Vice-President, Director of Advertising, Totonto Star 16:32
- Vaillancourt, Dr. Henri, Publisher, Le Réveil, (Jonquière, Quebec) 29:38-40
- Verronneau, Gilles, Immediate Past President, Business Press Editors' Association; Editor, "Génie-Construction" 18:69-79
- Villeneuve, André, Information Attaché of Laval University, Editor of Au fil des Événements 17:19-20
- Walker, Frank P., Editor-in-Chief, The Montreal Star 14:9
- Wardell, Brigadier Michael, Publisher, Daily Gleaner, Fredericton 5:65-69
- Warren, Roger W., Director, Countryside Holdings Limited 38:17-18
- Waters, Allan, President and Director, CHUM Limited 39:11-31
- Waters, David, President, Association of English Media Journalists of Quebec 6:43-49
- Westley, Dennis, Editor, Aquarius (St. Catharines) 28:46-61
- Wetzel, Han, Editor, Harbinger, (Toronto) 28:13, 28:22-28, 28:34, 28:49, 28:57
- Whitehead, G. A., News Director, CFPL-Radio, CFPL Broadcasting Limited 36:17
- Wilkes, Warren H., President, The Institute of Canadian Advertising; President, Tandy Advertising Limited 39:82-106
- Williams, Ivor, President, Canadian Managing Editors; Managing Editor, The London Free Press 1:47-63, 10:26
- Williams, Jack, Director of Public Relations, Canadian Labour Congress 11:92
- Willis, I. D., Editor and President, Alliston Herald (Ontario) 29:87-89
- Wingrove, W. C., Station Manager, CFPL-TV, CFPL Broadcasting Limited 36:13-25
- Withers, Frank, Editor, Bugle Gazette-Times (Woodstock, New Brunswick) 29:46-47, 29:62-63, 29:98
- Wood, David, National President, The Canadian Public Relations Society, Incorporated; Director of Informations, Western Cooperative Fertilizers Limited 24:46-63
- Zimmerman, E. Paul, President, The Reader's Digest Association (Canada) Limited 33:9-41

BINDING SECT. FEB 9 1971

